ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) making an appropriation for the payment of taxes on certain lands owned by the United States; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Monday is the 22d. of February—Washington's birthday.

Mr. CONNESS. Why not meet to-morrow?

Mr. ANTHONY. We do not usually meet on Saturday.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 43) for the relief of Milo Sutliff and Levi H. Case—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (No. 47) for the relief of William C. Walker and others—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (C. C. No. 114) for the relief of Daniel Werner—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (C. C. No. 115) for the relief of Darius S. Cole—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (C. C. No. 116) for the relief of William G. Brown—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (No. 160) for the relief of Chapin Hall—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (No. 162) for the relief of Nathaniel McLean, Richard G. Murphy, and Charles E. Flandreau—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (No. 163) for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (No. 39) for the relief of Alexander Cross—to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 19, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CLAIMS OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hold in my hand some papers which have been sent to the Committee on Commerce by the Secretary of State in relation to a claim of Nicaragua upon the Government. I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

Mr. COX. Has the Committee on Commerce already control of the subject?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No further than that these papers have been sent to it.

Mr. COX. These matters have usually been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman desires the matter to go to his committee, I am sure I have no objection; but the Secretary of State addressed these papers to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COX. Well, I have no objection to their remaining there.

The papers were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that, in order to do honor to the 22d. day of February, the birthday of Washington, when the House adjourns to-day it shall stand adjourned till Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. HULBURD, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution authorizing the committee on public expenditures in their investigation of alleged frauds in the New York custom-house, to take testimony in the city of New York by such members of the committee as they may designate, not, however, to exceed three in number.

The resolution was adopted.

INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FENTON asked the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Senate bill No. 66, to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports.

Mr. HERRICK objected.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports of a private nature.

INDIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians residing in Michigan the sum of $190,850; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

WINNEBAGO HALF-BREDS.

Mr. WINDOM, from the same committee, reported back bill of the House No. 194, for the benefit of half-breeds and mixed-bloods of the Winnebago tribe of Indians; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSPORT UNION.

On motion of Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a joint resolution to provide for the payment of the officers and crew of the United States steam transport Union, wrecked November 23, 1861, off the coast of North Carolina, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SALARIES OF DEPUTY NAVAL OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of deputy naval officers at New York for increase of salary, and sundry papers in relation to that subject, and the same were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ISAAC R. DILLER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back a bill of the House for the relief of Isaac R. Diller, and asked that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) making appropriation for the payment of taxes on certain lands owned by the United States.

EX-GOVERNOR BRIGHAM YOUNG.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 130) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust and settle the accounts of ex-Governor Brigham Young as ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Utah; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ABANDONED REBEL TENEMENTS.

Mr. BLOW, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the renting of abandoned lands, tenements, and houses in insurrectionary States, and for the care and employment of persons therein set free by the proclamation of the President of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the committee on rebellious States.

WASHINGTON GUARDIAN SOCIETY.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill granting certain privileges to the Guardian Society of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES REGISTER FOR 1864.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Public Printing, reported back adversely a resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to purchase one thousand copies of the United States Register for 1864; as published by J. Disturnell, at a price not exceeding fifty cents a copy, and to charge the same to the contingent fund, and moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

R. L. B. CLARKE.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ALBERT BROWN.

Mr. HALE, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 92) for the relief of Albert Brown, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Albert Brown, of Kingston, New Hampshire, the sum of $14,100 dollars, in full payment for one hundred Army wagons manufactured by him under a contract made with Morris S. Miller, quartermaster United States Army, dated July 1, 1861, and duly delivered to the order of the Quartermaster General, dated August 13, 1861.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does not that bill make an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I object to its being considered now.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

ALEXANDER CROSS.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a joint resolution for the relief of Alexander Cross, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read. It recites that Alexander Cross heretofore filed his petition in the Court of Claims praying relief on account of certain rents alleged to be due from the United States to him as assignee of Daniel Saffarans; that the Court of Claims, in January, 1859, rendered a decision adverse to the prayer of the petition on the sole ground of an alleged technical defect in the assignment of the lease. It therefore resolves that the case be remanded to the Court of Claims for further hearing on the testimony heretofore filed therein, and on such other testimony as either party may take and file pursuant to the rules of the court, and that if it shall appear that the petitioner is entitled to the rents, if any, due thereon by the United States, the court is authorized to render judgment therefor in his favor, notwithstanding any technical defect in the assignment of the lease.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JACOB WEBER.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of Jacob Weber; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY, KENTUCKY.

Mr. WADSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the benefit of Montgomery county, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WADSWORTH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the benefit of citizens of Montgomery county, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

NAVIGATION OF POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. DUMONT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back a bill to provide for the improvement of the Potomac river; which was recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DUMONT asked the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee for the District of Columbia have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

GEORGE PIERPONT AND OTHERS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the petition of George Pierpont and others for increase of pay of assistant assessors, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. ANDREW G. MILLER.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation touching the allegations against Hon. Andrew G. Miller, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, as contained in the memorials heretofore referred to said committee by the House as a subject for inquiry.

J. M. SULLIVAN.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of J. M. Sullivan for an invalid pension for wounds received; and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN L. DIXON.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John L. Dixon in relation to the purchase of corn, and that the petitioner be allowed to withdraw his petition and papers for reference to the Court of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 15) to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank;

An act (No. 26) to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington, District of Columbia;

An act (No. 79) to incorporate the Providence hospital in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; and

An act (No. 77) to amend an act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company.

OBJECTION DAY.

Mr. HALE. I ask, by unanimous consent, that this day be considered as objection day in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HALE moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. HOLMAN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

CHAPIN HALL.

A bill (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of Chapin Hall.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Chapin Hall, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500, in full for damages sustained by him in consequence of the taking and using his lumber, at Louisville, Kentucky, by General McCook's division of the United States Army, in September, 1862.

It appears from the report that the petitioner is a resident of Pennsylvania, engaged in manufacturing and dealing in lumber; that in September, 1862, he had a large amount of boards piled upon the common in the northern portion of Louisville, Kentucky; that on or about the 26th of September, 1862, a division of the United States Army, under command of Major General McCook, came into the city and encamped on the common near where the lumber was piled. The division was without tents or shelter of any kind, and the soldiers, by order of General McCook, took from the piles two hundred and ninety-eight thousand feet of boards of different qualities, valued at $4,470, and used the same for building tents, shelters, and floors. The petitioner applied to General McCook for relief. The general, in the presence of Hon. R. MALLORY, stated that he ordered the soldiers to take and use the boards, and, further, promised that the proper officer should arrange so that the petitioner should be paid. After repeated efforts the petitioner failed to obtain anything but promises. Immediately after the army removed from the encampment all the boards left were promptly and carefully gathered up by an agent employed by the petitioner, when it appeared that one hundred and fifteen thousand feet were burned, carried away, or otherwise destroyed, and the balance, so gathered, were greatly injured by being muddy and exposed to the weather, split by handling and use, and sawed, cut, and nailed, for which the petitioner claims compensation in the sum of $2,500.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MILLO SUTLIFF, ETC.

A bill (H. R. No. 43) for the relief of Milo Sutliff and Levi H. Case.

The bill provides that there be paid to Milo Sutliff and Levi H. Case, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,938, in full of their claim for wool seized, condemned, and sold by the collector of Buffalo in 1849.

It appears from the report that Sutliff & Case, in January, 1849, contracted with William A. Clark, of Toronto, Canada West, to deliver to them in Buffalo, free of all charges, fifteen thousand pounds of wool, at twenty-two cents per pound, upon which they paid $2,938. It also appears that, subsequent to the contract, in consequence of the embarrassed circumstances of Clark, the wool was delivered to Sutliff & Case at Queenstown, in Canada; Clark, however, agreeing to ship the wool to Buffalo and pay all expenses, according to the original contract. Instead of shipping the wool to Sutliff & Case direct, it was sent by Clark, or his agent, John A. Gamble, with other wool belonging to him, to Messrs. Coit & Farnham, commission merchants of Buffalo, and invoiced the same at ten cents per pound. The collector at Buffalo, believing the wool to be fraudulently invoiced below its real value, to avoid the duty, caused it to be seized, and it was afterwards condemned and sold, and the proceeds, after paying costs and expenses, amounting to $2,986 67, were duly paid into the Treasury of the United States. The evidence establishes, to the entire satisfaction of the committee, that Sutliff & Case had no knowledge of the fraudulent entry, had no interest whatever in the payment of the duties, and were free from all blame in the matter. The consequence, if the forfeiture is not released by the Government, therefore, will be that innocent parties, chargeable with no crime or neglect, either by themselves or those over whose conduct they had any control, and for whose acts they are in nowise responsible, will be made to suffer.

A penalty for a violation of the revenue laws, or any other, ought to be visited upon the guilty parties, including, of course, all who in any way aid or connive in the violation. But there it should terminate; to carry it further so as to punish, with this extreme severity, those who are wholly innocent of any fault or neglect by themselves or their agents, would be an act of injustice and oppression. It also appears that it has been usual for the Government, in similar cases, to remit the penalty.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM C. WALKER AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 47) for the relief of William C. Walker and others.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $664 90 to the following persons, and in the sums following, namely: to William C. Walker $83 25; to John S. Emrie $70; to A. G. Crane $97 50; to George W. Pilbean $21 50; to E. Goodrich $87 75; to Jacob Cox $11 25; to Thomas Lamkin $92 25; to Porter Durell $90; to Matthew Randall $96 75; to David Lynn $5 50; to Andrew Lisk $4; to William Burkes $3; to William Depuy $2 25; for labor done and performed by the above named persons respectively on the bridge across the Ohio river and floating battery at Paducah, under the direction of General John C. Frémont, while commanding the army of the West.

It appears from the report that William C. Walker and the other persons mentioned in the bill, who are citizens of Indiana, were employed in September, 1861, under the authority of Major General John C. Frémont, to aid in the building of a bridge of boats across the Ohio river, and a floating battery at or near Paducah, Kentucky. Certificates were given to the persons employed by Captain Roderick, who superintended the works, specifying the amount of labor performed by each, at what wages employed per day, and the amount due. These certificates were sent to St. Louis while the commission of which Hon. Joseph Holt was a member was in session, but, from some misunderstanding growing out of a statement made at the assistant quartermaster's department of that city, they were not filed before that commission, and have never been paid. In consequence of the irregular manner in which military operations were carried on in the West during the year 1861, it would appear that these certificates are not in proper form for adjustment by the quartermaster's department; but inasmuch as these claimants performed the labor for the Government, and have not been paid, the committee are of the opinion that the necessary appropriation should be made to pay the sum due, amounting, in the aggregate to $664 90.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

A bill (H. R. No. 161) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Josiah O. Armes, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,500 in full for damages sustained by him in consequence of the burning of his buildings and the destruction of his property at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia, by the United States troops.

It appears from the report that the property of the petitioner, situated at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia, consisting of a large stone house, together with sundry other buildings on his farm, was destroyed by fire by troops of the United States, also his shrubbery, fruit trees, and fences, during the months of December, 1861, and January, 1862. The evidence submitted establishes the fact that the buildings belonging to the petitioner described in his petition were burned during the period mentioned by troops in the service of the United States, and apparently by order of the officer in command, for military reasons, the buildings affording shelter for the enemy's pickets. The evidence submitted fixed the value of the buildings destroyed at $11,415, independent of fruit trees, shrubbery, picket fences, and other property, which the committee do not deem legitimate claims against the Government. But the committee, in view of the ex parte character of the testimony necessarily received on the question of the value of the property destroyed, have fixed the value of the buildings destroyed at $9,500. The loyalty of the petitioner is established beyond a question. The committee have not deemed it necessary to consider the question whether property belonging to loyal citizens destroyed by the troops of our Government for military purposes during the present war should be paid for. But, following the policy heretofore adopted by the Government in all former wars within the national limits, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That bill involves important questions, and I do not object if it be agreed that the bill shall be thoroughly considered in the House.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NATHANIEL McLEAN AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 162) for the relief of Nathaniel McLean, Richard G. Murphy, and Charles E. Flandreau.

The bill provides that there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nathaniel McLean, $916 50; to Richard G. Murphy, $1,700 32; and to Charles E. Flandreau, $189 32, for additional pay for their services as agents for the Sioux of Minnesota during the respective periods when each served in that capacity after the treaty of July 23, 1851, with said Indians, until March 3, 1857, at which last date the pay of that agency was raised by law to $1,500 per annum.

It appears from the report that Nathaniel McLean was appointed Indian agent of the Sioux, in Minnesota, on the 3d of December, 1849, and continued to hold the office until the 22d of May, 1853, when he was succeeded by Richard G. Murphy, who officiated until the 16th of October, 1856, when he was succeeded by Charles E. Flandreau, who continued to hold the office until the 3d of March, 1857. The compensation was then but $1,000 per annum, although it was understood by all that the salary should be increased to $1,500 per annum, being the same as agents of the other tribes received. This was recommended by Luke Lea, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in a letter sent to Governor Ramsey, who was also acting as superintendent of Indian affairs of Minnesota at that time. Governor Ramsey also recommended the same. George W. Manypenny, Commissioner of Indian Affairs in 1853, and Willis A. Gorman, Governor of Minnesota and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs, also recommended the same. More lately, A. B. Greenwood, the recent Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recommended an increase to the sum which other agents received. William J. Cullen, ex-superintendent of Indian affairs, also urged upon the Government the justice of such allowance. All of these give as their reasons for an extra compensation that the duties of the agent were much more arduous than a large majority of the other agencies; that the disbursements were much greater, and that the receipts exceeded nearly all others; the removal of the Sioux was attended with much trouble, and that the duties in other respects warranted the salary to be equal to the sum paid the other agents. Subsequently, after the retiring of the last-mentioned memorialist, the salary was increased to the sum of $1,500.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET L. STEVENS.

A bill (H. R. No. 195) for the relief of Margaret L. Stevens, widow of General Isaac I. Stevens. The bill and report were read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I must object to that bill, because it raises the salary of a man after the services have been performed and he is dead.

CHARLES ANDERSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 163) for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to pay to Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas, the sum of $1,041 66, being the amount certified by the Quartermaster General to be due to John James for back rent of camp Hudson, in Texas, prior to the 1st of July, 1859, the same having been regularly assigned to the said Charles Anderson.

The report, which was read, shows that John James, of Texas, had a claim against the United States for the rent of camp Hudson, in Texas, prior to the 1st of July, 1859, which was allowed by the Quartermaster General, who asked for its payment in a special estimate made to the Secretary of War on March 9, 1860. The item was also inserted in the Army appropriation bill in the House of Representatives in 1862, but it was struck out in the Senate because of the action of the State of Texas toward disunion. It was also embraced in the estimate of appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1862. Charles Anderson, in September, 1860, was a loyal citizen of the United States, residing in Texas, which State he was compelled to leave by the "alien enemy act" of the confederate States; and in doing so he exchanged his property, which he could not take away with him, with John James for the latter's claim alluded to above, which is regularly assigned to the said Anderson.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

JACOB S. LOWERY.

A bill (H. R. No. 171) for the relief of Jacob S. Lowery and George S. Gray.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, objected.

WILLIAM G. BROWN.

A bill (H. R. C. C. No. 116) for the relief of William G. Brown.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to William G. Brown the sum of ninety-nine dollars, in full for stone or other materials used by order of the agents of the Government in the construction of a pier in Little Sodus bay, on Lake Ontario, in 1853.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

F. A. HOLDEN ET AL.

A bill (H. R. No. 226) for the relief of F. A. Holden, Eli Thayer, Hannah Bexton, D. W. Frisby, and Hiram Bloss.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, objected.

DARIUS S. COLE.

A bill (H. R. C. C. No. 115) for the relief of Darius S. Cole.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Darius S. Cole the sum of $2,224, in full for materials furnished to the United States for the construction of the pier in Little Sodus bay, Lake Ontario.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL WORMER.

A bill (H. R. C. C. No. 114) for the relief of Daniel Wormer.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Daniel Wormer the sum of $1,778 36, in full for all percentage retained by the Government on payments heretofore made to him, and for all timber or other materials furnished by him in the construction of the pier at Little Sodus bay, on Lake Ontario.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

HARRIET MORRIS ET AL.

A bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Harriet and Emily W. Morris, unmarried sisters of the late Commodore H. W. Morris.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It seems to me that this bill introduces an entirely new principle in our pension laws. It proposes to give two pensions for one death, and I must object.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS, ETC.

Joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Potawatomi Indians residing in the State of Michigan $190,850.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would inquire if that bill and the accompanying report have been printed?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill was reported this morning, and has not been printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think, then, we had better stop where we are, and therefore I move that the committee rise and report the bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOLMAN reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report to the House sundry bills with a recommendation that they do pass.

The SPEAKER. The bills reported from the Committee of the Whole will be read, and if any gentleman desires a separate vote upon any one of them, they will indicate their desire.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It was understood that the bill (H. R. No. 161) for the relief of Josiah O. Ames should be postponed for consideration.

The SPEAKER. To what time?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that its consideration be postponed until one week from to-day after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KING] wishes to offer an amendment, that it may be printed and come up when the bill comes up for consideration.

Mr. KING. The amendment I desire to offer is a bill already printed, and I propose to offer it now as a substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. It is that the proposed amendment is substantially the substitution of a general bill for one of a private nature.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that that cannot be done except by unanimous consent. The Chair, however, is not aware of the nature of the amendment proposed.

Mr. KING. I admit it is the substitution of a general bill in reference to the subject to which the private bill relates.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair must rule it out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question upon all the bills which have been reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. I think it better, however, that a separate vote be taken on each bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the several bills reported will be considered as ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and the vote will be taken separately on their passage. There was no objection.

The following bills were then passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of Chapin Hall.

A bill (H. R. No. 43) for the relief of Milo Sutliff and Levi H. Case.

A bill (H. R. No. 47) for the relief of William C. Walker and others.

A bill (H. R. No. 162) for the relief of Nathaniel McLean, Richard G. Murphy, and Charles E. Flandreau.

A bill (H. R. No. 163) for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas.

A bill (H. R. C. C. No. 116) for the relief of William G. Brown.

A bill (H. R. C. C. No. 115) for the relief of Darius S. Cole.

A bill (H. R. C. C. No. 114) for the relief of Daniel Wormer.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the several bills were passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that two of the standing committees of the House were ordered to report to-day—the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee of Ways and Means.

TRANSFERS FROM ARMY TO NAVY.

Mr. DEMING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back joint resolution (S. No. 28) relating to the transfer of persons from the military service to the naval service, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. DEMING. I will state that the first section of the joint resolution authorizes the provost marshals to enlist seamen. The second section authorizes the President of the United States to transfer seamen into the naval service of the United States from the regiments of the Army.

The necessity for immediate action on the bill grows out of the fact that there is already a vessel at Fortress Monroe which the Department wish to send to San Francisco, and it is impossible to obtain seamen in any other way. There are also several other vessels which the Department wish to dispatch to the same port. There is a great dearth of seamen at present. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DEMING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF M'CLELLAN'S REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it be laid on the table:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House fifty thousand additional copies of General McClellan's report.

Mr. COX. I move to amend the resolution by reducing the number to ten thousand.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order pending the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion to enable me to submit the amendment.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I will withdraw for that purpose.

Mr. COX. I then submit the amendment; and I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have already ordered ten thousand copies of this report without the documents. We have received but about nine thousand. There should have been about fifty to each member; but we have only got forty-five. I do not know whether we ought to have a committee of investigation on this subject or not. The numbers we have ordered have not been furnished, either by fault of the printer or of the folding-room. I am under the impression that members upon that side of the House, as well as on this side, will not object to ten thousand additional. It will not more than supply the reasonable demands of our constituents for this document.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I now move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—67.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herck, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kaibfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John H. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweat, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. Whitto, and Fernando Wood—74.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. BAXTER, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Objection was made.

Mr. STEWART stated that he had paired with Mr. THAYER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is the resolution now open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move then to amend it by adding, "and ten thousand additional copies of the report of Major General Grant."

Mr. COX. I raise the point of order that that has not been submitted to the Committee on Printing, and cannot come in in that shape.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COX. I move the previous question on the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will allow the resolution, together with the amendment I suggested, to be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COX. I will withdraw my objection to the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot withdraw the objection. It is a matter of law, and not even the unanimous consent of the House can dispense with it.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The law requires that all propositions for the printing of extra numbers shall be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COX. Well, if the gentleman will introduce his proposition, and have it referred to the Committee on Printing, I will vote for it when it is brought back.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit the whole matter to be recommitted to the committee, they can report it back immediately.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Ohio then to withdraw the demand for the previous question, in order that I may make a motion to commit both propositions to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COX. There is no necessary connection between the two resolutions. If the gentleman will vote for our resolution, and then bring in his own, we will sustain it when it comes properly from the committee.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps the gentleman from Ohio will consent to include General Butler's reports?

Mr. COX. General Butler's!

Mr. DAWES. Yes, General Butler's. The gentleman's early education ought to induce him to stand by General Butler.

The House divided on the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 62, noes 61.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. Cox, and WASHBURN of Illinois, as tellers.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 63.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will yield gracefully.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kallbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweat, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scheuck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Upton, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—69.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio, stated that Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, was unavoidably absent.

Mr. TRACY stated that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. MILLER.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN gave notice that he had paired with his colleague, Mr. NORTON, until Tuesday next upon all questions, Mr. NORTON having been called away by unavoidable business.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon Mr. Cox's amendment to reduce the number of copies from fifty thousand to ten thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question now being upon agreeing to the resolution as amended,

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kallbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweat, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scheuck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Upton, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—64.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of House bill No. 51, to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, reported from the select committee on the subject, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. KALBFLEISCH] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means was ordered yesterday to report back the gold bill to-day. The committee is now ready to report, if it have the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. KALBFLEISCH] is on the floor, and cannot be taken off by the report.

Mr. STEVENS. The report is ready whenever there is an opportunity to present it.

Mr. FENTON. I ask my colleague over the way to give way one moment while I ask to have a bill referred to a committee.

Mr. ELIOT. It is objected to all round.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Mr. Speaker, the eloquent appeal made by the chairman of the committee on emancipation in behalf of the freedmen of African descent, and his very clever argument to prove the legal power of Congress, as well as his ingenious mode of attempting to demonstrate the sound policy of establishing the contemplated Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, have, I am compelled to say, signally failed to change my former opinions on that subject, and the remarks made by the gentleman from California were not of a character to shake my previous convictions relative thereto.

There are many other reasons which may be offered in opposition to the passage of the bill, aside from the objections already alluded to in the minority report of the same committee; and although they should, in my opinion, be deemed sufficient of themselves to cause us to pause carefully, and reflect, and weigh without bias its provisions before it be allowed to become a law, they are, nevertheless, worthy of consideration as furnishing at least food for meditation.

The best and I believe the most sincere friends of these freedmen of African descent only demand that they be taken care of during their infancy as freedmen, and a wholesome guardianship be placed over them during that period. This in my opinion should be done by the philanthropist and the charitable.

If these freedmen are incapable of assuming the rights and privileges to which they seem to be entitled under the emancipation proclamation of the President or any legislative action, and are mentally unable to perform the duties devolving upon them in their new social relationship, and are insensible of the fact that they are really freedmen, they should be made aware of it at once to the fullest extent their perception will admit; and to this end Government might perhaps be justified in lending its aid. Not however by undertaking to regulate their affairs through the agency of Government officials; for experience must have long since convinced the most skeptical that there is no safety in such a system as is proposed by the bill under consideration. Let the intentions of its framers have been ever so pure and honest, the proposed manner of putting the bureau into operation is defective, unjustifiable, and fallacious from its inception; it would be next to impossible to find so large a number of employes as would be necessary to honestly and faithfully carry out the benevolent intentions of the bill.

If it is intended to cultivate the confiscated or abandoned lands or plantations and improvements as they now exist, and place these freedmen upon them with an official to govern and control their labor and domestic affairs, as appears to be contemplated, who can doubt for a moment that it will institute a species of servitude which must prove worse in its results than the system of slavery it seeks to destroy? It ought not therefore to receive the countenance of any one who is opposed to supplanting one evil he knows by another he knows not of, and which may prove the greater of the two.

If on the other hand it is intended to divide the confiscated or abandoned lands into small parcels, tenements and all necessary outbuildings will have to be erected for the accommodation of the freedmen, and farming utensils and cattle procured for their use.

Should the Supreme Court of the United States decide—as I do not doubt in the slightest they will—that the Government only acquires the right to hold confiscated real estate during the lifetime of the person attainted of treason, the incurring of the vast expenditure necessary to carry out the purposes of the bill upon so slight a tenure would be madness in the extreme, entirely unwarrantable; and granting even that it could be legally done, it is without a semblance of justification to urge in its favor. I admit that a majority of the members of this House may and do express views differing from those I entertain in regard to the proper construction of the language of the Constitution controlling this subject. If, however, we allow our legislation in the absence of all legal adjudication, in matters of such vast importance and upon which opinions appear to differ so widely, to be governed by our political impulses and not by the written law which we have sworn to observe, our acts must of necessity be variable and contradictory, and may cause the commission of wrongs which can never be atoned for.

There does not appear to be any limitation as to the amount of money to be expended under the provisions of the bill. The general power it confers to issue bonds for purposes named therein without fixing the amount, even admitting the whole action to be within the scope and power of congressional legislation, is one which should only be delegated in cases of the most urgent necessity.

The amount of money needed for this experiment—for I can call it by no other name—should have been stated in the bill, and the expenditure confined within its limit, for it is after all only a trial, the anticipated results of which may fail to be realized. I must confess that I look upon it with doubt and suspicion and entertain no confidence in its ultimate success. The only case that I know of bearing the least resemblance to the proposed plan was that provided for in the will of John Randolph for freeing and colonizing his slaves; and although this was sanctioned by law, it proved nevertheless a total failure.

I believe that legislation upon this subject should be left with the States, where it properly belongs. They are themselves, as distinct political societies, capable of managing their own affairs and governing their own people, and it is not our province to seek in this manner to interfere with or attempt to destroy their legislative powers.

The proposed project would enable the Federal Government to seize upon lands originally abandoned by their loyal owner under circumstances entirely beyond his control, select a class of people who are to hold them, and prescribe the terms by which they are to be held; an exercise of power more despotic than the imperial Government of Russia within any portion of its territory. It destroys at a blow the solemnly guarded power of States over their lands and inhabitants, and may give to social and political enemies in remote portions of the country supreme legislation in those matters of State and domestic concern which a free people claim exclusively the right to exercise themselves.

I apprehend that no portion of the American people would for one moment permit their lands to be thus taken from them and placed in possession of the negro race without a bloody resistance. The descendants of a free race who had been despoiled of their rightful inheritance, prompted by a determination to remove an ever-present humiliation, would require for their permanent subjugation a military force that would impoverish our people and jeopardize our liberties.

The project is a disloyal and unpatriotic impediment in the way of restoring this once happy Union. It is a part of a policy which is attempting the impossible thing, that of bringing up the negro race to a participation with the white in the privileges and duties of citizens. It first makes them free by force, and then, because they are an abject and helpless people, they deprive American citizens without process of law of their lands, place the negroes in possession of them, and undertake to maintain them there. The plan proposed by the bill opens the way to great fraud, and places the African freedmen under masters who can have no sympathy with them and are controlled by a legislative body remote from them. If Congress possesses the power to provide in this manner for these emancipated slaves, where, let me ask, is the power to end? Is it confined to freedmen of African descent, or can Congress legislate to provide as well for the unfortunate whites and the remnant of colored people to be found in the free States? If so, it requires but little sagacity to foretell what results might be caused in consequence of allowing this bill to become the entering wedge to a system of legislation which could not be other than deplorable in its effects upon our social condition.

I am well aware that the humane appeals made in behalf of these unfortunate negroes come with some, nay, with great force; and that many of them are in a lamentable condition cannot be denied, and that the war must greatly increase the evil is but too true. Much of it is owing to the zeal with which abolitionists have pursued their avocation. The friends and advocates of abolitionism would now fain compel all to yield to their construction of the laws, to favor their views, and thus assist them out of the dilemma in which by their rashness they find themselves placed, and all through an utter disregard on their part of the plainest provisions of the Constitution, and an unwarrantable violation of State and private rights. No doubt extreme political partisanship has induced many to support radicalisms which, upon mature reflection, or could the consequences which always proceed therefrom have been known at the time, would never have received their sanction. We have only begun to experience some of the results produced by ultra abolitionism; let us beware lest this undertaking to divide and apportion the lands owned by the masters of the slave among these freedmen of African descent may not become the first seed of agrarianism, an ism that, if it once takes root, must affect our social relations in a manner much more to be dreaded than the immediate enforcement of abolition itself.

The chairman, my colleague on the committee of emancipation, looks upon the reasons expressed in the report of the minority of that committee in opposition to his bantering as scarcely entitled to be considered. What motive, if that be so, he could have had for addressing the House for so long a time in an attempt to illustrate the unsoundness of the opinions advanced therein seems somewhat unaccountable to me. Had the gentleman simply discussed the merits of the bill and the law authorizing the establishing the bureau, with the powers conferred therein, without appealing to feelings or prejudices which have already aided materially in causing a loss to the country of hundreds of thousands of valuable lives and thousands of millions of treasure, it would, in my opinion, have been more in consonance with healthy legislation. I do not feel myself called upon to follow the gentleman in all his rambles, but will simply state in reply to some of his remarks that I care not what has been done by the President or any former Congress. The question for us to decide is this: do the objects for which the bill is introduced come within the legitimate province of national legislation, are they just, and will they eventuate in results beneficial and for the best interests of the country? Necessity or any similar excuse will hardly avail as an answer for the assumption of doubtful powers, especially when coupled with very questionable expediency. The war may have created a necessity for the protecting and providing for those negroes, but I do most emphatically deny the power as well as necessity of establishing such a bureau with the host of political hirelings it calls for, and which will have to be maintained at the expense of the Government.

If I understood the gentleman's remarks correctly, the negroes must have been a source rather of benefit than otherwise to the Government, at least in some instances. If this be so, why not let well enough alone until a permanent change in the condition of things can be effected, and adopt such a plan as will be more in accordance with law, in consonance with justice and sound policy, and must meet with universal approval?

I must be permitted to reiterate my sincere and honest conviction that if the bureau be established and the purposes of the bill carried out, the inevitable result must be substantially a change of slave-masters, substituting the Government official for the former owner: the one having no direct interest in, but who controls him, and to whose love of gain the physical welfare of the negro might be sacrificed in making his labor a greater source of profit; the other equally desirous of profiting by his labor, but dictated by motives of self-interest to protect him against suffering and disease.

If a plan for the relief of these freedmen of African descent cannot be dispensed with, and must be adopted, it should be free from the many objectionable features of the present bill. It assumes too many doubtful powers, encroaches upon the private rights of citizens, and must ultimately interfere with State sovereignty.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, perhaps a bill of more importance was never introduced for the consideration of this House and of the country than the bill now presented by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT], and the select committee of which he is the organ. The territory on which it is to operate is larger than were the whole thirteen original States of these United States—a territory extending from the shores of the Potomac to the Rio Grande; and a bill enacting in substance that all that vast territory, in connection with the confiscation bill that we have passed, is to be dispossessed of its present holders and to be occupied by the black race, with masters from a distant country to rule over them. The bill is vast, therefore, in its territory, vast in its objects, vast in its purposes, vast in its intentions. It establishes a new bureau of the Government, a bureau costing, I suppose, $100,000; it may be more or it may be less; but a bureau having the seeds in it of a great Department, which, as the honorable gentleman who introduced the bill tells us, in a quotation from the Solicitor of the War Department, is in the end likely to produce an officer who is to have a seat in the Cabinet and be an adviser of the President.

I call the attention of the House to the magnitude of this proposition, in order to have for it a full consideration before it comes to a final vote. The bill, too, is illimitable in expense. No one can see or foresee what amount of money is to be expended under it. Modest in purport, with its commissioners and its sub-commissioners, with its clerks and superintendents, yet it is a bill with great pretensions and great consequences, and therefore to have a vast influence on the country.

The third section, which I do not well understand, contemplates the issuing of stock, the delivery of bonds, the use of indemnity money, involving, perhaps, large expenditures and large amounts of money.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that that provision only contemplates action concerning "bonds" which the United States may be obliged to deliver under any act of emancipation passed within the slave States.

Mr. BROOKS. This is the entering wedge put into the bill. But, Mr. Speaker, it is vain for me to attempt to discuss the details of this bill, for it is a bill which has doubtless been caucused and settled and decided upon elsewhere. I will not, therefore, waste the time of the House in a futile discussion of its details. If it is decreed out of doors to be enacted it will be enacted in doors, and no argument of mine would have any effect on the gentlemen who have so decreed. Indeed, whenever a gentleman from Massachusetts in these our latter days introduces any bill or propounds any proposition for the consideration of the House, I always listen to him with attentive ears, with apprehension, with something of awe, nay, with that deep interest that the Roman of old must have listened to the unrolling of the leaves of the Sibyl, or the Greek to the utterings of the oracle in Delphos.

Massachusetts is now the leading power in this country. Whatever she decrees is in all probability to be law. She exercises the same control over this vast country which stretches from the Passamaquoddy to the Rio Grande, and from the Rio Grande to the Pacific, that was exercised by imperial Rome on the little Tiber, from the Pillars of Hercules to the Euphrates and Tigris. Boston her capital is well called the hub of our universe, with her spokes now inserted in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, the great West, and the great Northwest, the rim of whose wheel now runs with frightful, crushing velocity from that Passamaquoddy to that Rio Grande.

Hence, whenever a gentleman from Massachusetts rises upon this floor introducing a bill like this, if I do not look upon him as a god or a demigod, I look upon him as a power sure to dictate the legislation of the House, and to have a vast control over this country. It is decreed in all probability, as was decreed in the case of the confiscation bill, that this emancipation or land occupation bill shall pass this House. It is written; it is ordained. It is a Massachusetts thunderbolt. There flashes now in the fiery, furious furnace of this bolt, delenda est Carthago. Ay, not only that Carthage is to be destroyed, but "delenda est Africa."—Africa is to be destroyed also. Slavery is to be abolished, and with it the African. I listen. I tremble before the decree. I hear now from the steeples, the spires, the pulpits of Massachusetts what I have often heard in the Moslem East from the minarets of the mosque, the cry go forth, "La illahou ila Allah w', Mohammed rasul Allah." There is but one God, and Massachusetts is his prophet. [Laughter.]

A superior race is now, under the decree of this bill, to come in conflict with an inferior race; the African is to be met with the white man; the poor, humble son of Africa, the negro, is to come into competition and conflict with the astute Massachusetts white taskmaster. Slavery, therefore, in this conflict of races, is not only to be abolished, but the slave is to be abolished also. Two races, the superior and the inferior, cannot live in equality. What was the fate of the Wampanoags and of the Pequods before the Puritan in Massachusetts is to be the fate of the negro slave whenever he thus comes in conflict with the white man.

I know the spirit of Massachusetts. I know her inexorable, unappeasable, demonic energy. I know that what she decrees she will execute, as when she ordered the burning of the witches at Salem, or the scourging of the Quakers, or exile of the Baptists to the rocky shores of the Narragansett or to the mountain-fastnesses and glens of New Hampshire, where my maternal Baptist ancestors were banished. Hence when, as now, she decrees on the African, I tremble for three millions of hitherto happy human beings now doomed to extermination.

Superintendents, masters, clerks, employes, persons of all kinds and classes, are to be transported by this bill from one latitude to another, under the superintendence of the Government. The negro race is thus to come in conflict with the white race, though the law of nature, and especially the law of settlement on this continent, shows that an inferior race perishes when attempting to live on terms of equality with a race that is superior. Disease, desolation, and death are therefore the doom of the hapless negro.

If the census of this city could be taken of the original slaves who were here when emancipation was decreed in this District, thirty per cent. of them would be found in their graves. Look at the hovels that surround this Capitol. Look at the miserable assemblages of emancipated Africans in this city, huddled five or six families in a little room, literally rotting with disease, under your decree of emancipation. Look, how the race is being exterminated in your freedmen's camps on the banks of the Mississippi, the great father of waters. See what a spectacle is there presented. Death is cutting down hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands as death seldom cut down mortal man before. Death there is the doomed decree to the African. As surely as the plagues or London or Athens decreed the death of the stricken victims, so surely does the march of the Army, liberating the negro from all protection and surrendering him to the cruel, merciless employment of the calculating white man, doom him to disease, hunger, starvation, and death. I know the philanthropic gentleman from Massachusetts does not design this any more than did his namesake, perhaps his kinsman, the apostle Eliot, when he carried the cross and the Bible among the New England tribes of Indians. But with the apostle came the rifle and the rum, and then opened upon the Indian the whole Pandora's box of terrible diseases that destroyed that Indian and extinguished his race.

Mr. Speaker, there are some things in this world which we Yankees have designated by the vigorous word "fixed," or what the French, in their philosophic phrase, call "fait accompli." Sir, the abolition of slavery is "a fixed fact," a fact accomplished. I must accept it. I cannot close my eyes to it any more than upon the sun or upon the sunshine, or upon the tornado or the storm. What is written is written, and I must read it, and I should be blind if I did not see that slavery is abolished, and the African too with it. I cannot help it; I cannot avoid it. Massachusetts has ordained it and the country accepts it, and, if not as a wise man, at least as a public man I must abide by and act upon it. When the border States voted upon the floor of this House at an early period of the session, and by their vote organized this House, it was written, it was decreed, irrevocably decreed, that slavery is abolished, and there was no help for it.

I know, sir, it is said that the States of Missouri and Kentucky are in a good degree under military government. I do not apprehend that all of the gentlemen who voted for the organization of the House intended to carry out this decree. I know that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who bears an honored name—clarum et venerabile nomen—intended no such thing; but nevertheless it is the decree, a decree written out, and he one of the writers. I know the people of Maryland and of Delaware, if they had been allowed to vote, intended no such decree; and I know that it is said those two States are better represented by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, than by their Representatives here. But when these Representatives are accepted and recognized by that people, acquiesced in by that people, and, if not acquiesced in by that people, defended and protected by the military power, I must accept all that as an accomplished fact, and a fact irrevocable, which is to be met. I am bound to act on it; every wise statesman is thus bound to act upon it; every true statesman has so acted in all past time.

I am told that these things are against the Constitution, against the laws of war, against the rights of property. Undoubtedly they are; but how can they be now helped? There are thousands of things against constitutions, against the laws of war, and against the rights of property, which when forced upon the people are fixed forever, facts accomplished, and irrevocable when thus accomplished. There is a higher law written upon the Massachusetts mind, especially and exclusively there written, that slavery is against the law of God, no matter what may be written in constitutions or what may be the rights of property, and this has now become the law of the land. I know there is nothing new in this higher law. It is the doctrine that revolutionized France, and that Frenchmen have obeyed and obey. It is not a New England doctrine born. It was a doctrine cradled in France in the agony and throes of her Revolution, and adopted in Massachusetts. It was the chanson of the French Revolution:

"La loi la plus juste, la loi la plus sacrée, Est d'oublier la loi pour sauver la patrie."

I know that it was not the law of Magna Charta, the law of Runnymede, the law of our Constitution. Nor was the law born in the better days of France. The most beautiful chapter of Telemachus is that in which he is taken to the island of Crete, where, the king having died, there assembled the sages in council to choose a king. They brought forth the laws of Minos, those laws kept in a casket of gold, highly perfumed with incense, and they fell down and kissed them:

"Qu'après les dieux, de qui les bonnes lois viennent, rien ne doit être si sacré aux hommes que les lois destinées à les rendre bons, sages et heureux. Ceux qui ont dans leurs mains les lois pour gouverner les peuples doivent toujours se laisser gouverner eux-mêmes par les lois. C'est la loi, et non pas l'homme, qui doit régner. Tel étoit le discours de ces sages."

Cowper has also beautiful lines inculcating obedience to the laws:

"We love the king who loves the law—respects his bounds,
And reigns content within them; him we serve
Freely and with delight, who leaves us free;
But recollecting still that he is man,
We trust him not too far. King though he be,
And king in England, too, he may be weak
And vain enough to be ambitious still;
May exercise amidst his proper powers,
Or covet more than freemen choose to grant.
Beyond that mark is treason. He is ours,
To administer, to guard, to adorn the state,
But not to warp or cheat it. We are his,
To serve him nobly in the common cause,
True to the death; but not to be his slaves.
Mark now the difference, ye that boast your love
Of kings, between your loyalty and ours:
We love the man; the patrie paysant you;
We the chief patron of the commonwealth;
You the regardless author of its woe;
We, for the sake of liberty, a king;
You, chains and bondage for a tyrant's sake;
Our love is principle, and has its root
In reason; is judicious, manly, free;
Yours, a blind instinct, crouches to the rod,
And licks the foot that treads it in the dust."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have tried through my whole life to be thus faithful to these laws; "the Constitution and the laws." We all on this side of the House have been loyalists, because loyalty is loyalty, fidelity to law. I mourn now over the destruction of the laws of my country. I invoke the genius of history to doom to eternal infamy all these violators of law; but, as a Roman, in the days of Julius Cæsar, or as a Frenchman, in the days of Napoleon, I must cease protesting and resisting. I accept things as they are. I must accept facts accomplished, and abide by the consequences. Hence I recognize the abolition of slavery; hence I intend to act hereafter upon that recognition, because it is inevitable. So far as I have influence I intend to withdraw that question from the exciting canvass of the day, and to go before the people upon other matters of difference. The anxiety I now feel is not for the negro, but for the liberty of the white man; the continued constitutional liberty of the white man. I concern myself less at present what may become of the negro, than what is becoming of the white man. My whole heart and soul are absorbed now that Magna Charta and habeas corpus are cloven down in rescuring these guarantees for the liberty of the white race. Hence, it is the white man's liberty, not the negro's liberty, that hereafter is to interest me in the discussions before this House.

Mr. Speaker, the violence of Massachusetts has brought about in two or three years only, what Christ, or the church of Christ, was twelve or fifteen hundred years in accomplishing in the Roman empire. The Saviour himself struck not off the chains of the slaves whom he addressed from the Mount of Olives. Nor did the Apostle Paul, in his address on Mars Hill, in front of Athens, strike off the chains of the slave in a moment or an hour. But they inculcated principles, they sowed the seed which was twelve or fifteen hundred years in ripening, but which in the end brought about the desired end, without war or the violent loss of life. But here in two or three years we have madly attempted the liberation of the negro, and at what cost? A million of men have been drawn from their households and firesides into the Army, and a million more are to be sacrificed in the hospitals by diseases, while at the same time a debt is fastened upon us of thousands of millions of dollars. Before we have finished the war the debt will be four thousand millions—a huge, monstrous, and crushing debt—which will inflict upon posterity, upon my children, your children, and their children hereafter for hundreds of years, a taxation under which they will groan as negro slaves have seldom groaned under the white master; a taxation of thirty cents on the day laborer's dollar.

Three years ago we had no national debt worth a moment's consideration; but pending this civil war, in only two or three years, under the spirit which has guided it, we have had inflicted on us a national debt now nearly, or soon to be, as large as the national debt of Great Britain, and which will grind the people of this country for hundreds and hundreds of years, if this war is longer persisted in in the spirit which now conducts it.

I recognize the abolition of slavery as existing for other reasons than I have given, and I call the attention of the southern border State men, who may not agree with me in opinion upon this subject, to a law of the rebel Congress which I now hold in my hand. When we in the North began to arm the slaves, I foresaw from the beginning that this would force the South to arm their negroes and their slaves.

The first section of this act of the rebel Congress, which I hold in my hand, declares that all male free negroes shall be conscripted and brought into the southern army. The second section of that act provides for organizing twenty thousand of the southern slaves, not exactly as soldiers, but as sappers, miners, and navvies, or laborers, in the southern armies. The South, therefore, has taken the secondary step to the first step which was taken by the people of the North.

There is the southern act, there is the southern record for arming first the free negroes of the South and second for arming the southern slaves. This of itself is the abolition of slavery in the rebel States; for the moment arms are put into the hands of slaves, that moment slavery is abolished, South as well as North. I say, therefore, we must accept the abolition of slavery as a fact accomplished, as a thing done, not only done by the northern people, but of necessity done by the southern people. The necessities of this war will compel the rebels of the South more and more to arm their slaves, and thus more and more to abolish their slaves.

If, then, war lasts two years, we shall see every able-bodied negro in the South that can be spared, either in the battle-field or as laborers in preparation of the battle-field. They must, they will take that course. Imperious necessity exacts it of them. The negro of the North will meet the negro of the South; and when "Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war."

Go on, then, conscript the negro; reënslave the negro. It is now the best thing you can do in humanity and philanthropy to the negro to reënslave him and doom him to the Army. You have made this a negro abolition war. You have changed its original purpose, and therefore the negro should be called out, and should fight the battles of the party which has taken them into their keeping. I do not, for one, intend to resist your movements in that respect any longer.

Mr. Speaker, two States have in the main governed this vast country since the Declaration of Independence in 1776, and those two States have been Massachusetts and Virginia. Massachusetts and Virginia, from 1776 and 1787 on to the end of Washington's Administration, cooperated together in most beautiful administration of this Government. From 1796 to 1800 there reigned the Administration of John Adams. It was a reign of terror from beginning to end; it was a reign of tyranny, too, as well as of terror throughout the country. Newspapers were silenced, the courts were overawed, the alien and sedition laws were passed, and it was such a reign of violence that in 1800 there was a civil revolution, and Massachusetts was thrown out of power, and kept out of power from 1800 till 1860. During that long period of time never did any country prosper as this country has prospered. The South took its columns of emigration over the Chattahoochee to the Coosa and the Tallapoosa, beyond the Mississippi, on to the Nueces and the Rio Grande, and created an agriculture which subjected to it all the civilized nations of the earth. No more beautiful spectacle of coöperative industry was ever presented. The North presented an equally beautiful spectacle. The columns of emigration marched on beyond the lakes to Minnesota, to Iowa, to Wisconsin, and to the Rocky mountains. During all that time Virginia and Massachusetts cooperated together in the spirit of Washington and Jefferson and Madison and the elder Hamilton. By the secession of the South in 1860 the reign from 1796 to 1800 was restored, and Massachusetts became ascendant in this Government again. Every path of hers has been traced in blood, and the monuments of her destructiveness are to be found on hundreds of battle-fields North and South. A million of human beings sacrificed unnecessarily is the holocaust of that administration. Four thousand millions of debt upon us and our posterity is the consequence of that administration.

How long the war is to exist I know not, but in God's name let me implore those men who now have control of this Government to take the reins and end it as soon as possible. You have illimitable power; you have the Executive; you have three fourths of the Senate; you have twenty majority here in this body. If you will give the conservative men the power in this Government, by August or September, or certainly by October next, we will end this war, and we will restore the Union. We hold you to that issue. We give you till September or October next to end this war and to restore the Union. Follow out your programme; accept our constitutional remonstrances, but accomplish what you have undertaken. Enter not into side issues. Make not such wicked diversions as that which you have just made in Florida under General Gillmore for the purpose of sending some two Massachusetts men from Florida to the United States Senate, or some Representatives to this House—a diversion made solely for political purposes; but concentrate your armies in solid columns and end this war. Cease to make it a war for politics. If you will not make it a war for the Union, make it a war for the restoration of peace as soon as possible. In the name of humanity, in the name of philanthropy, in the name of the Prince of Peace, I appeal to you to exert the powers which you have immediately to end this war. Protract it not beyond the presidential election for political purposes.

Nor enter not upon the system of settlement and agriculture proposed in this bill as if you were some William the Conqueror, lording it over a Saxon people. This "freedmen's bill," as it is called, is not worthy of the practical mind of Massachusetts. It hardly could have emanated from a Massachusetts mind, and the gentleman who introduced it tells us that he has consulted with others. It has not Massachusetts sense. It must have come from some of the freedmen's commissioners; perhaps from Robert Dale Owen, for the bill itself is socialistic, Fourieristic, Owenistic, erotic, (not erratic—I beg the reporters to bear that in mind.) The whole scheme is one of money-making; the whole scheme is one for the use of the black race by northern masters. But if, in the name of humanity, you are acting for these negroes, introduce some more practical measure, without consolidating and centralizing all the powers of this Government. Do not abandon this beautiful theory of States, and convert this Government into a consolidation and centralization, solely for the money-making purposes of this bill. Make it practical; make it self-supporting. Do not burden the Federal Treasury with it. Let it take care of itself, as is the theory of our Government. We have no more right to feed and support negroes than we have to feed and support white men. The thing is not written in the Constitution. It is not written in human nature. If you are to advance the pay of negroes in the Army, make them, as you make white soldiers, support their wives and children. Give the negro eight or nine dollars a month, and subtract the other four or five dollars for the support of his wife and children. But here is a bill the cost of which no man can foresee or possibly foretell.

I protest against my constituents being taxed for it. I protest in the name of the laborer of the North, in the name of the workman of the North, in the name of the capitalist of the North. I protest against it in behalf of the white women and white children of the North. Burden not the Treasury with the support of southern negroes. If it be a mere scheme of philanthropy and benevolence I will contribute to it, according to my means, as much as other gentlemen will contribute; but come not to the Federal Treasury for the support and sustenance of the negro people. I therefore propose to offer a resolution that this bill be recommitted to the select committee on emancipation with directions to report a bill organizing a system for the care and regulation of emancipated persons, which shall not burden the Treasury. I submit that proposition.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion already pending, to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but this motion will be reserved and entertained.

Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not desire to interfere with the course of business. I suppose I will be entitled to the floor whenever this bill comes up again?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will then be recognized.

SALE OF GOLD.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell gold on hand in the Treasury, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire action now on that joint resolution?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir.

Mr. ALLEY. I should like to inquire what disposition is made of that joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. No action has been taken on it. The House has passed it over informally.

Mr. ALLEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that as this is a question of so much importance—probably there is none more important before the House—it had better be considered and disposed of at the present time.

The SPEAKER. If it is passed over now it will come up after the bill creating a Bureau of Emancipation, and the bill prohibiting the Court of Claims from taking jurisdiction of war claims, are disposed of. They both come up in the morning hour, and will take precedence of this.

INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FENTON asked, and obtained unanimous consent, to have Senate bill No. 66, to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports, heretofore referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FARNSWORTH in the chair, in the absence of Mr. WASHBURN,) and proceeded to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, on which the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. C. A. WHITE) was entitled to the floor.

Mr. C. A. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of that freedom of debate which by the rules of the House is only allowed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for a brief space of time to occupy the attention of the House in the discussion of questions which I conceive to be of vital moment to the cause of the Union and of free government. Well knowing that any attempt at legislation in the present temper of the House upon the questions which I propose to discuss would prove unavailing, the only resource left me is to indulge in that freedom and manliness of debate which becomes a member of this body and a representative of the people. Doubtless I shall upon many vital points differ materially, not only with a majority of the House, but with many gentlemen of my own party with whom I have affiliated on this floor. I do not, therefore, speak for any person but myself, nor do I desire that any person may be held responsible for anything I may say, nor will I acknowledge any responsibility for what I may say, or answer therefor to any but my constituents; to them I acknowledge the fullest and completest responsibility, and to them alone will I render my account.

I maintain that the war in which we are at present engaged is wrong in itself; that the policy adopted by the party in power for its prosecution is wrong; that the Union cannot be restored, or, if restored, maintained by the exercise of the coercive power of the Government, by war; that the war is opposed to the restoration of the Union, destructive of the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. It ought, therefore, to be brought to a speedy and immediate close.

These are questions from which the motive for nearly all our legislation springs, and are therefore proper subjects for careful and dispassionate consideration. We all have an equal interest in their rightful determination. Our own happiness and the welfare of those who are to come after us are all equally involved. We should, then, in view of these great interests, strive to banish those passions and resentments which the heat and fervor of a terrible revolution is so well calculated to inspire, and call into requisition all of the higher and more exalted elements of our nature, that we may in the exercise of a clear conception and sound judgment the better conserve the interests and promote the welfare of our common country.

It does not require a very profound study of the philosophy of human nature, or extended research in history, to illustrate to the satisfaction of the commonest understanding that if the war in which we are unhappily engaged is ever brought to a close and a permanent peace established, it must and can only be as the result of negotiation. The President in his inaugural address very wisely and appropriately said:

"Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you."

What then, I ask, can be gained by it? Nothing; a thousand fold worse than nothing. War only tends to exasperate the feelings of the sections, and make the work of reconciliation more difficult, and the probabilities of reunion more remote.

The war is not merely a collision of the passions, but it is a conflict of armed opinions, stimulated, it is true, by the passions, which war always excites and inflames rather than subdues. How, then, is this conflict of opinion to be reconciled? Certainly not by force. You cannot conquer opinion, nor change the convictions of men by corporeal inflictions. It is a trite old saying, full of philosophy, wisdom, and practical statesmanship, as illustrated by the experience of mankind for ages and generations:

"He that compiles against his will,

You cannot subjugate opinion; it is as free as the God of which it is a scintillation. You may cast the body of which it is an indweller in a dungeon; you may torture it on the rack, burn it at the stake, execute it on the gibbet, or cleave it down on the bloody field of battle, and so far from having gained the mastery, you will have but given to it a sanctity, purity, and power that it never before possessed. Does any man doubt that if there had never been any conflict of opinion between the North and the South they never would have been at war with each other, or that if that conflict were reconciled that peace would be at once established and the Union restored? It is in the very nature of things impossible that we should all think alike. We view questions and things from different stand-points. Those evidences from which we draw our conclusions strike some minds with greater and others with a less force. Our modes of thinking, our preconceived opinions, our education, and the peculiar organism of different minds will lead us to different conclusions and cause us to adopt different principles of action. An apt illustration of this fact may be found in what is sometimes denominated the religious world, where we find as great diversity of sentiment upon matters affecting the happiness of man for time and eternity as we do in the political world. In fact, some of the most bitter, persecuting, relentless, and sanguinary wars that have ever been waged have grown out of differences in religious opinions.

The people of the South have fixed and settled principles of political action, to which they are strongly attached by tradition, by education, and from a deep and settled conviction, the maintenance of which they believe to be essential to their rights, their liberty, and equality, and therefore their happiness and welfare. In these opinions they may be right, and they may be wrong; whether they are one or the other, it is not for me to say; for were you or I to attempt to do so authoritatively it would be futile. Of that question they will be the sole and exclusive judges, whether rightfully and legally or not it makes no difference.

Do you propose to dig these convictions, rooted in the hearts of a community numbering ten-million souls, from their breasts with bayonets? Nothing short of the total annihilation and banishment of the population of the South will answer any purpose for which the war can be prosecuted. If you leave the work half done; if you but smother instead of put out the flames, they will break out again with redoubled fury. How shall we extinguish the flames and rescue the superstructure from the devouring element? By adding fuel to the fire? No: By tearing down the building? No. How then? By extinguishing the flames, repairing the structure, and leaving the occupant in its full enjoyment just as he was before the casualty. Make peace, repair the injuries inflicted by the war, and restore all the States to the Union just as they were before the war began, with all their rights unimpaired, except so far as the ravages of war may have made that impossible.

But I may be asked, how would you make peace? I answer, by reconciling the differences of opinion, that conflict of principle which is the sole cause of the war, by fair, honorable, just, and reasonable concessions, not, in the euphonious language of the gentleman of Kentucky, by meeting it, fighting it, and crushing it. I differ with him in the conclusion that this is the whole sum of our moral, social, and political duties. That is the voice of passion, and not the language of reason. It is the sentiment that burns churches and convents, whips Quakers, inspires the horrors of the inquisition, and which has reddened the pages of history with the shed blood of the martyrs, saints, and heroes of all ages. I had cherished the hope that the progress of Christianity and the march of an enlightened civilization had carried us beyond this point. You may kill the heroic and true men of the South—I mean those who will not surrender their principles and what they conceive to be their honor but with their lives. You may make hypocrites and dissemblers of all the rest for a time, but the God in man, struggling ever for the mastery, will ultimately assert His supremacy. Your work can never be accomplished until you transplant the principles of the Puritan in the very heart of the Cavalier, of the New Englander in the Carolinian, a task which the conflicts of centuries have so far failed from accomplishing that they have but served to widen the breach and make the line of demarcation more palpable and distinct. That the South are terribly in earnest, that they are honest in their convictions, that they felt and now feel a conscious sense of insecurity in the possession and enjoyment of what they conceive to be their reserved and constitutional rights, the great sacrifices they have made and are continually making does not permit me to doubt.

Here I might, with great propriety, quote the language of Douglas, a statesman worthy of the best days of the Republic, a patriot whose sympathies were ever in accordance with the true spirit of our institutions, and whose love of country would not permit him to survive its wreck and ruin. Hear him:

"When there is such an irrepressible discontent pervading ten millions of people, penetrating the bosom of every man, woman, and child, and in their estimation involving everything that is valuable and dear on earth, is it not time to pause and reflect whether there is not some cause, real or imaginary, for apprehension? If there be a just cause for it, in God's name, in the name of humanity and civilization, let it be removed. Will we not be guilty, in the sight of Heaven and posterity, if we do not remove all just cause before proceeding to extremities? If on the contrary there be no real foundation for these apprehensions; if it be all a mistake, and yet they, believing it to be a solemn reality, are determined to act on that belief, is it not equally our duty to remove the apprehension? Hence the obligation to remove the discontent, whether real or imaginary, is alike imperative upon us, if we wish to preserve the peace of the country and the union of the States.

"It matters not, so far as the peace of the country and the preservation of the Union are concerned, whether the apprehensions of the southern people are well founded or not, so long as they believe them, and are determined to act upon that belief. Extirpation, subjugation, or separation, one of the three, must be the result of war between the northern and southern States. Surely you do not expect to exterminate or subjugate ten million people, the entire population of one section, as a means of preserving amicable relations between the two sections?

"I see no alternative, therefore, but a fair compromise, founded on the basis of mutual concessions, alike honorable, just, and beneficial to all parties, or civil war and disunion.

"Is there anything humiliating in a fair compromise of conflicting interests, opinions, and theories, for the sake of peace, union, and safety?"

Such is the language of the noble Douglas, worthy of his great name. If the South entertain serious apprehensions of danger to their rights and institutions, no matter whether such apprehensions are well founded or not, it is the first duty of a wise and beneficent Government to remove their fears and allay their discontents by any necessary guarantee. If the Government intends no encroachments upon their rights, and their fears and apprehensions are unfounded, what can be lost by their removal? If, on the contrary, encroachments on their rights endangering their security in the possession and enjoyment of their property and threatening the stability of their institutions are intended, then their fears and apprehensions are well founded and the Government is under still higher obligation to remove them. In either case there is nothing to be lost and everything to be gained by securing the confidence and affections of the people. The confidence of the people is the strength of the Government. That Government that cannot command the confidence of its citizens or subjects, it matters not what may be its form, will always be the prey of faction, and must sooner or later fall.

If there ever was any room for doubt as to the objects and purposes of the party in power, of those who control and direct the war and its policy, that doubt must now be removed. Their purposes no longer require concealment. With a million men already in the land and naval service, with all of the available military resources of the country at their command, with the judicial, legislative, and executive departments of all the State governments prostrate at the feet of the Executive, who has with the utmost complacency clothed himself with a "war power" that disregards all constraints and overleaps every barrier of the Constitution, and having reduced all the northern States to the condition of subject provinces, by the assumption of absolute dominion over the life, liberty, and property of every citizen, they propose to compensate us for these sacrifices, and for the loss of three hundred thousand of our brothers, by reducing the ten millions in the South (except the negroes) to the same condition, and governing them in the same way for untold years and generations, imposing upon them the like loss of precious blood and countless millions of treasure. With all becoming respect for the opinions of others, I must say I can see no good to come of this war to the country. Can the Union be restored by it? Can the constitutional supremacy of the Government be asserted over the States in revolt by it? Can any conceivable benefit be conferred upon the people North or South by it?

The Union cannot be restored either in semblance or form by war. If we should succeed in overrunning the South with our arms, and reducing them to a state of subjection by force, we would be far, very far, from a restoration of the Union. That would be a Union founded in force, and not consent, the very opposite of that established by the wisdom of our fathers. It would be the union of England with Ireland, of Poland with Russia, of Hungary with Austria, a Union to be execrated and despised by every true American who breathes that spirit of patriotic piety that animated the bosoms of our fathers. It would be a Union of hate pinned together by bayonets, a Union which it would cost us our liberties to maintain, which could only be preserved by the unholy trinity of perpetual war, perpetual taxation, and perpetual conscription. It may in the estimation of some be disloyal in me to say it, but I think it, and will therefore say it. I have no heart for such a Union as that; I reject it, and should regard its establishment as the greatest calamity that ever befell my country except the war which produced it. It has already cost twenty million people at the North their liberties in the effort to establish it, and if it should be established they will never regain them while it endures.

The President, in his recent message and proclamation sent to Congress, proclaims that whenever one tenth of the number of persons who voted at the presidential election in 1860 in any of the revolting States shall concur in the organization of a State government, and swear to support the proclamations he has issued and such as he may hereafter issue, the Federal Government will recognize such State government, and of course employ its bayonets to enforce the decrees and edicts of one tenth of the people upon the remaining nine tenths, the one tenth to be composed of freed negroes, and plundering speculators, who may be induced to go there for the purpose of making their fortunes out of confiscated property, and working freed negroes upon abandoned plantations in the culture of sugar and cotton. How long does the President expect these plunder-gorged satraps would remain in the South after the Army was withdrawn? My opinion is that they would abdicate their seats of power the very moment the protection of the Army was withheld, and they would never be seen there again. How long will it take the people of the South to become reconciled to a Government placed over them under such circumstances? Certainly not while grass grows or water runs; nor until the laws that govern humanity—which are as pervading as the laws of nature—are all reversed, and man becomes degraded to the condition of the brute.

How long does Mr. Lincoln think that his own great State of Illinois would submit to such a government as he proposes to set up over the southern States? Just as long and no longer than they could throw it off. Just so it is in the South. Human nature North and South is the same. Hence Mr. Lincoln's theory involves the necessity of keeping constantly in the field a large standing army to keep up and enforce the authority of the governments he proposes to set up over the people in the revolting States. After their armies are dispersed and their military power broken, if such should ever be the case, it would take not less than five hundred thousand men to enforce the authority of a government set up over ten million people against their consent, which was repugnant to all their feelings, sentiments, and principles. They would, like Poland and Hungary, whenever any great national emergency occurred, rise up in revolt and assert their freedom and independence. And yet, with all the ingenuity of the men in power, those who control the destinies of the nation, they cannot tell us of any better fruits this war is to bear to us. In the name of humanity, of justice, and of God Almighty, ought it not to cease? In all that I have heard of war for the last three years—and it has been much, scarcely anything else—my mind has not been enlightened by the delineation of any plan whereby the Union as our fathers made it can be restored through its agency, and I confess my utter inability to perceive such a possibility.

The party in power now declare the impossibility of restoring the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is through the agency of war. Then can the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws be asserted and enforced in the insurrectionary States by it? We have, alas! for three long, sad, and bloody years been trying to work out this problem. In the effort at least three hundred thousand of our brave and gallant soldiers have gone prematurely to fill untimely graves; widowed and bereaved Rachels are weeping around almost every hearthstone in the land, and refuse to be comforted because their husbands, sons, and brothers are not; thousands of millions of dollars have been expended, and the country brought to the very verge of bankruptcy, to use the language of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] and yet not a single law has been enforced in a single revolting State, while the supremacy of the Constitution and the majesty of the law have been set at naught in every loyal State; drum-head courts-martial, with leather-head judge advocates have become the arbiters of the life, liberty, and property of the citizen, and yet after all these sacrifices we have made no progress in the enforcement of the Constitution and laws. On the contrary we are further from it than when we began. The entire population of the South, men, women, and children, are united in one solid mass in their resistance to us. Such have been the results of your policy in the prosecution of the war. The supremacy of the confederate constitution within the confederate States is just as complete as that of the United States is in the loyal States. While the war continues it is impossible in the very nature of things for us to enforce laws in the revolting States. We are without courts, juries, marshals, and all of the ordinary processes of the law are obstructed. Will it be any better if a government is set up over those people by force, against their will, repugnant to the feelings and principles of the great mass of the population? It will constantly require a large standing army as a posse comitatus to preserve the public peace, and enforce laws upon so large a body of unwilling people, expounded by imported judges, and enforced by imported marshals, backed up by an imported posse comitatus. The effort, then, to enforce the Constitution and laws of the United States upon the confederate States by making war upon them must ever prove unavailing and abortive. It ought, therefore, to be abandoned.

I have now shown, at least to my own satisfaction if to nobody else, that war cannot restore the Union, maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and enforce the laws in the revolting States; that the subjugation of those States and the holding and governing of them as subject provinces would involve the loss of our own liberties, require a large standing army, oppressive taxation, and a system of forced conscription revolting to a free people, utterly at war with the fundamental law of the land, and subversive of the principles upon which the Union of the States is founded. Then shall we wage a war against the confederate States with the view and for the purpose of annihilating and driving into banishment their entire white population? Such a war would be revolting to the moral sense of the civilized world and shocking to humanity, and yet right here the real issue of the crisis presents itself: peace by conciliation, concession, and compromise, or war to the full extent of extermination and ostracism. He who favors what is termed a "vigorous prosecution of the war," opposes all compromise, and stops short of this point is illogical and unreasonable. There is no point at which we can halt, putting compromise out of the question, short of extermination. Subjugation is impossible, for, as I have before said, if you leave the work half done, in a little while you will have more than all of it to do again, and at a time when we are less able for the task than now, for the burdens of heavy conscriptions and taxation will be a continual draft upon the vital powers of the body-politic, thus, in the interim, weakening our energies for the renewal of the inevitable struggle, and perhaps disposing the temper of our people in favor of peace.

We are dealing with a proud and stubborn people, Americans all of them, proud of their history, their traditions, and their race, as they may well be; devoted in the last degree to that spirit of independence which our institutions are so well calculated to inspire, they may be our fellow citizens, but our subjects—never! never! No, never! You may bury in bloody graves her brave and gallant sons until resistance shall prove unavailing, you may drive the balance of her people into banishment, confiscate their estates, and send them, men, women, and children, all ages, conditions, and sexes, strangers in a strange land, houseless and homeless wanderers; all this you may do, and more if possible, but you can never make them a subject race. I say this not for the people South alone but for my countrymen, for my blood, and my race. With these remarks I put the question of subjugation aside as not only impolitic but impossible; and repeat that we are impaled upon a dilemma that has but two horns, and we must choose upon which we will throw ourselves, peace by a compromise of conflicting interests, principles, and opinions, or an exterminating war of the North against the South. We had just as well prepare our minds to meet this issue, the sooner the better. Twenty million people possessed of all the physical and material resources with which it had pleased God to bless us may possibly destroy, sweep from the face of the earth the six millions of our race and blood inhabiting the confederate States. I say such a thing may be possible; but before entering upon such a work would it not be wise in us to make some little calculation of the profit and loss which we must necessarily incur? A war prosecuted to such extremities as that cannot be terminated in five, ten, or even twenty years. The constant draft upon the energies of the Government would necessarily compel it to make corresponding requisitions upon the life, blood, and treasure of the people who would have nothing that it was not disloyal to call their own; under this process the Government would, like an athlete man, grow stronger by the continual exertion of its strength, the people grow weak just in proportion as the Government grows stronger, for the Government derives all its powers from the people until they, when the fullness of time had come, like Samson shorn of his locks and bereft of their power, would become the mere sport and plaything of this new Delilah.

Nor would the necessities of the Government cease with the war; the burdens of an untold amount of national indebtedness and many other causes which I will not stop here to enumerate will create a necessity for a strong centralized Government, that its exorbitant demands upon the fruits of labor may be enforced. The great conflict between capital and labor is just now being inaugurated. The Government bonds which represent the indebtedness of the country are being purchased up by the capitalists of the East at thirty-five and forty per cent. below the par of constitutional currency, and they are receiving six per cent. interest thereon in gold. Our indebtedness is now popularly stated at $3,000,000,000, and is increasing at the rate of more than two millions per day. All this indebtedness will go into the hands of capitalists exempt from State, Federal, or municipal taxation. The result of all this is that the product of labor or the laboring and producing masses of the country will owe to the capitalist non-producing class an amount equal to one fourth the value of the entire taxable property in the United States. The principal office, then, which your Government will have to perform after this war is at end will be to provide for and enforce payment of these exorbitant demands of the rich upon the poor, acting simply the part of a trustee or receiver, wrenching the money from the fists of one class and emptying it into the coffers of the other. The people in the newer and western States have no money to purchase Government bonds with. Our population is composed of men of moderate means as a general thing; they have expended all their available capital in the purchase and improvement of their lands, and are now just beginning to acquire an easy competency. In the State of Connecticut, having only four hundred and sixty thousand population, they have more capital than the great State which I have the honor in part to represent, having a population of two million three hundred and forty thousand.

What will be the result of this new state of things thrust upon us by the war? The establishment of classes, a peasantry and an aristocracy. The same causes that produced these results in the Old World will in the New; those causes now exist among us, and the result must sooner or later follow. The mutual jealousies of these classes will for a time, it is to be feared, prove to be a fruitful source of commotion among us, and require a strong and vigorous Government to preserve order and enforce the public peace. The vast area of our territory and our rapidly increasing population will do much to militate against these results. The ruin impending our system may be retrieved and averted by a speedy peace; but if the war is to be prosecuted to the extremity of extermination, I can for the life of me see nothing in it but the utter wreck and overthrow of our proud fabric of free government, and the erection upon its ruins of an absolute imperial despotism that may wield its barren scepter over the waste and desolate fields of the South, the prostrate liberties and bleeding forms of freedom at the North. These results are so certain, so inevitable, and so apparent, that I cannot believe that the reflecting, thinking, and reasoning men of the Republican party intend them. I will do them the justice to believe that they entertain no such monstrous ideas and cherish no such hideous purposes.

They are prosecuting the war, as I believe, not for the purpose of restoring the Union, maintaining the supremacy of the Constitution, nor for any purpose of subjugation or extermination, unless subjugation and extermination become necessary to the accomplishment of the real purposes and objects they have in view, for which the war was inaugurated, and has ever since been conducted. That object and purpose is the abolition of slavery in every State where it exists. This never has been a war for the Constitution and the Union, as the popular phrase goes, but it was inaugurated and has been conducted solely and exclusively for the purpose of abolishing slavery, and for no other purpose. There has not been an hour since the war began, and for some time before, when the party in power, those who inaugurated and control and direct the policy of the war, would have given to a bleeding and distracted country peace for the Constitution and the Union. They would not do it now. War is the great shibboleth with which they expect to scourge slavery from the land, and maintain and perpetuate their political ascendancy. Until these objects are accomplished they do not intend that peace, harmony, and union shall prevail. The measure of the extent to which they will go will be just what the emergencies that arise in the progress of events may require. Should the path to the object of their desire lead them over the ruined, shattered, dismembered fragments of a broken and dismembered Union, a torn, tattered, desecrated Constitution, and the ruins of a Government in which are concentrated all the best hopes of the patriot for freedom and civilization, not halting for a moment, they will press forward to the accomplishment of their wanted object regardless of consequences. Driven on by the irresistible impulse of a blind revolutionary zeal, hugging the delusive phantom of universal emancipation, inspired with the vain hallucination of giving freedom to four million slaves, they seem to know not that they are reducing themselves and more than twenty-six million of their own race to the same condition, and sacrificing all the fruit of our revolutionary struggle.

Let us suppose for a moment that our abolition friends succeed in the emancipation of all the slaves, what will be the result? Will that restore peace to a distracted country? Where will you put them? What will you do with them? Will they be permitted to remain South among the people from whom they have been forcibly torn away? Will they if they desire to continue free take the chances of being reenslaved upon the restoration of peace by remaining South with their masters? It certainly cannot be expected that we will always keep our armies in the South to prevent the masters from reenslaving those who may have been emancipated by force of arms. We cannot wage eternal war against these people; there must be an end of it some time and some way. Then to make these slaves permanently free you must before the war closes force them all out of the slave States to prevent their reenslavement when the war is terminated and the Army withdrawn. To what land will these newborn children of Israel make their exodus? Will it be to the cold, sterile, and barren regions of New England, where their population is already sufficiently dense, and where climate, soil, and labor are all repulsive to the nature and capacities of the poor African who has been cradled with his face exposed to a tropical sun? Would you expect the untutored African to run the New England engines, turn their spindles, or indulge in the ingenious pastime of making pins, combs, buttons, horn gun-flints, and wooden nutmegs? His brawny fingers and untutored capacities do not adapt him to such implements.

In the year 1850 the six New England States had a white population of 2,705,095, and a colored population of 23,003. In 1860 they had a white population of 3,110,572, and a colored population of 24,711, showing an increase of colored population in ten years of 1,708. In 1850 the State of Ohio, a comparatively young State, with a white population of 1,955,050, had a colored population of 25,279; and in 1860, with a white population of 2,302,838, she had a colored population of 36,673, showing an increase of colored population in ten years of 11,394; while New England during the same period shows a gain of only 1,708. Now there must be some reason for this state of things.

It is not on account of any hostility of the people of the New England States to the colored race. Far from it. For thirty years, in fact I might say ever since the African slave trade was abolished and they sold their slaves to the South, their pulpits, their lecture-rooms, their theaters, every forum has resounded with pæans of praise to the downtrodden African. One would suppose, taking New England sermons—now called anti-slavery lectures—and New England literature as the test, that there was no greater degree of compatibility between any two races of the earth than between the modern New Englander and the "free American of African descent." They do not only ask liberty but equality with the white race for him.

Is it not, then, wondrous strange that with all these strong cords and ties of sympathy between these people the colored people do not seek homes among them? There is but one explanation, and that I have given: the climate, soil, productions, and types of labor in those cold and frigid regions are not adapted either to the nature or capacities of the African race. It is a curious fact that my district, embracing five counties in the southern part of the State of Ohio, has nearly twice as great a colored population as the States of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, and my own county more than the States of New Hampshire and Vermont. The reason for this state of things must be apparent. Our climate, compared with that of New England, is warm and salubrious; our soil rich and productive; our labor is employed in the simpler (but I trust not less honest and beneficial) mechanical and agricultural pursuits, adapted to the nature and the capacities of the negro, and therefore they migrate to that region.

The result of all this is, that if the four million slaves in the South are turned loose upon us they cannot remain South under penalty of re-enslavement; they cannot go North under penalty of starvation and death. The agricultural States bordering on the slave States will become the paradise to which these new-born freemen must and will inevitably flock, and in which they will make their future homes. There is but one way to avert these consequences, by colonization, and that is impracticable and impossible.

Now for a moment let us consider the consequences of turning loose in our midst these four million houseless, homeless, and propertyless fugitives, with all the prejudices of race and caste existing among us. Right here is where their irrepressible conflict about which we heard so much begins. These prejudices are "things which are of ourselves a part." We cannot get rid of them if we would. These freedmen will at once be brought in competition with the laboring masses in that section of the Union where the fates have cast their lots, in the agricultural region of the Northwest, as I have shown, and that, too, at a time of all others least auspicious, when the labor of the country is depressed, crushed to the earth by an almost fabulous amount of national indebtedness. Mischief-making abolitionists will not be satisfied with emancipation, but they will inspire this race with the dream first of political then social equality. The collision of conflicting principles and interests, the conflict of white and black labor, inspired by the prejudices of race and caste, which when fully aroused are stronger than any other, will inevitably produce a collision of races. If it ever begins, and I believe it will, then the poor African will have occasion, if there ever was such an occasion, to exclaim, "God save me from my friends!" Then we shall have a renewal of that terrible conflict between the Spaniards and the Moors, which for cold and implacable ferocity is without a parallel in history. There the prejudices of race and caste were arrayed against each other, inspired by that pride and heroic chivalry which was the characteristic of that age. That contest resulted in the annihilation and ostracism of the Moorish race from the soil of Spain. And if this contest between the races here ever begins, it will not stop short of the extermination of the colored race, and none of us will live to see the end of the demoralizing consequences of such a struggle. Surely, then, this is an unwelcome feast to which we are inviting the colored people of our country. These are the only legitimate fruits of the war. It bodes no good either to the white or colored race.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to show that the Union cannot be restored by war; that the Constitution and laws cannot be enforced in the revolting States by it; that the subjugation of the ten million people in the revolting States is impossible, or, if possible, that it will prove to be the destruction of the Union, and involve the loss of our own liberties; that the extinction and ostracism of the white population of those States is alike destructive of the Union, our system of free Government, revolting to the laws of Christian civilization, and can end only in the establishment of an absolute imperial despotism; that a war waged for the abolition of slavery, if successful, will be productive of a conflict between the races, ending in the destruction of the colored race.

In any light, then, in which it can be presented to my vision, it is a useless, fruitless, and criminal waste of precious blood and treasure.

But it is said we are engaged in war, and how can we get out of it without loss of honor? The honor lies not in its continuance, but in putting an end to it. The old Governments of Europe, jealous of the growing power of the United States, and anxious to put a check upon it, would doubtless be glad to see us separate, and that system of checks and balances established on the North American continent which they have established on the European. This they deem essential to the peace of the world. Considering the expansive area of our territory, and our rapidly increasing population, they look forward to the time, not far distant if we are wise, when the dream of Young America will become a reality, and the whole boundless continent shall be ours, teeming with more than a hundred million of the best population on the face of the earth. It is this growing giant that they would strangle in its infancy by the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico whose perpetuity should be guaranteed by a European alliance, and by lopping off the confederate States. They are only waiting and looking on with calm complacency because we are doing the work much more surely and rapidly than they could do it themselves. When the hour shall have arrived when the process of exhaustion through which we are speedily passing shall have reduced us to utter helplessness, and when they can interfere with impunity, they will, dictating to us their own terms.

Sir, we can make peace, and every incentive to humanity and to patriotism conspires to demand it of us. If we had the will to do it we could do it, for where there is a will there is a way; we have never tried it; but on the contrary every effort, every measure looking to a restoration of peace and the reestablishment of fraternal relations has been proudly and scornfully rejected by the President and by Congress, and the parties proposing them subjected to undue and unfounded suspicions. I do not believe that the South are the enemies of our institutions, that they are opposed to the principles of our Union, or of republican free government as embodied in our Constitution; upon these great fundamental principles I do not believe that there is any material difference of opinion among us; for upon their withdrawal from the Union they adopted the Constitution of our fathers and their fathers as the organic law of their government, with immaterial changes affecting matters of construction more than principles, and they established a union under it similar in all respects to our own, and that from which they had withdrawn.

There is then no conflict of principles between us that we cannot or ought not to reconcile, if we would have union and harmony restored to our suffering, bleeding, and distracted country. Our troubles have grown out of differences of opinion as to the construction of the Constitution upon matters affecting the rights of the States, their institutions, and the right of individuals to be secure in the possession and enjoyment of private property. If these conflicting opinions were reconciled, the cause of the war would cease to exist and the war with it. Slavery is not the cause of the war, but it is the conflict of opinions and principles growing out of that relation; and you can no more change those opinions and principles by destroying the institution of slavery, than you could change the opinions and principles of men with reference to their right to possess and enjoy any other species of property by robbing them of it, destroying it, or stealing it from them. Their opinions and principles with reference to their rights would continue to be the same after the property is destroyed as before, and neither they, their children, nor their children's children will ever think any the better of you for your pains.

Then let us reconcile those conflicting opinions, as they only can be reconciled, by mutual concessions: the North by removing every ground of apprehension and making every man, woman, and child feel a conscious sense of security in the Union, in the undisturbed possession and enjoyment of all the institutions of their States and the rights of their persons; the South by coming back into the Union, yielding an implicit and willing obedience to its authority; and, thus united, to devote all our energies to the reparation of the injuries and ravages of war, and as one happy and prosperous people renew our march on the great highway of progress and of Christian civilization to that goal which a beneficent Benefactor has set in store for us.

Mr. BLOW addressed the committee, but before concluding his remarks the committee rose informally, and a was received by Mr. HICKY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate have agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 36) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The committee again resumed its session, and proceeded to the consideration of the

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield and allow us to go into the House and dispose of the report of the committee of conference on the conscription bill.

Mr. BLOW. I yield the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FARNSWORTH reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) making appropriation to pay taxes on certain lands owned by the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am now prepared to make a report from the committee of conference on the enrollment bill. I send the report to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have it read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a single suggestion. It is very manifest that we cannot dispose of this report to-night, and I will suggest that it be postponed until Tuesday next, by which time the amendments made by the committee may be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot consent to that.

Mr. STEVENS. I think it had better be postponed. There is evidently no quorum in the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think differently. I would gladly accede to the course proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I feel that there is a public duty upon us to pass this bill at as early an hour as possible. I cannot therefore consistently with my sense of duty enter into any such arrangement. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference appointed to consider the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 36) "to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863," having met, after full and free conference do report as follows:

That the House of Representatives do agree to the second section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. Strike out the word "or," where it first occurs in the second line of said section. 2. Strike out all of said section after the word "draft," in the twenty-fourth line, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "In filling that quota; and his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person, on account of his payment of commutation money for the procurement of a substitute, extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year, in every such case, the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again, if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section." And that the Senate agree to the said several amendments.

That the sixth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out.

That the seventh section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out.

That the eighth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out, and that the Senate do agree to the fifth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives.

That the ninth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out, and that the Senate do agree to the ninth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. After the word "able," in the second line of said section of said amendment, insert the words "or ordinary." 2. After the word "able," in the ninth line of said section, insert the words "or ordinary." 3. After the word "able," in the sixteenth line of said section, insert the words "or ordinary." 4. Strike out the words "Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War," in the twentieth and twenty-first lines, and insert the words "President of the United States" in lieu thereof. And that the House of Representatives agree to the said several amendments.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the tenth section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. After the word "able," in the second line of said section, insert the words "or ordinary." 2. Strike out the word "or" where it first occurs in the fifth line of said section. 3. After the word "township," in the fifth line of said section, insert the words "precinct or election district." 4. Strike out the word "or," in the sixth line of said section. 5. After the word "townships," in the sixth line of said section, insert the words "precincts or election districts." And that the Senate do agree to the said several amendments.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the eleventh section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. Strike out the word "or," in the eighth line of said section. 2. After the word "township," in the eighth and ninth lines of said section, insert the words "precinct or election district." 3. Strike out the word "or," in the tenth line of said section. 4. After the word "townships," in the tenth line of said section, insert the words "precincts or election districts." And that the Senate do agree to the said several amendments.

That the twelfth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out.

That the thirteenth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out, and that the Senate do agree to the thirteenth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the fourteenth section of the bill of the Senate.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the fifteenth section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment, to wit: Add to said section the following: "And nothing in this section contained shall be construed to relieve the party offending from liability, under proper indictment or process, for any crime against the laws of a State, committed by him while violating the provisions of this section." And that the Senate do agree to said amendment.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the sixteenth section of the bill of the Senate.

That the Senate do agree to the seventeenth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives.

That the seventeenth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out, and that the Senate do agree to the eighteenth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the nineteenth section of the bill of the Senate.

Strike out the word "four," in the eleventh line of said section, and insert the word "three" in lieu thereof. 2. Strike out all of said section after the word "soldiers," in the fourteenth line, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "Provided, That no person shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this section, unless his declaration of conscientious scruples against bearing arms shall be supported by satisfactory evidence that his department has been uniformly consistent with such declaration." And that the Senate do agree to the said several amendments.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the twentieth section of the bill of the Senate.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the twenty-first section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment, to wit: Strike out the words "absent from the country or," in the sixth and seventh lines of said section, and insert the words "for some good and sufficient reason" in lieu thereof. And that the Senate do agree to said amendment.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the twenty-second section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment, to wit: Add to said section the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of War may order the discharge of all persons in the military service who are under the age of eighteen years at the time of the application for their discharge, when it shall appear from due proof that such persons are in the service without the consent, either express or implied, of their parents or guardians: And provided further, That such persons, their parents or guardians, shall first repay to the Government and to the State and local authorities all bounties and advance pay which may have been paid to them, anything in the act to which this is an amendment to the contrary notwithstanding." And that the Senate do agree to said amendment.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the twenty-third section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment, to wit: 1. After the word "any," in the fourth line of said section, insert the word "drafted." 2. Strike out the words "drafted, and liable to render service," in the fifth line of said section. And that the Senate do agree to the said amendments.

That the House of Representatives agree to the twenty-fourth section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment, to wit: After the word "disability," in the sixteenth line, insert the words "and any officer, clerk, or deputy connected with the board of enrollment who shall receive compensation from any drafted man for any services, or obtaining the performance of such service required from any member of said board by the provisions of this act." And that the Senate do agree to said amendment.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the twenty-fifth section of the bill of the Senate.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the twenty-sixth section of the bill of the Senate.

That the Senate do agree to the twenty-sixth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. After the word "male," in the first line of said section of said amendment, insert the word "colored." 2. Strike out the words "of African descent," in the second line of said section. 3. Strike out the words "whether citizens or not," in the third line of said section. 4. After the word "thereof," in the ninth line of said section, insert the words "and thereupon such slave shall be free." 5. Strike out the word "owes," in the twelfth line of said section, and insert the words "was owing." 6. Strike out the words "on freeing the person," in the thirteenth and fourteenth lines of said section. 7. Strike out the word "the," in the sixteenth line of said section, and insert the word "a" in lieu thereof. 8. Strike out the words "commutation money, upon the master freeing the slave," in the nineteenth and twentieth lines of said section, and insert the words "fund derived from commutations, and every such colored volunteer on being mustered into the service shall be free," in lieu thereof. 9. After the word "enlisted," in the twenty-first line of said section, insert the words "or have volunteered." 10. After the word "applicable," in the twenty-fourth line of said section, strike out the words "as well." 11. Add to said section the following: "But men of color, drafted or enlisted, or who may volunteer into the military service, while they shall be credited on the quotas of the several States, or subdivisions of States, wherein they are respectively drafted, enlisted, or shall volunteer, shall not be assigned as State troops, but shall be mustered into regiments or companies as United States colored volunteers." And that the House of Representatives do agree to the said several amendments.

That the twenty-seventh section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out.

That the following section be inserted in the bill of the Senate, to wit:

"SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the words 'precinct' and 'election district,' as used in this act, shall not be construed to require any subdivision for purposes of enrollment and draft less than the wards into which any city or village may be divided, or than the towns or townships into which any county may be divided."

That the House of Representatives do agree to the twenty-eighth section of the bill of the Senate.

That the House of Representatives do recede from their amendment to the bill of the Senate, except as recited in the foregoing report.

HENRY WILSON,
J. V. NESMITH,
J. V. GRIMES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT SCHENCK,
HENRY C. DEMING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. The report having been read, and it having been adopted by the Senate, I suppose the question is now on concurring in it by the House.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCHENCK. Upon that I propose to submit a very few remarks to the House, entirely of the character of an explanation, so as to enable the House to vote understandingly on the report.

The first thing that will strike gentlemen is, perhaps, the great length of the report. In order to explain that I will recall to the recollection of the House the fact that when the committee of conference was ordered by the two Houses the position of the bill was this: the Senate having passed the bill the House struck out all after the first section, and inserted from the second section onward a substitute for the entire remainder of the bill. To that amendment the Senate non-concurred, and asked for a committee of conference.

The managers on the part of the House met the managers on the part of the Senate upon this ground. They suggested to the managers on the part of the Senate that the Senate recede from its non-concurrence in the amendments of the House and concur in the House bill with such modifications as the committee had agreed on to the House bill. If that course had been adopted, the report would not have occupied one of these pages. Instead of that, the managers on the part of the Senate preferred to retain their own bill, and to transfer into it piecemeal the bill of the House. Thus, instead of adopting as a substitute for a section of the Senate bill a section of the House bill and transferring it bodily to the report, they preferred to amend the Senate section by inserting a word here and there in place of words stricken out so as to make the section conform with the substitute.

The conclusion then is this, that the committee have thus transferred in these small parcels to the bill of the Senate, the entire House bill with the exception of two or three material changes only. I want the House then to understand that in agreeing to the report of the committee of conference they agree to the House substitute which they have once voted upon and passed, with two single material exceptions.

And to those exceptions, Mr. Speaker, I now call the attention of the House. They will be found in the sixth section of the Senate bill, the latter part of which of the two amendments which were moved and afterwards modified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] striking that out, the managers on the part of the House were not willing to fall back upon the Senate bill. They struck out the amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania introduced and fell back upon their own bill. The committee of conference then agreed upon that originally reported by the Military Committee of this House. That is precisely the condition in which it stands.

Gentlemen will recollect the Military Committee reported back amendments in respect to the payment of commutation money, that that commutation should buy the person free from any difficulty, provided it did not exempt him for more than one year. The bill is made more stringent in reference to the time purchased by the commutation money. The conference committee took the bill as it was originally reported by the committee of this House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is the time for which a man who pays commutation money purchases exemption?

Mr. SCHENCK. For a call not exceeding one year.

There is one other slight change which I did not propose to refer to, but which I will now call to the attention of the House. I am sure it will gratify those gentlemen who are the friends of the amendment offered in the House. We strike out the words "able-bodied seamen" and make it read "ordinary seamen," so as to authorize the transfer of a larger number from the Army to the naval service.

There is no other material change from the substitute of the House until we arrive at section twenty-six, as passed by the House. It relates to colored persons, and the receiving of such persons into the Army of the United States. The changes made by way of modification of that so as to make it correspond to that of the Senate are these: it is provided after the drafted man has served he should be paid for at the rate of $100, under a commission, and that after thus being paid for the master was to free the slave. In place of providing for the freeing of the slave by the master, it is declared that the slave shall become free by reason of his having been mustered into the service of the United States. It was agreed to modify it so that a man who had served in the Army of the United States, vindicating and maintaining our institutions, should not by want of the consent of his master be remitted to slavery, but should be declared free under the law by reason of his having been mustered into the Army of the United States.

I will read the section for the benefit of the House, as it will stand, with the amendments and modifications agreed to by the committee of conference:

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male colored persons between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, whether citizens or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof; and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of $100 now payable by law for each drafted man shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300, for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutation; and every such colored volunteer on being mustered into the service shall be free. And in all cases where men of color have been heretofore enlisted or have volunteered in the military service of the United States, all the provisions of this act, so far as the payment of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable as to those who may be heretofore recruited. But men of color drafted or enlisted, or who may volunteer into the military service, while they shall be credited on the quotas of the several States or subdivisions of States wherein they are respectively drafted, enlisted, or shall volunteer, shall not be assigned as State troops, but shall be mustered into regiments or companies as United States colored troops.

The object of the latter provision, which has been added to the section, was this: to leave the colored man to be credited to the several States, townships, &c.; but when mustered into the service of the United States they should remain and be ranked among the United States colored troops, so as to have the benefit of being commanded by officers whose efficiency and capacity had been tested by a thorough examination, as is now done by the board appointed for that purpose.

I have explained, as nearly as I can, the two points of difference.

Mr. DEMING. There was another point which the gentleman has neglected to mention.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thank the gentleman for recalling it to my mind. The managers on the part of the Senate would not agree to the repeal of the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the existing law, which authorizes, at the discretion of the President, the consolidation of regiments. The repealing law stands as in the original substitute as proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. These constitute the differences, not between the Senate and the House bills, but between the House bill as it was when it left this House, and the act of Congress as it will be if the House agree to the report of the committee of conference.

Hoping that I have made the points clear, I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question, in order that I may say a few words.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would gladly yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he knows, more gladly than to any other gentleman in the House; but I believe the necessity for the speedy passage of this bill is such as to compel me to insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON called for tellers upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEELE of New Jersey and KELLOGG of New York were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 27.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Francis P. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Spaulding, Starr, Stebbins, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Chanler,

Cox, Dawson, Edgerton, Eldridge, Benjamin G. Harris, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, McKinney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Ward, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—23.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, said: Mr. KERNAN and myself made an arrangement to pair off after to-day for a day or two. Mr. KERNAN has left town, and I prefer not to vote unless a vote should become necessary to make a quorum, for fear of some misunderstanding between him and myself as to time.

Mr. DAWES stated that his colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, left the House on account of indisposition.

Mr. COBB stated that Mr. SLOAN was detained from the House by the indisposition of a member of his family.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF GOLD—AGAIN.

Mr. STEBBINS. I have been requested by the Committee of Ways and Means to move that the bill in relation to the sale of gold by the Treasurer be recommitted to the committee, with instructions to report it back on the morning of Tuesday next. I ask unanimous consent to make that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. FENTON, (at half past five o'clock,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The CHIEF CLERK, (WILLIAM HICKEY, Esq.) The following letter has been received from the Vice President:

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1864.

SIR: I shall be absent from the city to-morrow. You will communicate information of this to the Senate at its session in the morning, and oblige, yours, very truly,

H. HAMLIN.

Colonel JNO. W. FORNEY, Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I move that Mr. FOOT, of Vermont, take the chair as President pro tempore.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved that Mr. FOOT, of Vermont, be appointed President pro tempore of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. FOOT took the chair and called the Senate to order.

The Journal of Friday last was then read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Assistant Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of expenditures from the appropriations for contingencies of that Department, its offices and bureaus, during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1862, and June 30, 1863; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of numerous men and women of West Liberty and vicinity, in the State of Iowa, who represent that they believe slavery is the great cause of the present rebellion, that it is an institution fatal to the life of the Republic, and they ask Congress to take measures to amend the Constitution so as to forever prohibit its existence within the jurisdiction of this Government. I move that it be referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the memorial of Carlisle Doble, praying compensation for services rendered and expenses incurred in carrying the mail on route No. 14006, between Taylor's Falls, Minnesota, and Superior, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, praying for legislation on the part of Congress to foster and support ocean steam navigation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of H. S. Parkhurst, of the thirty-ninth regiment Illinois volunteers, and other soldiers in the service of the United States, praying for a bounty of $100; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition from citizens of New York, praying Congress to pass such laws as will put the soldiers of our Army on the same footing as to pay, bounties, and pension, without regard to difference of complexion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition from women of Ohio, setting forth that they sympathize deeply with those persons who have been freed from slavery by the present war, many of whom are in most destitute circumstances, and praying Congress to do something to ameliorate their condition; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of Job B. Stockton, of Fort Smith, in Arkansas. He sets forth that he is a citizen of the United States, and that he was one of the first if not the very first person commissioned as an officer in the volunteer service on the breaking out of the rebellion, and that he has remained in that service over two years. He says it is "an established fact, demonstrated every day in the American armies by actual practice, that the American citizen of African descent is the very best material of which to make a complete and perfect soldier; and as his loyalty is beyond question, and his allegiance to the United States cannot be tainted by tampering," he "therefore prays Congress to pass a law establishing the regular standing Army at the close of this rebellion at two hundred thousand men, to be composed entirely of colored men, and to be officered by white men." This is a petition from Arkansas. I ask its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer another petition from persons who represent that they volunteered and enlisted in the service of the United States for the term of nine months in the autumn of 1862, and that they performed the service faithfully, and at the time of their enlistment believed that they were to receive a bounty of twenty-five dollars, and that they have never received it, and they ask Congress to enable them to receive it. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer also another petition calling upon Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting slavery or involuntary servitude any where in the United States. This petition is signed first by Josiah Quincy, the oldest surviving member of Congress and one of our most eminent citizens, next by John A. Andrew, Governor of Massachusetts, and afterwards by the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, and by other eminent citizens. As that subject is already before the Senate, I move that this petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. RIDDLE, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of the representatives of Hugh Montgomery, praying for remuneration for his losses and sacrifices and compensation for his services during the revolutionary war, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following petitions and memorials, asked to be discharged

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 49.

from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, for a grant of lands to make up the deficiency in the grant heretofore made to aid in the construction of the Minneapolis and Cedar Valley railroad;

A memorial of Joshua C. Brown, praying for the passage of a law authorizing him to locate upon and acquire title to different parcels of land in Utah and Nevada, upon the same terms and conditions that he could acquire title thereto if such lands were open to private entry and were to be purchased at private sale;

A memorial of citizens of Wisconsin, remonstrating against an appropriation of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad from the end of Lake Superior to the city of St. Paul, to run entirely on the Minnesota side of the St. Croix river;

A memorial of the Bay de Noquet and Marquette Railroad Company, of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against any further legislation for the benefit of the Peninsular Railroad Company; and

A memorial of the common council of the city of St. Paul, praying for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Paul to the head of Lake Superior.

ADMISSIONS TO MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the number of cadets at the Military Academy to four hundred, of requiring the age of admission to be not less than seventeen years, of raising the standard of qualifications for admission, and of changing the mode of recommendation for appointment, so as to secure an examination for admission based upon the comparative merits of the several candidates.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 19th instant, an act (S. No. 51) amendatory of and supplementary to an act to provide circuit courts for the district of California and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863.

OBJECTS OF THE WAR.

Mr. CARLILE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce the following joint resolution; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed:

A joint resolution (S. No. 28) declaring the objects of the war.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: 1. That the military power of the Government can only be rightfully exerted against individuals in arms opposing its authority. That the prosecution of hostilities against the citizens of the States in rebellion ought to be for the sole purpose of maintaining the constitutional Union, and for the restoration of the Union upon the basis of the Constitution, leaving to each State the regulation of its own domestic policy; and protecting each and all in the enjoyment of the right of self-government as recognized by the Constitution of the United States.

2. That the President be requested to declare by proclamation, whenever the people of any of the States now resisting the authority of the United States shall reorganize their State government by repudiating the ordinances of secession adopted in their name, and shall recognize their obligations to the Union under the Constitution, full pardon and amnesty to the people of such State, assuring the citizens thereof that all their rights of person and of property under the Constitution shall be restored to and enjoyed by them; excepting, however, from such pardon and amnesty such persons as shall be designated by the Legislatures of the several States as fit persons to be held for trial before the judicial tribunals of the United States under the laws thereof.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 27) relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. FESSENDEN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) "to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

In line six of said amendment strike out the word "seventy" and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty-five;" and in line eleven of said amendment strike out the word "eighty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventy."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: In line four of said amendment strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "forty-five;" and in line seven of said amendment strike out the word "sixty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the sixteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

W. P. FESSENDEN,
TIMOTHY O. HOWE,
REVERDY JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

THADDEUS STEVENS,
FERNANDO WOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

I dissent from this report.

E. B. WASHBURN.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This report is signed by all the conferees on the part of the Senate, and by two of the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives. Mr. WASHBURN, one of the conferees, dissents from the report. I will explain the only change that is made. The original scale fixed by the Senate was sixty cents up to the 1st day of July; after that and up to the 1st day of January seventy cents; and after that indefinitely eighty cents; and we made a corresponding change in the provision with regard to imported liquors. The conferees have agreed upon a less sum, substituting sixty-five for seventy, and seventy for eighty, raising only five cents instead of ten. There was a disagreement, also, in regard to the duty on imported liquor on hand. The House agreed to strike out the duty on domestic liquors on hand, but disagreed as to the duty on imported liquor on hand. It is manifestly proper that they should compare. If they are retained in the one case they should be retained in the other; and if they are not retained in the one case the same course should be taken in the other. It is substantially the bill as passed by the Senate with the changes in the scale that I have stated. I should like to have action upon the report now.

Mr. POWELL. I did not hear the honorable Senator from Maine. I wish to inquire whether the bill as it now stands taxes liquor on hand?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not.

Mr. POWELL. I thought you said so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. I said that the House agreed with the Senate in striking out the tax on domestic liquors on hand, but disagreed to striking out the tax on imported liquors on hand. They have now receded from that amendment with regard to the imported liquors. There is, therefore, no tax upon liquors on hand, either domestic or imported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to make an inquiry. Some ten days or two weeks ago I introduced a resolution, which was passed by the Senate, directing the Secretary of War to transmit to this body the orders and instructions he had issued to the provost marshals in Kentucky, Delaware, Maryland, and Missouri, concerning elections in those States; and I understand that there has been no response to it as yet. I desire to inquire of our Secretary whether or not that resolution was transmitted to the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (after consulting the Chief Clerk.) The Chair is advised that the resolution was transmitted on the day of its adoption.

Mr. POWELL. Then I request that another copy be sent to the Secretary of War. I suppose it has been mislaid.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up the joint resolution to equalize the pay of troops.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is within the recollection of the Chair that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] moved an amendment in the form of a substitute for the entire resolution. That leaves the original resolution and the proposed substitute both open to amendment, by way of perfecting them before the question of substitution be taken. An amendment was proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] as an amendment to the pending substitute, and it will be read.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to modify that amendment, and I now send it to the Chair in the modified form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modified amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be now read.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "that," and insert: From and after the 1st day of March, 1864, the soldiers of the United States of the same grade and service shall be entitled to receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp-equipment, rations, and medical and hospital attendance, pay, emoluments, and pensions; and that persons of color shall receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding $100.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to amend the original joint resolution. I propose to amend his amendment to reach, I think, the same object but more fully. If the amendment offered by him is to be adopted, I hope it will be first amended as I propose.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is not here, but from the reading of his amendment at the time it was offered and the remarks he made in explanation of it, I should think that this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would seem to defeat the purpose the Senator from Pennsylvania had in view. His purpose was to avoid saying anything about color. He said that distinctions of color were not recognized in our Constitution, and he wanted the law made, agreeably to the Constitution, to speak of "persons" and "persons" only, and that was the object of his amendment. Now, we come right back to the use of the term "persons of color" again. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts wherein does the amendment he now offers to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania differ from the original resolution?

Mr. WILSON. It provides for perfect equality between the different classes of white troops and black troops. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania does that, and so does this amendment of mine. The difference is that my amendment is more full than that proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The question of bounties stands thus: most of us desire to put these troops on an equality with white troops; but we cannot have equality in regard to bounty among white men. We propose to give veteran soldiers one price and new volunteers another. Then there is a difference of condition and needs in the different sections of the country. A colored man in the loyal States should have the same bounty as a white man; but in rebel States, when we take these persons into our service and support their families—as we often have to do out of the public Treasury—the question arises whether we should give the same bounty. While I desire to make perfect equality between white and colored troops, I do not want to take money out of the Treasury unless it is necessary to do it.

Mr. COLLAMER. What is the difference, I again ask, between the amendment you now propose as a substitute and the original resolution?

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me one instant, I have just been examining these propositions: It appears that the original resolution, as amended, provides for paying the same compensation to colored soldiers after the 1st of January last passed as is paid to white soldiers. The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to pay the same compensation and put them on an equality from and after the passage of the resolution. The amendment now offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, proposes that this equality shall begin from and after the 1st day of March next. I do not understand why the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs retires from his former proposition.

Mr. WILSON. I do not. I am for the original proposition, and prefer it to any amendment whatever.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I suggest that we adhere to it.

Mr. GRIMES. The purpose that the Senator from Massachusetts has is to amend the substitute offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, so that, if that substitute shall be adopted in place of the original resolution, it will be perfect.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I would suggest to him to make the proposition conform to the vote already given by the Senate, to make the compensation begin from and after the 1st day of January.

Mr. GRIMES. That will come up on the question of adopting this as a substitute for the original proposition. I am going to vote for the original proposition; but I am in favor of making the substitute as perfect as I can, so that if I am outvoted in the Senate I shall not have a bill totally objectionable.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senate will allow me a single moment I will state the case as I understand it. I offered the original resolution making this equality of pay among our troops. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee reported it as it was introduced, making it retrospective. It came into the Senate, and on consideration it was evident that but a very small portion of this body was in favor of the resolution as reported. The retrospective portion of the resolution was stricken out on my motion, and the first day of the year substituted. I saw clearly that the retrospective clause would be stricken out, and that the resolution might not pass for three months to come. I supposed we had gained a great deal for the colored soldiers when we fixed the first day of the year.

Mr. CONNESS. Why not adhere to it?

Mr. WILSON. I am free to say that I prefer the original resolution; but the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] moved an amendment to it, in order to avoid, as he said, the word "color." I propose to amend that amendment so as to make it as near perfect as I can, so that if the amendment should be adopted we shall have it in the best form.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I suggest to the Senator, in place of offering the amendment that he has offered, to amend the amendment so that the compensation shall begin from and after the 1st day of January. Why leave that position? I do not understand it.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator says he does not understand it. It is very plain. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] proposes to give equal pay and bounties, to commence on the passage of the resolution, and it may not pass Congress until May or June. By fixing the 1st day of March we have a good starting-point. The original resolution does not contain equality of bounties, and if Senators will not give the bounty of $100 to all colored persons enlisted in the rebel States, they surely would not consent to go back to the 1st day of January and give the large bounties which expire on the 1st day of March. But my desire is to stand by the joint resolution as I introduced it, as reported by the Military Committee, and amended by the vote of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I would let this amendment go without amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Suppose it should be adopted?

Mr. CONNESS. There is no fear of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] as an amendment to the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire if the proposition which I offered as an amendment in the form of a substitute to the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania be in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order. Any amendment to the amendment proposed as a substitute, or to the original proposition, is in order.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move the three resolutions which I offered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, to strike out all of the amendment after the word "that," and insert the following:

All negroes and mulattoes, by whatever term designated, in the military service of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be discharged from such service, and shall be discharged as soon as practicable; but the President of the United States may retain such of said negroes and mulattoes as he shall deem proper in the military service as teamsters and laborers; and the commandants of the respective regiments to which said slaves may be attached shall issue to their owner or owners a certificate of their employment in the service of the Government.

And he it further resolved, That every loyal owner of any slave that has been heretofore or that may hereafter be taken into the service and for the use of the United States shall be entitled to a fair and reasonable compensation for the services of such slave for the time such slave may have been or may be in such service, to be paid quarterly; and where any slave may have been killed or died through exposure, or may have been disabled in such service, the owner or owners of all such slave or slaves shall be entitled to such compensation as will reasonably satisfy them for all damages that he, she, or they may have sustained by reason of the death or disability of any such slave or slaves; and where any such slave or slaves may become a fugitive and be not returned to the owner, the United States shall pay the owner or owners the reasonable value of the service of such slave or slaves.

And he it further resolved, That the owner or owners of any slave entitled to pay and compensation as hereinbefore provided for, may make out his, her, or their account therefor against the United States, and upon filing the same at the Treasury Department, sustained by such vouchers and proofs as are required ordinarily to support accounts against the United States, the same shall be audited and paid by the proper officers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to say a few words upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the subject-matter of it. I do not think that I shall add or say anything new on the subject; but as that amendment has brought so directly before the Senate the employment of negroes in putting down this rebellion I desire for a moment to be heard on that point.

The Administration have been busy for a year or so in arming and bringing into the service black men, the men who have been held in slavery. I have thought that I could see in the employment of these men the hand of retributive justice visited upon crime. I agree entirely with what was so well expressed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] the other day, that we northern men had not been mainly instrumental in destroying slavery, which he conceded was in effect dead, but it was the retribution of Heaven upon a stupendous crime. I think I see a fitness in employing these black men who have been held so long in slavery, to destroy the institution which has bound them.

The Senator from Kentucky now proposes that we disarm those men who have been brought into the service; that we take from them their muskets or their swords, or whatever they wield; that we do not only discharge them from the service, but keep them as teamsters, to dig in the trenches, and to do any service for which they may be taken, except to bear arms. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky, and I should like to have him answer it here now if he will—I submit it in all respect to him—why those men should not be armed and put into the service of the country? I do not insist that he shall answer if it is at all unpleasant to him now, but I should desire him to do so if he could do it concisely, that I might address myself to his objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I will do it very concisely. I have answered that question many times in this Senate, and I do not think it is necessary to repeat it again.

Mr. CLARK. Of course I will take what the Senator says, that he has answered it many times, and he does not desire to answer it again. Then I must look over perhaps the many long speeches he has made in order to see what his answer is. It is a labor I would not impose on anybody; and I did not know but he might tell me in a few words what really was his objection.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator is much worse employed very often.

Mr. CLARK. It may be that I am very much worse employed, but I have no taste for that kind of employment just now.

Mr. DAVIS. Why do you want me to repeat it, then?

Mr. CLARK. But if the Senator will not answer me now, as I have no time to stop to read these speeches at this time, I must go along and state what are my objections to turning them out of the service.

Mr. President, the question is not one as to the payment of money to the black man; but it is that by the employment of the black man, in addition to what I have said, we save the white man. If the Senator from Kentucky, or any other man who holds the notions which I suppose he does, undertakes to say that the black man is not worth so much as the white man, that he will not make so good a soldier, then I submit to him and to every other person who hears me, that it is a matter of self-interest to this country to employ the black man if he will do even tolerably well in putting down this rebellion; and I desire to say here that I am for employing every black man we can bring efficiently into the service, for the reason that it saves the blood of the white man and helps put this rebellion down quicker. I want that black man to have arms in his hands. I glory in the opportunity of putting arms in his hands, that when he puts down the rebellion he may put down forever the institution which has enslaved him. I hail in it the safety of the black man. I glory in his elevation; and I say here to the Senator from Kentucky, and I say it unhesitatingly, that when you have put arms in the hands of the black man you cannot enslave him; and therefore I would give him arms. I would make his arms his protection. I would teach him to respect himself as a man, and to feel that he is respected, and his rights preserved. It is for this reason, in short, that I oppose this amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

While I am up, sir, I desire to say further, that I am in favor of the resolution as originally offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] I desire to pay these black men who have been put into the service from the earliest time they have been efficiently employed. I do not understand why it is that men are to bare their bosoms for the country's cause, why they are to meet the enemy with arms in their hands, why they are to be slaughtered, why they are to be wounded, why they are to give their blood freely to the country, and not be paid for that service. I do not know that we can conveniently reach the matter so as to give every one of these black men pay from the moment he is called into the service of the country; but I would certainly give this pay to those black men who have been in the field, and especially those who have been in battle. Why should not the men who stood up before Wagner, why should not the men at Vicksburg, why should not the men all along the Mississippi, though they be black men, if they have been in the service, be paid for their service?

I know very well that when we first talked about employing these black men, it was a matter of experiment. This Senate was very timid on the subject. We did not know how these men might fight. We did not know how well the country might bear the service or the employment of the black man; and if Senators will refer to the acts of Congress, they will find in the first act which we passed on the subject, which was the confiscation act, we provided that the President might employ them in such way as he thought proper, and in such service as he thought proper, and in such organizations as he thought proper, but we did not say a word about their pay. We did not say anything about giving them thirteen dollars per month. We did not say anything about putting them on a level with other soldiers; but we left it for the President if, in his discretion, he thought it well to employ these black men, to put into the service in such way and manner as he thought proper so many of them as he thought proper.

The next act on the subject was the one in which we provided that he might employ them upon intrenchments or in teaming, or any other service for which he found them fit, and give them ten dollars per month. It was not known then that the black man was to be a good soldier; but when the negro was brought into the service of the country he vindicated himself. He showed that he could make a good soldier. He showed that he could make a good fighter. He showed that he could make a good marcher. He showed that he was obedient to discipline. He showed that in some cases he could endure more than the white man, and was equally loyal and ready to fight. Then, if the black man makes a good soldier, if he goes readily to the fight, if he stands up firmly and bravely and gives his blood and his life to the country, I ask, why should he not be paid? Can anybody tell me? I ask you, Mr. President, when in this country there have been those who have trodden down this black man for more than three quarters of a century, and when now in our need and misery and in our affliction we call upon him to come and help us put down this rebellion, I ask you if it is not ineffably mean to refuse to pay him what he deserves? No matter where the country's defender comes from, no matter what be the color of his skin, if he is a brave man, if he is a loyal man, if he stands up to the fight, I am for giving him his pay from the earliest time he is put into the field. I would give those brave men of Massachusetts their pay from the time they were enlisted; I would give those South Carolina men their pay from the time they went into the service; and so with all others. I do not believe that this country is so poor that it must be illiberal or unjust. I say these men should be paid, and I shall give no vote that does not look to their payment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment moved by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Wright—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—30.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLAMER. I propose to amend the original joint resolution by adding to it the following:

All persons enlisted or mustered into the service as volunteers under the call dated October 17, 1863, for three hundred thousand volunteers, who were at the time of enlistment actually, and for six months previous had been, resident inhabitants of the State in which they volunteered, shall receive from the United States the same amount of bounty, without regard to color: Provided, however, That the foregoing provision shall not extend to any State which the President by proclamation has declared in a state of insurrection.

Mr. President, I ought perhaps to state by way of preface and apology for presenting this proposition the fact that in the State in which I reside difference of color between men is not known either in its constitution or its laws, and our colored men were enrolled, subject to draft, and drafted in the same manner as white people. When the draft was made last summer, some of our colored people were drafted. After that draft was through, when the call was made in October again for three hundred thousand men, which we were assured if filled up would prevent any further draft, exertions were made in the State to do that, and they did it. It was done by adding to the bounty which the Government offered of $300 for raw recruits, from $300 to $500 apiece by the different towns. The town in which I live had in it some colored inhabitants. We understood that they were to be all the same in the volunteers as they were in the draft; we offered our bounties without regard to color; and black men and white men entered into the service and were mustered in, and they received the town bounty of from $300 to $500 apiece without regard to color. After the quota was made up by the State and the men had rendezvoused at Brattleboro', the Government proceeded to muster them into the service by inspection, and on ordering them pay they paid the $300 Government bounty to all the white men and they told the colored men they must go without any. That was the first intimation our people had that there was any difference between them in relation to pay.

I cannot state the precise number of these men, but there were from forty to sixty, a company of them, and I would mention one thing as showing the character of the men: every man among them wrote his name to his articles of enlistment; not one made his mark. There was no man among them but could have commanded his two dollars a day at home. They were from twenty to forty-five years old, able-bodied men. A very great sensation was produced not merely among them, but among the white people and the white soldiers who surrounded them; but they were carried away without any pay and without any assurance of any or any hope of any that I know of, and went away in great distress.

Under these circumstances I cannot but feel it to be my duty to ask to have the bounty paid to these men. I do not ask that colored men shall be paid where a State has sent off South or elsewhere and procured them. I ask, and that is my proposition, that the bounty shall be paid alike to men, regardless of color, if they were actually inhabitants, residents of the State, and had been so six months before the time of their enlistment. I have no more to say about it. It seems to me a very clear case of equity and justice, and I feel that it is my duty to claim it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the individual case to which the Senator alludes I perhaps agree with him; and I do not know but that there may be some other cases of a similar description; but it strikes me, as the amendment is worded, it would be likely to cover many cases where no such promise was made and no such understanding had. Take, for instance, the troops in Maryland. They have raised several regiments there, and raised them under the peculiar promises that were made to them. It would cover them as well. It would cover all, I suppose.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would ask the gentleman if he knows what were the terms on which they were enlisted?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that they were raised under that particular promise; but this amendment provides for paying so much to volunteers, and may include them.

Mr. COLLAMER. Were those men enrolled and subject to draft?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know.

Mr. COLLAMER. These men went because they might as well go and take the bounties as wait to be drafted. They were all on the rolls.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not sufficiently aware of the facts to vote on the Senator's proposition. I say to him distinctly that if these men were enrolled and subject to draft, and were taken into the service on that understanding, and precisely in the same way that white men were, I see no reason why they should not have the same bounty; and I agree with him on that subject. I do not see any reason for the distinction; but in making a general provision we should be careful that we do not run the Government to very great expense in reference to men who really are not entitled to the money, and I want time to look into it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Maine allow me a moment? I happened to be on the Eastern Shore of Maryland when many of these enlistments were made. The Government sent steamers to certain towns on that shore, and notice was given out that any negroes who wished to enter the military service would be received on the steamboats; and I saw some of them taken off on a steamboat.

Mr. COLLAMER. Was there anything said about their getting a bounty?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I never heard a word of it. Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot vote for this amendment if it is to be pushed on this resolution to-day.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no other on which to put it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unless the Senator introduces a new one; and of that he will judge. All I ask is that it may go over until we can get the proper information to see how far it will go, and to what cases it will apply. It is entirely unsafe to legislate here on the assertions and recollection of Senators as to a particular statement that has been made. That we have experienced often. By legislating in that way we may get ourselves into a difficulty that it will be hard to get out of. If the Senator from Massachusetts will consent to let the joint resolution go over to a subsequent day, until we can obtain the requisite information on the amendment proposed, to see how far it applies, it may perhaps be put into a position where I can vote for it. On the statement of the honorable Senator from Vermont, I feel disposed to vote for his amendment; but it is unsafe to act on it until we get more information than we have now. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will consent to let the resolution go over until to-morrow, so that we may get this information, because it is a very important amendment, and one which we ought not to act upon without more information.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And it is in order that we may get the requisite information of the extent of that amendment that I suggest that we take a little more time with it, because it may have a vastly more extensive operation than it would appear to have on the face of it.

Mr. WILSON. To accommodate gentlemen, I move to postpone the further consideration of this resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the House bill reviving the grade of lieutenant general.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the question is put on that motion I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts. I am as ready myself to act upon the bill providing for a lieutenant general now as at any time, but we have already had the roll of the Senate called and it appears that we have barely enough to make a quorum. It would be very desirable that we should have a full Senate when we act upon a bill of that character, and as there is considerable business to be done in executive session I suggest whether we had not better spend the rest of the day in acting on that kind of business to which there is no objection, and thus get rid of it and prevent its occupying our time hereafter.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing after the bill shall be taken up to go into executive session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; I have no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON. I am very anxious to get this bill through.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no! Let us finish the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I doubt if we can.

Mr. SHERMAN. Rather than delay a complement of this kind, I would at once consent to agree to the amendments of our Military Committee, and pass the bill in that shape.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have hard work to get a quorum here, even after sending out for members.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there will be no difficulty in keeping a quorum here to act upon the bill now before the Senate. It seems to me that we ought not to delay action on a complimentary bill of this character. If we are to pass it at all, let us pass it promptly; and, as a friend of the House bill unaltered, I would rather agree at once to the adoption of the amendments of our committee and pass it in that shape than have it longer delayed. I shall not detain the body by discussion, but I hope the Senate will act on the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My objection is founded upon the very idea that it is in a great degree complimentary; but perhaps we have no right to assume that, though we know the fact; and I say that in order to make it so we ought to have a full Senate when we act upon it, and not a bare quorum. The Senator must be aware that on the call of the roll before we were obliged to send out for members in order to make a quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the question is one of sufficient doubt to call for a division.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the bill be passed to-day it will be by a very lean vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps as large a vote to-day as at any other time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that on a matter discussed so much we ought to have a full vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. SHERMAN called for a division.

Mr. SUMNER. A division will show that we have not a quorum here.

Mr. SHERMAN. We know that if we go into executive session, divisions will occur almost immediately; and therefore, if we are without a quorum, that fact may as well be ascertained now.

Mr. SUMNER. I will state that there is business which it is important to act upon in executive session, with regard to which I think there will be no division, but which must in the nature of the case take a little time.

The Senate being divided on the motion of Mr. SUMNER, there were 15 yeas and 7 nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

There is no use in sitting here without a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from New Hampshire is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I am requested to say that the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] is in consequence of severe illness in his family, by which he is called away, and he is not able to assure the Senate at what time he can return.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, on the motion of Mr. HALE, resulted—yeas 3, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Hale, and Saulsbury—3.
NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—34.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum being now present, the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting a statement of the expenditure of the contingent fund of that Department; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

CONTESTED ELECTION IN MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House depositions in the contested-election case between James Lindsey and John G. Scott, from the third congressional district of Missouri, on the part of the contestant; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

VOTES ON THE ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the report of the committee of conference upon the conscription bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. I, in common with many others, understood that no vote would be taken on that matter on Friday evening, and under that impression we left the Hall. We were anxious, and we are anxious still, to record our votes on that measure, and I hope the House will not be found wanting in courtesy by refusing us the privilege now of recording our votes. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] I have no idea we can change the result. If he finds there is any danger of that he can withdraw his consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is not a matter of courtesy. I expected the first application would come from this side of the House. On Friday we were left very nearly without a quorum, and I shall now object to every application of this kind except where the applicant was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MALLORY. I was very unwell and had been for some time, and I was worn out with the long session on that day before I left. I ask the gentleman if he will now object to my voting?

Mr. SCHENCK declined to withdraw his objection.

Mr. MALLORY. I should have voted "no."

Mr. GRIDER. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the conscript bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio says he objects to every application to vote, except where sickness prevented the applicant from voting.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am compelled to object.

Mr. GRIDER. I would have voted in the negative.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BOYD. I wish to record my vote on the conscript bill.

Objection was made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is called for. The call for committees for reports is in order; and under that call the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLEY took the floor.

Mr. HARDING. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to make a statement. The report of the committee of conference on the enrollment bill was brought up at a very late hour on Friday evening, at a time when no man in the House expected it would be brought up. The hour was so late that the report then took every man by surprise. At that late hour a gentleman was upon the floor making a lengthy speech; and I regard the bringing in of that report then as taking an unfair advantage of those who were absent. I would have voted against that iniquitous measure had I been here.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I ask the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that if I had been here on Friday I should have voted in favor of the report of the committee of conference on the conscription bill.

Mr. KELLEY resumed the floor.

Mr. STEBBINS. Will the gentleman give way to me for a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot, if it is to come out of my time; otherwise I will gladly yield.

Mr. STEBBINS. I desire to introduce a resolution which will give rise to no debate.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. I understand that the chairman of the committee, whose bill I am about to sustain, proposes to offer an amendment to the bill, and I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will withdraw his objection for that purpose.

Mr. ELIOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can modify his amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. That is all I want to do. It will make the bill more acceptable to gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. Have I not a right to object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] yielding the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could have done so if he had objected in time, but he did not do so.

Mr. MALLORY. I objected as soon as I found out what the gentleman wanted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked to have the privilege of modifying his amendment.

Mr. ANCONA. And I rose in my place and objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the objection came too late.

Mr. ELIOT. I propose the following modifications:

At the end of section one add the words "nor concerning any other persons than freedmen."

On page 5, in section six, after the words "real estate," in line nineteen, insert the words "within said districts."

Strike out "therefrom" in section six, line twenty-four, and insert "from said lands."

I now ask that the bill as amended be printed.

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, mutation is the law of our life. Paradoxical as it may seem, no law is more immutable or inexorable than this. "Passing away" is written on all material things. Nothing bideth in one stay; and, sir, much of pain and anguish as these ever-recurring changes, the inevitable product of swift-winged time, may bring, they are the sole source of hope and aspiration; they are the method and sure guarantee of progress, social and political. Stagnation is death. Bats and owls undoubtedly have their place in the economy of nature, but in their love of the twilight and darkness that succeed the day they do not symbolize the wise and sagacious statesman. That nation is in a bad way whose legislators' intellectual vision is from the back of their heads; whose faith ignores eternal laws because they are invisible, and lays hold only of such palpable facts as that pepper is hot in the mouth, and that when the sun is at meridian it should be noon by the almanac; and whose hope sings no joyful prophecy of a better future, but spends itself on a sad refrain made up of legend and tradition. The wise statesman—indeed, he who is at all a statesman is keen and far-sighted—notes the ever-recurring new facts of the new day. He watches the progress of sentiment and opinion. He observes the development of the material resources of his country and of the world. He pays regard to the great eternal laws of justice, right, and truth, and from time to time so modifies those habits, customs, and institutions which are vicious or essentially temporary and transitory as to bring the order of society into harmony with nature's laws, and thus secure the prosperity and peace of the people.

Sir, statesmanship would have averted the rebellion that now scourges our country. The fathers of the country saw the character of slavery. They gave us the Ordinance of 1787, which forever prohibited it north and west of the Ohio river. They excluded from our Constitution the words "slave" and "slavery," because they believed the institution to be transitory, and would not cause the blush of shame to mantle the cheeks of their descendants by recording in that enduring instrument the fact that an institution so incompatible with its scope and spirit had ever existed under it. Had their counsels prevailed, or had statesmen succeeded them in the government of the country, slavery would have long since been abolished, and other questions than those which now distract our country would have been in process of solution at the hands of a peaceful, prosperous, and mighty people. But it was not so ordered. The Government was confided to the hands of wicked and short-sighted demagogues, and they, by disregarding the immutable laws of right and justice, have involved us in war; and it is the part of the statesman and the wise legislator to accept the facts of the day as he finds them, to apply to them controlling and enduring principles, and thus to evoke beautiful order out of the sanguinary chaos that surrounds us. This he may do by inaugurating a system of paid labor that shall be in harmony with the spirit of the age and Christian civilization.

The bill under consideration, Mr. Speaker, is well calculated to produce these happy results. The committee charged with its preparation has considered it in no narrow or partisan spirit. The majority of the committee beheld the great need of such a bureau as it contemplates. They have called from far and near the wisest counselors. They have heard slaveowning and other citizens of the rebellious territory. They have called to their aid officers both civil and military who had enjoyed the means of ascertaining what is needed, and after mature deliberation they have reported the bill as it stands before the House. Its immediate passage is demanded by the fact that the ancient order of things has been destroyed over a territory described by the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] as "larger than were the whole thirteen original States of these United States; a territory extending from the shores of the Potomac to the Rio Grande." The constitutions of the States that once had jurisdiction over that vast territory were extinguished when sovereign conventions of the people severed the ligaments that bound them to the Constitution and Government of the United States. Their able-bodied white men have been or are being conscripted by the despotic and aristocratic usurpers of their government to make war upon us and our institutions. Their slaves, freed by the proclamation of the Commander-in-Chief of our Army and Navy, are fleeing by tens and hundreds of thousands to our standard and within our lines, and the broad territory to which we look for supplies of cotton, rice, sugar, and tobacco lies a wide waste, overgrown with weeds. The bill proposes, by means simple, legal, constitutional, and inexpensive, nay, by which millions, many millions, per annum will be added to the Treasury of our country, to cultivate so much of these lands, and to employ in their cultivation so many of these people as have come or may come within our lines. In the cultivation of its lands a nation finds its wealth. And none can suffer from the employment of idle laborers on abandoned lands.

The future welfare of the freedmen demands such action. They must not be permitted to contract habits of idleness, indolence, and vagrancy. The welfare of the people of the North demands it. They need the commodities yielded by this territory. Their industry is paralyzed by the want of cotton which will be produced on these fields and by the labor of these people. The world at large demands it. The absence of the well-directed toil of these very people upon the neglected lands now and soon to be within our lines has caused gaunt want and starvation to stalk through the manufacturing districts of Great Britain and the continent. And it is our duty, by prompt legislation, to stanch these wounds, as we can do by the coming autumn. The provisions of this bill are well directed to that end. Humanity, the spirit of the nineteenth century, and Christian civilization demand its immediate passage.

Happily, I need not dwell on its details. They were elaborately explained by my colleague on the committee, the chairman, when he introduced the bill to the attention of the House. On that occasion he challenged the free, frank, and full discussion of the bill; and what response has been made to his challenge? The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox], the gentleman from the Brooklyn district of New York, [Mr. KALBFLEISCH], and the gentleman from the city district of that State, [Mr. Brooks], have all spoken to the bill; but they have not discussed its details. They have not attempted to point out the provisions in it that are unconstitutional, illegal, or unwise. They have heaped upon it invective and denunciation; but its details and its spirit they have evaded. Indeed, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] said:

"But, Mr. Speaker, it is vain for me to attempt to discuss the details of this bill, for it is a bill which has doubtless been caucused and settled and decided upon elsewhere. I will not, therefore, waste the time of the House in a futile discussion of its details."

Futile, indeed, would have been the discussion had the gentleman attempted to verify his denunciation of the bill by pointing out the provisions which sustained or justified it. The gentlemen chose rather to evade the bill, its objects, and its provisions, and to entertain us with incoherent rhapsodies, which would have been very well in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union where we all speak for buncombe, but which sounded dreary and melancholy enough in connection with a great and grave topic like that which should properly have engaged the attention of the House.

Sir, in the absence of assailable provisions in the bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] poured forth his indignation upon the grand old Puritan State. He said:

"I know the spirit of Massachusetts. I know her inexorable, unappeasable, demoniac energy. I know that what she decrees she will execute, as when she ordered the burning of the witches at Salem, or the scourging of the Quakers, or exile of the Baptists to the rocky shores of the Narragansett or to the mountain-fastnesses and glens of New Hampshire, where my maternal Baptist ancestors were banished. Hence when, as now, she decrees on the African, I tremble for three million of hitherto happy human beings now doomed to extermination."

And again he said:

"The spirit of Massachusetts has done in two or three years only what Christ, or the church of Christ, was twelve or fifteen hundred years in accomplishing in the Roman empire."

Sir, I am no son of Massachusetts or New England as the gentleman is; but I remember that, in my wayward youth, being free from the indenture that had bound me to a long apprenticeship, but not having attained manhood, I wandered from my native Pennsylvania, counter to the current tide of emigration, in pursuit of employment, and found a home in Massachusetts, and I may be pardoned if I pause for a moment to feebly testify my gratitude to her in whom I found a gentle and generous foster-mother. I thank God for the Puritan spirit of Massachusetts. A boy, poor, friendless, and in pursuit of wages for manual toil, I found open to me in the libraries of Boston the science, history, and literature of the world. At a cost that even the laboring man did not feel I found, night after night, and week after week, in her lyceums and lecture-rooms the means of intercourse with her Bancroft, her Brownson, her Everett, her Channings, her Prescotts, her Emerson, and scores of other as learned and as able, though perhaps less distinguished sons than these. I thus learned what it was to be an American citizen, and to what a height American civilization will be carried; and I found four years of life spent at well-paid toil worth to me what the same number of years in a college might have been. I thank the men of Massachusetts, as will the scholars in public schools fashioned upon her principles in the city of Charleston in good time. They may be white, they may be black, they may be yellow, but when the civilization of Massachusetts shall have penetrated that dark city, and fashioned its institutions as it will, the pleasure of the pupils in the schools will be to thank God night and morning for the spirit of Massachusetts which kept liberty alive, and finally brought its blessings to the entire people of the country. Yes, sir, Massachusetts in the past two or three years has given a practical application of those principles which in twelve or fifteen centuries gave freedom to Europe, and is about giving it to all the people of America. Not without war, however; and the gentleman ignored the teachings of history when he said that it had been done without war in Europe. Sir, the history of the contest for freedom in Europe is a history of continuous, sanguinary, and destructive war.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] less gravely—I will not say more flippantly, for that might be offensive—devoted his hour, as I have said, not to the examination of the bill, but to a criticism of certain utterances of Wendell Phillips and Theodore Tilton, and the reading of copious extracts from an anonymous pamphlet recently published by Dexter, Hamilton & Co., Nassau street, New York, entitled Miscegenation.

I am a little disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should receive such treatment at the hands of gentlemen on the other side of the House. They profess to sympathize with the people of the South. They profess to wish for peace and to restore them to the blessings of society. Sir, do they not know that this bill relates to four million people of the South, half a million, certainly more than four hundred thousand, of whom are the near relatives of their former associates upon this floor and their partisans in the South, men to whom they and their deluded partisans confided the administration of our Government for more than thirty years? None know better than these gentlemen that one half million of those slaves are the near relatives, the uncles, aunts, and cousins, brothers, sisters, and children of the Democracy of the South; that in the veins of that number of colored people tingles the blood of what the gentlemen have been pleased to consider the master race of this country. The gentleman intimated that, by reason of the utterances to which he referred, he was satisfied that the Republicans and abolitionists of the North would fall into the practice of amalgamation. Sir, he knows very well that the complaint of the alleged illegal and unconstitutional arrest of that specimen of southern chivalry, that representative of Virginia manners and morals, that leader of the New York Democracy, Captain J. U. Andrews, is not their real grievance in the premises. He knows very well that their real grievance, and that out of which they expected to make most capital while they hoped to restore slavery to its old political power, is that when the officers tore that husband of a white woman ruthlessly from the sweltering embrace of his African inamorata they violated Democratic usages. Yes, sir; this is their real cause of complaint in the premises.

It is not the men of the North who have been enamored by that complexion which is described as the "shadowed livery of the burning sun." It is not the men of the North who have laid their "snowy hands" in "palms of russet;" or have "hung Europe's priceless pearl that shames the Orient on Africa's swarthy neck;" or realized experimentally the truth of the poet's aphorism, that "In joining contrasts lieth Love's delight."

These exquisite and delicate sources of enjoyment have been in the exclusive possession of the southern Democracy, the collaborators in politics of the gentleman who charges them so wantonly upon the people of his own section. He has never seen the white northern man choose his companion from that race. I have by me the picture of a band of slaves sent North by General Banks, four of whom are as white as we who hold this discussion. They come from the colored schools recently established in New Orleans. They are children of southern Democrats; born in Virginia and Louisiana, they were owned or sold by their fathers as negro slaves.

I look, sir, upon that picture of Washington's companion in the Revolution [pointing to the picture of La Fayette] and his fit associate in this Hall, and I remember that when on his tour through this country in 1824 he visited the southern States, he very publicly expressed his surprise at finding the complexion of the negro population in their cities so largely changed from what it had been at the close of the revolutionary war, and expressed the hope that in finding the two races thus blending their blood he might discover the solution of the slavery question.

But a few weeks ago, in conversation with a distinguished son of Kentucky, himself a slaveholder, upon the question now under discussion, he said to me that in 1849 he was at school at Danville, Kentucky; that there were there on an average three hundred young men, and that though the colored population of the town numbered six hundred, there were but six of pure African blood. The scholars of that school were not northern abolitionists or Republicans. They were the wealthy and educated young gentlemen of the democratic South.

But, sir, let this question not rest upon isolated instances or narrow localities. Let us look at the census of 1860. I find by it that more than half a million of the colored people of that section are, as I have already intimated, the kindred of the white race of the South. Thus in Louisiana, of the free colored people, 81.29 per cent. are of mixed blood, while in Pennsylvania only 33.67 are of mixed blood. And here let me say the latter are nearly all of southern birth. I remember while litigation was pending in our courts between two colored natives of Charleston there were on one occasion about fifty witnesses in court. Some of my colleagues remember the occasion. The contest was between Robert J. Douglass and Wilkinson Jones, and among the fifty witnesses, all of whom were natives of Charleston, South Carolina, and its immediate vicinity, there was not a black or one white man. They were all of mixed blood. And in behalf of Pennsylvania, I claim that the South has sent us by far the greater portion of what we have of that stock. In Alabama the percentage of mixed blood is 77.99, and in Vermont 27.08. In Texas it swells to 76.90; in Rhode Island it sinks to 25.23; in South Carolina it rises again to 71.96, notwithstanding her exportations to Pennsylvania and elsewhere; in Connecticut it sinks to 72.04. In North Carolina it is 71.59; in New York it is 15.88. In Florida it is 68.99; in New Jersey it is but 13.64. But these, you say, are freed people; these are persons whose fathers, unwilling to sell their own blood, have manumitted their children. Let us look, then, to the statistics of the slave population. I find that by the census of 1850 there were of mixed blood among the slave population but 7.30 per cent.; and in 1860, so busy had the pro-slavery Democracy been in augmenting the numerical power of the institution, that the 7.30 had swollen to 10.41; and if the negro race is to be saved as a distinct race, the only way to do it is to take it from the embrace of the slaveholders, to acknowledge the humanity of the slave, to give him the rite of marriage, and to teach him those great truths which, according to the gentleman from New York, in twelve or fifteen hundred years gave freedom, and with it morals, to Europe.

But enough and something too much of this. Indeed, I crave the pardon of the House for having followed the gentleman from Ohio so far into this discussion.

It is not for me, Mr. Speaker, to predict the fate of races of people. It is not for me to disclose the providence of God with reference to our country. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." My business, and yours, sir, and that of this House, is to legislate wisely for the remedy of the evils that now beset our country. The country, the world, humanity at large needs the labor of these freedmen upon the broad lands abandoned by rebel owners, and I beg the House to pass this bill as the sure means of securing present blessings and future peace and national prosperity.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] said further:

"I must accept facts accomplished, and abide by the consequences. Hence I recognize the abolition of slavery; hence I intend to act hereafter upon that recognition, because it is inevitable. So far as I have influence I intend to withdraw that question from the exciting canvass of the day, and to go before the people upon other matters of difference."

Sir, I hail the gentleman as friend and brother in the good work of the future. I welcome him as I hope soon to welcome to the ranks of the friends of freedom the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] who told us that the Democratic party had not been a pro-slavery party, and seemed to me to be paving the way for coming forward and joining those who bear the standard of progress. Yes, I shall welcome him too, addicted to persiflage as he is.

But the gentleman from New York says that slavery is dead. Let us, then, give it decent burial. Let us erect to its wicked memory a monument. Let us close the mouth of the sepulcher with a stone so weighty that it shall preclude the possibility of resurrection. Let us put over it the Constitution of the United States, having first written indelibly therein that slavery or involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime, shall be forever prohibited within the United States, or any State thereof, or any Territory belonging thereto. When we shall have done that, then slavery will be dead indeed, and the United States be freedom's harbinger to mankind, offering perpetual welcome to the oppressed of the world. Will you, gentlemen, give us a vote for that amendment, and thus attest the sincerity of your conversion?

But something more is to be done. Slavery is not quite dead. It holds a little fastness still in Kentucky, where slaves are gathered, I am told, from all the surrounding States; but it is in the act of death. We may consider it dead, and pass on to the next duty. Having thus eradicated chattel slavery, let us unite in securing freedom to the people who have been its victims. Are they capable of freedom? Are they worthy of our efforts? Let Messrs. Owen, McKay, and Dr. Howe speak. They have had ample means of judging, and have carefully passed upon these questions. In their report of the American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission they say:

"The evidence before the commission establishes, beyond cavil, the fact that these refugees are, with rare exceptions, loyal men, putting faith in the Government, looking to it for guidance and protection, willing to work for moderate wages if promptly paid, docile and easily managed, not given to quarreling among themselves, of temperate habits, cheerful and uncomplaining under hard labor, whenever they are treated with justice and common humanity, and (in the southern climate) able and willing, on the average, to work as long and as hard as white laborers, whether foreign or native born."

Certainly such people are capable of taking care of themselves. Let us then give them freedom, indeed. We have struck the shackles from their limbs, but they are like orphan children. They need such guidance and assistance at the hands of the Government as a faithful guardian would bestow. They have not owned themselves. Marriage has been a rite denied them. They were not permitted to identify themselves or their children by the use of family names. History, science, and literature have been sealed books to them; nay, it has been a felony to teach them to read the word of God! They, their wives and children, have been numbered, counted, bought, and sold, with horses, cows, and other cattle on the plantations of their owners. This can be no more. They are sober, industrious, and skilled in the labor which is required to make these broad acres productive, and all that they need is guidance, fair play in the battle of life, and fair wages for fair day's work. Let us, then, by the provisions of this bill, secure these things to them, and they will prove their fitness for liberty.

But the gentleman [Mr. Brooks] says they will be destroyed; that a harsh and superior race will exterminate them; that liberty is no boon to them. In this he asserts the theory of the despot and the aristocrat of every age and country. No man is, in their judgment, fit for freedom till he has got used to its enjoyment. I tell you, sir, that liberty is not a superstition, a name, an uncertain tradition. It is a fact. It is well embodied in our political institutions, and is confirmed by the equal social and political life of New England. Freedom, sir, is for the laborer

"Broad
And a comely table spread,
When from daily labor come,
In a neat and happy home,
It is clothes and fire and food
For the trampled multitude."

Let us pass this bill. Let the commissioners it calls into being see that these abandoned estates are leased. Let the freedman feel that he is a man with a home to call his own, and a family around him, a wife to protect, children to nurture and rear, wages to be earned and received, and a right to invest his savings in the land of the country, and you will find that no race will prove itself able to blot out of existence these hardy children of toil. According to the gentleman's theory, the Irish race is rapidly disappearing from the world. Look at the census and behold its frightful exhibit. In 1841 the population of Ireland was 8,175,124. In 1861, after a lapse of but twenty years, it had shrunk to 5,764,543. Is the Irish element therefore disappearing? Sir, it is making an empire of Australia. It is taking advantage of our ridiculously misnamed reciprocity treaty with Canada, and building up a rival power beyond the lakes. The names of Corcoran, Mulligan, and Meagher tell you what it is doing in our midst. Although the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARRINGTON] would exclude the Celt from the right of citizenship and confine it to the Anglo-Saxon merely, the day never was when the Irish element of humanity was exercising so wide, so powerful, so beneficent an influence as it does today, when the little island of Ireland is apparently being depopulated. You need not fear that this black race will fade away. Give these people homes, give them the sense of proprietorship in the land, give them families to cherish, give them the pleasures and power of science, literature, philosophy, and the hopes of religion, and you need not fear that you can corrupt them as you have done in slavery or annihilate them by your power. The glowing South, the land of the tropics, genial to them, invites its own development and will insure that of this race.

The people of the South understand this matter better than we. I find in the New Orleans Times of December 16 the proceedings of the convention of the friends of freedom in the State of Louisiana. It was largely attended by the ablest and best men of New Orleans and the contiguous parishes. Thomas J. Durant, Esq., who for thirty years has illustrated the glorious profession of law at the bar of Louisiana, presided, and, on taking the chair, said:

"Fellow-citizens of the convention, friends of the cause of human freedom and of liberty, I feel greatly oppressed by the sentiments which crowd upon me with overpowering influence as I thank you, before taking my seat in the honorable position to which your voices have assigned me, for the honor you have conferred on me. You are assembled in a great and sacred cause. It is the cause for which your forefathers fought; the cause for which your brothers, on many a battle-field, are falling and dying. It is the sacred cause of liberty. We are prompted to the execution of the task which we have undertaken by every sentiment of justice and humanity; of justice to ourselves as men representing the great principles of freedom in the State of Louisiana, and to those wearing the bonds of slavery, but whose bonds are now to be broken. This convention is the first deliberative body in Louisiana that will have proclaimed the freedom of all men. No matter with how dark a hue their skins may be embrowned, beneath the surface there is the soul of a man, and therein we recognize the great principle of equality and fraternity. It is the assertion of this principle which will lead to the reconstruction of our country. It is by the destruction of slavery that, phoenix like, will rise from the ashes of this rebellion the spirit of a new freedom. Out of this insurrection will grow a resurrection that will lead us to a glorious immortality."

The men of Louisiana who know the colored people of that State believe that they are fit for freedom, and do not fear their extermination. I find in the same paper—the New Orleans Times of the 9th instant—an elaborate report of the proceedings of a mass meeting of colored people of New Orleans, held in lyceum hall the preceding evening. I read a more condensed account of the meeting taken from the columns of a leading New York journal, remarking that its statements are all sustained by the report to which I have referred:

"A meeting of the colored people of this city was held last evening in the lyceum hall to meet Colonel McKay, one of the commissioners appointed by the President to investigate the condition of the negroes emancipated by act of Congress and the President's proclamation of January 1, 1863. Long before the hour of commencement every seat in the vast hall was filled, and soon the aisles and all available standing-places were densely packed above and below.

"It is no exaggeration to say that a more respectable audience, so far as external appearances were concerned, was never assembled in New Orleans. The female portion especially were as well dressed and looked as tidy and as genteel as the audience to be found in your fashionable churches on the Sabbath. Many of the quadrons and octorons were of surpassing beauty, and in every line of their countenance expressed intelligence, refinement, and good-breeding.

"The white gentlemen present, who had spent much time among the degraded negroes on the Sea Islands of South Carolina, were astonished to find before them an audience so fashionably dressed, so intelligent in appearance, and in every respect so thoroughly competent to understand all that should be said to them. It is also interesting to know that this lyceum hall is in the court-house; that it is the largest room in the city; that the city authorities have always refused permission to the negroes to hold meetings there, and that in this instance it was obtained only upon the order of Governor Shepley, at the request of Colonel McKay.

"It was in this hall that the convention met to carry the State out of the Union, and it was here that the ordinance of secession was drafted.

"The Rev. S. W. Rogers was appointed president of the meeting. The proceedings opened with prayer by a clergyman present, after which the chairman stated the object of their assembling together. He then introduced Colonel McKay, the commissioner from the President.

"This gentleman on taking the stand was received with great applause. In a short address he stated to the audience that the people of the North and the President felt the deepest interest in the condition of the colored population of this city, and that the President had sent him here as a special commissioner to inquire into their condition and ascertain their wishes. He had visited their schools and was very favorably impressed with the progress they were making. They must go on in the work they had commenced, and must depend in a great measure upon their own labors for their salvation.

"To be really free before the law involved great responsibilities. You have not only rights to achieve but duties to perform—duties to yourselves individually, to your families, and to the community at large. Your enemies say that you are not susceptible of a high degree of cultivation, that your Creator never designed that you should be free men, and that you will either gradually disappear from the earth or relapse into the condition from which you have but recently been rescued. It remains with you to decide whether you will work out for yourselves a glorious future or return to slavery and obscurity.

"Upon the close of the remarks of Colonel McKay, a committee was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting, and while they were absent Mr. J. B. Noble was called upon to address the assembly. He stated that there were two classes introduced here—one of slaves from the wilds of Africa, an ignorant, degraded people, and the other an intelligent, educated, enlightened, and wealthy class from Jamaica and Cuba; that they had contributed by their labors to the wealth and prosperity of Louisiana; that they had always obeyed the laws and paid their taxes promptly, school tax and all, though they had never reaped any advantage from it until within the last year. They wanted public schools. They wanted to be recognized as men. They wanted the odious black code done away with.

"After Mr. Noble had concluded his remarks, in the course of which he related an instance of the workings of the black code which affected many of the audience to tears, the following resolutions were reported by the committee, and after being read in French and English were adopted:

"Whereas his Excellency the President of these United States felt it his duty to inquire into the condition of the colored people of Louisiana for the realization of their new position in social life, to sustain themselves and implant a spirit of independent and free manhood into the minds of their descendants; and whereas we perceive, through the effects of this wicked rebellion, that the power, prosperity, wealth, justice, and liberty of this country will be brought to their greatest perfection only by a wise and judicious legislation for the just equalization of human rights; and whereas the sympathies over the relative condition of society will be notably renovated and improved: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That we the colored people of this city, in mass meeting assembled, at lyceum hall, in New Orleans, do hereby express our unbounded and heartfelt thanks to the President of these United States, Abraham Lincoln, and his Cabinet, for the palpable interest they take in behalf of the once so unrighteously oppressed people of Africa's blood.

"Be it further resolved, That we acknowledge the power, proceedings, and enactments of the present Administration of the United States, and our sincere prayer is that its legislative acts may be felt throughout the land, like the rain and sunshine on our earthly soil.

"And be it further resolved, That as unto God we send our daily prayers for the welfare, both temporal and spiritual, of the President and his family, so unto the same great Being we offer up our petitions for the longer continuance of his servant, Abraham Lincoln, in his present high and responsible position, and for the progressive development of a higher civilization, refinement, righteousness, truth, peace, and national happiness of the American people."

But gentlemen say that the bureau proposed by this bill is to be expensive to the Government; that if the system could be made lucrative, they "would love to do something for these poor blacks." They do not ask you to give them anything but work and wages. They wish to pay liberally for all beyond this. These men without a name, known as Tom, Joe, and Dick, have rented their one, their five, ten, or twenty acres, and have produced a large amount of cotton, on which they pay to the Government a duty of two cents per pound. I find in Mr. Yeatman's report on the condition of the freedmen of the Mississippi the following statement on this subject:

"I visited quite a number of freedmen who were engaged in planting cotton on their own account.

"Granville Green, (colored,) on the Beard place, works a number of hands, and is supplied by Government with rations, to be paid for when the crop is sold. I was informed that he would make from ten to twelve bales of cotton.

"Tom Taylor (colored) was working seven hands on the Savage place, the Government furnishing rations until the crop is sold.

"Luke Johnson, (colored,) on the Albert Richardson place, will make five bales of cotton, and corn sufficient for his family and stock, and has sold $300 worth of vegetables. He has paid all expenses without aid from the Government. He commenced work last May.

"Bill Gibson and Phil Ford (colored) commenced work last May, and will make nine bales of cotton. They occasionally hire a woman or two, and have paid their hands in full, and found their own provisions.

"Solomon Richardson, (colored,) on the Sam. Richardson place, will make ten bales of cotton. He has had one hand to assist him, and has a good garden and corn.

"Richard Walton (colored) will make seven bales of cotton. He has only had assistance in gathering it. He has no garden, but has provided for himself, and paid for everything.

"Henry Johnson (colored) will make eight bales of cotton, doing all the work himself.

"Moses Wright (colored) will make five bales. He has had his wife and two women to aid him, and all have paid their own way.

"Jacob, (colored,) on the Blackman place, has made seven bales of very fine cotton, the best I saw, and equal to any ever grown in this section. He had some assistance.

"Jim Blue, (colored,) an old man, has made two bales of cotton.

"George, (colored,) aided by two women, has made eight bales of cotton.

"Milly, (colored woman,) whose husband was killed by the rebels, will make three bales of cotton. She had two boys to aid her in picking, at fifty cents per day.

"Peter (colored) and his son have made two bales, and raised a crop of corn.

"Ned (colored) will make two and a half bales of cotton, besides his corn.

"Charles (colored) will make two bales of cotton, besides his corn.

"Sancho (colored) works part of the Ballard place. I was informed he would make eighty bales of cotton. He works about twenty-seven men, women, and boys. I called to see him, but he was absent.

"Patrick, (colored,) on the Farron place, near Millikin's Bend, has made about twenty-seven bales of cotton. He has six or seven persons to aid him.

"Bob (colored) will make nine or ten bales of cotton on the same place.

"Prince (colored) will make six or seven bales of cotton.

"From the above one can readily see that coercion is not essential to make the negro work. The new boon of freedom had been granted, and still they steadily went forward with their work, some of them accomplishing fully as much as under the eye of a master and the lash of the overseer."

Adjutant General Thomas also tells us that he had leased fifteen plantations to freedmen, and that they worked them well and judiciously, raising from four to one hundred and fifty bales of cotton, on every pound of which the Government received a rent of two cents. I hold in my hand the account of sale of part of the cotton made by a number of these poor freedmen. It is from the second report of Mr. Yeatman—that on the subject of leasing abandoned plantations:

"Ample provision is made for such freedmen as desired to lease ground for themselves. Such as did it last year were eminently successful. I annex a statement of a few account sales of cotton grown by the colored lessees: the sales do not by any means include all grown by them; besides there are many others who leased plantations, or parts of plantations, for which no returns had been rendered.

Poor Contraband, having twelve bales of cotton as working capital, may yet hope to earn himself a "local habitation and a name."

Under General Thomas's arrangements these people were hired at seven dollars a month for an able-bodied man, and five dollars for a woman. Under the influences which originated this bill their wages have been raised to twenty-five dollars for a first-class, twenty dollars for a second-class, and fifteen dollars for a third-class man, and women of the same character, instead of being compelled to labor for five dollars, now get eighteen, fourteen, and eleven dollars.

Sir, speculators, when they leased lands, said they could not work them and pay such wages; but when the lettings of hands came to be made there was much competition for laborers at the enhanced price. On this subject Mr. Yeatman says:

"The lessees were necessarily disappointed, having been led to believe that they could employ laborers at the old wages, seven dollars for men and five dollars for women of every age and capacity. There were those who stated that plantations could not be leased, if they had to pay the minimum wages required, say for men graded No. 1, twenty-five dollars; No. 2, twenty dollars; No. 3, fifteen dollars; women of the same grades, eighteen dollars, fourteen dollars, and fifteen dollars; but notwithstanding, when the time for leasing came, there were none that held back on this account."

Pecuniary advantage to ourselves is a mean argument to suggest; but let me ask whether the men of the Northwest do not wish to create millions of consumers, liberal consumers, of their great staples? I know that Pennsylvania and New England will not complain if these four million people who have been non-consumers of their products shall send each fall and spring to buy the products of their workshops. It will do the North no harm to see these freedmen and their families in houses, rather than in dog-hutches called slave quarters; to know that they have carpets upon their floors, furniture in their rooms, and Yankee clocks upon their mantels; and that when on the Sabbath day they repair to the village church, built by their own generous contributions, they dress as their taste may lead them to.

This, Mr. Speaker, is not a political bill. It is required by the exigencies of the case. We are in the midst of a revolution, and it is no answer to the demand for a bureau to say that there has never been a Freedmen's Bureau before. It is no answer to say that there is no precedent. Gentlemen, turn your vision to the front; for to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow again will come, and each day will bring new conditions and new duties; and the man who is not ready to confront the morrow is not fit to legislate for the leading nation of the world.

But gentlemen inquire whether this bill will benefit the white man. Yes, it will. I find that among the eight million whites of the South, with scarcely any foreigners among them, for foreign labor has been excluded by the system of unpaid labor that prevailed—among the eight million whites there are more than fourteen thousand more who cannot read or write than are found among the eighteen millions of the North, though these embrace almost all the uneducated foreigners who have emigrated to this country. Under the provisions of this bill, by which abandoned plantations are to be occupied, the colored man who has never owned himself, and the white man who has owned nothing but himself for a few acres of mountain side or sandhill, can come and rent from the Government a farm, larger or smaller as his means may justify, for which he will be required to pay two cents a pound on the cotton he may raise and five cents per bushel for corn, and so add to the revenues of the country. It will bless the poor white man quite as much as it will his dark-skinned brother, the freedman.

The bill might well be pressed as a revenue measure. Mr. Yeatman tells us that the lands leased up to February 12 will yield an income of from twelve to fifteen hundred thousand dollars per annum. But let him speak for himself:

"Under the present system all who employ labor, whether owners or lessees, are required to contribute one cent per pound on all cotton grown, which is to be applied for the maintenance and benefit of the aged and infirm freed people and motherless children, and the establishment of schools. If the quantity of land applied for should be cultivated, it will yield an income of from twelve to fifteen hundred thousand dollars per annum to be applied to purposes above mentioned, a sum more than sufficient. Those who labor will support themselves. Schools can and will be established on every plantation leased where there are children sufficient to justify. Teachers are now being supplied by the various missionary and other educational associations; others if required will be raised and supported out of the fund raised by the one-cent contribution. A blessed day will it be when this occurs. The year of jubilee will indeed have come.

"The quantity of land applied for will more than employ all the laborers now under our jurisdiction, but those most conversant with the condition of things at the South say that there will be no difficulty on the score of laborers, that thousands will flock in the moment they hear that there is work for them at fair wages. They have a dread of the freedmen's camp, in which so many have suffered and died."

And again:

"By a judicious fostering of the system of labor proposed, it will not only relieve the Government of the charge of many thousands of these people whom they are now feeding and maintaining in idleness, and who must if so continued sink into a deeper state of degradation and vice than they were as slaves. With protection such as is asked for, all will find employment at fair wages, and will be able fully to support themselves, besides putting millions into the Treasury in the way of rental and tax and duties on cotton. If the number of acres as applied for are planted and the product derived from it as anticipated, a revenue of not less than eight millions may be calculated on. Besides, the country which is now laid waste and desolate will be made to blossom once more as the rose, and yield a rich return to those who are willing to risk something to aid in bringing about these results. But pecuniary gain should be secondary to the good which is to be done to these poor down-trodden people. It will elevate them in the scale of civilization and prepare them to enjoy the rich boon of freedom which has recently been granted to them."

But my time is almost spent. I appeal to gentlemen to let this bill pass, or better still, to aid in its passage, and for once at least give

"Thanks for the privilege to bless
By word and deed
The widow in her keen distress,
The childless and the fatherless,
The hearts that bleed."

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. DAWSON obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STEVENS, who said: I rise to a privileged question. I submit the following report from a committee of conference:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 129) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: in line six of said amendment strike out the word "seventy," and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty-five;" and in line eleven of said amendment strike out the word "eighty," and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventy."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: in line four of said amendment strike out the word "fifty," and insert in lieu thereof the words "forty-five;" and in line seven of said amendment strike out the word "sixty," and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the sixteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

W. P. FESSENDEN,
TIMOTHY O. HOWE,
REVERDY JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
THADDEUS STEVENS,
FERNANDO WOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

I dissent from this report.

E. B. WASHBURNE.

Mr. Speaker, in a few words I can explain the purport of that report. The committee held that by the action of the two Houses the question of taxing the stock on hand was settled. All that they had left for them to do was to fix the duty prospectively on the articles produced. The Senate had laid a tax of sixty cents; from that up to the 1st of January, seventy cents; after the 1st of January, eighty cents. The committee changed it by making the tax up to the 1st of July at sixty cents; between July and January, sixty-five cents; and after January a permanent tax of seventy cents; reducing the tax as made by the Senate bill and raising it as made by the House bill. They also altered the duty on imported liquors from fifty to forty-five cents, and after January to fifty cents, so as to reduce it in proportion to the reduction of the tax on domestic liquors as imposed by the Senate bill. These are all, I believe, of the changes which have been made by the committee.

Mr. WARD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether the retroactive features of this bill have been removed?

Mr. STEVENS. They have.

Mr. WARD. I would like to ask him further, whether any mention is made in the bill in regard to goods on shipboard?

Mr. STEVENS. There is no special provision made for duties on shipboard, but all goods imported after the passage of the bill are to pay the tax. There was a great desire to make some difference, and to fix the duty only upon goods which should be embarked after the passage of the act, leaving those which were already afloat without it. But we found upon an examination of the act of 1862 that a different principle had been adopted, and we thought it would be incongruous to depart from that principle in the present law.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to make a few remarks before final action upon this report? I will detain the House but a few minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. My colleague on the committee of conference, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] I believe, desires to make some remarks upon this report before a vote is taken upon it, and I must first yield to him. I will say that the Senate have adopted the report of the committee of conference. I have stated its provisions. There was, indeed, but little left for us to do, the House having agreed to the amendment of the Senate striking out the retroactive feature; having agreed to the amendment of the Senate striking out the tax upon the goods on hand. But, sir, I do not desire to detain the House by any remarks. I yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and Joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

Also, a message notifying the House that he did, on the 19th instant, approve and sign a joint resolution (H. R. No. 30) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman.

And on the 22d instant, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) making appropriations for the payment of duties on certain lands owned by the United States; and

An act (H. R. No. 145) for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall.

INTERNAL REVENUE—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Being obliged to differ from the conference committee, and withholding my assent from their report, I beg the indulgence of the House to state in a few words some of the reasons which have governed me in my action. Believing not only in the principle but in the justice and policy as well as the necessity of taxing liquors on hand for the purposes of revenue, I have consistently voted in every stage of the bill for the proposition imposing that tax. My convictions have never been clearer upon any subject on which I have been called upon to act in my capacity as a legislator. Those convictions were shared by nearly two thirds of the House, after a full and elaborate and able discussion, and against the opposition of the Committee of Ways and Means. The House adopted the following amendment to the bill originally reported by the Committee of Ways and Means:

"Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864; except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law of July 1, 1863, shall not bear more than the additional or increased tax provided for by this act."

The proposition contained in this amendment seemed to strike the House as an eminently proper one. It was known that in anticipation of an additional tax being put on whisky, and that it would thereby be enhanced in price, an immense quantity of it was made, and the question was then, whether this vast amount of taxable property, which had only been taxed one third of what was now proposed to be assessed by Congress, should go free of any additional tax; that is, whisky having paid a tax of twenty cents a gallon, and we by our legislation having added sixty cents a gallon to its value, which had to be paid by the consumer, whether that forty cents should go into the hands of the speculator and holder of whisky, or into the Treasury? This is all there is in the whole question; the talk of the faith of the Government pledged to the whisky-holders that there should be no additional tax, being contrary to what we have acted on and are acting on every day in our legislation and prac-

The public will not and cannot lose sight of the great fact that they have to pay this additional tax in any event. Whisky has advanced in proportion to the tax we have put on it, and that advance comes out of the pocket of the consumer, and it now, under this proposed law, will go into the pockets of the speculator and holder instead of going where it should go, into the Treasury, which is reeling and tottering under our vast and unheard-of expenditures. There is no faith of the Government, either express or implied, pledged to the whisky speculators, or any other class of individuals in the same position. The faith of the Government is just as much pledged to the consumer of liquors, that it will not legislate to raise the price on him, as it is not to raise the tax on the holder. What claim have these liquor holders and liquor speculators on us over and above the great masses of the community who consume the liquors for manufacturing, medicinal, and other purposes? Sir, they have no special claims upon Congress; they took their chances when they undertook to gamble upon congressional legislation, and they must accept the consequences. It should be the province of Congress to repress rather than to encourage this curse of speculation, which is the handmaid of that venality, corruption, and extravagance which always attend the prosecution of great wars.

Well, sir, this House, as I said before, by a vote of nearly two to one in a matter which seemed to have been fully discussed and thoroughly understood, determined that a tax should be imposed on the stocks of liquor on hand. Then it was that this vast private interest in the country became alarmed; it was a question whether $10,000,000 of tax, after being paid by the public, should go into the hands of private individuals or into the Treasury of the United States. Soon the city becomes filled with these interested gentlemen who besiege the Halls of Congress and the doors of committee-rooms, urging their peculiar views of taxation in this particular with a degree of ingenuity and eloquence proportioned to the amount of interest each man had in the result of our legislation. They said to Senators and Representatives, "Let there be light," and, sure enough, "there was light." In speaking of the speculators and holders of liquors I speak in no personal sense, for I know nothing and would suggest nothing prejudicial to the personal character of any of them. They are insisting upon legislation in favor of their own interests and against what I believe to be the interests of the public generally, and it is to that I am opposed.

The Senate struck out the provision of the House bill in regard to taxing stocks on hand, but as a partial equivalent for the loss of eight or ten millions by that action, they provided a sliding scale of taxation for the future by levying seventy cents a gallon on all liquors after the 1st of July next to the 1st of January, 1865, and eighty cents a gallon on all after that date. The Senate also struck out that provision in the House bill taxing forty cents per gallon additional on all imported liquors, thus deciding against levying a tax of forty cents on stocks on hand, but in lieu thereof putting on the additional tax on the sliding scale on all domestic liquors distilled after the passage of the act. Such was the action of the Senate in regard to the most material portions of the House bill. The bill being returned to the House, thus amended by the Senate, we exhibit to the country the wonderful change which had been wrought in the opinions of honorable members. Nearly two thirds of the House having voted originally for the proposition to tax whisky on hand, there was now found a majority of three votes to concur in the Senate amendment striking out that tax. The House having, therefore, voted that it would not impose a tax of forty cents additional on the stock on hand, I voted to non-concur with the Senate amendment fixing the sliding scale of tax for liquor hereafter distilled. I voted in that way in the hope that if the stock on hand could not be taxed the full forty cents additional which the House had originally determined on, the sliding scale might be raised, and a less rate of tax for that on hand might be agreed upon, so that about the same amount of revenue might be derived as would have been obtained if the original House bill had become a law.

But you will see, Mr. Speaker, by the report of the conference committee, that there is not only nothing in the bill that imposes any tax whatever on the stock on hand, but the sliding scale on liquor hereafter distilled has been actually reduced from seventy and eighty cents on a gallon to sixty-five and seventy cents on a gallon. While the House concurred in the Senate amendment not to tax domestic liquors on hand, it refused to concur in its amendment striking out the tax on foreign liquors on hand. The House did not, therefore, settle any principle by its action on this subject, it only determined it would not levy a tax of forty cents a gallon on domestic liquors on hand. I will not violate any parliamentary rule or usage by referring to any action of the committee of conference, but I will state what I wish had been done by that committee. The House and Senate having both agreed they would not tax domestic liquors on hand forty cents a gallon, I would have been glad if the committee had imposed a tax of twenty cents a gallon on stocks on hand, and raised the sliding scale from seventy to eighty cents from and after next July to the 1st of next January, and one dollar a gallon after that time. Such an amendment to the bill by the committee of conference could have been made in conformity to parliamentary practice and to the usage of such committees. The bill thus amended would have yielded to a great extent the amount of revenue which the condition of the country demands from such an interest, and the burden of the taxation would fall where it belongs. I hope the House will, therefore, vote down the report of the committee, so that another committee may be appointed that will insist upon such a modification of the differences between the two Houses as will secure to the Treasury at least a portion of the immense sum to be paid by the people which otherwise would go into the pockets of the speculators. But if the House will not do this on this bill, I think gentlemen will find out the controversy on this question has but just opened. The attention of the people must be attracted to it, and when the next revenue bill comes up the whole ground must be gone over again, after we have been instructed by an enlightened public sentiment.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not only on account of what is lost to the Treasury, and the injustice to the public which flows from permitting this stupendous private interest to go unwhipped of a just taxation, that I shall regret the refusal of Congress to impose this tax on liquors on hand. It is a fearful indication to me that in our legislation here the interests of combinations of individuals, of monopolizers, speculators, and corporations, interests which can bear taxation, are to be comparatively exempted, while the great burden of the tax is to fall upon the masses of the people who are the least able to bear its weight. Let Congress undertake to impose even the most proper taxation on any of the great interests such as I have spoken of, the representatives of those interests will swarm the city and penetrate our committee-rooms, and into our legislative halls; but the masses of the people, our own constituents, upon whom all of this tax is to fall, if these interests escape, have no outside agents here to argue their side of the case before our committees. They have confided to their Representatives in this Hall the great duty of watching their interests in all these matters so vital to them. It is a wise provision of our Constitution which declares that all bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. As the taxes to be raised would fall on the people, it was wise to provide that their immediate Representatives, those more immediately responsible to them, should alone have the power of originating measures for taxation. Our constituents, therefore, have a right to look to us for the protection of their interests in the revenue bills we are to enact, and in this matter of imposing taxes upon them. While they are at home pursuing their ordinary avocations, in the fields and in the workshops, it is proper for them to demand of their Representatives here that they shall vigilantly guard all their interests, and permit no burdens to fall on them which ought to fall on other interests. This confidence having been reposed in me by a constituency whose interests I have never yet misrepresented, I propose to stand to the end where I have always stood on this proposition, and shall vote against the report of the committee of conference, in order that we may have a new committee who will bring in a bill embracing the features I so much desire to see incorporated in it. I move to disagree to the report of the committee.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague upon the committee of conference from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has stated reasons why he did not concur in the report which was made, and it becomes my duty now to state reasons why I did concur in that report. I desire to say that I now agree fully with the gentleman from Illinois in all he has said in support of the principles of the amendment which I had the honor to offer, and which was adopted by so large a vote of the House. I believe that that amendment is right; I believe it is politic, that it is wise to tax the whisky on hand.

I regretted exceedingly that the Senate by so large a vote should differ with the House upon that point; and I regretted much more that gentleman, no doubt from proper motives, found it necessary to change their positions upon that point.

As was said by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the principles of that amendment were ably discussed here. All the views which could possibly be advanced in favor of it were advanced; and all which could be possibly said against it was said against it. I listened attentively to the arguments upon the other side, but I heard not one that convinced me that the amendment was not just, right, and proper or that it was not in accordance with principles heretofore established by the Government to tax the stock on hand. And I am ready now to cooperate with the gentleman from Illinois, and with any other member of this House, in sustaining that view, and in incorporating it, if we can, into this bill.

But, sir, as I understand the powers and duties of conference committees, they are confined exclusively to those points about which the two Houses of Congress differ; conference committees are appointed because there are differences between the two Houses of Congress; and the jurisdiction of a committee of conference can extend only to those points of difference. If that is true they had no power to take up any other question, especially one, as in this case, upon which the two Houses had originally differed, but afterwards agreed.

The very able gentlemen upon that conference committee, gentlemen of very enlarged experience in public affairs in this country, and especially in legislation, whose opinions and experience were entitled to the highest consideration, stated that the Senate by a very nearly unanimous vote had sustained the Vice President in ruling that the report of a conference committee which contained matters not at issue was out of order and would not be received.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think I understand the argument of the gentleman from New York, and I must be permitted to differ with him in regard to the jurisdiction of the committee of conference upon this bill. It will be recollected, as I stated in the few remarks I have made, that the Senate struck out that portion of the House bill which imposed a tax on domestic liquors on hand. But the principle did not stop there; the House further in their bill imposed a tax upon foreign liquors on hand. Although we concurred with the Senate in that amendment, striking out the tax upon domestic liquors, we refused to concur with the Senate in striking out the tax upon foreign liquors. Therefore it was a balanced question in the House. We had decided neither one way nor the other, and it was not foreclosed to the committee of conference to take this whole subject under consideration.

But further than that, I differ from the principle which the gentleman has suggested. I say—and I speak from personal observation of what has been the action of these conference committees for ten or twelve years—I say the committee of conference could agree to an amendment which was germane to an amendment upon which the two Houses agreed, or germane to the bill itself. In my judgment there was no difficulty, no parliamentary law, no parliamentary usage, which would have prevented the committee of conference, when they were considering the amendments, from considering such an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will recollect—and I may mention it now that discussion is opened—that in committee the question of jurisdiction was decided adverse to the right of taking up this matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not feel at liberty to refer to any action of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee did decide against the jurisdiction.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend need not have told me that, but I appeal from the decision of that committee to the representatives of the people, who are sent here to guard the people's interest. I say that in my judgment that committee had a perfect right to make such an amendment as I have indicated, and in that I believe I could appeal with confidence to the Speaker, and I know I can appeal with confidence to our Journal clerk, (Mr. Barclay,) who has been such for twenty years, and who, I undertake to say, is the best parliamentarian in this country.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The gentleman from Illinois made precisely the same speech before the committee of conference upon this question which he has made now. I was not sufficiently familiar with the rules governing the action of conference committees to have any opinion of my own as to the power of conference committees under such circumstances. But it is a sufficient answer to say that gentlemen who have been sixteen years continuously in either one or the other Houses of Congress, gentlemen who were here twenty-two years ago, holding seats in these conference committees, did differ with the gentleman from Illinois. A large majority differed with him. It was there settled that there was no power to take up, to determine, to take from, or to add to, the provisions of this revenue bill, or to treat upon any subject, if there had not been an issue between the two Houses upon the subject. In my inexperience I naturally yielded, upon this question of jurisdiction, to a majority of the committee of conference of which I had the honor to be a member.

Again, sir, as I understood my duty, it was to represent, so far as I had the power, the decision of the House of Representatives. Although the decision of this question of taxing liquors on hand was directly in opposition to my own opinion and my vote, yet looking upon my position as simply a representative upon that committee of the wishes of the House of Representatives, I had no discretion, no option, and was obliged to represent that sentiment as it was expressed in a concurrent vote with the action of the Senate.

Therefore, although I have changed no opinion as to the necessity or propriety of taxing whisky on hand, and although I am ready to vote with the gentleman from Illinois to fix this same feature upon any other bill which may be reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, I felt convinced upon this question here, signed the report, and am ready to sustain that report by my vote now.

The SPEAKER stated that, as the powers of conference committees had been under discussion in the committee which has just reported, with the right of the Presiding Officer to rule out their report, and as the gentleman from Illinois had appealed to him to state his opinion thereon, the Chair would give it if there was no objection. The conference report that was ruled out of order by the Vice President was made during the last Congress. His distinct recollection was that after settling the disagreements between the two Houses that conference committee recommended to both Houses of Congress to amend the original text, which had not been referred to them at all, and over which consequently they had no jurisdiction. The Chair believed then, as now, that the Vice President had decided correctly.

But as to the power and right of a conference committee to recommend a concurrence in pending amendments by adding amendments thereto, the Chair had no doubt whatever, especially if the proposed amendments differed in any material degree from amendments rejected by both Houses, and also related to the article or subject referred to in the disagreeing votes referred to them for adjustment.

The Chair thought it but right to state this opinion, after being publicly appealed to, that conference committees, which might be influenced in their action hereafter by the allusions to parliamentary law in to-day's debate, could clearly understand the opinion of the Chair as to their power, its extent, and its limitations.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois yields to me for a few minutes, and I avail myself of the courtesy thus extended with no intention of entering into a general discussion of this question. I was detained from the House by illness during a portion of the time when this subject was discussed. The bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, was prospective in its operation, except as to spirits on shipboard bound to the United States, and in bonded warehouses and public stores. The honorable members who addressed the House in behalf of the committee supported this mode of taxation as proper, just, and feasible. My colleague, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] however, moved an amendment, that the increased tax of forty cents should apply to all whisky on hand for sale, with a view, as alleged, to reach speculators without reference to the injury it would inflict upon distillers, persons legitimately engaged in the trade, and consignees who had made advances upon spirits at the present rates of taxation. It is unnecessary for me to point out in detail the injury that would thus have been inflicted upon distillers and others, because the Senate, perceiving the injustice of the retroactive amendments, removed them as to domestic and foreign spirits on hand for sale. I deemed it due to the constituency I represent to oppose these changes, and as they were adopted by this House, I voted against the whole bill in that objectionable shape, although disposed to favor a liberal system of taxation in a proper form. My colleague [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] urged his amendment as a revenue measure, necessary for the support of the Government. His amendment, and others of a like character, having been adopted, and the bill made to conform to his views, he voted against it.

I am opposed to all retroactive taxation. The persons engaged in distilling and vending spirits are disposed to submit to a liberal tax upon this article if made prospective, and would submit to even one dollar per gallon in that form if required by the necessities of the Government.

Mr. GRINNELL. I understand the gentleman from New York to say that he would be willing to vote for a tax of a dollar a gallon on whisky. I ask him, then, if he will vote against concurring in the report of the committee of conference, so that we may have the question taken as to whether we will impose a tax of one dollar a gallon or sixty cents?

Mr. WARD. While I believe my constituents would be willing to submit to a tax of a dollar a gallon on whisky, in the manner I have suggested, I prefer that my friend should let my action indicate my views when the question comes up.

As a necessary sequence to the general tenor of the amendments taxing all spirits on hand, the House negatived my proposition to exempt such as might be actually on shipboard bound to the United States, and in bonded warehouses and public stores.

The committee of conference has agreed to strike out the retroactive features of the bill, so that the increased tax will only apply to future manufactures, but have omitted to exempt goods on shipboard and in bonded warehouses and public stores, so that if a vessel arrives the day after the act is passed the importer who sent his orders abroad without anticipating the proposed increase must pay the additional tax. This is clearly unjust. It is a most obnoxious discrimination against a numerous and influential class of citizens who contribute largely to the commercial prosperity of the country, and is, I believe, without a parallel in the legislation of this country. The act of March 2, 1861, did not take effect until April 1, 1861—twenty-nine days after its passage. By its thirty-third section it excepted all goods actually on shipboard and bound to the United States within fifteen days after the passage of the act, and also provided that the increased duty should not affect goods in public stores until the 1st of April, thus affording time for withdrawal. By section five of the act of August 5, 1861, the same classes of merchandise were exempted. The act of July 14, 1862, did not come fully into operation until the following 1st of August, and excepted from increased duty (section twenty-one) all goods in bonded warehouses on August 1, provided they were withdrawn within three months from their importation. Goods on board ship on August 1 were subject to increased duty, but as that date was seventeen days after the passage of the act, it afforded sufficient time for most of the goods, bona fide ordered and shipped without anticipation of increased duty, to arrive before the law was enforced.

The act now before Congress is to take effect on its passage without excepting spirits on the way to the United States, although up to this time merchandise on shipboard has always been excepted from increased duty, or a future day named when the law should take effect, allowing a reasonable time for arrivals, thus practically exempting such goods from the additional and unexpected tax. The practice has always been to consider goods thus in transitu as if they were on hand. The shipper cannot call the vessel back to port to discharge cargo, nor can the consignee prevent the arrival in the United States.

Domestic manufacturers will have immediate notice of the passage of the act, but American agents and consignors residing abroad in those countries whence the articles are usually sent must remain fifteen or twenty days without any opportunity of knowing the fact.

The bill as reported by the committee of conference I cannot sustain, containing as it does a feature inflicting such great injustice to commercial interests which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KASSON. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania will move the previous question before he concludes his remarks.

Mr. STEVENS. That is my intention.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me about three minutes of his time?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. KASSON. I want to make a remark in connection with the proposition for another committee of conference. It seems that there has been a serious mistake either on the part of the House or on the part of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who, in part, represented the House in the committee of conference. He declares his opinion to have been concurrent with that of others on the committee that, inasmuch as the House had voted to strike out the proposition for a tax on the stock on hand, of forty cents per gallon, additional, the committee was precluded from considering that question. On that theory the gentleman seems to have acted with what he supposes to have been the opinion of the House. It seems, however, that he concurred in reducing the sliding scale; in connection with which I venture to say that he did not represent the opinion of a majority of the House. If the House voted anything on the sliding scale it voted to reject it entirely, just as it voted to reject entirely the proposition to tax the stock on hand.

Now, the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is the necessity for a committee of conference that shall be in full understanding with the House on the subject, so that, if the view of the gentleman from New York is correct, it should have been applied to the sliding scale, and he should not, as a representative of the House, have consented to the sliding scale. On the contrary, I hold that the House voted simply not to impose an additional tax of forty cents per gallon on the stock on hand in that general language in which it was proposed by the gentleman from New York. But this House never expressed its opinion that it would not impose an additional tax of twenty cents per gallon on the stock on hand, in barrels or casks, so as to exclude the idea of searching for it in small quantities.

And here is the great point, I submit, in which the House has not been fairly heard in the conference committee, from the fact that they, it seems, have declined to allow another form of stating the same question which came before the committee on the part of the Senate. For this reason I hope the House will reconsider the bill upon this question of a sliding scale, for the purpose of putting it more in accordance with what we know to be the opinion of the House, and also for the purpose of raising in another form the proposition against which the House voted when the tax was to be fixed upon the stock on hand at forty cents per gallon.

Mr. STEVENS. I most earnestly hope this House will not stultify itself in any such manner. Now, sir, I can show in five minutes that the position taken by the committee of conference, and agreed to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] is the only parliamentary rule the committee could possibly have adopted.

There was a proposition coming to this House from the Senate that upon all liquors distilled and removed previous to the 1st day of July next a tax should be laid of sixty cents per gallon. That was agreed to by the House, and the committee could not adopt an amendment requiring any other tax to be imposed on these liquors, unless it disregarded every rule which has ever governed committees of conference.

The next thing, we agreed with the Senate to strike out the principle contained in the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] taxing the domestic liquors on hand. The House agreed to that; and if we had any regard to the instructions of the House, we were bound not to put any tax upon the domestic liquors on hand, for both these points had been decided by the House and by the Senate concurrently; and no principle of parliamentary law would allow us to take into consideration any matter which had been decided by the concurrent vote of both Houses of Congress.

But then the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate fixing the duty at seventy and eighty cents upon liquors distilled after the 1st day of July and the 1st day of January respectively. The House refused to agree to that. We could not tell why, but I venture to say that nine out of ten of the men who in this House voted against that proposition voted against it because they thought it was too high; we therefore in lowering that duty did it in obedience to what we supposed to be the sense of the House. We did not reduce it much, only five cents per gallon on one and ten cents upon the other, leaving the rates still sixty-five and seventy cents.

Now I deny that there is any practice or rule of parliamentary law by which we could possibly have taxed the stock on hand.

It is true that we refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate allowing an additional duty upon foreign liquors; but that had nothing more to do with the principle allowing it upon domestic liquors than with any other duty in the bill. It was in an entirely different part of the bill, and nowhere connected with it. Anything connected with duties upon foreign liquors was open; but as to the duty on the stock of domestic liquors on hand I deny that any fair principle of legislation would have allowed the gentleman from New York to have reinstated it, or have allowed this House to reinstate it. It would have been an assumption upon the part of the committee to reverse a decision made by the concurrent vote of both branches of Congress.

But it seems there is never to be an end of this matter in this House. Men who are on the temperance side of the question have become as much intoxicated upon this question of liquor as if they had been drinking whisky for a month. [Laughter.] They have become so giddy upon the subject as to have lost all reason, as to have forgotten, certainly, all parliamentary law. The gentleman from Illinois, with that kind of pertinacity which I very much admire when directed to a laudable object, but which sometimes degenerates into obstinacy when he is wrong—of course I do not mean in the gentleman from Illinois, but in others [laughter]—I say with that pertinacity which is so commendable tells us that he is still in favor of retroactive taxes. He is certainly in favor of retroactive discussion, for we have discussed this same subject here for days, I believe for weeks, and yet he is not satisfied with the action of the House upon it, but comes back upon it with a most retroactive vehemence. He tells us, and I hope gentlemen will not be alarmed, though I was a little alarmed when he intimated that if we pass this bill without this retroactive clause that will not be the last of it, but that he will follow it up to doomsday whenever he gets a fair chance. I would almost say that upon the next committee of conference I would agree to his proposition rather than to have it brought up upon every bill that is to come up. But, sir, I hope that, if the House insists upon its course, even his sturdy constitution will become exhausted. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE. There is no danger of that.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope there may be. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman states that the country loses revenue by this measure. I deny it. I say that we gain revenue by this measure over any measure adopted by this House and amended by the Senate. The committee of conference bill will produce the first year more revenue than the House bill, and every year after $9,000,000 more than the House bill which we amended, and which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] has advocated. Let not the gentleman, therefore, delude the country with the idea that we are throwing away revenue by this measure. We are doing no such thing; on the contrary, we are gaining revenue.

He says that he voted against the Senate amendment because it was not high enough. He wanted it to be a dollar. I do not know what motive the gentleman had for voting against it. I do not know what motives other gentlemen had, but I will venture to say that more voted against it because it was too high than that it was too low.

Mr. Speaker, it is time that we were done with this. It is time that this deleterious agitation should cease.

Gentlemen talk about speculators besieging the committee rooms. I do not know who besieged him. I think he would hold out, whoever they were. I think that he would stand out against an army of besiegers. Nobody appeared before the committee but distillers. No speculators, no man who had stock upon hand appeared before us. Seventy-two distillers, the largest in the whole country, were before the Senate committee and the House committee. They asked us to fix it, and we have. I hope the House will have done with the matter, and I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. ODELL. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a question.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. ODELL. I understood my colleague [Mr. WARD] to say that the result of the adoption of the report of the committee of conference would be to tax foreign liquors on which duties had not been paid.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose your colleague intended to say that it would put additional duty upon those imported after this time.

Mr. ODELL. He said that and the other.

Mr. STEVENS. Then he was mistaken. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What has become of my motion?

The SPEAKER. If the report of the committee of conference be rejected, the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Blow, Cobb, Cole, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, English, Fenton, Finck, Griswold, Harrington, Holman, Hooper, King, Law, Leazear, Long, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McIndoe, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perry, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhes, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcey, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Branderage, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cox, Creswell, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Gauson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Harding, Benjamin C. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Le Blond, Loan, Longear, Mallory, McClurg, McDowell, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Norton, Odell, Perlman, Pike, Pike, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schofield, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Sweet, Tracy, Upson, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, and Windom—86.

So the report was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. WOODBRIDGE stated that his colleague, Mr. MORRILL, was confined to his room by indisposition.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the House do further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate heretofore insisted upon, and ask for another conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. WASHBURNE of Illinois, KASSON, and DAWSON were appointed managers of said conference on the part of the House.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of correspondence which has recently taken place between her Britannic Majesty's minister accredited to this Government, and the Secretary of State, in order that the expediency of sanctioning the acceptance by the master of the American schooner Highlander of a present of a watch which the Lords of the Committee of her Majesty's Privy Council for Trade proposed to present to him in recognition of services rendered by him to the crew of the British vessel Pearl, may be taken into consideration.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the naval appropriation bill.

Pending that motion, I move that all general debate be closed on that bill in an hour and a half after the Committee of the Whole resumes its consideration, and that thereafter it be made a special order from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to making the bill a special order, but I hope the gentleman will give two hours for general debate.

Mr. STEVENS. The reason why I mentioned one hour and a half was that the gentleman who is entitled to the floor has only half an hour unexpired, and another gentleman wants an hour.

Mr. COX. The gentleman on the floor has spoken only ten minutes, and another gentleman wants an hour.

Mr. STEVENS. I will modify my motion, and make the time two hours.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

The motion to suspend the rules to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill; on which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLOW] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Chairman, for over two months I have listened to the speeches and debates on this floor, and observed the course of events in this House, with an interest and anxiety that have absorbed every faculty of my mind. With many sad moments, because no reflecting man can fail to see that we are trembling in the balance, I have nevertheless had that most soothing of all feelings to the public man of to-day, the consciousness that in the fearful ordeal through which our beloved country was passing, I was acting with its truest friends, and discharging important duties to the best of my humble ability.

You will bear me witness, sir, that I have seldom intruded, even for a moment, on the attention of this honorable body, content that our more experienced members should lead in debate, and anxious that all measures actually necessary for the maintenance of the best interests of our Government, its honor and character, should be adopted at the earliest moment. I might have thus quietly continued my labors; but we are the creatures of circumstances, and a single thought, one beautiful burst of eloquence from the gentleman from Maryland, induced me to change my mind. He spoke in defense of himself and that proud old State, now marching with rapid strides to the citadel of freedom. I crave your indulgence while I allude to matters originating in the West, intimately connected with this Government, affecting its present and its future, and entitled, in my estimation, to the brief consideration which I entreat you to bestow upon them. These matters have been brought up by two occurrences in this end of the Capitol. The first was the introduction of a resolution, which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read, as follows:

"In the House of Representatives, United States, February 1, 1864, Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, introduced the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

"Resolved, That a special committee be appointed by the Speaker of the House, to consist of five members, with authority to inquire into and report upon the practical operation and results of the act of Congress regulating commercial intercourse with the States declared to be in insurrection against the authority of the Government, and whether the regulations of the Treasury Department which purport to have been made in pursuance of said act, as carried out by the Department, comply with its design. To examine particularly and report upon the manner in which said act has been executed, and whether any frauds have been practiced on the Government by the officers or agents employed under said act, and whether any favoritism to individuals or localities has been shown in its execution; and to inquire further whether the effect of said act and of the said regulations of the Treasury Department has been to prevent supplies from reaching the rebels or to facilitate the object. That said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a clerk, with the usual amount of compensation, for the purpose of reducing to writing all testimony taken by said committee."

Mr. BLOW. The second, a speech from the gentleman from Missouri against the confiscation resolution lately passed in this House, the only points in which now worth noticing, so far as Missouri is concerned, relate to the radical delegation in this House, and the radical party of the State of Missouri—the party that the gentleman himself had such an honorable part in creating, and which still holds in its ranks the men who contributed most to elevate him to the high position which he enjoyed in the past, and whose confidence was given him at a time when some of the leading conservative newspapers which now print and praise him had no words of contempt equal to their hatred and detestation of this anti-slavery leader. Yes, sir, the papers to which he so disparagingly alludes, and which he not long ago depended upon for support, are now held up to public scorn, and one, he says, was bought up by Fremont with public patronage. I have this much to say in relation to it as well as the Westliche Post, that the mere idea in St. Louis will be ridiculed. The fearless Democrat was never bought, or its columns sold, and although my colleague's friends abound in wealth, all of them together have not enough to purchase its principles.

Here is what my colleague says of his ancient friends and supporters, the men who have never to this hour flinched in their devotion to this Government, or been known to ask the aid of a gun or a traitor's vote, but standing on the highest ground that can be occupied by those purely and solely intent on saving this Republic, place principles far above their love for or fear of any man, be his position ever so elevated, or his power above that of emperors and autocrats:

"Of a piece with the ingenious, but rather disingenuous assault of the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon the President is an occurrence which took place in the other end of the Capitol some days since, and which I find recorded in the Daily Globe. A Senator from my own State [Mr. BROWN] presented what purported to be a memorial from members of the Legislature of Missouri, and a protest of four Representatives from that State, against the confirmation of General Schofield as a major general. I do not mention this circumstance to comment on the extraordinary and most unbecoming declaration contained in that protest, in which these four members claim to be the only representatives of the Union men of Missouri, for there is nothing in the character or history of either of them to warrant this arrogant assumption, but for the purpose of exposing a covert assault upon the President under the pretext of defeating the confirmation of General Schofield.

"If it had been the object to effect the latter purpose this paper would have been presented in executive session, where nominations are considered, and not in the open session of the Senate, as it purports to have been done, when no such matter can properly come before that body. The memorial and protest contained only matters which had been previously submitted to the President by a great committee of radicals which visited Washington for that purpose; and these statements had been examined into by the President, who, in his reply, plainly declared that he did not believe them to be true. Yet the President is arraigned upon these same stale and discredited statements before the country upon the memorial of members of the Missouri Legislature and four members of this House, under the pretense of asking that General Schofield should not be confirmed, and that, too, after an agreement was had with the President that no opposition should be made to Schofield's confirmation, but that he should be on his own request relieved from the command in Missouri.

"The President, I presume, in his desire for peace among those who professed to be loyal, was willing to make this concession; but after accepting the concession, these parties flew from their agreement, under the dictation of bolder and more open enemies of the President and his Administration, who would not permit the opportunity for assailing him to pass. To show the spirit which animated this assault upon the President by his professed friends, I will read to the House a few brief extracts from the leading radical papers of Missouri.

"The Westliche Post, the most influential German paper in Missouri, says, "It is scarcely necessary to repeat—apart from this serious and general danger which the reelection of Lincoln threatens us—all his special sins ad nauseam. We have at present nothing to do but to declare herewith, once for all, that we, supported by honest conviction of all friends of freedom in our State, cannot support Mr. Lincoln's reelection under any circumstances whatever.

"The Missourian, a radical paper printed at Springfield, snuffing the danger of Lincoln's nomination, says:

"The earnest radicals of the Union will never be bound by the proceedings of any but a radical national convention, and such convention will be called at an early day, in spite of all the obsolete Republican conventions that can be gathered together."

"The Missouri Democrat, a paper bought up by Fremont with public patronage, and which went heartily into his scheme for a western dictatorship, whines over the recent defeat of the radicals in Missouri, and says it was accomplished by three administrations combined—"one at Washington, one at Richmond, and one at Jefferson City."

"It was the spirit which animates these extracts, and which broke out in fury when it was rumored in Missouri that all opposition to the confirmation of Schofield was to be withdrawn, and he relieved from the command at his request, that drove these gentlemen from their agreement, and produced the extraordinary spectacle at the other end of the Capitol.

"I should have had more respect for those engaged in it if the assault on the President had been characterized by the same bold and open spirit as that which compelled it. I trust that the friends of Mr. Lincoln's Administration will hereafter be able to appreciate the assumptions of those who claim to be the only representatives of the Union men of Missouri, in derogation of the character of others who have sustained the policy of the Government from the beginning up to this hour."

Now, sir, before discussing this extract from the gentleman's speech I intend to dispose of this resolution, as another occasion may never offer. I first desire to call attention to the extraordinary spectacle of a gentleman claiming to be a patriot, a soldier, and a statesman, after a futile attempt in Missouri to degrade one of the purest men in this country, and one of the highest officers in a Government which he professes to love, dragging his malice after him in these Halls, and again endeavoring to cast a stain upon a record which is engraved in the hearts of a grateful people, and at the same time making slanderous charges against the friends of this Government and the friends of human liberty. And worse than either, while thus prating about suspicions, not even dreamed of by those who have faithfully devoted themselves to this Government from the commencement of the present session, he is found in the midst of his self-righteousness invoking the aid of and acting with the opposition members of this House. The men whom he has abused for years he now takes to his bosom; and with them he is at times arrayed against almost every acknowledged supporter of this Government. Every member of this House understands the injustice which can be practiced and the unkind influence which would be used by my colleague against the Secretary of the Treasury, were he placed at the head of a committee of investigation. Not that any friend of the Administration is opposed to the investigation; not at all; let it be as full as our most ardent enemy could desire, but let it also be fair; and this can easily be effected by referring the matter to an appropriate committee.

But I can fancy the feelings of my colleague just at this moment. He is congratulating himself that he has succeeded, and that I am entering upon the defense of a presidential aspirant. But this gentleman is greatly mistaken. The humblest man that serves this country in this its hour of peril is entitled to the friendship of every true patriot. I have never yet, thank God, failed to defend such a man. It is for the unselfish laborer, the faithful officer who presides over the vast machinery that almost runs this Government, that my feeble voice is raised, and I do not envy that man, be he high or low, who can find it in his heart to be unjust or ungenerous, especially in times like these, toward those upon whom a people confidently relies for the nation's honor and the nation's salvation.

The abuse of Mr. Chase, originating with my colleague and his collaborators, kept up incessantly in his St. Louis organ, and wrongfully attributed in many instances to the merchants of St. Louis, is based throughout the country upon wrongs charged by my colleague and his politico-trading friends to have been committed by the Secretary in restricting the trade of the Mississippi valley.

To show the gross injustice already done, as is thought for political effect, and the greater mischief intended, I will as briefly and rapidly as possible allude to matters in connection with these trade regulations. With a familiarity growing out of constant examinations into the regulations, earnest conversations with the President and the Secretaries, and a most ardent desire to assist in relieving the trade of the Mississippi valley, I have looked forward to relief whenever those high interests of our Government, tending to its success in suppressing the rebellion and maintaining a just consideration for its loyal people, would allow.

At the outbreak of the rebellion the regulation of trade or prevention of supplies to the insurgents was necessarily left with the military authorities, aided when practicable by the revenue officers and special agents of the Treasury Department.

A law of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, authorized the President to declare by proclamation States and parts of States where unlawful combinations existed, &c., in insurrection, and thereafter all commercial intercourse between inhabitants of such States and parts of States and citizens of the rest of the United States was prohibited, except as it might be licensed by the President to be carried on only in pursuance of rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

August 16, 1861, the President proclaimed certain States and parts of States in insurrection. Collectors and surveyors of customs at points having trade with insurrectionary districts were instructed, and a special agency of the Treasury Department was created, to supervise trade and prevent supplies to insurgents.

May 20, 1862, additional powers were conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to this matter by a supplementary act of Congress. Special instructions prescribing rules and regulations were, from time to time, issued to proper officers and agents as transactions arose requiring them, until August 28, 1862, when a code of regulations was issued. Cases of hardship on one side and of illegal trade on the other, not provided for, were constantly arising, and a code of regulations embracing new premises was provided and published March 31, 1863.

On the 11th September, 1863, a more full and complete code of regulations, with all the laws and proclamations on the subject, with the orders of the War and Navy Departments approving them, and with the license of the President and his approvals and proclamations, were published, under which commercial intercourse is now carried on.

This information is within the reach of every intelligent man in the country. It can be seen from the contents, almost at a glance, that the responsibility rests on the President, and the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, and Navy; and the statesman or general who undertakes to saddle it all upon any one of these officials, is willfully ignorant or willfully unjust; yet notwithstanding all of this, the acknowledged organ of my colleague has for months abounded in the vilest misrepresentations and abuse of the Secretary on account of his, as they assert, restrictions on trade, and since my colleague's last effort opens its batteries with an increased disregard of the truth, a recent editorial that has been brought to my attention being an improvement on others in point of decency, I propose to read it. It is from the St. Louis Daily Union of the 5th instant:

"A BOMB-SHELL IN THE CHASE CAMP.—General Blair's resolution of inquiry into the unnamable and inconceivable abominations of the trade regulations, has fallen like a live mortar-shell in the camp of Mr. Chase's friends. One would presume that they would be glad of an investigation and of the opportunity it offered of vindicating their 'monarch-minded' chief from the grave suspicions which the notorious villainies conducted under these trade regulations have brought upon him. But not so. The virtuous friends of the Secretary desire anything but an investigation. They never dreamed of such a thing. They can bear any amount of suspicion, any amount of accusation, any amount of the gravest charges; but an investigation they pray to be delivered from."

This but feebly portrays the bitterness of the hired demagogues who daily utter their slanders through the columns of a paper owned, as is claimed, by an association of forty gentlemen. Let me state a few simple facts. Trade was prohibited by Congress, and not by the Secretary of the Treasury. He has always favored the most liberal trade compatible with prevention of supplies to the rebels; he believed that as we suppressed the insurrection and restored the authority of the Government over territory, that trade should be restored to its usual channels as nearly as practicable. At an early day he adopted the motto, "Let commerce follow the flag." I ask that this letter to the special agent containing this motto may be read, and beg you to observe that it is dated as early as May, 1861, and is a key to the entire action of the honorable Secretary.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 29, 1861.

MY DEAR MR. MELLER: I am much obliged to you for yours of the 25th instant. The topics which you mention have been subjects of much and somewhat painful reflection with me. I have little doubt that the exchange of provisions and supplies, except munitions of war, and other articles usually prohibited, would be more useful than injurious. The difficulty, however, is this. The States controlled by insurrectionists, especially by insurrectionists exercising the powers of government, can hardly be regarded otherwise than as hostile communities with which the United States are for the time being at actual war. The rules applicable to the relations of war must be applied. If war existed between this country and England no trade whatever would be permitted. American property shipped to England and English property shipped to the United States would be liable to seizure. So constant experience teaches us that property shipped to the insurrectionary States is liable to seizure, and actually seized; and if the property of citizens in those States, shipped to the United States, is not seized, it is simply because the Federal Government desires to treat them as far as practicable not as enemies but as citizens. I see no way in which safe intercourse can be established between citizens of the loyal States and those under insurrectionary control. The question is not one of revenue, nor one of rights in a state of peace, but a question of supplies to enemies, and is controlled by considerations belonging to a state of war.

The best thing to be done, it seems to me, is to establish the power of the Government, in cooperation with the people of Kentucky and Western Virginia, within those limits, and to let commerce follow the flag. This policy opens Missouri, Kentucky, and Western Virginia to trade, and will extend southward as rapidly and as far as the authority of the Federal Government can be restored.

Continue your conversations with reflecting men, and let me know the result.

Yours, &c.,

S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. MELLER, Esq., Special Agent, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. BLOW. The regulations from time to time prescribed demonstrate his purpose to conform to this motto. Each successive code was more liberal in its provisions, and conceded more to the wants of the people than the one preceding it.

I do not believe that Secretary Chase has ever been over-confident that any great public good was being accomplished by the licenses of the President and the action of the Secretaries; but the law imposed the duty of prescribing regulations, and he had no alternative but to discharge official obligation, and he aimed to do it intelligently and with fidelity. Commercial intercourse was absolutely prohibited, except as licensed by the President and regulated by the Secretary, and to his labors and exertions and regulations, sanctioned by the President and by other Departments of the Government, insurrectionary districts, and my colleague's complaining friends, who have coined millions with their murmurs and slanders, are indebted for whatever privilege of trade, and even the supply of the necessities of living, they enjoy in the States south of Cairo. We all know—history proves it—that the prevention of unlawful traffic in time of war by civil agency is very difficult, if not impracticable. The military power is the primary agency in subduing this rebellion, and whenever a military force is present military orders are necessarily paramount.

Men with guns in their hands insure a respect and fear greater than can be inspired by men with civil commissions in their pockets. I am confident there has been no time when the Secretary of the Treasury has not desired to be relieved from all supervision over this trade, and experience has satisfied him, as well as others, that with military aid and cooperation alone can these regulations be made more effectual than any other governmental move in accomplishing the objects desired.

If the intention of my colleague in his resolution was to expose malversation on the part of the Secretary, and/or requires that he should have made a specific charge in his resolution. For if he ever brings any charge of political favoritism, or asserts that the Secretary has perverted the power of patronage to his own political advantage or any other personal object, I feel certain that these charges will be shown to be false and absolutely baseless. It is known that Secretary Chase has appointed to offices in connection with this bureau, as important as any, those not regarded as of his own political school, and it is safe to venture the assertion, and to challenge the proof to the contrary, that in all appointments made in connection with this business, no regard has been had to the personal preferences of any, no questions been asked, no conditions imposed, expressed or implied, and no effort whatever, anywhere exerted, either in appointments or permits, to advance the political fortunes of the Secretary. I understand that no permits for trade of any character, either to sell merchandise or buy products, have been given by the Secretary directly, and I believe it. All traffic and transportation in insurrectionary States has been under regulations by which certain officers, at convenient localities, were authorized to grant permits, and all transportation prohibited except as permitted by those officers.

The regulations are general and impartial in their provisions, and it is not known by the President or Secretary, or believed by either, that there has been any corruption or unfaithfulness in their execution by the agents employed. And I assert that they are as well devised as any regulations can be for controlling commercial transactions and preventing contraband trade by civil administration amid public discords in time of war. But my colleague perhaps has never read, certainly never studied, the laws and regulations which he has so constantly denounced, little feeling at the time that every denunciation of these regulations, because solely attributed by him and his trading friends to the Secretary of the Treasury, was also a denunciation of the President of the United States, who carefully examined and approved every one of them. It is the President, equally with his Cabinet officers of the Treasury and War Departments and department commanders and generals of the divisions, that are bound to come under the investigating committee. I respectfully submit to my colleague that he should at the earliest moment pass them all over to the committee on the conduct of the war if justice to his country and not persecution of one whom he has already attempted to wrong is the impelling motive. Why, Mr. Chairman, even while I am discussing this question the regulations relieving trade in the valley in certain articles are suspended at the request of the War Department, except when the usual authority from the Treasury agent is approved by a commanding general. Telegrams and letters have come to me every few days for two weeks complaining of certain supplies being again prohibited; and though trade was entirely relieved in the States of Missouri and Kentucky before my colleague's resolution was laid over the last time he called it up, yet his complaints are so chronic that I am afraid he will not finish grumbling until we have an unrestricted free trade to San Francisco by the gold mines, over a rail not made by English neutrals, but wrought from the ores of free Missouri by radical free-soil men, and laid down by a set of Jacobins whose very names bring up visions of defeat and disaster to that gentlemen.

I have alluded to my colleague's friends in connection with these trade difficulties. Justice requires that I should state that many of them since he first commenced his assault, always unexplainable except upon the ground that it was purely political, having made fortunes, and monstrous fortunes, during the rebellion in trade, traffic, and speculations, mostly in connection with the Government, they evince a disposition to be just, I am willing to believe from a conviction that they were hasty and ungenerous. The most prominent and wealthiest of these firms, whose St. Louis partner, Captain Barton Able, has been distinguished for his intense devotion to every act of my colleague, and foremost in expressing, in every possible way, his gratitude and admiration, concede that the trade regulations for 1863, and now existing, should be satisfactory to every honest dealer.

I will record this evidence, because it is a candid admission, and alike creditable to them and the Government:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 10, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Yours of yesterday, on the subject of the existing trade regulations on the Mississippi river, received. In reply we would respectfully state that while the merchants and business men of Memphis regard some of the regulations as burdensome and unnecessary, they are generally satisfied with them. We think with some few modifications they could be made all that any community situated as ours is ought to ask for, and without the alterations we are fully satisfied that any honest man in our community ought to be able to transact business under them with profit to himself and the Government. We have been able to do so. We paid to the Government, in the items of taxes and duties for the privilege of transacting our business for the year 1863, over one hundred thousand dollars, and would have paid cheerfully more, but the restrictions on trade during part of the year curtailed our business to some extent. Yet we never complained, believing the authorities imposing the restraints did so for the public good, which ought to be considered paramount in all cases by all good citizens.

Hoping the continued loyalty of the citizens of the city of Memphis may induce those in authority to place our city on an equality with other loyal communities, and that our trade may be only taxed as the business and commerce of all the loyal cities of the United States, we are, very respectfully, your friends,

LACEY, ABLE & CO.

Hon. H. T. Blow, House of Representatives.

But there is still higher testimony. It comes from a man whose praise is on every tongue, and the mere mention of whose name always arrests the attention of this House—I mean Major General U. S. Grant. I will read an extract from his letter July 21, 1863. Mr. Secretary Chase very much desired to modify the trade regulations upon the fall of Vicksburg. He indicated this to General Grant, and in his reply these views are expressed. I know that on a previous occasion these views have been very adroitly used against the President and the Secretary of the Treasury; but no straightforward man can fail to see in them the same idea that, if adopted early by Congress, would have absolutely prohibited all trade. And here I leave this branch of my subject with the name and fame of our highest officials. I commend them to that honor and sense of justice which has thus far distinguished the loyal population of this land; but not without saying that in my humble opinion it is the duty of every sincere lover of this Government to stand up firmly against any attempt, come from whatever source it may, to weaken and embarrass this Government by maliciously assailing those charged with its highest interests. We who so regularly witness their untiring labors can bear testimony to the fearful responsibility which rests upon the heads of the Departments and the devotion which marks their daily duties. I am proud to announce that, whatever differences of opinion others acting with me in this House may have in regard to any one of the honorable gentlemen mentioned for the Presidency, and when publicly urged in this Hall and elsewhere—urged, as I fear, to the disadvantage of our common cause—I will always be found sustaining to the best of my judgment and the fullest extent of my power the honest, overburdened public servant who makes his country and not himself the constant object of his thoughts and actions.

I do not greatly fear, Mr. Chairman, that my colleague's semi-political effort will make a breach among those who must by this time understand his peculiar fashion of deciding for the people before they speak for themselves, and in a very different way from that foretold by this prophet.

Twenty million freemen are watching with eager eyes the events which are daily transpiring in this land, confidently relying upon the wisdom and patriotism of the President, his Cabinet, our faithful armies, and the Representatives of their choice. Shall it be said of us, or of those above us, that in such a moment we turned from an imperiled country, from a people willing to assume increased burdens, a people preparing to respond to the heaviest taxes, a people who have consecrated to this Government and their devotion to human liberty the bravest sons of the nation? I say, sir, shall it be recorded of us that at such a time our thoughts were directed to a contest for coming political spoils, and under the demoralizing influence of such an unworthy prompting we were willing to imperil if not sacrifice our beloved country? Let members have their preferences, let them labor as they choose outside these Halls, but here let us frown down every move that is calculated to separate the firm friends of the Government, or those intrusted with these weighty responsibilities. Cabinet quarrels should not enter the two Houses. Now more than ever in the history of this nation we need unity. Now more than ever, with a burning desire for action, should men prepare to make good their oft-repeated declarations in favor of human liberty, and devote themselves to its immediate accomplishment. The power or weakness that stands in the way of this glorious achievement will be accursed of God and man.

But I am trespassing upon the patience of the House. Bear with me while I pass directly to the gentleman's attack upon the radicals of Missouri, and the radical delegation in this House. My colleagues deny that they ever made or thought of the compromise alluded to, and the House will think it strange for the gentleman, to have thus asserted that which bears upon its face the want of truth. President Lincoln did doubtless confer with our Senators in regard to General Schofield's confirmation, as the subject was to come before them. But if the gentleman who gravely makes these unfounded charges had appeared more promptly in his place, instead of lingering on his way from camp, he would have been better informed in regard to his colleagues. His allusion to the radical delegation, consisting of some seventy gentlemen from all parts of Missouri, is in very bad taste and unkind to the President, and his assertion in regard to the President's answer addressed to the chairman of that delegation, though not really replying to that chairman's appeal to the President, will be pronounced untrue by every candid man who will examine both documents. I desire to speak decidedly for myself, and indignantly repel the charge of bad faith or arrogant assumption or covert assault which my colleague prefers. He is becoming mad, sir. We have had some discussion before; it was unavoidable on my part. Old feelings and friendships and the practice of my lifetime have prevented me in these discussions from unkind, ill-natured, or unjust personal allusions. He never spared me, but my only retaliation has been when he spoke or wrote slanderously of me to make the facts as clear as mid-day to all who chose to listen or read. This I will do with these his last charges. I have referred to the fact of the gentleman's delay; I will therefore relate certain events which transpired before his arrival. When I first reached the capital, I found the public mind greatly excited in regard to Missouri affairs; our own friends were becoming deeply interested, and the sympathy for the cause of freedom in Missouri, now the cause of this Union, had produced an intense feeling against the President. This feeling manifested itself everywhere, but especially in a meeting of national men, best known to the President himself; not his enemies, but his friends, and representing the patriotism and intelligence of twenty States. I can appeal to this noble body of men for the manner and matter of my addresses before them in regard to the unhappy differences in Missouri between the radicals and the President. Shortly after, I was invited to address the Union League of this city on the Missouri question. I confidently assert that every liberal man—ay, the President himself, if he has finished the Rockville speech and can glance over mine—will testify that it is at least fair toward him, and was dictated by elevated, not low, promptings. I went further; I did talk with the President (not that I intruded on him) with regard to Missouri matters, but called by a written invitation to the White House, on business. In an interview, when he was not pressed by others, I did plead with him for justice to Missouri. I related to him facts which I believe were never known to him before. I protested against General Schofield, because he had failed to obey his—the President's—instructions; had committed outrages on Union men; had suffered wrongs to be perpetrated and go unpunished at which a rebel would blush, and which disgraced him and clouded the justice of my Government; and thus protesting, from the noblest impulses of the human heart, if the President had expected me to compromise with such a man, I would have then and there resented the foul outrage upon hospitality and character, and turned with loathing from a mansion which should hold within its walls the type of a great nation's dignity and honor.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague has grossly misrepresented the President, so far as I am concerned. He had no praise, no defense for General Schofield, in replying to my heartfelt denunciations of this official who had so deeply wronged the loyal men of Missouri. But the country is entitled to a full statement of everything pertaining to Missouri, and my colleague shall have the pleasure of hearing it. I went beyond the Schofield matter, which after all is nothing in comparison with the glorious theme of Missouri freedom. I brought up the matter of emancipation in Missouri. I told the President how after all our labors, we had failed to accomplish the object of years of toil, and that the so-called ordinance of emancipation, carried through with the aid and approval of my colleague's conservative friends in fact emancipated nobody, and was a hypocritical cheat, if not an outrage. I prayed him for the sake of human liberty, for the sake of this Union, because it was just to the enslaved whom we had been so long deluding, to cast his influence on the side of those who were nobly striving in our Legislature to call a new convention, a convention, as we believed, that would express the real views of our people, and pass an honest ordinance of emancipation. One line from him saying that he desired it, and that magic key transmitted with lightning speed would have unlocked the resisting hearts and made Missouri free. The coming spring would have been bright with the hopes of our future, and the ripening crops of summer would have been tilled and gathered in earnest by men, white and black, who would have closed each day of toil with heartfelt thanks to God that the air they breathed was that of a noble State washed of its only stain. Hundreds of thousands of emigrants with their families, who have watched with interest the struggle we have made, would have cast their lot with us, and Missouri, the battle-ground of a nation's emancipation from a foul and damning sin, would have become the bright morning star, the harbinger of a more glorious Christianity and civilization.

The President would not write those magic words, and yet our condition is not hopeless. The convention bill, though not passed for an immediate call, has nevertheless become a law, and notwithstanding the blighting influence of conservatism in our State, will be held next November. Meanwhile Arkansas, Louisiana, Maryland, and Tennessee are praying and working for the immediate abolishment of slavery. Oh! sir, this is no time for hesitation, no time to be idle. We claim to be in earnest; let us see to it that we do not deceive ourselves. This year will decide our faith, our fidelity, our destiny; all depend upon the honest public sentiment and united exertions of our people. But I ask your indulgence while I refer for a moment to my colleague's position. On this vital question he has taken his stand with the conservatives, and has made a speech which is adapted to his new-found friends in Missouri, while he plants himself here on what I believe he calls the President's platform.

Another member of the gentleman's family has defined the President's policy. I hope I may be pardoned for contrasting our position on some leading points with my colleague. We contend for immediate emancipation without injustice to loyal slaveowners; he is content with the ordinance already passed, if I understand his position at this moment; if wrong in this, I would be most happy if he will correct me. The gentleman from Missouri early adopted the Jeffersonian idea in regard to emancipation and deportation. At first it was somewhere near the equator; then distinctly Central America; once I know his eyes were feebly directed to the tangles and swamps of Chiriqui; now, with the honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. LANE,] he has fixed upon the broad and sunny plains of Texas, and it must be said to his credit that this last proposition is the best he ever made, and has some humanity in it. We have no such theories, have indulged no such unkindness to the unfortunate blacks. We are content to let them remain where God in His providence placed them, and with a more elevated sense of justice to ameliorate their condition at once, and elevate them as speedily as possible on the soil that has been enriched by the sweat of their brows through years of unrequited toil and crushed and bleeding hearts. Hence we are deeply interested in the bureau proposed by the emancipation committee, and in the bill emanating from the committee on the rebellious States.

We have opposed General Schofield's management of the department of the Missouri for reasons repeatedly and clearly stated to the public. He indorses the general now, though he and his friends in August, 1862, appointed me chairman of a committee authorized to present the shortcomings of General Schofield to the President and beg for his removal, and on that presentation and prayer he was removed and General Curtis appointed in his place. Subsequently, on slanders never made good against General Curtis, and from the pressure of Attorney General Bates, the President had to yield, and removed General Curtis, against whom to this hour not one single charge has ever been sustained, and singularly, as every fact will show, restored Schofield, and now asks his confirmation from the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Does the gentleman assert that I condemned General Schofield at that meeting, or that I authorized the gentleman to represent that fact to the President?

Mr. BLOW. I assert positively that the gentleman from Missouri made the motion which sent me here as the chairman of a committee to ask the President of the United States to remove General Schofield.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I defended General Schofield there, and offered no such resolution as the gentleman has spoken of.

Mr. BLOW. It so happened that when I returned to St. Louis and made a report of the proceedings of the committee to a meeting of the gentleman's friends, every one of those gentlemen accepted the report which I made, upon the basis I have mentioned, and a resolution was passed in that meeting, that every thing which had transpired should be kept and considered a profound secret.

But, sir, I leave the question of truthfulness and veracity between the gentleman and myself to his own friends. None of them will ever deny that there was such a meeting, that I was called there by invitation, and that I was authorized to come here, and that in that same meeting Isaac H. Surgeon and F. A. Dick were appointed to come with me for this purpose. I brought those resolutions here and submitted them to the President. These are the simple facts of the case.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. All I have to say is to deny as emphatically as the gentleman states it, that I ever authorized him to represent me, or that I offered any such resolution. As a matter of fact, I state that at that meeting I defended General Schofield.

Mr. BLOW. God save me from such friends as the gentleman upon that occasion.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. And God save me from such a pretended friend who would misrepresent facts in such an assemblage as this.

Mr. BLOW. Our hope and confidence rest on the justice of that honorable body. My colleague was opposed to constitutional confiscation as inexpedient; we were not. He sometimes caters to the Opposition, as already stated; we have not, thus far, departed from our faith in the Administration party in this House. We were here to vote for an unconditional Union man for Speaker; it was generally understood that the gentleman's sympathies were not so decided, nor did his organ fail in abuse of the gentleman we selected. We can excuse him for the ambition he indulged, but not for the bad taste of those attacks. Our sympathies and identifications are altogether with a different class at home. We cherish the strongest Union element, have no semi-Union friends or supporters, and have drawn, on our clear, distinct enunciation of principles, almost every soldier in the Army to our standard. We abhor indecision, scorn those who have grown rich from never-ending contracts, and despise those men in every part of the land who, living on the Government, are unceasing in their insidious attacks on its highest and best officials.

We claim to be in full sympathy with the acknowledged friends of the Government, while its greatest enemies have never coined into language a greater insult to the loyal people of this land than is contained in this extract from the Rockville speech of Hon. Montgomery Blair, Postmaster General:

"The abolition party, while pronouncing philippics against slavery, seek to make a caste of another color by amalgamating the black element with the free white labor of our land, and so to expand far beyond the present confines of slavery the evil which makes it obnoxious to republican statesmen. And now, when the strength of the traitors who attempted to embody a power out of the interests of slavery to overthrow the Government is seen to fail, they would make the manumission of the slaves the means of infusing their blood into our whole system by blending with it 'amalgamation, equality, and fraternity.'"

"The cultivators of the soil must then become a hybrid race, and our Government a hybrid Government, ending, as all such unnatural combinations have ever done, in degraded, if not abortive generations, and in making serfdom for the inferior caste—the unmixed blood of the conquering race inevitably asserting a despotism over it."

We are almost a nation of abolitionists. This side of the House is supposed to be entirely abolition; the Army of the United States is abolitionized, and if you were to come out to-morrow in a declaration against abolition you would not have in a month a corporal's guard to fight the battles of the country. Ay more, sir; arrest this love of liberty and determination on the part of the people to make every foot of American soil free, and you lose the only hope of the oppressed nations of the world. This Republic will cease to exist. A nation of hypocrites can never find favor in the sight of a just God; and I can tell the Postmaster General that if this great rebellion is crushed and the Federal authority asserted throughout the land, it will be effected by an abolition party and an abolition army, and when effected the black race will be protected and sustained by this same class and prepared for that freedom which is now withheld from them by outrage, violence, and wrong.

There is another plain truth which might as well be recorded. The strongest supporters of this Government, from one end of the land to the other, utterly repudiate the policy defined in this Rockville speech. The people, who have urged the President forward, still demand that he and we shall deal promptly, humanely, and justly with the freedmen of the Union; that we are pledged to protect and advance, that the President himself shall lead in every move for their moral and political elevation, so that they can enjoy at once those privileges which the civilized world expect from our professions and obligations. No excuse or explanation will now be taken for delay, inactivity, or indecision. The cries, criticisms, and arguments of the Postmaster General I hope will be ejected from the Executive Mansion, nor be allowed by any inattention of the President to tarnish the heroes of the "irrepressible conflict." This I hope for as much as I do that we will never suffer any one, though he may assume, as my colleague has, to speak the sentiments of the President in regard to his repudiation of the loyal radicals of Missouri, to deceive and divide our party, or divert us from the accomplishment of those thorough measures now actually necessary to save us from the charge of insincerity that may soon be preferred.

God reigns, and this nation should tremble lest His displeasure rest upon it. To-day is the time for action; in a week or a month it may be too late; and if the justice so long withheld causes Him to withdraw His smiles, then indeed are we lost. There is an unhealthy and fictitious state of affairs in the land; our people feel prosperous; some are not only prosperous but suddenly rich. The masses seem dependent entirely on the continuance of this unreal state of affairs, and may be suddenly awakened from their delusion. The only safety is in the action of our people; the effort must be herculean, the struggle short, the result soon attained. Once start with this feeling and the national pulse will recover its tone, the love of gain and ease which has demoralized the public sentiment will yield to the spirit which actuated our fathers, and the gamblers in gold so graphically described by the gentleman from Iowa will give way to honest men engaged in legitimate trade. The immense importations now temporarily aiding our Government, but foreshadowing an impending crisis, will cease, for our statesmen will become wise, increased duties will check imports, and the protection to home manufactures thus given will fill the country with thrifty men, and pour actual capital into every spot where development is to be rewarded. Do not treat this assertion lightly. Our imports into New York since the 1st of January have been $7,000,000 more than in the same time last year, which at the present premium on exchange and gold will require full $11,000,000. In the same time our exports of produce have fallen off over $8,000,000 making a difference against us in eight weeks of $19,000,000 of gold, and this difference must be added to the constantly increasing one of the last six months. The signs of extravagance all around us indicate a crash. The error must be checked; economy in the Government and in the people must be enforced by wise legislation, or this crash will soon be upon us.

There was printed in London and Paris recently a pamphlet written by a citizen of the South, entitled, Emancipation the Duty, Policy, and Strength of the South. These pamphlets, as I am well assured, were sent in large numbers to Richmond, and the party acknowledging their receipt in the rebel capital for president Davis writes in reply to the suggestion of arming and emancipating the slaves, that they are not ready for it yet, though every day is bringing them nearer to the inevitable conclusion. It will not do to agitate the subject; the pamphlets sent for circulation favoring emancipation were retained, biding a little time for circulation. This comes from a reliable source, and the pause which now prevails may be broken by the announcement that the South, to gain her independence, surrenders her pride and her corner-stone, and rests on a basis which is indestructible.

Mr. Chairman, this country has the largest Army the modern world has ever seen; the finest Navy that floats; a people so generous that we vote millions where our statesmen formerly hesitated to spend thousands; and all this comes from our single purpose to have a free and united Government. Such a Government we must have. It is our only hope. Are we to be faithful to the people? Are they prepared to be faithful to themselves? If so the errors of the past must be blotted out, and then, and then only, will our country be prepared for triumph in the cause of human freedom.

My prayer is that we may have the courage and ability to act so justly that the Supreme Ruler of the universe will not abandon us.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Chairman, availing myself of the wide latitude which the debate has assumed, I shall not attempt to perform the useless task of inquiring whether the present unhappy and desolating war in which our countrymen are engaged might have been averted. Nor shall I speak of the causes which produced it, further than to state the single fact that it arose out of the unwise and fanatical agitation of the subject of domestic slavery. This is the Pandora box out of which has issued all our woes.

When the present ill-fated war was inaugurated, the President assured the country that it was a war to repossess the Government of the public property, to preserve the Union, and to enforce the laws. Our generals commanding likewise proclaimed, at the head of the Army, that it was a war "for the Union." The Secretary of State officially announced to the civilized nations of the earth in a more elaborate and extended manner the same great fact; while the Congress of the nation, with almost entire unanimity, proclaimed that this was not a war of conquest or subjugation, or a war to interfere with the rights or domestic institutions of the States, but a war to preserve the Union and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution. Sir, I challenge the production of a single instance in the history of this or any other country where the people rallied with such unparalleled enthusiasm in defense of their imperiled institutions as did the people of this country after the fall of Sumter. Party names and dissensions all perished, and the heart of this great nation throbbled as one deep, unanimous, and universal whole. So intense was the public feeling, that in the short period of fifteen days nearly three hundred and fifty thousand volunteers offered their services to fill the contingent of seventy-five thousand, and more than forty million dollars were contributed by States, cities, and individuals.

Congress convened in extraordinary session on the 4th of July, and on the 6th by an almost unanimous voice voted five hundred thousand men and $500,000,000 to arm, equip, and maintain the Army of the Union; and by the following December nearly eight hundred thousand men, a greater number than ever marshaled beneath the victorious banners of Cæsar or Napoleon, rallied to aid the Government in vindicating the honor and integrity of the Union.

The country rejoiced at this unparalleled exhibition of devotion to the Union; and it imparted a reassured hope that our victorious legions would speedily conquer an honorable peace, and restore again our good old Union. The country likewise pointed to Missouri, to Kentucky, to Tennessee, to Arkansas, to Maryland, to Western Virginia, to the intrenchments of Henry and Donelson, to Pea Ridge, to Shiloh, to Antietam, to New Orleans, as trophies of their prowess and renown, and as achievements that will adorn the historic page in all time to come. Sir, our great triumphs on land and on sea, with the people of the North united in heart, soul, and purpose, and the South defeated, disheartened, and divided, enabled the country to quietly repose in the grand thought that speedily the rebellion would be overthrown, and the Union move onward in her career of prosperity and renown.

But, sir, these pleasing anticipations were destined not to be realized. At this stage in the mighty drama a new enemy boldly entered the arena; that same old abolition enemy that for more than a quarter of a century past has been teaching the doctrine that this Union could not endure permanently half slave and half free; that there was "an irrepressible conflict" between these once united, happy, and prosperous States; that there was a higher law than human constitutions and human enactments; that this Union ought not to be restored as it was, and that when restored all men in it must be free and equal. Acting upon the doctrines so laid down and inculcated, Congress lost no time in responding to the wildest and most visionary schemes of these radical enthusiasts, and instead of regarding the true interests of the country and the promotion of the welfare of the brave men who had imperiled their lives in defense of the Republic, these Halls became the theater where abolitionists vied with each other in their zeal for the negro; as how to feed him, clothe him, liberate him, arm him, educate him, and place him on an equality with white men.

Let it might be considered that I am exaggerating the true state of facts, let me call the attention of gentlemen for a moment to a synopsis of their legislative career:

1. By the numerous abolition harangues.
2. By the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.
3. The passage of a law permitting the testimony of negroes in certain cases against the whites.
4. The repeal of the law against the transportation of the mails by negroes.
5. The amendment of the Articles of War, so as to make it a high offense for an officer of the Army to return a runaway slave to his owner.
6. The refusal to make it an offense of like character for an officer to entice away a slave.
7. The passage of a law recognizing as our equals the negro Governments of Liberia and of Hayti.
8. The passage of a confiscation bill, aimed at slavery.
9. The act authorizing the President to call negroes into military service.
10. The admission of the State of Western Virginia on condition of abolishing slavery.
11. Prohibiting the existence of slavery in all the Territories of the United States.
12. The passage of a law forever prohibiting any person connected with the rebellion from holding any office of honor or profit.
13. The compensatory emancipation scheme of the President.
14. The passage of an act indemnifying the President and his subordinates against prosecutions for the commission of illegal and unconstitutional acts.

Sir, unwise, unjust, illiberal, and unconstitutional as much of this legislation was, it did not satisfy the requirements of these radical gentlemen; on the contrary it operated but as a stimulant to demand the adoption of more unreasonable and dangerous partisan measures. They now boldly announced their policy to be "tax, fight, emancipate," as the trinity of the nation's salvation. They assured the President that if he would issue his presidential edict proclaiming the slaves in the rebellious States and districts forever free, the highways would throng with patriots more ardent and devoted than were the crusaders; that "Father Abraham" would behold the embattled hosts of abolitionism coming six hundred thousand strong to overthrow the armed legions of the rebellious South. They assured the country that it would witness an exodus of these children from the house of their bondage unparalleled since the days that Israel's dark-eyed daughters celebrated with timbrel and dance the exodus of God's chosen people in the olden time. The President, being neither a Washington in wisdom and patriotism, nor a Jackson in resolution and statesmanship, complacently yielded to the pressure, and in an evil moment hearkened to the voice of this abolition siren. In violation of the fundamental principles upon which this Government is founded, and upon which it has been so successfully administered from the days of Washington down to the days of Abraham Lincoln; in violation of his own party platform which he declared was a law unto him; in opposition to the avowed policy and object of the war; and in the exercise of an arbitrary power which no king or emperor of Europe could wield without producing revolution, save perhaps the Czar of Russia or the Sultan of Turkey, he declares by one sweep of his pen that the entire social and industrial systems of the South, as they had existed for more than a century, shall exist no longer, and that three million negro slaves shall be forever free.

And now, sir, after the observations and experiences of eighteen months, I wish gentlemen to tell me where are the grand results that were to compensate this nation for yielding to such extraordinary arbitrary power? Where have the highways thronged with the embattled hosts of abolitionism panting for revolutionary battlefields? Where are the solemnly promised six hundred thousand men? Sir, prior to the date of this proclamation volunteers to the number of nearly thirteen hundred thousand had responded to the call of the Administration. Neither Greece nor Rome in their palmiest days ever boasted such mighty armies; and the eagles of Napoleon were carried in triumph beyond the Danube and the Po, and into the very heart of the old commercial metropolis of the northern Cæsar with less than half of the mighty host that voluntarily went forth to fight in the sacred cause of the Union. The hopes of this great nation were concentrated in the stout hearts and strong arms of that million and a quarter of brave men. But the proclamation was issued, and with it came a change in the entire object and policy of the war. With it came dissensions and divisions in the North. With it came a destruction of the freedom of speech and of the press. With it came a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and a denial of the right of trial by jury. With it came military orders and invasions of free homes, arbitrary arrests, mock trials, bastilles, and exile. And with it ceased volunteering. That same Congress was compelled to go to the despotisms of the Old World and drag out from their musty records an unconstitutional conscription law, to compel our people to advocate, aid, and carry out a newly-inaugurated war policy. As a necessary consequence to that extraordinary act of the President, that old Constitution about which the people of the country had boasted so long was torn in fragments and scattered to the winds; and all power became concentrated in the hands of one man.

But, sir, if this unwise radical policy produced these disasters with us at the North, it was infinitely more disastrous in the States of the South. The President had assured us in his message that there was a majority of the people of the rebellious States in favor of the Union. I ask gentlemen on the other side of the House to tell me now where is that Union majority? Where to-day are those Union men whose hearts beat responsive to the music of the Union? Alas! the result of your proclamation and of your radical policy was to fill the defeated armies of the South and unite their people with increased hostility to the Union of their fathers. That was its effect. Sir, it seems strange that, notwithstanding the effect of that policy having been so disastrous, gentlemen are determined not to let the experience of the past be a light to guide them in their present or future course. Strange as it may seem, these radical men pursue the same policy; and I have no doubt that the same disastrous results will follow it if persisted in. We have here in this Congress a proposition to repeal the fugitive slave law, thereby nullifying a solemn provision of the Constitution.

I ask gentlemen what will be the effect of such a policy in the State of Kentucky and the other border States? These Kentuckians have proved themselves equal to every emergency. When the country called them they responded like patriots. But they expected you would act in good faith toward them, and protect them in their property and in their rights.

But now you propose to take, by the strong arm of arbitrary power, from them their property and their rights under the Constitution and the laws. Is not that the way to render alien the hearts of these people of the border States? Is not that a sure policy to make the border States dissatisfied with the Government as administered by you? Will they not resist your course by every means known to the Constitution and the laws of the country?

We have also a proposition here to reduce the eleven rebellious States to a territorial condition, to enact laws and govern them as conquered provinces.

We have also here a proposition which, so far as this branch of Congress is concerned, has already assumed the character of law, to confiscate the real estate of the people of the South. In other words it is a proposition in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, and renders the restoration of the Union almost hopeless if adopted and carried into execution.

We have also a proposition to establish a Bureau of Emancipation. Let me ask gentlemen on the other side why they do not cooperate with us in passing laws to feed, clothe, and pay a proper compensation to our soldiers, and to the widows and orphans this war has made? Why do they overlook all the interests of the white men of the nation and rush blindly to the negro, and think nothing and do nothing but what they fancy is for his welfare?

Sir, who is there here that believes for a single moment that Congress has the right or power to establish such a Bureau of Emancipation as is here proposed? It is nowhere named in the fundamental law, and is in direct violation of all our previous ideas of government and law.

We have also here a proposition, a plan of the President for restoration—we have the startling proposition which assails directly the only principle upon which a republican form of government can exist—we have a proposition that says one man out of ten may control and govern the affairs of the other nine. And we have here a proposition which says further that that one man shall first become an abolitionist, and swear to support the President's proclamations then issued, and all others in prospect which may be issued. He is first to turn abolitionist before the Administration will place confidence in his patriotism and place him in power.

We have a proposition also, pending in the other branch of Congress, which declares that all laws shall be repealed which make a distinction between the races—between white and black. Sir, this is the culmination of all the hopes of these radical fanatics. Here is the goal toward which they are directing all their efforts: to debase the white man to the degraded level of the African negro.

Sir, I know that gentlemen on the other side will consider me disloyal. I know they will say I am a sympathizer with the rebels; but I tell them that not only so far as I am concerned, but so far as the Democratic conservative masses of the country are concerned, they always have, from the inception of this radical policy, they do today, and they will continue in the future to enter their most solemn and earnest protest against so unwise and ruinous a policy.

I am willing that gentlemen should criticize with the utmost scrutiny the action of the Democratic party during its long and eventful career. I can justly and truthfully say, that upon all occasions, in the halls of legislation, through the press, in the forum, on the hustings, every where, at all times, in all variety of circumstances, the Democratic party has ever been true and faithful to the bond of the Union; always respecting the rights and interests of every section of the entire country, never failing to warn their countrymen against the fatal effects of sectionalism, which for more than a quarter of a century past has been engaged in the unholy work of overthrowing the pillars of constitutional liberty. As each successive wave of fanaticism rose higher and higher, this noble old party of Jefferson and Jackson stood, like Corinth of old, a breakwater against the double tide, until at last it culminated in the election of a sectional President. Even then, sir, ambitious but for the integrity of the Union and the equal rights of the States, it called into requisition all the power and prestige of its great name to preserve the sacred compact of sovereign States out of the horrors and calamities of civil war, and to recognize peaceful channels as the only remedy of the commonwealth. With the only record that history will make of this time-honored party, born with the Constitution, that has adhered to it through all of the vicissitudes of prosperous and adverse fortune, that will live as long as constitutional liberty survives, and perish only amid the ruins of the Republic, with that record there is not a Democrat throughout this broad land but will be perfectly contented.

Sir, I do not say that this Government has not the right or power to crush armed rebellion. I say that it is the duty of this Government to do it; and I say further than that, if the party in power had kept steadily in view that original and legitimate object, the proud old flag of our country would have floated in triumph over the capital of every State in the Union. It was because its original policy was changed that this little insurrection of ninety days has swelled into the mightiest revolution recorded in the annals of time.

We are told by gentlemen upon the other side of the House that they do not want the Union as it was; that this is an abolition war. For what purpose? They tell you for the purpose of confiscation, of emancipation, of subjugation, and of extermination.

Sir, I should be glad if any gentleman who has the power sufficiently to make it appear would tell us the way in which such a contest should end. A war of subjugation! History tells us when Rome attempted to subjugate Carthage and confiscate their property, it so exasperated their people that their women tore their hair from their heads and gave it to their fathers, sons, husbands, and brothers, with which to make bowstrings to fight the gladiators of Rome. More than that. When the despots of Europe parceled out Poland like so much public plunder, and when Russia brought men from Siberia and placed them upon the confiscated estates of the Polish noblemen, she thought that she would raise up a new race of people who would be loyal to the Russian Government. How often have the streets of Warsaw been crimsoned with the blood of their people; and this very day that same Poland, downtrodden, without an army, without a navy, without munitions of war, is again appealing to the God of battles upon newly made revolutionary battle-fields to place her name on the honored roll of nations. And there is Ireland, against whom England has warred for centuries for the purpose of subjugating her people and confiscating their property, and the time never was that the very bogs of Ireland did not send forth their hardy sons of toil to resist the tyranny and oppression of the British Government.

Subjugation! Who is it you propose to subjugate? Eight million Americans, eight million men in whose veins flows the same blood that courses through our own; eight million people who drew their inspirations of liberty from the same great fountain-head whence we drew our own. Subjugate such a people! Are they less devoted to their homes and firesides than were the people of Poland and Ireland? Are they not as much devoted to liberty as any race of people who has lived in the past ages? Will they not make greater sacrifices to maintain and to preserve them? Talk about subjugation! Let me tell you that the man breathes not the vital air that will live to see the day when the lightnings of civil war will not flash through the heavens, if that be the purpose of this war. Look at it. When you have parceled out the estates of the people at the South between the people of the North and the negroes of the South, when you have driven their unoffending women and innocent children to the mountainfastnesses, do you suppose that they are subjugated? Why, sir, those women will whisper in the ears of their children eternal hatred to you and your Government. The fires will only be smothered, and at some unpropitious hour, as in Europe, they will burst forth anew and bring destruction upon you and the country.

There is one other question which I would like to ask of the learned and experienced gentlemen upon the other side of the House. Can they tell me whether the mission of war is to build up, to restore, to reunite? Let me rather ask you if it is not the mission of war alone to sever, to overthrow, to destroy, and annihilate? Did not the long and protracted Peloponnesian struggle of the Greeks blot out Athenian liberty? Did not the civil wars of the Caesars erect an imperial despotism upon the ruins of that proud old republic? Did Spain restore Mexico with force of arms? Did Mexico in turn restore Texas? Did Holland in 1831 restore Belgium by war? Did George III restore by force of arms these thirteen revolted American colonies? Sir, it is not the unaided mission of war to accomplish any such thing.

Let me ask gentlemen another question. Suppose you succeed in accomplishing all you desire; that these southern hosts are driven and scattered before your victorious legions like chaff before the wind; is that the end of the struggle? How will you enforce your laws upon an unwilling people scattered through their mountains, forests, and swamps? How will you enforce even the ordinary writs of courts of justice? Before you can do it you must take your sons and garrison the cities of the South. You must do that in order to hold them in subjection. And when you have done that, will they be an element of strength to the country?

I ask gentlemen to look at this in the light of history. Is Poland an element of strength to Russia? Is Hungary an element of strength to Austria? I want gentlemen to bear in mind the important lesson that all history teaches, that nations are BORN AMID THE MIGHTY THROES OF REVOLUTION! When Andrew Jackson declared this Union could not be preserved or the Constitution maintained by the mere coercive powers of the Government, he announced a fact which three years of war has only confirmed. And when Abraham Lincoln announced in his inaugural address that suppose you go to war you cannot fight always, and after much loss on both sides and no gain on either, the same identical question which caused the strife remains open for adjustment, he announced only the truth attested by all history. It was no new truth. It was but the logical deduction which the history of past ages fully confirmed.

I need not stop to speak of the loss upon both sides. I need not talk of the hecatombs of our fallen countrymen which lie scattered over a hundred battle-fields. I need not speak of the widows and the orphans, and of the immense debt which will hang like an incubus upon the energies of this people for ages to come. The horrors are enough to cause tears to flow down even Pluto's iron cheek.

What then is our true policy? I tell gentlemen the history of other nations leave us not in doubt as to this point. Before you can ever secure peace in this country you must accompany the sword with the olive-branch. You must, in addition to destroying the armed power of the rebels, build up a Union sentiment to protect that country after you have withdrawn your armies from it. Louis XI of France, by far the ablest Bourbon of them all, by a conciliatory policy united the several French dukedoms and kingdoms into one vast empire, over which Louis Napoleon presides, and at whose power even continental Europe trembles. Charles V won more by a conciliatory course than he ever achieved by the sword. Henry VII of England by conciliatory policy united and restored peace to his distracted country.

I need not go to other countries for examples in confirmation of the truth of this position. Here in our own country we have the most illustrious example of the power of a conciliatory course. When our fathers had achieved our independence, when they came to lay broad and deep the foundations of constitutional liberty, they laid the very corner-stones in the great and mighty intersectional doctrines of conciliation and concession.

Sir, I do but quote the unanimous language of

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1864.

NEW SERIES, No. 50.

the members of the Convention that framed the Constitution, in declaring that the Constitution was the "result of a spirit of amity and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensably necessary." If those great men who had endured the toils and hardships and privations incident to a long and arduous struggle for liberty found themselves constrained when they came to form a Government to adopt principles of concession, how much more indispensably necessary is it to do so now, when we, their children, have grown from three millions to thirty millions of people, with a country extending from ocean to ocean, and having vast agricultural and manufacturing interests, with our commerce whitening every sea. How can we get along without harmony and conciliation? How can we exist as a nation, except by adopting and adhering to the policy laid down by our fathers? On no other principle can a free Government exist. Any other doctrine is but the argument of kings, tyrants, and despots, and is not adapted to this land of the free.

Sir, the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] in his argument a few days ago, adverted to the fact that Shay's rebellion and the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania were instances where the constituted authorities of the country negotiated with armed traitors. In that whisky insurrection there were, at one time, more than seven thousand men in arms, including portions of the people of the great States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. These armed men seized on public property, plundered the mails, assaulted, maltreated Federal officers. Some were killed, many wounded. If there had been at that time presiding over the destinies of the country a Charles I or a George III or an Abraham Lincoln, he would have put his foot down firmly on these rebels, and demonstrated to the world that he was at the head of a strong Government. But, sir, the good genius of the great Washington presided over the destinies of the nation. Commissioners were appointed, negotiations were entered into, and the rebellion was ended, leaving hardly any evidence to survive it.

Again, sir, when Missouri applied for admission into the Union, the passions of the people were excited to an extraordinary degree, and it was believed by many that the Union was in imminent danger. But the fathers yet lingered among their children, and the sage of Monticello was aroused from his slumbers by the sound of the alarm bell at the hour of midnight. Conciliation was resorted to, and peace and harmony were restored to the country.

Again, in 1832, during the administration of Andrew Jackson, they got up what they called the nullification rebellion in South Carolina. The old general made the hearts of the people thrill by his memorable sentiment, "The Union must and shall be preserved." And yet it must be borne in mind that Congress modified the objectionable law; and through a conciliatory policy that rebellion was ended.

Yet again, in 1850, when the infuriated passions of our people had been lashed into a perfect tempest, when the Sumners and Searles and Chases of the North and the Jeff. Davieses and Toombses and Yanceys of the South disturbed the Halls of Congress and were unwilling to concede anything for the sake of the peace and harmony of the country, the noble Kentuckian and the giant Webster, of Massachusetts, and the great Douglas, of Illinois, stood up in the Senate, aided by the Union men of both parties; and when Clay waved aloft his magic wand of compromise, the stormy sea of human passion sank to silent rest and the glorious old ship of state sailed on in her grand career, dispensing the blessings of peace and liberty and happiness to thirty millions of the most prosperous people that the sun, in his wanderings through the heavens, ever shone upon.

Let me state, further, what every gentleman whose judgment is not warped by malice and passion knows to be true, that with a little conciliation in 1860 this horrible civil war would never have been brought upon us. But for the first time in the history of the Government a sectional party got control of it, and for the first time the policy was inscribed on their banners—"No more compromises." The consequence is a land rent with civil feuds and drenched in fraternal blood.

What is the remedy for these evils? To what must we look in this hour of gloom and darkness for that aid, that safety, which will give us a restored Union, peace, and constitutional liberty? If the party in power were wise this war would end, and end in ninety days, by a conciliatory course. But if their radical policy be continued it will be a still further incentive to rebellion; and if next spring we find the rebel army better prepared to confront our own, we may ascribe it to that cause, and you will be responsible for the protraction of the struggle. If you will return to the policy of the fathers by inaugurating a conciliatory course you will have peace, union, and constitutional liberty. But I tell you that if you do not do that the great heart of this mighty nation, which will throb in November next, will banish you forever from power, and will elevate to your places men who do love peace and Union and liberty more than fratricidal war and the freedom of the negro.

Sir, the signs of the future are bright only through that view. Any other view will never end this strife. We can only end it by a return to the ancient landmarks of the fathers. That return will be made by the Democratic and conservative masses of this Union. I care not whether McClellan, Seymour, or any one else be the man, the conservative masses, burying their partisan feelings and past differences of opinion, knowing only the Union and the whole Union, will rally from hilltop and plain to restore the Government to its original condition.

Sir, lest some of my Republican friends may think that I am only in a certain contingency in favor of the Union, let me tell them that never, never shall I vote for its dismemberment. I am for the Union, and the whole Union. I am for the Constitution as it is; and I never will consent, by my voice or vote, that that Constitution shall be marred or destroyed. I regard the Constitution as the only instrumentality to save the Union. It is only by adherence to it that we can bring back the Union. I believe it is the high and holy mission of the conservative people of this country, overthrowing radicalism at the North and forever burying secessionism at the South, to restore this Union once more on the venerated foundations reared by the hands of our fathers. While life endures, we will struggle for that, and we will bequeath to our children that undying legacy.

Sir, I have said all that I had intended to say. I have spoken of the war freely and without reserve. I have spoken of it as I think becomes the representative of a constituency which loves liberty and intends, at all hazards, to maintain it. I speak in behalf of a people who will resist any act of oppression or arbitrary power, who are determined to have a free and untrammelled ballot, let the consequences to them be what they may. I speak in behalf of a people who are determined to live a free people, or perish in the glorious effort. Mr. KING obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. STEVENS, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to. So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had come to no resolution thereon.

NATIONAL ARMY.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill authorizing commissioners to select a site for a national armory, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLERKS TO ASSISTANT TREASURER.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco to appoint certain clerks, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced an act to provide for the voluntary enlistment of persons resident in certain States into regiments of those States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MISSOURI AND ILLINOIS LAND PAPERS.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in relation to the field notes, maps, records, and other papers pertaining to land titles in the office of the late surveyor general of Illinois and Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IOWA LAND GRANTS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill extending the time for the completion of certain railroads in the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of which a grant of land was made, approved May 15, 1856; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at half past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, which were yesterday signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 27) relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting "the copy of a correspondence which has recently taken place between her Britannic Majesty's minister accredited to this Government and the Secretary of State, in order that the expediency of sanctioning the acceptance, by the master of the American schooner Highlander, of a present of a watch which the Lords of the Committee of her Majesty's Privy Council for Trade propose to present to him in recognition of services rendered by him to the crew of the British vessel Pearl, may be taken into consideration;" which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONNESS presented the petition of Maria Antonés Blume, widow of James Donson, praying compensation for property alleged to have been taken in July, 1846, by order of John C. Frémont, at that time in command of United States soldiers in California; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of J. W. Eddy, paymaster United States Army, praying to be allowed in the settlement of his accounts $1,487 56, alleged to have been embezzled by L. St. John, a clerk in the pay department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of Francisco Caseres, praying compensation for a horse alleged to have been taken from him on the 2d July, 1846, by John C. Fremont, then in command of the United States forces in Alta California; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for the construction of a wagon road to Idaho, through Minnesota and Dakota, and such military protection as will afford safety to emigration and secure a more speedy transit of merchandise and the precious metals; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of staff officers of the Navy, praying that the retired staff officers of the Navy may be placed on an equality in regard to pay with line officers of the same rank; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I have a petition from contractors for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats known as "double enders," representing that the price to be paid to them is considerably less than the actual expenses of the work, and praying that Congress will take such action upon their petition that they may have the opportunity to verify the matters and things set forth in it, and that they may have such further relief in the premises as shall be judged meet. I hardly know to what committee this petition should go, but perhaps the more appropriate reference would be to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of John L. Campbell, a citizen of the Territory of Idaho, and formerly a citizen of the State of Iowa, representing that the Territory of Idaho is divided by a range of the Rocky mountains which renders one portion of the Territory inaccessible from the other portion; that it is composed of a territory sufficiently large to make several States as big as New York or Pennsylvania, and he prays that Congress may in its wisdom provide for a division of the Territory. The petition is accompanied by a map. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of John Thomas Lane, who claims that he is the discoverer and proprietor of a remedy for the prevention and cure of small-pox. He represents that his remedy has been submitted to various tests; and he asks that Congress shall provide that he shall have an opportunity of trying it upon some or all of the patients in the small-pox hospital at Kalorama. I move that the petition and papers accompanying it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I presented a few days since resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa in favor of an amendment to the pension laws, so as to allow pensions to widows of chaplains and surgeons who may die in the service. I move now that those resolutions be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TEN EYCK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 42) to enable guardians and committees of lunatics, appointed in the several States and other countries, to act within the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of further providing by law against the exclusion of colored persons from the equal enjoyment of all railroad privileges in the District of Columbia, submitted a report, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a petition of copyists in the Quartermaster General's office, praying for an increase of compensation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 130) for a charter of Masonic Hall Association in Washington city, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 131) to consolidate into one district for judicial purposes the northern and southern districts of California, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 133) in relation to the pay of cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to state that this bill was prepared by a committee representing the various interests of the different branches of the Pacific Railroad Company. I introduce the bill at their request, without committing myself at all either to its general principles or its details. It is rather a petition presented by them in the form of a bill to be submitted to the committee for its action. I move its reference to the committee on the Pacific railroad, and I also ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred; and the order to print will be made; if there be no objection.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate insisted on by the Senate, and asked for a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. J. A. KASSON of Iowa, and Mr. J. L. DAWSON of Pennsylvania, conferees on the part of the House.

HOPKINS BATTERY.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be requested to inquire into the expediency and justice of presenting to the State of Kansas the "Hopkins battery" captured by the gallant troops from that State at the battle of Fort Wayne.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Accompanying the resolution there is a letter from Major General Blunt, giving the facts connected with the capture, and showing that the battery is not serviceable. I ask that that letter be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made if there be no objection; and it will also be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARMY OFFICERS ON LEAVE.

Mr. TEN EYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the law which reduces to one half the pay and allowances of officers in the Army when absent on leave.

COTTON SPECULATIONS BY OFFICERS.

Mr. POWELL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate the report and evidence taken by the military commission, at the head of which was Major General Irwin McDowell, appointed to investigate the conduct of officers of the Army, and others engaged in the military service, in cotton and other speculations.

Mr. WILSON objected to the present consideration of the resolution, and it lies over, under the rules.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 19th instant, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 30) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman; and, on the 22d instant, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) making appropriation for the payment of taxes on certain lands owned by the United States; and a bill (H. R. No. 145) for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to say a few words in explanation of some remarks that I made here on a former occasion, by the leave of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will proceed, if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be recollected that when the deficiency bill was before the Senate there was a clause in it, as it came from the House of Representatives, making an appropriation to pay Little & Brown for certain volumes of their edition of the laws, the tenth and eleventh volumes, I think. The Committee on Finance recommended that that clause be stricken out; and being called on for an explanation, I gave to the Senate the explanation that I had received at the Department, almost in the same words, as near as I could recollect them; the facts were certainly the same. That explanation which I gave seemed to cast a reflection on the conduct of those gentlemen, Messrs. Little & Brown, with reference to the matter. It stated substantially that their dealings had been with a clerk of the Interior Department, and that it was a surprise on the Department itself, and there was no occasion to pass it, as the books were not needed and there was no claim on the Government with reference to them. I will not now repeat it. The remarks were published in the Globe and came to the view of these gentlemen. They considered them, as they do in point of fact, as making a reflection on them.

Mr. Little has handed me this morning a letter addressed to myself which he desires me to ask leave to have read in the Senate. He does not consider the question of money as so important; and I deem it due to that firm to say that it is a firm that has always maintained the highest reputation for integrity in every point of view; and I am not surprised that they should feel somewhat sensitive at the remarks that were made by me. I can only repeat what I said at the time, that I made the explanation as I received it from the Department itself. I deem it due to them to have this letter read; and I also deem it further due to them to say that I consider the letter as a vindication of them with reference to the matter. What the House may see fit to do with regard to the particular appropriation is another question. Should it come before the Senate again, it will be for us perhaps to reexamine the decision to which we came on the subject.

With this explanation, saying, as I feel it but just to say, that such is the reputation of that firm and the individuals connected with it, it is not surprising that they should feel somewhat hurt at anything which would tend to impeach their high mercantile character and standing, I desire that the letter may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1864.

SIR: A friend has sent me a copy of the Daily Globe containing the report of remarks made by you on the 12th instant upon the proposition under consideration by the Senate to supply a deficiency for the purchase of the tenth and eleventh volumes of the Statutes at Large, published by the house of Little, Brown & Co., of Boston.

Although I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with you, I know too well your distinguished reputation as an honorable, just, and courteous gentleman to hesitate for a moment in submitting to you an unequivocal statement of the facts to which your remarks were directed, in the firm conviction that you will perceive the injustice which you have done—unintentionally, I am sure—to my firm, and to an innocent employé of the Government, by those remarks.

The one thousand copies of the Statutes at Large provided for by the joint resolution of May 10, 1852, (see vol. ten, p. 147,) having been found insufficient to supply the increasing demand for the public offices and officials entitled to them by law, Congress, upon the application of the Secretary of State, increased the number to two thousand copies of the tenth and eleventh volumes, by acts of March 3, 1855, (vol. ten, p. 646,) and March 3, 1859, (vol. eleven, p. 428.)

Under these acts we have printed and bound not only the two thousand copies of the tenth and eleventh volumes, but the same number of the twelfth called for by subsequent enactment, solely for the use of the Government, and holding them subject to its disposal. As provision was made for the purchase of this number, we had reason to expect them all to be taken, and the more so, since Congress has ceased to supply new members with the Statutes at Large, which was formerly done, and which practice we presumed would continue when we made the original contract.

The number of two thousand copies, then, having been fixed by law, you will perceive, sir, that neither the honorable Secretary of the Interior, his subordinates, nor myself had the power to commit any irregularities in reference to the number furnished to Government, and that the certain "odd volumes"—amounting to nearly eight hundred, as you accurately stated—being the undelivered complements of volumes ten and eleven, were, as the Secretary believed, provided for by law.

The action of Judge Usher was not, as you surmised, initiated under the suggestion of a clerk. Being myself in the city I called upon the Secretary in regard to the delivery of the volumes in question. The honorable Secretary of the Treasury was present, and might have heard, if he did not, the whole conversation. I had held no communication with any subordinate on the subject. It was only when Judge Usher desired to give his instructions that a clerk appeared at all in the transaction.

Subsequent to these instructions ordering the volumes, I learned who was the gentleman immediately charged with the details of the business, and asked him if he could give his personal attention to the prompt delivery of our boxes from the railway station to the Department. In the immense pressure of public business at the Washington railway station, such personal attention was absolutely necessary to insure not only the safety of the boxes, with their valuable contents, upon which there is no insurance from fire or rain, but also to insure the prompt delivery of the pamphlet laws, which we are under heavy penalties to deliver at a specified time. The gentleman kindly promised to give his own attention to the matter out of office hours. This was the explicit requirement I made, and which he assured me would be fulfilled, and I saw no impropriety, after he had diligently attended to my business in his unoccupied hours, engaging transportation and paying my bills, in asking his acceptance of some volumes of our own publications.

So far as his transactions with my house are concerned, that gentleman is as innocent of receiving private compensation in his official character as any person living. It is with extreme pain that I feel myself constrained to defend the house of which I am a partner from imputations of such a nature as your remarks suggest. I had hoped and believed that my firm was too well known, especially to New England men, to require such a defense.

Although our relations to the Government as the official publishers of the Statutes at Large were not of our own seeking, we have ever felt a pride and satisfaction in embodying the national legislation in a form which, for absolute accuracy and style of workmanship, is unequalled by the official statutes of any other country.

More than fifty thousand dollars have been expended in the preparation of our stereotype plates, which, in view of the extremely limited demand for the volumes from private sources, and the stoppage of the supply to members of Congress, involves a large amount of dead capital. Since our contract began for supplying the eleven thousand copies of the pamphlet edition of the acts of Congress, we have but in two instances obtained additional compensation for the vast increase in the size of the pamphlet over the average at the time of the contract. The necessary legislation of Congress during the past three years has swelled the insignificant pamphlet of former times to a volume unthought of when the contract was made. The cost of material has increased one hundred per cent., and labor more than fifty per cent., and we are sustaining losses upon the contract price of our twelfth volume, and upon the pamphlet edition; yet in no single respect is there the slightest falling off in the fidelity of our work. Under the exposition with which I have troubled you, I trust, sir, that you will review the judgment you have formed, and be convinced that my house has not departed from those old-fashioned principles of probity and integrity upon which it was established.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
CHARLES C. LITTLE,
Of Little, Brown & Co.

Hon. WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will only add, Mr. President, if further explanation is needed, that Mr. Little states that ever since he has been in the habit of delivering these laws, as he is under a penalty to deliver the pamphlet laws on a certain day, and as the transportation is very uncertain, he has been obliged to employ some person here to look out for them and see that they are delivered and protected, as a little rain upon the boxes or anything of that sort might injure them. For that reason, it has been necessary for him to have a special person engaged to look out for them. While the matter was under the control of the State Department it was done by a porter there, and after it was removed by law to the Interior Department he went to that Department for the first time, and after making his arrangements he turned to a gentleman there and inquired if he would look out for them, and he at once said that he would. As there was necessarily a great deal of trouble about it, and this business was attended to by the gentleman out of office hours, Mr. Little did not perceive any impropriety in making him a present of some of his own publications. That is all there is of that matter. The Senate will judge for itself whether the vindication of the firm is not entirely complete.

WARDEN FOR THE JAIL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. No. 86) to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia. It was under consideration on Thursday last, and nearly finished and passed over.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Davis, Harding, Harris, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Powell, and Ten Eyck—13.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time. A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives announcing its passage by that body.

ADMISSION OF NEVADA.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up the bill to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone all other business for the purpose of taking up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. WILSON. That means morning business, does it not? At one o'clock the bill to create the rank of lieutenant general comes up by special assignment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill indicated by the Senator from Ohio, if taken up, will not displace the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 96) to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The bill authorizes the inhabitants of that portion of the Territory of Nevada included in the following designated boundaries to form for themselves, out of that Territory, a State government, which State, when formed, is to be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever. The boundaries of the new State are to be as follows: commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-eighth degree of longitude west from Washington with the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude; thence due west along the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude to the eastern boundary line of the State of California; thence in a north-westerly direction along the eastern boundary line of the State of California to the forty-third degree of longitude west from Washington; thence north along the forty-third degree of west longitude and the eastern boundary line of the State of California to the forty-second degree of north latitude; thence due east along the forty-second degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the thirty-eighth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south down the thirty-eighth degree of west longitude to the place of beginning.

The bill also prescribes who shall be qualified voters, and how the convention to form its constitution shall be constituted. The convention is to meet on the first Monday in July next, and after its organization is to declare on behalf of the people of the Territory that they adopt the Constitution of the United States. Thereupon the convention will be authorized to form a constitution and State government for that Territory. The constitution is to be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence; and it is required that the convention shall provide by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of the State: first, that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the State, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; second, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of the State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; and third, that the people inhabiting the Territory agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by Congress or donated to actual settlers by the homestead act, or located by the bounty land warrants of soldiers which have been or may hereafter be granted, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by the order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of three years from and after the respective days of the sale, location by land warrant, or notice of settlement thereof under the homestead act; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without that State shall never be taxed higher than the land belonging to residents thereof; and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by, the United States.

When formed, the new constitution is to be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of October next, and the vote, if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for the constitution, will be certified to the President of the United States, together with a copy of the constitution and ordinances; and thereupon it is to be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

The new State is to be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States; and the usual land grants are to be made for the support of common schools, for the erection of buildings for legislative and judicial purposes, penitentiary, and the construction of roads, ditches, canals, and a general system of irrigation. In the State of Nevada the laws of the United States, not locally inapplicable, are to have the same force and effect as elsewhere within the United States, and it is to constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Nevada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, but the morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday supplants it.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone the special order, so that we may proceed with this bill and pass it at once, unless it is going to be debated. I do not suppose there will be any debate upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it will take any time to pass the bill in regard to General Grant. I do not believe there will be any discussion about it. I am perfectly willing to take the Senate committee's report rather than have a debate about it.

Mr. WADE. I do not suppose this bill will take a moment. These bills are not generally debated. It is precisely similar to the bill that we passed at the last session.

Mr. WILSON. I must say to the Senator from Ohio that we have given way several times in regard to the bill reviving the grade of lieutenant general, and I had it called up yesterday with a view of making it the special order. I think we can pass it in a few minutes, and then I will give way to the Senator.

Mr. WADE. But I suppose we can pass this bill in just a few minutes, and fewer still. If it leads to debate I will not resist the taking up of that bill. I ask that the special order be passed over informally in order that we may see whether this bill is going to be debated or not.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. That will be done if there is no objection. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is now before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to strike out all after the word "United States" in the twenty-sixth line of the fourth section down to the word "and" in the thirty-fifth line, in the following words:

And moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by Congress or donated to actual settlers by the homestead act, or located by the bounty land warrants of soldiers which have been or may hereafter be granted, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by the order or under the authority of said State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of three years from and after the respective days of the sale, location by land warrant, or notice of settlement thereof under the homestead act.

Mr. WADE. I hardly think that clause should be stricken out. I believe it is in accordance with all the enabling acts that I know of that have been passed. I know my friend from Iowa thinks some of them were exempt from such a clause. This clause is inserted to prevent the State from immediately laying burdens on these lands, and causing them to be sold probably, and thereby withdrawing them from homestead settlers, &c. I do not think it would be prudent to strike it out. I do not want to debate it, but I think this is in accordance with all the bills I have examined on that subject; and all the other provisions of this bill are in accordance with the other enabling acts we have passed. Formerly there were reservations of five years instead of three, during which the lands remained exempt.

Mr. COLLAMER. They had five years to pay in.

Mr. WADE. Yes, they had five years to pay in, and they were exempted for five years. This exempts for but three years, which I think is in accordance with the modern enabling acts. The prior ones exempted for five years.

Mr. GRIMES. What new States had three?

Mr. WADE. I think those of Oregon and Kansas. I think all those enabling acts had that provision. I will not be perfectly sure about it, but I feel very confident of it. However, I am not going to debate it.

Mr. HARLAN. I am sure that the chairman of the Committee on Territories is in error, in part at least. Lands sold in Iowa were subject to taxation by the State immediately, unless they were located with land warrants by the original grantees. If the soldier himself carried his warrant to the land office and located it on a piece of land, it would be exempt from taxation, under the laws of the United States, for three years; but otherwise the lands were all taxable from the beginning. There is an eminent propriety, as it seems to me, in striking out this clause in the present instance. How does the Senator propose to support the State government in Nevada if we exempt all real estate—which will include all improvements on real estate—from taxation? In what other way can the State of Nevada, when it shall be organized, support its government? Manifestly in no way except by levying enormous taxes on personal property.

Mr. WADE. That same objection weighed with equal force against all the old enabling acts. The enabling act of Ohio reserved all lands sold by the Government from taxation for five years after actual sale; and yet it was not deemed any great burden, because the State governments, where there are very few inhabitants, do not require a great sum to keep up their organization. This exemption is only for three years. These lands are principally valuable for their mining facilities. I think that if it should be left to the State to burden them ad libitum to any extent they pleased, the Government would find these lands very soon withdrawn and under the control of the State. I do not think it is safe to strike out this provision. That is all I wish to say about it. I do not wish to prolong the debate.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not propose debating this matter at any length; but I wish to say a word in favor of striking out this clause. There is no similarity, I will say to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories, between the cases of Nevada and Ohio. In the case of Ohio or any of the States on this side of the mountains, all their acres are capable of cultivation; in the State of Nevada there are very few acres that are capable of cultivation, and this provision would simply exempt every acre in that Territory that is capable of cultivation from taxation by the State for three years.

The Senator will remember again that in our western mining States there is a very strong disposition on the part of the population (and it is universal, and the people make the laws,) against taxing mining property; that is, taxing the right to mine. The result is that it is a very difficult proposition indeed to sustain their State governments, but will become more so in regard to the State of Nevada than any other State yet created. In California, although the proposition is applicable there, we have a very large extent of rich agricultural lands and many other interests besides our mining interest; but Nevada is a mining community exclusively, and can never be anything else. It must always be fed from adjacent countries; and the small amount of land that is fit for cultivation would be exempt from taxation.

As to the proposition that the State would oppress its people by taxing unduly, I think that is sufficiently met by this reply that if the people of a State are not able to govern themselves justly, they should not have an enabling act passed, nor be created from a Territory into a State.

Mr. WADE. The Senator misapprehends this. This is to withdraw land from taxation in the hands of the General Government. I have no objection to their taxing themselves what they please, but what you want to do now is to enable them to tax everybody else that happens to own land there.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all. I desire to enable the State government to tax as it shall see fit its own people, and I wish all its property exposed to that rule of taxation. I hope that the clause will be stricken out.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire (I have not had time to read the bill) whether there is the usual provision in this bill that the State agrees that the lands belonging to the General Government shall not be taxed?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLLAMER. That would cover all the lands which these people actually go on to.

Mr. CONNESS. The State will have no power to tax the Government lands.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is one of the terms and conditions of the compact. I take it it is in this bill in the usual form.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the effect of this provision, which it is proposed to strike out, is to exempt lands from State taxation for three years after they have been sold.

Mr. WADE. And after they have been settled under the homestead law.

Mr. HOWE. Every one who has ever lived in a new State knows that one of the greatest evils it has to contend with is the fact that a great many of its lands are held by non-residents, who do not improve them, and who have nothing to tax but the lands themselves. If you exempt the lands from taxation, the burden would be very oppressive on the settlers, and of course that deficiency must be made up by taxing the property of the residents.

Mr. HARLAN. If this amendment shall be carried, the clause will then stand:

Third. That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the land belonging to residents thereof; and that no taxes shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by, the United States.

The amendment does not propose to unsettle these provisions, but merely to permit the State to tax the lands after they pass into the hands of private citizens, nothing more.

Mr. WILKINSON. I agreed to this provision in the bill in committee, and I do not suppose it amounts to very much. The idea that operated on my mind was that in the new States, very frequently the levying of taxes upon real estate operates very hard upon that class of settlers who go into the States for agricultural purposes; and hence in many of the bills which have been heretofore passed by Congress this exemption has been made. It is not contained in the enabling act authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a State government, but in many of the other acts the provision has been inserted as it is here. I would suggest that if the people there want to tax the land let them do so.

Mr. WADE. Very well; let the Senate vote as they please.

Mr. COLLAMER. The view of those who have heretofore acted on this question has been that the exemption at first for five years was because we sold our lands on a credit of five years. Then after that it was continued for a limited time, in some cases I think three years, really for the reason that the United States Government had land there to sell, and they could sell it better to the people who wanted to buy for the purpose of having it rise in market and holding it, if it was not liable to taxation. The object of reserving it from taxation was to enable the United States to more easily, the more readily to sell their lands, because then men taking up the land would not be subject to taxation until they sold out to actual settlers. I do not think that is applicable to this State. If I am rightly informed about it, selling United States land there will amount to very little. Therefore I do not know that it is necessary to keep this provision in.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. As a member of the Committee on Territories I consented to allow this bill to be reported as it stands; but I hope the chairman of the committee will consent to the adoption of this amendment. This exemption was a mistake originally that crept into these bills for the benefit of speculators, and not for the benefit of the residents. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WADE. Let the Senate decide it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I am opposed to this bill, sir, for two reasons. The first is that the population of this Territory does not amount to much more than half the ratio of representation. The second is that this enabling act requires a State constitution to be formed in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence. That is entirely a new condition, according to my recollection of acts enabling the people of a Territory to form a State government. The interpretations which are given to that important paper are so various and so wide apart that I think it would be a very unsafe rule.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill in the tenth section by striking out the words "have been or" in line three, and by striking out the words "prior or" in line four; so as to read:

Five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WADE. I move a verbal amendment in line fifteen of section four, to insert the word "that" after the word "first."

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up the Colorado bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 97) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The boundaries of the proposed State are as follows: commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude with the twenty-fifth degree of longitude west from Washington; extending thence due west along the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the thirty-second degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due north along the thirty-second degree of west longitude to a point formed by its intersection with the forty-first degree of north latitude; thence due east along the forty-first degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the twenty-fifth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south along the twenty-fifth degree of west longitude.

Mr. WADE. This bill is precisely like the other, and perhaps the Senate by unanimous consent will dispense with reading it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are the amendments that were incorporated in the other bill incorporated in this?

Mr. WADE. They are not; but the amendments can be offered to make it conform to the other bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be dispensed with if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill in like manner with the preceding bill, by striking out of the fourth section all after the words "United States," in the twenty-sixth line, ending with the word "act," in the thirty-fifth line.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This being precisely the same amendment offered to the other bill, it will be regarded as adopted if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARLAN. In section ten I move to strike out in line three the words "have been or," and in line four the words "prior or."

The VICE PRESIDENT. This amendment is understood to be precisely like one agreed to in the other bill, and will be regarded as adopted if there be no objection. The verbal amendment moved by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] will also be made to this bill if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe the last amendment of the Senator from Iowa was in section ten. I move to strike out that whole section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read section ten, as follows:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making and improving public roads, constructing ditches or canals, to effect a general system of irrigation of the agricultural land in the State, as the Legislature shall direct.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish to detain the Senate long, but I desire to have this matter rightly understood. When we originally granted to the new States five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits for the purpose of making improvements within the States, it was done as a remuneration for the agreement on their part not to tax the lands sold by us for five years after their sale. We granted to them in the first place three per cent., and afterwards five per cent. as a remuneration to them for the suspending of that right. That was the origin of the thing. It has undergone modification from time to time since. But inasmuch as it has been moved and approved here that the State shall have the right to tax immediately all the lands sold or taken up within the State, the giving of this five per cent. is entirely without consideration, and I therefore move to strike it out. I do not expect to succeed in this motion, because I know the power of the West is altogether potential; but I wished to state the principle as I understand it to be and let the Senate do as they please.

Mr. HOWE. I dare say the Senator from Vermont is right in stating the origin of this five per cent. payment; but I certainly have understood it very differently than he has stated it. I have understood that the five per cent. was given as a consideration, not for exempting the sold lands from taxation for five years or three years, but for exempting lands unsold from taxation forever—all your lands until they are sold; and I believe many of the enabling acts so state it.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is true that a part of the contract was that the States should not tax the United States Government lands at all. We know it was a disputed point whether they ever had such a power any way; but to remove all question, that was inserted in the acts, and that was right enough in order to remove all doubt upon the point. But the suspension of the right of taxing land actually sold for five years, was the essential consideration for the grant of the three per cent., which was the original grant, afterwards extended to five per cent. Three per cent. was granted to the State for the purpose of making improvements within her own borders, and two per cent. reserved by the United States to be laid out by the United States in the making of improvements toward and within the State itself. That was the original agreement; that was the way the three per cent. and the two per cent. stood before. Now they take the whole five per cent., and yet tax all the lands from the moment of their sale.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the bill now identical with the one just passed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Territories whether he has any information as to the extent of the population of this Territory?

Mr. WADE. Nothing that I can rely upon with a very great deal of confidence. I have taken some pains to ascertain the facts from the Delegate in the other House, and from Mr. Edmunds, of the Land Office, who has some information on that subject. I understand there must be now about sixty thousand inhabitants in Colorado; some think a great deal more than that. That is the smallest number I find intimated by those who profess to know anything about it. It is a Territory which is filling up very rapidly. Judge Edmunds tells me that he has not the least doubt in the world that before they finish their arrangements and become a State, there will be sufficient population there for a Representative in Congress according to the ratio of representation fixed by the last census. That is about the information I got.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day, which is the unfinished business of yesterday, is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, in section one, line eleven, after the word "ability," to strike out the following words:

And who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States; and that we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant, of Illinois, for the position of lieutenant general.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I am unalterably opposed to the passage of this bill in any shape in which it can be presented to the consideration of the Senate; and I will occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes while I state the reasons that will govern my vote; not, however, with the most remote idea that anything I can say will prevent the passage of the bill, although I am thoroughly convinced that the best interests of the country require that it should not pass.

Mr. President, let us look for one moment at the past history of this country in connection with this subject of a lieutenant general. When in 1798 it was believed by our ancestors that war was imminent between this country and France, the whole attention of the people of this country was directed to the one subject of the selection of a man who was capable of leading our armies against the embattled hosts of that kingdom. The man who was preëminent in all the relations of life, who was regarded as the "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen"—George Washington—was the man who was selected. He was the man who had led the armies of this country through the seven years' war with Great Britain. He was the man who had for eight years administered the affairs of this Government as the Chief Executive Magistrate of the Government. He had been tried in the highest positions in which he could be placed, both in a civil and military point of view; and there was an eminent fitness and propriety in giving a new rank in a case of that kind, where you selected a man who had been the chief of our armies for seven years and had been for eight years our Chief Magistrate, to command our armies; but even the name of that man, transcendent as he was, was not sought by anybody to be incorporated into the resolution of Congress. The resolution under which George Washington was appointed, as we are informed by the contemporaneous history of the event, was passed at the instance of the then President of the United States, John Adams. Is there any parallel between that case and this? Is there any parallel between George Washington, who for fifteen years had been at the head of the Army and of the nation, and who was recommended and for whose appointment the law was passed at the instance of the then Executive, and General Grant who has been at the head of one of our armies during the last thirty months?

That war cloud, sir, passed over. We escaped the difficulties with France that were anticipated in this country, and the office of lieutenant general became obsolete. We had no war until that of 1812-14 with Great Britain. During that war we had several generals who distinguished themselves greatly in the field. We had our Browns, our Porters, our Scotts, our Ripleys, our Maccombs, our Hamptons, and our Jacksons; but no man ever thought at that time of creating the office of lieutenant general to bestow upon any one of them. No such suggestion ever emanated from any quarter, and no Congress of the United States therefore ever gave a single moment of consideration to the subject.

But, sir, there was one man who did distinguish himself greatly during that war, at Lundy's Lane and at Chippewa. He remained in the Army after the war. He afterwards greatly distinguished himself in connection with the removal of the Cherokee Indians. He distinguished himself in connection with the Patriot war, as it was called, on our northern boundary. He distinguished himself in connection with the north-eastern boundary difficulties with Great Britain. But more than all, he led our armies through a succession of triumphs achieved in Mexico, and which finally culminated in the capture of the halls of the Montezumas.

Did anybody during that war ever suggest that we should create a lieutenant generalcy for the purpose of bestowing distinction upon General Scott? No. It was never conceived of until years after the end of the Mexican war. The law itself did not pass until seven or eight years after the end of the war, and then it only conferred a brevet; and in that act which conferred the brevet no man's name was mentioned. It was never thought of making General Scott a lieutenant general even by brevet—that man who had distinguished himself at the head of our armies in our war with Great Britain in 1812-14, who had distinguished himself at the head of our armies and in a civil capacity all along between 1814 and 1846, who had distinguished himself and achieved so many victories in Mexico—until years after the Mexican war, when public sentiment had become crystallized and settled into the conviction that it was proper that some distinction should be awarded to him. I ask gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill what analogy there is between the two cases—and those are the only two cases that exist in our history—and this case which it is proposed to make now?

One of the great arguments that was urged in the case of General Scott was that he was the only man during the war, and the only man during the twenty years preceding the war, who, on account of his distinguished service, had not been able to get any increase of either rank or pay; and it was for that consideration among others that the brevet rank was conferred upon him. So much in regard to the history of lieutenant generals.

What will be the effect of the passage of this bill if we do pass it? It will have one of three effects: either it will call General Grant from the position that he now occupies, from the field, and place him here at the head, as commander-in-chief of the armies, at Washington, and cause him to be a man of council rather than a man of action; or, second, it will make him the commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, controlling the armies of the United States, and still exercising the local command which he now holds; or else, third, it will confer no distinction upon him other than the mere nominal rank and pay, and leave him exactly where he is, to be governed by the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief of the armies through his subordinate, General Halleck. Do you want to accomplish either one of these purposes? You must accomplish one or the other of them by the passage of this bill. Is it worth while to pass this bill for the purpose of accomplishing either of these ends?

"I do not propose to enter upon any criticism of any of the campaigns of any military officer. I do not wish to detract from, and I am not going to seek to elevate, any one of them. I am the last man who would pluck a single leaf from the victor's chaplet that adorns General Grant's brow. But if I comprehend the character of that man, he is a man for action, for field service, for active duty, and not a man for the council chamber. I am satisfied that that is the estimate which he places upon himself; and I am also satisfied that there is no man in the whole country who would deplore the passage of this bill more than General Grant himself. Why, sir, since this bill was introduced by a distinguished Representative in Congress at the other end of the Capitol, General Grant has written a letter to him, which that gentleman has seen fit to cause to be published, in which he says:

"You should recollect that I have been highly honored already by my Government, and do not ask or feel that I deserve anything more in the shape of honors or promotion. A success over the enemy is what I desire above everything else, and I desire to hold such an influence over those under my command as to enable me to use them to the best advantage to secure this end."

That letter shows that General Grant is a man of good common sense. I believe that the effect of the passage of this bill will be to undermine and counteract the influence which he is now able to exercise over the officers in the field, and that it will have a tendency to demoralize a portion of the service.

It is said that we want to pass this bill in order to get rid of the officer who exercises the duty of a commander-in-chief here at Washington. I allude to General Halleck. I believe the argument was urged by some gentleman the other day that they wanted a live general in the council chamber; they wanted a man of action; they wanted a man who would prevent the army of the Potomac oscillating back and forth between the Rappahannock and the Potomac. Sir, have you any assurance, in the first place, that General Grant will be any better counselor than you have now; and, in the second place, are you assured that the bad counsels here result from this person whom you condemn, or do they proceed from some other head? Do you condemn General Halleck for the ridiculous expedition that has recently been made into Florida, where we have for the third time captured Jacksonville, which we have twice before abandoned because it was not worth holding—an expedition which the newspaper press seem to have received instructions to praise, but which we all know has resulted in the mere capture of a rebel quartermaster's private circular containing information that we already knew, namely, that there was a great deal of destitution in the rebel army? Do you hold General Halleck responsible for that most ridiculous expedition of General Banks, in which we spent more than forty or fifty million dollars in sending nine months' men down to New Orleans, which resulted simply in the capture of Port Hudson, that would have fallen the day after Vicksburg fell if there had been no force in front of it?

Mr. President, let us be sure that we are condemning the right man when we attempt to remove by legislation one general and substitute another in his place. Understand me: I am no advocate of General Halleck. I do not stand here as his special defender. He has given me no particular cause to admire him; but I have an instinctive love of fair play, and I want to see justice done to General Halleck, as I want to see justice done to the humblest individual in the country. I think that until we have more thorough information on this subject, it is not fair, it is not magnanimous even to an enemy to condemn him as it is proposed to condemn him here.

If General Grant is not brought here and put into the council chamber, he will be retained in the field where he now is, and still, under the bill, if we pass it as it now stands, be commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States. Do you want to accomplish that result? Do you want a general in a local command on the banks of the Mississippi river or in the mountains of Tennessee, and yet exercising a general command over all the armies of the United States? That will be the effect of the bill if you pass it.

If you do not bring him here, then, under the bill as it stands, he is to be commander-in-chief of all the armies of the United States, and remain where he is. Do you suppose it is possible that he can properly conduct the armies of the United States, that he can properly control the army of the Potomac, situated as he is at the foot of Look-out mountain? What means of information has he, what channels of communication has he by which he will be able to obtain that information that would justify him in directing the movements of an army here, or to control the movements of General Gillmore on the coast of South Carolina, or to control the action of General Banks in Louisiana?

If one or the other of those two alternatives does not follow, it follows that he will remain where he now is, but will be subject to and controlled as he now is by this very General Halleck, whom you condemn. Is that all the purpose you have in passing this bill? Is it worth while for us to establish this precedent of creating lieutenant generals for the purpose of giving General Grant an empty honor? I trow not.

Mr. President, if I had not any other objection to the passage of this bill it would be enough for me that it is going to establish a precedent which, before this session of Congress is adjourned, will be followed by Congress, and we shall have a batch of lieutenant generals added on to this one, if we create the office. Sir, do not imagine that the gentlemen who are now major generals are not tolerably ambitious, and that they are not looking forward with intentness and earnestness to our action here, not particularly because they desire General Grant promoted, but because they believe this promotion will be a precedent by which they themselves can secure the same sort of advancement that they now desire for General Grant. I am not prepared to do this. I am very well satisfied that a man can perform the duties of commanding an army just as well with the rank of major general as with the rank of lieutenant general. I believe that the pay of $6,000, which General Grant now receives, is adequate to the rank and to the position which he holds, and that it is not necessary for me to assist in running the hands of Congress into the national Treasury for the purpose of giving him between thirteen and fourteen thousand dollars a year. I have come here this session with the determination to assist in creating no new office, and to assist in increasing the salary of no officer that now exists; and I do not propose to commence in the manner which is now proposed.

I have thus, Mr. President, very briefly stated the reasons why I shall vote against this bill in any shape in which it can be presented. I do not believe that the best interests of the country will be subserved by it. I believe we are getting along well enough as we now are; and I know that the best friends of General Grant in his army do not believe it is for the interests of General Grant or the interests of the country that this rank should be conferred upon him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am surprised that the Senator from Iowa should oppose this bill in the modified form in which it is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. I hoped there would be no further opposition to it. The amendment reported from that committee so alters the bill that its effect is simply to confer upon General Grant the rank and title of lieutenant general, but leaving him under the command of the President, and only placing him in supreme command within the department or district in which he is for the time being. I am informed by high military authority that the bill is now so framed as not to throw any impediment in the way of the proper command of the Army through any officer who may be designated by the President of the United States as chief of his staff. The present position of General Halleck is, properly speaking, not that of commander-in-chief of the Army. He is rather the chief of staff of the President of the United States, who by the Constitution is made the Commander-in-Chief. He is the adjutant general, in a particular sense, of the President of the United States. The orders of the President are issued through General Halleck. They could be issued through a major in the Army to the highest officer in the Army. The passage of this bill will not, therefore, impede the military operations of the Government. It will not place General Grant in command of General Banks. It will not place him in command of the army of the Potomac, unless the President so requires. Nor will it prevent orders being issued through General Halleck to General Grant. It amounts only to the high compliment and honor of out-ranking all major generals within the limit of the command assigned to General Grant.

Now, the question is whether General Grant is deserving of this compliment. It was painful to me to hear the Senator from Iowa ignore the great services rendered by General Grant. He depreciates these services as compared with those rendered by General Scott. Why, sir, when General Scott commanded the Army of the United States in Mexico, there was, if I remember right, but one major general beside himself, and there were only four or five brigadier generals in the Army of the United States. The whole of the army of General Scott would scarcely form a corps in the grand army of General Grant. The Mexican war furnishes no parallel to the vast and complicated campaigns of General Grant, either in the numbers engaged, the physical difficulties overcome, or the enemy defeated.

The Senator says if we make one lieutenant general, it will be followed by others. If any officer of the Army of the United States can give us such a series of victories as General Grant has done, I am willing to make him a lieutenant general. I trust that other brave and skillful officers may be able to win such distinction. One more General Grant would utterly destroy the rebellion and bring us peace again. How gladly would our people confer these high honors if only we have the victories which lead to them.

I ask Senators, on what does this honor depend? The course of General Grant has been successful almost without exception. It has been brilliant, and may well bear comparison with the achievement of any officer in this or any war by this country. It is true his first battle of Belmont resulted in a repulse, but it was a bold attack, justified by the country, and only defeated when the enemy had brought into the field largely superior numbers. It gave heart and spirit to the country at a time of great depression, and paved the way for undoubted successes.

Then his movement up the Cumberland and Tennessee, the battles at Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, and afterwards the battle of Shiloh—these were victories of which we had no example in this war before. They were victories won at a time when the whole country was under discouragement, when the army of the Potomac had been defeated or lay slumbering under its new general. They were the first clarion notes in this war, and the victory at Fort Donelson has scarcely been exceeded since.

But look a little further. In my opinion, there is not in our history a campaign similar to that about Vicksburg. Vicksburg had been assaulted by land and by water. It had been declared to be impregnable. Our enemy so boasted and consoled themselves for many losses by their new Gibraltar. The papers that came back to us from Europe declared that Vicksburg was impregnable and no force of the United States could capture it; and yet after discouraging failure a grand campaign was planned by General Grant with his distinguished subordinates far away from Washington, without any aid or assistance whatever from Washington. Soon we hear that with the hearty and important aid of the Navy he had run the gunboats by the forts, had marched his army around on the left bank of the Mississippi, had crossed the Mississippi, and then commenced that unparalleled campaign, in which, after a series of battles, each one of which was a great victory, he finally came into the rear of Vicksburg, besieged and captured it. In these successive battles and victories he captured or destroyed an army greater than his own, divided in twain the territory occupied by the enemy, and opened to our commerce the great artery of the West. All that the most sanguine had hoped for he had accomplished. But this was not all. General Rosecrans, his equal in rank and command, had been defeated at the battle of Chickamauga, and his army was environed with perils and difficulties. General Grant was required to reorganize this army in the presence of a superior force of the enemy. He did so. He melted into one grand army, corps and divisions which had never acted together; he retained his position, never receding, and waiting until General Sherman led to his aid, by a march almost unexampled in length and difficulty, a portion of his old army, and then he fought the battle of Chattanooga. It was a grand plan, a poetic battle, with all the surroundings and accessories which can make a battle memorable in all time. It was a battle simple in its greatness and faultless in its execution. It lifted a weight from the breast of a nation. But General Grant did not rest here. Bragg was driven out of Tennessee, but Burnside was besieged at Knoxville. Who does not remember the anxiety felt for his fate? General Grant did not rest. Without delay the column that had taken Missionary Ridge and had recently left Memphis were on their way to Knoxville, and in four days had performed much the most rapid march of the war, had relieved Burnside, and were moving back again.

For these victories and movements, almost without a parallel in any history, equal to any of Napoleon's, we cannot give General Grant a less compliment than by promoting him one degree in the scale of rank. If his successes had been doubtful, if they rested simply upon one battle, upon one campaign, or upon one victory, I should feel very reluctant to pay him this compliment; but such is not the fact. It has been a series of victories. The number of prisoners he has captured has been in excess of those captured by all the other armies in the field. I believe it is stated that he has captured some eighty thousand or ninety thousand prisoners, more than twice as many as have been captured by all our other armies. He has captured more flags, taken more guns, fought more battles, and won more victories than any other general. I ask Senators whether they will deny him, on a vote by yeas and nays, this honor, stripped of its command, and will say to him that he has not yet won the title conferred upon General Scott for his victories in Mexico. I will not record such a vote.

I repeat to the Senator from Iowa that if any other general should hereafter win equal victories, I will be willing to give him the same compliment. Though I am not in favor of increasing the pay of officers, I am willing to reward high merit and high success with high honors. Besides the love of country and the desire to do their duty, all that induces these officers to perform great and noble actions is the love of fame, an honorable ambition, which, instead of being a vice, I conceive to be a virtue. A man has a right to the honors he wins by his own courage and gallantry in battle and by victory. Military honors in all ages have been held to be the need, the reward of victory. These honors confer additional rank, and as they are the highest inducements, so they should be cheerfully given for high military service.

Mr. President, you have seventy major generals in the Army. Is there not among them some who have been designated by the public voice, and who are entitled by their services to a higher rank than the rest? General Grant is clearly one of those. This all must concede. So far as you have conferred honors, you have conferred upon seventy individuals the same rank that General Grant now holds. I ask you whether he has not, by his peculiar services, won a right to higher rank and higher honors than these officers? I think he has. To deny him this reward, after the House of Representatives have sent the proposition to us, would be doing an act of injustice to him.

Mr. President, I do not vote for this resolution for the purpose of casting any reproach upon General Halleck. I believe the Senator from Michigan said that one purpose he had in view was to relieve the Army from General Halleck.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to disabuse the Senator from Ohio and all other persons on that subject. I made no allusion whatever to General Halleck in the few remarks which I addressed to the Senate, and I did not intend to make any allusion to him. I certainly could not have conveyed any such imputation against him, because I have always held General Halleck in the very highest esteem.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Senator from Iowa to refer to the Senator from Michigan as having made that remark.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not refer to anybody.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought the Senator from Michigan made such a remark.

Mr. GRIMES. I did understand the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Michigan the other day to make such an imputation.

Mr. HOWARD. I can only say then that the Senator from Iowa entirely misunderstood me. I made no allusion whatever to General Halleck.

Mr. CONNESS. The remark fell from the Senator from Illinois, now absent, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

Mr. GRIMES. I thought it was the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad to be corrected. Some Senator at any rate said that he desired to support this bill because it would relieve the Army from the command of General Halleck. I have no such feeling in regard to General Halleck. General Halleck is here performing an irksome duty. He has had no opportunity in his present position to gain the high honors of military fame in the field. No general can ever acquire much reputation in an office. Although he may command and direct armies and may organize all these great victories, yet, being in an office, removed from the field of active operations, the popular honors will not be conferred on him. I therefore do not wish to criticize General Halleck; he has had many difficulties to overcome.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Did he not have an opportunity at Corinth?

Mr. SHERMAN. He had an opportunity at Corinth, and he succeeded at Corinth. The Senator may think that he marched too slow; but that was a question of doubt and difficulty. Other officers who were advancing rapidly were blamed; and if the slightest reverse had happened to our arms under General Halleck at Corinth he would have been blamed for hasty action in marching from the base of his operations. I do not appear here to defend him or to disparage him. We are civilians. We know very little about military movements. But when any general has by his uninterrupted success in several campaigns shown us that he has military capacity and military ability, then I am willing to give him the civic honors of his country. We cannot judge here, sitting in the Senate Chamber, about the capacity of military officers in managing the details of campaigns, except by the results of their operations. We cannot criticize them. I therefore have very rarely engaged in criticism of our general officers; but when they have won success, when they have shown their skill by their success, then we ought to give to them the civic honors and civic rewards which all nations, and especially all republics, give to the soldiers who have fought their battles and won their victories.

In regard to General Halleck, I repeat that his duty is an irksome and difficult one. The officers of the regular Army think that General Halleck as a General-in-Chief is superior to any that could be selected in the Army for the particular duties intrusted to him. That, it seems, is the opinion of the President, who, notwithstanding the attacks upon General Halleck, adheres to that officer. He must have a good opinion of him. I am in no position to discredit that opinion. It is true that I have indulged in a feeling of uneasiness about the delay of the army of the Potomac and other armies; but I cannot say upon whom rests the blame. It may be upon General Halleck; it may be upon the commanding officer in the field. If I were disposed to criticize, I would say this: during the last thirty days of beautiful weather the great army of the rebellion has lain within forty miles of Washington; it is generally believed that our army is superior to theirs; but there they have lain in sight of each other. I believe this rebellion will never end until we concentrate here a sufficient army to attack and break those forces and march toward Richmond, and wherever else we can go. But whom can I blame? How can I say that the President or General Halleck or General Meade is in fault for this? If General Meade or any other officer will take that army of the Potomac, organize it effectively, defeat Lee in two or three pitched battles, march on Richmond, take Richmond, and then march on, I will, as a Senator from the State of Ohio, freely grant him the highest honors of this Republic, as I now wish to do to General Grant. I cannot say why this is not done, nor whose the fault. I only know that the army of the Potomac is now where it was two years ago; not through any lack of courage in the brave men who are fighting in that army; but for some reason they have not won the honors of this war. But General Grant and the armies under his command have won those honors; and I think we should all frankly and generously, by a unanimous vote, tender them. Whenever the army of the Potomac shall win equal honors or gain similar successes, break down the adversaries in their front; capture their fortified places, drive the army of Lee as far back from the base of operations as General Grant drove those opposed to him, I shall then be ready to give the leaders of that army similar rewards.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Committee on Military Affairs, if I recollect aright, proposed to strike out of the bill that portion of it which named General Grant as the person recommended by Congress to be appointed lieutenant general, and that part which provided that he should have the command of the armies of the United States. Assuming that these amendments will receive the sanction of the Senate and that the bill can therefore only be passed so modified; it will simply be the creation of the office of a lieutenant general, naming no one, and not in any way prescribing the character of the command which he is to have.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to explain?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a printed amendment before the Senate now which I had the honor to offer which it is proposed to add in case the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs be carried, which does characterize the command which the lieutenant general is to have, giving it its exact character.

Mr. JOHNSON. But we are first to vote on these amendments. I am not mistaken, I think, in saying that the amendments which I have just stated are the amendments recommended by the committee. Assuming, then, that those amendments will be adopted, and that no alteration will be made in the bill which will in any way affect the bill in the particulars named, it will simply be a bill providing for the creation of this grade of military appointment. Believing that to be the case, it will receive my support, and I give that support without any reference at all to the person whom the President of the United States may think proper to select. I am willing to trust to him the selection from the Army of any one whom he supposes to be more competent than any others, or as competent as any other, to fill the office of lieutenant general. In the nature of things, if it has not been disclosed already, it will be disclosed in the future that there is some officer in the military service of the United States who is entitled to and who should receive this highest rank known heretofore to the military service of the United States. But if the amendments shall not be adopted recommended by the committee, I shall be forced very unwillingly to vote against the bill as it will then stand, for as it would then stand it would, in my opinion, be a direct reflection upon the present General-in-Chief of the Army. I know that there are a great many intelligent men in the United States, but perhaps a great many more prejudiced men in the United States, who think that General Halleck is not adequate to the duties of the post that he fills. I am not one of that number. It has been my good fortune to know him intimately for the last six or seven years, to have spent months in his society, to have talked over with him all the subjects connected with the war, with the origin of the war, and to have listened to him from time to time on everything that he deemed to be necessary for the purpose of bringing the war to a successful termination; and without professing to be more of a judge than any other civilian can be, it appeared to me, forming the opinion from these facts alone, that he was as fit, if not more fit, to discharge the duties of the place that he holds than any other man who could have been selected.

I know, too, that that was the opinion of the present lieutenant general, General Scott. It was at his special instance mainly, I believe, that he was selected for the command. He conducted the campaign at Corinth not so as entirely to satisfy the public, but he conducted it in one sense to a successful termination, and I have heard military men of high capacity, who now stand very high in the confidence of the public, say that it could not have been conducted with greater ability.

It is true, sir, and it may be owing to his physical constitution or to the education that he has received, that he may have made himself obnoxious to individual censure by not having that politeness which characterizes some men. When he means not to do a thing, he says "No." He may not say it in Chesterfieldian terms, but he has this good quality, that when he intends to act "no," he says "no," and he adheres to "no." It is the great misfortune of men in high places that they are, if they have opinions, unable to persevere in them. They are affected by the influence around them; the opinion of to-day ceases to be acted upon to-morrow by this outside influence. But I know the General-in-Chief of the armies of the United States well enough to know that all such outside influence, as mere influence, is thrown away upon him. He acts upon his own judgment, and a judgment in military matters enlightened by long and careful study, by books that have received, I believe, the commendation of most of the military men of the country; and as far, therefore, as I am advised, he is abundantly competent to discharge the duties of the post which he holds. If there have been disasters, mistakes which might have been corrected, I rather think when history comes to record the events that are occurring and have occurred around us, the cause of such disasters will be found referable to others and not to the General-in-Chief. His advice has not always been followed; he has not at times been consulted at all, and when consulted his opinion has not been followed; and I am very much inclined to think that the dissatisfaction of the country, a dissatisfaction which, as it seems to me, is well founded, at the want of success of the army of the Potomac—I mean the want of complete success—is not to be attributed to General Halleck, but to others, or to some others. There is no man in the country, and I speak that too from a personal observation, not continued through the last six or seven weeks, but from the time he assumed the command up to about six or seven weeks ago; I was in the daily habit of visiting his office, and I say from personal observation that there is no man in the country who has given his time more undividedly to the service of the country than he has, and intelligently devoted it to the service of the country.

As to the army of the Potomac, the public are dissatisfied. They have been dissatisfied with every man who has been at its head; with McClellan, with Burnside, with Hooker, and now with Meade. But the fate of that army, Mr. President, proves their undying loyalty, and it proves also their unflinching gallantry. From the time they were organized up to the present time they have lost in killed and in wounded nearly one hundred thousand men, and whenever they have met the enemy upon equal terms victory has perched upon their standard.

They have failed to drive Lee's army from Virginia, a failure in my view unaccountable, unjustifiable, inexcusable. It has for some time outnumbered Lee's army. When General McClellan conducted so successfully the campaign which terminated in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, and it was supposed, and justly supposed as I think, that the army of Lee should have been destroyed, it was proposed by the general in command here to leave twenty thousand men upon the other side of the Potomac, sufficient to meet the whole of Lee's army if they attempted to make an assault upon the city, and to march with sixty thousand men on the other side of the river so as to cut Lee off. The advice was not followed; there was an apprehension, a feverish apprehension that the city was not safe, and, in order to place the safety of the city beyond all possible question, the movement was rejected, which must have resulted, or, to speak more guardedly, in all probability would have resulted in the capture of the entire of Lee's army.

The fact which I have just stated, Mr. President, I got from a major general in the Army—the man who proposed the movement. So, again, at the campaign at Gettysburg, there is not a military critic in the country whose voice has been raised, or whose pen has been used, that has not spoken of that campaign, and the battles fought under the leadership of Meade, as the finest battles on record, not only as regards the unflinching heroism of your men and your officers, but the skill of the leader. He was but just placed at the head of that army; he felt the responsibility of his situation; he had lost twenty or thirty thousand men; and yet, as I understand the fact to be, he was willing to pursue the enemy, when unfortunately taking the advice of his corps commanders that proposition did not meet with their assent—I believe they were divided about it—and he failed to pursue the enemy. He was unwilling to assume the responsibility. I think he ought to have done it. I thought then, and I think now, if he had done it, we should no longer have before us the confederate army in Virginia. But the responsibility was very great. It is due to history to say that where victory would terminate at the termination of the last of those days was very uncertain; a feather almost might have changed the result; and if he had been defeated afterwards in making the second attack, with his reduced force and his men worn down by fatigue, what would have become of this District and the Government? It is not to be wondered at that an officer who though not young in years was for the first time put at the head of an army as great almost in numbers as Napoleon ever commanded should have felt that responsibility and quailed under it, quailed not from any physical fear, quailed from no unwillingness to hazard his life in carrying the flag of his country everywhere triumphant, but that he should have quailed from the crushing responsibility which would have been upon him if he had failed in that further movement, and the capital had been taken; and then the whole country would have censured him.

I rose, Mr. President, merely for the purpose of excluding any conclusion which anybody might think proper to form from any vote that I shall give on this bill, that I have not entire confidence in the ability of General Halleck, and more confidence—I speak it with no purpose of disparaging General Grant—to fill the station which he now holds than any other officer in the Army.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, there appears to be a good deal of difference of opinion among Senators who have spoken in regard to this bill. The Senator from Ohio when up directed his argument in such a manner that the bill might be adopted as it came from the House of Representatives, without the amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs of this body, and while presenting his views on the question went at large into the history of the campaigns of General Grant, describing his great successes, his ability as a military leader, his preëminent ability over any other man developed thus far by this war. I agree with that Senator in his review, and in the compliments and conclusions that he deduces from the history of the war thus far for General Grant; but I do not agree with him in proposing to pay an empty compliment to General Grant for these services. I do not agree with him that, while the war has developed the greatest amount of genius in him, and also found the greatest number of successes under his lead, he should simply be treated to a compliment very much the equivalent of the resolution already passed by Congress, thanking him for his eminent services, by making him now on the passage of this bill a lieutenant general without a chief command.

It has been stated in addition, and the country comprehends it, that for nearly three years past the greatest army that our country has yet put together and organized and equipped has failed of success in this war, namely, the army of the Potomac. Commander after commander has controlled its columns with only partial success and sometimes with complete defeat. Mr. President, I ask is there not cause enough in that to seek now, through all the military commanders that this war has thus far developed, for a man with sufficient genius, with sufficient military capacity, possessing at the same time the confidence of the country, to conduct, control, and direct from this time forward the fortunes of the army of the Potomac?

Is the Senator from Ohio willing merely to pass this bill as a compliment to General Grant, giving him a mere degree more in rank, without entitling him to the command that it should give him, without giving him the power and control that the mind of the nation now looks to him as the best possessor of? I say that if the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator, is in favor of that manner of compensation to General Grant, of that disposition of title and rank, it is less than is due, in my opinion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator propose to make General Grant, as he is to be the man, lieutenant general, independent of the President?

Mr. CONNESS. I do not, sir. I am totally opposed to that, but I am in favor of making him lieutenant general and General-in-Chief of the armies of the United States under the direction of the President, and subject to removal at the pleasure of the President, recognizing in the President the constitutional Commander-in-Chief of our armies.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I will ask my friend another question. If we make him lieutenant general, and he is the only lieutenant general, does he not of necessity, unless the President should prohibit it in some way, become commander of the armies?

Mr. CONNESS. I answer the Senator with great candor, I think that legitimately such would be the result; but we have seen, time and again, a great deal of hair-splitting and a great deal of indecision in determining questions as those questions applied to generals in the field, and to men before the people; and I want to make the language of this bill so clear and so distinct that the President of the United States will see his duty, see what the will of Congress is, not deduce it, but have it clearly before him. I hope that the amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs will be adopted, and I say before I close that unless they be adopted I shall feel compelled to vote against the bill as it stands.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate long, but I want to call the attention of Senators to one objection that has been made to this bill, which strikes me as not having much force in it, and that is that it confers supreme command on the lieutenant general, under the direction of the President. If I have understood the argument raised against that provision of the bill, it is said that it is an impeachment of the constitutional prerogative of the President. I do not understand it so, and I find that Congress in its past legislation has not so understood it. I find in an act passed about two years ago in relation to the other branch of the service, the Navy, that Congress undertook to decide there directly without reference to the President who should command a first-rate vessel, who should command a second-rate, who should command a third-rate, and who a fourth-rate; and Congress provided by law that first-rates should be commanded by commodores, second-rates by captains, third-rates by commanders, and fourth-rates by lieutenant commanders. Still the President is Commander-in-Chief of the Navy as much as he is of the Army; and if you undertake to designate what shall be the peculiar command of an officer of the Navy, I do not see the slightest objection to prescribing by law what shall be the particular command of any officer in the Army. To my mind that objection is without foundation.

I shall vote, if ever I get a chance to vote on this bill, for it just as it came from the House of Representatives without any of the amendments proposed by the committee, because if I want to do a thing I wish to do it graciously and not grudgingly. If we think that General Grant has a claim upon the gratitude of the country, let us say so; and when the peculiar Representatives of the people, the members of the other House, have seen fit in the exercise of their undoubted prerogative not to dictate or control but humbly to suggest and advise who should be selected for this high office, I think they but speak the sentiment of the people, and I am willing for one to submit; and I do it without any great repugnance upon my part.

There is one reason that has been assigned by the Senator from Iowa against the passage of this bill which, instead of satisfying me that it ought not to pass, is the strongest argument I have heard why it should pass. He says—I cannot quote his words, but I think I have the idea—that if we create this office of lieutenant general we shall have cause to repent of it before this session is over, because other generals watching carefully what we are doing will come up with their claims, and we shall have to increase the list. I pray Almighty God that the Senator spoke the truth. I hope that there are some other generals in our armies who, when they see the high reward which Congress, as the mouthpiece of the people, award to a brave and successful soldier, will be stimulated to exertion to show themselves worthy of like honor; and if it did nothing else but stimulate an honorable ambition in the minds of these other generals when they see what Congress and the people of the country have done for General Grant, it would be very beneficial if the result be to stir and excite and move them to make energetic efforts to place themselves upon the same roll of honor, so that Congress, with equal consistency, may tender them the like reward.

Mr. President, if I stood anywhere else except in this high council chamber of the nation, where every man is supposed to speak, and where I believe every man speaks, just exactly what he thinks without any sinister or covert meaning, I should think that those gentlemen who are so strenuously opposed to rendering this due honor to General Grant, were secret enemies of Mr. Lincoln by the course which they have taken toward General Grant and want to put him on the inside track for the Presidency; for, sir, let it go abroad, justly or unjustly, let the people get a suspicion that from any motives the due tribute to the gallantry and self-sacrifice and the great victories which General Grant has won is withheld, that there has been a feeling in favor of withholding from him the due reward of his merit and the prompt and generous acknowledgment of it—let that go abroad among the people, and I tell you, sir, the people will put it right; they will rally, and they will not stop until over the Senate and over Congress they have rendered the highest honors in their power to General Grant.

I do not want to do any such thing as that. I want to leave General Grant just exactly where his own merits leave him, and I desire that there should be no sinister influence created by our action, however well intended, that shall tend to give him this great advantage over his other competitors for the Presidency. Sir, there is no feeling on the earth, not even the love of woman, so powerful as the feeling of gratitude in the minds of a free people for the hero who has gone out in the hour of his country's peril, taking his life, his honor, his reputation, and everything in his hand, and standing ready between the country and her foes to do what man can do, and to sacrifice all that a patriot can sacrifice for the benefit and the salvation of his country. If there is a single lesson in the history of this country demonstrated beyond controversy and beyond contradiction it is that. What made General Jackson President of the United States? What made General Taylor President of the United States?

So far has this feeling of gratitude been carried that the people have been ready to take a general even upon trust; and they not only made General Jackson and General Taylor Presidents of the United States for the great and heroic victories which they had achieved in behalf of their country, but the feeling was pushed to such excess that they actually took General Pierce [laughter] and made him President of the United States. That same feeling is strong in the breasts of this people. They are not only a brave but a generous people. Sir, you may withhold this tribute from General Grant, you may strip the bill as it came from the House of Representatives of everything that goes to give it meaning, or force, or vitality, but I tell you that everything you do will have a tendency to endear General Grant more and more to the sympathies, the affection, and the gratitude of his country.

Mr. President, we are told that there is no precedent for this measure. That is true; there is not exactly any precedent for it; and we are in a time at this moment not to follow precedents but to make them. There is no precedent for such a gigantic rebellion as we are engaged in; there is no precedent in the history of this country or in the history of the world for the situation which our country presents; and if we had stopped to be tied up by precedents before we entered upon a vigorous prosecution of this war, the destinies of this country would have been fixed long ago. When Fort Sumter was attacked, when the national authority was defied, the national flag trampled in the dust, and rebellion, red-handed, stood threatening the very existence of the nation, suppose that President Lincoln before he called out seventy-five thousand men to defend the country had sent for some pettifogging lawyer to hunt authorities and find out a precedent for what a President of the United States might do in such an emergency as that, and when he could not find anything in the books he had stopped and ceased and waited until Congress came together, where would the country have been?

But, sir, the President did what every man of sagacity and of patriotism would do, and what he should have done. He saw the emergencies of the country, he saw the desperate condition in which he was placed, and he took the responsibility, and without law and without authority he called these men into the field, trusting that Congress when they came together would see that the circumstances were such as to justify his action and to demand it, and with a full and generous confidence that they would sustain him. And, sir, he did right. I said he did it without law; but he did not do it without law. There was a law higher than any that Congress had made or could make, and that was "the safety of the Republic," which the old writers upon the Roman law tell us "is the supreme law." It was upon that law that he acted without looking for precedents. Sir, I shall be glad if we make a precedent here that can be followed. I shall be glad if we confer this honor upon General Grant, and stirred and stimulated by the example there comes crowding upon the area general after general bringing his laurels and the proofs of his victory, and laying them down at the feet of Congress, and asking us to do unto him as we have done unto General Grant, and the more the better, and the sooner they come the better.

Mr. President, in the tremendous emergencies of this country, such as no man could have foreseen and such as we can now hardly realize, General Grant has gone forward and with the simplicity of a Roman and the patriotism of an American he has done all that human agency could do in the perilous conditions in which he found himself; and now shall we cease to reward him, shall we cease to acknowledge everything that is due to him because we cannot find a precedent? I trust not, sir; but I trust that in the action of Congress to-day upon this matter we shall set a precedent which those who come after us will be proud to follow. But, sir, I hope that in the history of the country there never will arrive a crisis when the war through which we are now going will be looked to as a precedent. I hope such a rebellion never will exist again, and I believe it never will. I believe that if you put General Grant in a situation where he can go on and consummate what he has so well begun he will terminate this war, and terminate it so effectually that centuries will clasp before our successors will have occasion to look to our doings for precedents to guide them.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am so anxious to take the vote upon the passage of this joint resolution which is to make General Grant a lieutenant general that I reluctantly detain the Senate for a few moments. But, sir, the Senator from New Hampshire has made some suggestions that I think require a brief notice.

The Senator expresses the hope that Congress will now make a precedent, that the Congress of the United States will pass this resolution as it comes to us from the House of Representatives; a resolution that dictates to the Chief Magistrate of the Republic who shall be made lieutenant general. I hope the Senate of the United States will do no such thing. I hope, too, that we shall vote without any reference to the presidential election, or to candidates for the Presidency. For myself, sir, I take no part whatever in any of the movements here or elsewhere looking to making a President of the United States in November next. It will be time enough for us to turn our attention to that great duty when it comes upon us. Our duty now is higher and nobler.

But, sir, I trust that the Senate will pass the resolution as proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to make a lieutenant general and not dictate to the President who that lieutenant general shall be. The public judgment of the country points to General Grant; the House of Representatives has expressed its wish for his appointment; and I believe the sentiment of the Senate to approach unanimity that General Grant shall be appointed. I know, sir, that the President of the United States is in favor of that appointment. It seems to me that Congress ought not to tell the President whom he shall appoint. Why should the Congress of the United States advise the President to appoint General Grant? If there be a man on earth that has been the best friend of General Grant, it is Abraham Lincoln. When the public judgment was against him, when portions of the public press denounced him, when officers filled the city with communications against him, when members of Congress shrank from his side or criticised him harshly, when the pressure was made to remove him, the President of the United States stood firmly by him, had confidence in him, carried him in triumph through, and he has nobly proved himself worthy of that confidence. I know no body of men on the earth, in Congress or out of Congress, that has a right to go to the President of the United States and advise him to appoint General Grant. General Grant's great service to the country is owing to the fact that the President stood firmly by him when so many turned their backs upon him. He who stood by him in the hours of doubt, when his fame was clouded by misrepresentations or misunderstandings, is not likely to turn his back upon him now, when he has rendered such services to his country and won such honors for himself.

Therefore, sir, it does seem to me that there is an impropriety in passing through the Congress of the United States this resolution as it comes from the House of Representatives, saying to the President that we recommend the appointment of General Grant. The President is as ready to make that appointment as Congress is to vote for this grade of lieutenant general.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has expressed his confidence in General Halleck. We are living in times when men are harshly judged in every department of public life. We are passing through a civil war, and there is hardly a man in public life, civil or military, that is not subjected to the criticism, to the censure, to the rebuke, and to the denunciation of large portions of our countrymen. To General Halleck, I believe, we have done injustice, and to many other public officers we have been unjust, and that will be the judgment of the future when we have passed through these stern scenes, and the record is fully disclosed to the world. It always has been so. Through the trials of the Revolution, one portion of our countrymen were fault-finding with the other. A number of men in the Continental Congress were opposed to Washington, and they were among some of the best and noblest patriots of that age. Just so in the last war with England, men that we have almost deified since were then censured and denounced by large portions of the country. We are apt in our times to underrate the magnitude of this contest and the gravity of the events that are passing around us. We are apt to find fault with and belittle the men who are engaged in public affairs, civil and military; but when the triumph is won, and won it will be, when the record goes to the world a better age will measure these transcendent events more accurately than we are doing, and will do justice to the public men of our day, civil and military, to their capacity and to their character. I think men in civil life or military life who are earnestly striving to serve their country, although they may make mistakes and do make mistakes, may calmly trust to the judgment of the coming future.

The Senator from Iowa has spoken of the great services rendered by Washington and by General Scott, who have been made lieutenant generals. Well, sir, has not General Grant rendered transcendent services to the country? He has fought seventeen battles for the Republic and won them all; he has taken more prisoners and more cannon than ever Washington or Scott saw on all their battle-fields. He has rendered great service to the country in this great struggle, and the popular voice points to him as the man to receive this great honor. I think it has been well and nobly earned. I have confidence in him, as I have in all men, civil and military, who know what this war is about, who understand its cause. He understood its cause, and had the sagacity to see in August last that the cause of this rebellion, slavery, was dead. He then declared that it would take a standing army, if we made peace, to support slavery; and that he was opposed, much as he wanted peace, to making any peace until this question was forever settled. It was not only the language of a great general but the language of a genuine statesman, and I honor him for it.

Now, sir, I hope that the Senate will take this resolution, amended as proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, and pass it; that the House of Representatives will concur in the amendment; that the President of the United States will promptly nominate General Grant for this high position; that he will be promptly confirmed by the unanimous voice of the Senate; and that he will take his place under the President of the United States as the highest military officer of the Republic.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate through the afternoon, and I listened to a debate on the same question on one or two other occasions with an earnest and prayerful desire to ascertain, if I could, what the question in dispute is. I understand that the distinct proposition upon which we are to vote is to amend the bill by striking out certain clauses. The effect of those clauses I understand to be to recommend to the President of the United States the appointment of General Grant as lieutenant general, and to confer upon the lieutenant general made under the bill the chief command of the Army. Such I understand to be the effect of these clauses. It is moved to strike them out. Senators say it will not do to put such a recommendation in the bill; it is dictation to the President; and yet the House of Representatives, the immediate representatives of the people, by an immense majority have expressed such a wish. The people themselves throughout the whole country, in every fiber of them, have made known such a wish; and Senators say, speaking individually, that there is but one man who can fill the place, and that is General Grant. They put all these declarations in the Globe; they make them over and over again; but they say, do not put the same language in the bill, because that is dictation to the President!

I cannot so understand it for my life. When the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Military Committee, stands in his place here and calls upon the Senate to strike out this recommendation of General Grant from the bill, but still says that the country demands of the President the appointment of General Grant, I do not see why he does not dictate to the President just as much as if he said no such thing but let the question be taken on the bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives and contented himself with saying simply "ay" to the passage of that bill. I do not think that would be any more dictation than the declaration we have heard out of the mouth of almost every Senator who has spoken here.

Mr. President, I indicated the other day a purpose to vote for this bill. I want to have some reason for voting for it. As it came from the House of Representatives I thought I had a good reason. I thought that as it came from the House of Representatives the bill said to the President: "We, the representatives of the people, are willing to create anew the grade of lieutenant general, not upon condition, but for the reason that we want that authority conferred on one man who has shown himself capable of it." For that reason I was willing to go for the bill, and I do not want to go for it for any other reason; I do not want to get rid of the additional money that will go into the pocket of whoever may be named lieutenant general. There are other methods of getting rid of it. We can vote it to ourselves as we did last year, and that would suit me better, although I did not vote for that. There are other methods of getting rid of all the surplus money you have in the Treasury.

Now, when it comes to the matter of authority which this bill proposes to confer, there is none about it. It does not propose to confer any additional authority on anybody. The President without this bill can confer all the authority that this bill proposes to give to the lieutenant general upon any general officer that he pleases, and it is conferred to-day upon one, and has been ever since this war commenced conferred upon some one. What other purpose then have we for voting for this bill if we do not couple with it a request that the authority, the rank, the pay should be conferred upon that one individual whom the Senator from Massachusetts, whom almost all Senators, whom almost all Representatives, whom almost the whole country say has shown himself to be fitted for it?

But the Senator from Maryland said that unless we adopted these amendments, the passage of the bill would be a direct reflection upon General Halleck, the present General-in-Chief of the Army. Tell me how, sir. What reflection the passage of the bill with that recommendation in it would be upon the present General-in-Chief any more than the passage of the bill without that language in it and accompanied by the speeches and declarations that have been made on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the other House, I cannot understand for my life.

For my single self, sir, allow me to say I am not here to attack General Halleck or to attack any other general. I never have spent a day's labor since I have been a representative of the people in any such business. When any servant of the people of the United States does his duty well, I thank him. When he does not, I am sorry for it; I never felt that I could make him do his business better or come nearer to the discharge of his duty by standing here in my place and howling at him; and I have spent no part of my time in any such employment as that, and I am not here to attack General Halleck.

There is another reason, a constitutional reason, why I do not spend any portion of my time in attacking generals and Secretaries and subordinates. There is this reason why I do not attack the General-in-Chief, the general of a corps, or the general of a brigade: they are only responsible for doing the best they can, for achieving such results as they are capable of, and as the means placed in their power will enable them to achieve; and whether such a battle was lost through the fault of a brigade or of a brigadier, or such a campaign was disastrous through the fault of the General-in-Chief, or the general in command, or the Commander-in-Chief, these are questions which I seldom allow myself to reflect upon, never to discuss in the Senate or elsewhere.

I am only prepared to say that there has been one mistake made from the commencement of this war. I know of but one mistake that has been made since the commencement of this war, and that is that we have allowed about two and a half millions I think of genuine rebels and about two and a half million semi-rebels within our own territories and jurisdiction, with twenty-six million loyal people at our bidding and our command, with unlimited resources of money and of men; I say we have allowed this insignificant force of treason to lie here confronting us from May, 1861, to the present time. That is the only mistake I know of. That I am prepared to say ought not to have been and need not have been; but whether the Commander-in-Chief or General Scott or General Halleck or you and I are to be held responsible for it, I am not prepared just now to say. I do say it ought not to have been, and it need not have been. We owed it, Mr. President, to our belief, to our faith that the people are capable of self-government; we owed it to that fundamental doctrine on which our institutions stand, the doctrine of human equality, the doctrine that one man is as good as another, to have shown that twenty-six million were not merely stronger than five million but that they were capable of riding over and riding down five million at once and forever. That ought to have been done; and your flag, upheld by such vast numbers, and such vast loyalty, and such unquestionable valor, ought never to have been compelled to waver on a single field.

So, sir, you see I waive every disposition to find fault with this general or that; but I do recognize the fact which almost every one here has spoken of freely, that one general who has filled very important commands almost from the commencement of this war has been most uniformly successful; that portion of the public resources which has been placed in his hands has produced results the most beneficent and the most important. I am disposed to put the resources of the nation into his hands, to let him marshal for a few months the people of the United States, and see what will come of that. He may fail us. He may not be equal to this vast command. I cannot say. He has been found very faithful and successful over a few things. I was disposed to vote for the bill as it came from the House of Representatives and make him ruler over a great many—the whole lot.

That is the only reason I have for voting for it, and if you strike out this recommendation I have no reason for voting for the bill, and I shall not vote for it, for then you confer upon the President simply the authority to make a lieutenant general. I do not want a lieutenant general for any purpose except to exercise this command. He can give this command to General Grant to-day, if he pleases. He does give it to General Halleck. Gentlemen assume here upon the floor that if you authorize the rank of lieutenant general to be given to any one, he will give it to General Grant. Why should he? Why should he give the chief command, with the rank of lieutenant general, to General Grant, when he gives the chief command without the rank of lieutenant general to another officer? I do not know that he would not do it; I certainly think he would do it; but I do certainly know that there is no dictation in asking him to do what we all think ought to be done, and which every one concedes he wishes to have done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the condition of the Senate and the vacant seats show very well that every Senator has made up his mind pretty much on this question, and that debate is entirely useless about it; and therefore what I have to say I say merely for the purpose of defending myself against an inference that may be drawn from what has been said by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, and intimated by some other Senators; and that is that every Senator who dares to vote for the recommendations of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on Military Affairs themselves in pressing these amendments, are guilty of a desire to detract something from the honor that is due to General Grant, and must stand before the people as being willing to withhold from him the high credit and honor that is due to him; for that is clearly the inference to be drawn from the speech of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire.

Now, sir, I propose to support by my vote the recommendations of the Committee on Military Affairs; and if these recommendations are adopted I propose to vote for the bill creating the office of lieutenant general; and I wish to say, sir, that instead of desiring to detract anything from the honor that I am willing to bestow upon General Grant, if he is to be the man—and that is taken for granted; there is no dispute about it—I do it for this, among other reasons, that I wish not to deprive him of the honor that he will receive from the nomination in case it shall be conferred upon him. I wish to add to what has been said in the Senate and in the other House in regard to him, the free selection of the Chief Magistrate and the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, of him as the man, his judgment exercised upon it without dictation and without advice, at least without any advice contained on the face of the bill.

Sir, I think it would be detracting from that honor, if it is to be conferred by the Chief Magistrate upon him, that we should undertake in the bill to advise him about what we wish, and add the weight of popular sentiment, if it is popular sentiment, to the honor which is proposed to be conferred.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. The question I wish to ask is if, in the judgment of the Senator from Maine, the appointment of lieutenant general conferred by the President would be any credit to the individual if it was against the sentiment of the people of the United States?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would very much diminish its value; but I take it everybody assumes that there is no dispute about that point here; it has been indicated in the other House; gentlemen propose to indicate it here; but it must be understood and presumed that the President of the United States, being Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, ought to know who has rendered the most distinguished services and who is the most fit man to fill this great place; and when the President of the United States, under an act of Congress leaving him free to judge and to select the individual, says that he has learned from his position that that is the man, it is a double honor to him that he is thus selected.

Now, sir, while it might have been very well for the House of Representatives in its enthusiasm to name the man, there is, in my judgment, a very great impropriety in our doing so. I have so considered it from the beginning. Sir, we are Senators—

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will allow me to suggest that the bill, when it was introduced originally and when it was reported, did not name the man.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that, and I was saying that while it might be excusable in the enthusiasm of the moment for the House of Representatives to do what it has done in this instance, it will not be so excusable in us. And why? For the simple reason that we are yet to act as judges on whatever nomination may be made. This office cannot be conferred until the nomination of the President shall be confirmed by us. We are to act upon it judicially. Is there any propriety in us, when we pass an act of Congress authorizing the appointment of an officer, upon whose appointment we are ourselves to act as judges, saying beforehand that we are prepared to advise that A, B, or C should be no nominated and his name sent to us for confirmation? I consider that there is a gross impropriety in our attempting to do any such thing.

Let me illustrate it by a case where I think all will see the impropriety. Suppose that we were passing an appropriation bill to-day, and in that should make an appropriation for a new minister abroad, a minister plenipotentiary to some foreign court where we have none now, and it were proposed to add to it that Congress recommend that Mr. Jones, or Mr. Smith, or somebody else be appointed to that office; no matter how distinguished the individual might be, I take it the Senate would see in an instant that it would be grossly improper and contrary to all precedent and rule for us to attempt to do such a thing. Standing, as we do, as advisers of the President after the nomination is made, it would certainly be improper for us to attempt to advise beforehand. This is the main view which I have in regard to this matter, and therefore I have been from the beginning in favor of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, sir, let me say a word or two more. Gentlemen have talked about an "empty honor" to General Grant. There is something in this, I take it, besides an honor to General Grant. I do not intend to vote upon the bill before the Senate merely on the ground of conferring an honor upon an individual. If I vote for it at all, as I hope I may be able to do, it will be because, among other reasons, I think the public interests require that the office be created. Why do I think so? I have come to the conclusion that it would be well to have a military man of distinguished reputation, who has the confidence of the country, in command. It is true that it may be answered that the President has the power now to create precisely such an officer; that is, to appoint somebody to command all our armies. That is true; but I may possibly be of opinion that the President does not mean to exercise that power; and I may possibly be of opinion that it is worth while to jog him a little upon that point to put somebody in command, not to be independent of him, but in the multitude of his duties to relieve him of the necessity he is now under to do the military thinking of the country as well as the civil. I may have come to the conclusion that it will do no harm to have such an officer, who, although subject to the President, liable to be removed by him, controlled by him, as he should be by the Constitution, yet may act for himself, not independently of the President, but independently until he is controlled or directed otherwise. It may be well to have some general whose mind may be called upon to overlook the whole field of operations in the whole country, and a distinguished military man for that purpose. If I have come to that conclusion, then it would inevitably follow, perhaps, that I should think it my duty to vote for the appointment of such an officer.

Is it an empty honor? My friend from California said something about his being unwilling to confer an empty honor upon General Grant. Why, sir, is it an empty honor to confer upon a man like him, distinguished as he is, who when he was originally in the Army I believe was not there long enough to get higher than the grade of lieutenant, and who has now been in service between two and three years; is it an empty honor to say that that man has so distinguished himself in the course of three years that we make him the first military officer in the country over all other major generals and all our armies, conferring upon him at the same time a pay amounting I believe in the whole to some twelve or thirteen thousand dollars a year for life—vastly better and greater, take it as a whole, than is conferred upon the President or anybody else—over all and every one so far as pecuniary recompense is concerned, and placing that man at an early age of life, too, in a position where from necessity, so long as he conducts himself well, he has the control of all the military operations of the country, unless the President for good reasons should see fit to deprive him of it?

Do gentlemen call that an empty honor? If it is, it is an empty honor that many men of the greatest attainments in any sphere of life would be very glad to attain. No, sir; this talk about an empty honor is merely that gentlemen may put into the bill, what? Nothing that adds to his power, but may say in the bill that he shall have the power. I look upon it in the first place as a new precedent, which I am never in favor of establishing unless there is a necessity for it. I appeal to my friend from California on that point, and it is the reason I asked him the questions I did. "Do you propose to make the lieutenant general, whoever he may be, independent of the President?" "No." "Do you not hold that when he is made lieutenant general he has from necessity the command of the armies of the United States, being the first officer, and having no superior?" "I do hold so." Very well, then, why do you want to say in the bill that he shall have command of the armies of the United States? Of what benefit is it? You do not want to effect anything by it. Why then embarrass it? Why not put the matter on its simple ground, such as it has been put upon before? We authorize the President of the United States to appoint, subject to our confirmation, a lieutenant general of the Army, and we know that when that power is exercised that lieutenant general will be at the head of the Army, and at the head of all the military operations of all the armies, subject merely to the constitutional Commander-in-Chief. Is not that enough? And when the President says to us, as he will say unquestionably, "I consider that General Ulysses S. Grant is the man of all others, from his great services, to be placed in this exalted position," and when we as we shall unquestionably unanimously say "ay" to that and confirm him, have we not given him a position such as any man living or who ever lived might well be proud of, without putting his name in our bill originally, and thus saying to the President, "Sir, we cannot trust you to act on this matter unless we hint to you that we want such a man appointed?"

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to explain? Does the Senator understand me to be in favor of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, indicating to the President whom he shall appoint?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all. I understand that the honorable Senator is not, but I understand that he is in favor of putting it on record that this lieutenant general shall have command of the armies, which is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. CONNESS. I had the honor to propose an amendment which is not under consideration now. I would not offer the amendment if these amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs were voted down, not adopted. In that event I do not intend to offer my amendment; but if these amendments be adopted, then I think I can show the honorable Senator from Maine that there is some propriety in adopting my amendment, but I do not understand it now to be under consideration.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not under consideration now, but I was addressing myself to him and to that particular branch of the subject. It has been once substantially struck out of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Permit me again with the Senator's leave to say that I agree with him in nearly all that he has said, and that in calling the rank and title an empty compliment, I but in part adopted the language of the honorable Senator from Ohio, or at least took issue with that language. As I understood him to contend that it was a compliment due to General Grant, and that as a compliment we should confer it, I meant to be understood to say, and I wish the Senator from Maine to understand me as occupying that position, that I would do nothing more than has already been done by Congress in the way of offering compliment, but I would do now what is proposed in this bill with the amendments offered by the Committee on Military Affairs for its uses and benefits to the country, and not as a compliment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What I said in reference to my honorable friend's proposed amendment was rather to save myself the trouble which I supposed I might have of saying it by and by when it was offered, and seeing if I could not convince him that all the object he desires to accomplish by it will in fact be accomplished by the bill as it stands after adopting the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg to say to the Senator that it is not my purpose to undertake to discuss my amendment when it shall be proposed. I will have it reported from the desk, and if the Senate do not consider that it is necessary to be adopted, let it be voted down.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not intend to extend my remarks. As I said, I rose simply to defend myself from what might be an inference drawn from the remarks of my honorable friend from New Hampshire. I cannot consent to be placed in the category before the country, because I vote for the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs, of being disposed for a moment to detract anything from any honor that is proposed to be conferred on General Grant or any other distinguished officer before the country.

But, sir, upon all these matters we must act after all with reference to our own judgment of what is right and proper. As I have stated before in the course of my remarks, I cannot see that anything is to be added, by those parts of the bill which the committee propose to strike out, to the honor that will result to General Grant if he is to be appointed to this office; but, on the contrary, in my judgment that honor would rather be lessened by the impression that is to go abroad, that we, the Congress, deem it necessary to name the man, for fear that after all he may not be selected, that there is somebody else who stands on a par with him. Besides, I cannot deem it to be proper in any way, so far as I am concerned, to say beforehand that I will vote for the confirmation of any particular man. All things are possible; and now suppose before this nomination shall come in to us, or after it shall have come in, before we have acted upon it, some very great disaster should happen to our armies commanded by General Grant, some terrible disaster for which perhaps he might not be responsible, should we not deem it our duty in such a case to wait and inquire whether on the whole it was advisable to confirm such a nomination? Unquestionably we should. I mention this to illustrate the impropriety, in my judgment, of the Senate of the United States, being the advisers of the President, saying in any case beforehand whom they would select for an office upon the nomination to which they themselves are to act. That is the position which I assume with regard to that point.

Now, sir, in regard to General Grant himself, for fear that I may be misunderstood in any sense, I will say that, in my judgment, if I had the selection to-day I would select him unquestionably before any one in the country; he would have my vote and my voice, because I believe that of all others he has most distinguished himself. Whether it is owing to great ability or to great good fortune, I cannot say. At any rate he has been successful, and in military matters success is the great test of merit in the first instance. And in the next place, from all I have heard of him, I believe that he is a man of high moral qualities; that he not only has physical courage but moral courage; that if he had been at Antietam he would have followed the retreating army at once and demolished it; that if he had been at Gettysburg the army of Lee never would have crossed the river, because he would not have consulted those about him and agreed with them contrary to his own opinion; he would have acted, he would have taken the responsibility. The great danger we have been in, the great trouble we have suffered in this country, in my judgment, is that a great many of our military men have asked themselves the question how misfortune was to affect them, and whether in case they did not succeed it would not ruin them individually. If they had taken their lives, and their reputations as well as their lives, in their hands, and said, "This thing ought to be done, and I will do it though I perish," we should have accomplished vastly more than we have accomplished with men who have stood waiting and inquiring, wondering whether they could succeed, and judging that if they did not succeed there would be an end of them.

Sir, in my judgment we want some man at the head of all the armies of the United States who has moral power as well as physical courage and military ability. We want somebody who will correct abuses. I believe myself that of all the men who have appeared General Grant has given the strongest indications of being that man. Still, we do not know what he may be after all. He undoubtedly is the man before the public at the present time, undoubtedly the man we should all select; but for the sake of selecting him and piling honors on him so thick that perhaps we shall be afraid to hunt for him for fear we should not find him after we have covered him over so deeply, I have no idea of breaking down what I conceive to be the true, dignified rule of action of the Senate; and that is, not to act as if we were in town meeting, and afraid we should be outvoted, but to look at things deliberately, calmly, and act with the dignity that becomes us.

Mr. HALE. I rise simply to ask for justice at the hands of the Senator who has just sat down. He commenced his speech by speaking of the impeachment of motive; and he said that it had been said directly by the Senator from New Hampshire, and intimated by others. I know the Senator is an impulsive man—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all; I am the coolest man in the world.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I said nothing of the sort, and I not only did not say it, but I disclaimed saying it; and it seems a little ungenerous to say that while others had intimated, I had said directly that which I said I would not say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I might have misunderstood my friend. My friend is always so very eloquent that I do get confused when he speaks, frequently. [Laughter.] No doubt about that; but I will say to him, that to reiterate, to say over and over again that he did not wish to throw any imputation upon General Grant by striking this out, he did not wish to belittle him by adopting the amendment proposed by the committee—I state substantially the idea, I cannot use the Senator's language—and then to disclaim any imputation upon anybody, (while I do not suppose for an instant he meant to impute any wrong motives,) the necessary inference would be that every man who voted to adopt the amendment of the Military Committee did so from a desire to detract something from the honors due to General Grant.

Mr. CONNESS. I understood the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to say more than that, in addition that they must be covert enemies of the President and not in favor of him. That is what I understood him to say. Was I right?

Mr. HALE. I cannot give myself the credit of being eloquent if I fail to make myself understood. I will repeat now what I did say: I said that if I was anywhere else except in this high council of the nation where it was supposed every man said what he meant, and where I believed he said exactly what he meant, I might have supposed that such and such things were intended, but under those circumstances it could not be. That is what I said.

Mr. CONNESS. I take it for granted that the honorable Senator simply meant to make the opening campaign speech of the presidential contest.

Mr. JOHNSON. Being one of those, Mr. President, who were in favor of the amendments suggested by the Military Committee, I wish to clear myself from what I certainly understood to be an imputation (although not intended because disclaimed) that fell from the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not know what he may really think; but thinking as I do of public opinion upon all such questions I cannot help believing that the public will suppose from what the Senator said that the members of this body who vote against the bill as it came from the House of Representatives had some other purpose. The Senator told you that if he had been anywhere else where this subject was pending, and the members who might be present at any such meeting took the course taken by members of the Senate, he should have no hesitation in saying that that course had been adopted from some sinister motive. He only disclaimed the suggestion that any such idea could influence individual Senators, because they were in this body and members of this body. But he, I am sure, is not so blind to public opinion—he is always alive to it—as not at least to think it very probable that the public will believe that in such matters there is no difference between the Senate and any other citizens of the United States, no matter how assembled, and they will come to the conclusion that although the Senator disclaimed, (and we who know his frankness know that the disclaimer was made in good faith,) really did not believe in his own disclaimer.

And he went further, Mr. President, which strengthened what I suppose the public will consider an imputation on the members of the Senate who differ from him; he went further and told us that, although we adopt the amendment proposed by the Military Committee and express our willingness to pass this honor upon General Grant, until it shall be made in his view comparatively unimportant, the public will take possession of this officer in spite of the Senate and elevate him to the highest office in the gift of the people of the United States.

I only rose for the purpose of saying, Mr. President, that that imputation, as far as I am concerned, is wholly unfounded. I mean the imputation that the public will draw and that the honorable member himself would draw if he and I were disputing this matter anywhere else than in this Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to strike out all of the first section after the word "ability," in the eleventh line.

Mr. CARLILE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to hear the words proposed to be stricken out read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

And who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States; and that we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant, of Illinois, for the position of lieutenant general.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, I shall sustain this bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives. I have listened to the debate here to-day, and judging from the speeches that have been made I should infer that it was the opinion of this Senate that General Halleck should be the man to be appointed rather than General Grant. As I believe General Grant is a much better general than General Halleck, and that he would make a much better commander-in-chief of the Army, I am willing to express it in the terms in which this bill comes to us.

Sir, General Grant does not want honor conferred upon him by the President of the United States merely for the purpose of having honors conferred upon him. He has won enough of them. The glory that he has achieved in the several campaigns which he has conducted has won for General Grant greater honors than can be given to him by the passage of this bill. But, sir, I want a man at the head of our armies who will be able to insure victory, to inaugurate victory, and to bring victory with the army of the Potomac as well as with the western army.

I believe that this army of the Potomac is just as good an army as the army of the West. In some particulars, I am inclined to think it is a better army than the army of the West; but there is one particular in which it falls far short of the army of the West. The western army has had a man at its head who has made that army a unit. There is not a traitor nor a disloyal man in it. There is not a person connected with that army from General Grant down to the boy who drives a wagon, that is not devotedly attached to this Union and in favor of striking the rebellion the hardest and heaviest blows they can hit. I do not think that is the case with the army of the Potomac. I believe that one great cause of the defeat—not the defeat, for this army has never been whipped and never can be, in my judgment—but one great cause of the want of success in this army has been that it has not had a head and a leader. It did have one for a little time, but General Halleck would not allow him long to remain in that position. Why, sir, when General Hooker was at the head of that army, leading it against General Lee at Gettysburg, he called upon the commander-in-chief, General Halleck, who, the Senator from Maryland thinks, is altogether the ablest man for this place in the United States, to give him the command of General French's corps at Harper's Ferry. It was refused him right on the eve of a battle, and then General Hooker said, "If I cannot command these men, I do not think it is best that I should lead this army into battle," whereupon he was relieved, and those men were given to General Meade in three days afterwards and joined his army and became part of the forces which he led to battle.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or the Senator from Maryland or anybody else may eulogize the General-in-Chief of our Army who does these things; but, in my humble judgment, the country requires that there should be another and a better man at the head of our armies; and that is the reason why I am in favor of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. The Senator from Massachusetts stated in his speech that great wrong and injustice had been done to General Halleck. Who ever did him wrong? What great service has he rendered the United States in this great struggle that should place him over the gallant generals who have led our men to battle and to victory? I think he has been more highly honored than any man in this nation. I think he has received greater rewards for the services he has rendered than any other man in the nation.

I do not think the Senate need hesitate in regard to expressing an opinion to the President of the United States as to what they think he ought to do. I do not think there is any indecency about this matter at all. It was but this morning that I took up a newspaper and read that General Sherman, under the direction of General Grant, had marched a force directly into the very heart of the South, and the people around here hardly knew that any such campaign was inaugurated. They have already advanced one hundred and fifty miles. Why does not the army of the Potomac advance? It is not because it is not composed of as brave men as those whom General Sherman is leading to-day into the very heart of the southern States, but it is because there is not a man here to inaugurate such campaigns and to select leaders that are competent and able to lead our troops to victory.

An allusion was made here by some Senator in the debate in regard to the failure of General Meade after he fought the battle of Gettysburg, when he marched his troops down to the Potomac river, that there was a bare possibility that General Meade might have been whipped if he had attacked General Lee at that time and at that place. Why, sir, it was no longer ago than yesterday I was sitting upon a horse with General Pleasanton when the second corps of that army was being marched in review, and General Pleasanton made this remark, and I believe it is true, "Although this army has not been always successful, it cannot be whipped;" and I do not believe it can be. The difficulty is that our generals do not have the confidence in that army that they ought to have. They are not possessed with the same patriotism that stirs the bosoms of the soldiers who are fighting in the army of the Potomac.

Mr. HALE. Why do you not speak of the army of the West?

Mr. WILKINSON. I need not speak of the army of the West because their deeds speak for them; their victories speak for them. The soldiers of the West need no eulogist in the Senate of the United States. Let anybody who wishes to know what they have done search the record and look at the territory they have conquered, and which they hold to-day. I think it is a burning and everlasting shame that the brave soldiers from Massachusetts cannot have the same privilege and the same opportunity to win victory and glory that has been the fortune of our western troops. The reason is that they have not had a leader.

A general in the army of the Potomac told me the other day that he had a letter from General Hooker in which General Hooker gave his reasons for believing that the army of the West was a better army than the army of the Potomac; not that the troops were any better, for in very many particulars he thought they were not as good; but, said he, the army of the West is a unit; there is not a bad man in it; there is not a disloyal man in it; there is not a selfish man in it. Whenever that army moves, it moves as a solid body with one mind, with one heart, and with one impulse, to put down and to crush this rebellion. The general told me that General Hooker said in his letter that the want of that unity was the reason why the army of the Potomac had not been more successful.

Sir, there have been a great many men connected with this army of the Potomac who believe that it is very wrong to meddle with the peculiar institution of slavery, and pro-slavery Democrats and old hunker Democrats, of whom the General-in-Chief is one, have had the control of this army. They have not demoralized the soldiery because their hearts were too patriotic to be affected in that way, but they have corrupted many of the officers in that army. I want to pass this bill just as it came from the House of Representatives for the purpose of putting a man at the head of it who has the ability, who has the will, who has the power over men to strike down any man, be he a corps commander or a division commander or a brigade commander or the commander of a regiment, who does not move straight on under the command of his leader, being moved and guided by the patriotic impulse which actuates the general in command.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Minnesota comments upon the remark of mine that I thought the public voice of the country had done injustice to General Halleck. He calls that eulogizing General Halleck. I am not here to pronounce eulogies upon General Halleck or any other general in the service; but I repeat what I said to the Senator from Minnesota, that I think there has been injustice done by the press and by the hasty judgment of the country to General Halleck and to many other generals. General Halleck is a man of unquestioned capacity and great intelligence, and I doubt not devoted to the interests of the country. I entertain no question in regard to his talent, in regard to his intelligence, or in regard to his devotion to the country. I think there are other generals better fitted to direct and command armies in the field than General Halleck. That is my judgment. What I meant to say was simply this, that in the time in which we live, in the sharp contests we have had, in the misfortunes that have sometimes come upon us, the public press of the country, the public sentiment of the country, and the public men of the country are apt to do injustice to the actors in the scenes through which we are passing. We all see and all feel this to be so. The sharp contests of the past few years, the mighty struggles of the present, the treacheries and treasons that darken our time, tend to make us, the actors in these transcendent events, distrustful and impatient, critical and unjust.

Sir, all our misfortunes have not come upon us on account of the management of General Halleck. Misfortunes came upon us before he was placed in the position he now holds. He has made mistakes. I know he has made mistakes. The Secretary of War, with all his titanic energy and zeal for the public service, and his incorruptible integrity, with all the talent he has brought to bear to correct abuses and to make our armies what they are to-day, infinitely superior to what they were at any other period in the history of the country, has made mistakes. The nation owes a debt of gratitude to the Secretary of War; generations will pass away before it is paid; and yet the public press of the country and the public voice of the country often cry out, "Crucify him." I know that the President of the United States, with as sincere a devotion as ever actuated a patriot in any country or in any age, has made mistakes. Who has not? Sir, we have made mistakes here in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. I have made mistakes, and I see and acknowledge them. I believe that with all our earnestness and all our devotion to the country in the great contest through which we are passing, we have not always fully comprehended our condition and realized our duty clearly. We have all of us, who have been in the service of the country, made more or less mistakes. But, sir, instead of arraigning military men or men in civil capacities, I think our duty should be to give all credit to every man who gives his heart and his hopes, all he is and all he hopes to be, to the service of the country. And, sir, if he makes mistakes, as we all have made and shall continue to make mistakes in the future, patriotism demands that we shall forget and forgive errors, and remember only the devotion to the endangered country.

Sir, we all agree who shall be lieutenant general. There is no division here among us; not a divided voice in either House of Congress. If we pass this resolution, we know who is to be sent here as lieutenant general. Nobody questions that.

The Senator from Minnesota refers to the army of the Potomac, to the mistakes made there. We know something of the errors of the past, and we know something of the bad influences that have been at work in that army. We now see clearly that the only statesmen of the war are anti-slavery men, and the only generals in this war worthy to lead men are generals who have become anti-slavery; and that will be the verdict of the future. In other times, when this contest is studied, comprehended, the judgment will be that the only men who comprehended our condition, who were the real statesmen and the true soldiers of the war, were the men who knew what the war was about, who made it, and what was the cause of it, and who were in favor of destroying the sole cause of this war among countrymen of the same tongue and race.

The Senator says that the army of the West has got clear of the doubting men. I think that the army of the West has made more rapid progress in the right direction than has the army of the Potomac. I know that many of the men who entered this contest with false views learned in the school of submission to the demands of slavery have been changed—changed almost as suddenly as St. Paul was changed. They have grown in this contest; they are now powers in the land, and I hail, welcome, and honor them. But, sir, the same is now true to a great extent with the army of the Potomac. Nearly all its officers and the great mass of its soldiers have learned what this war is about; they know who made it; they know why it was made; they know the cause of it; and they are in favor of trampling it out and stamping it out with the iron heel of war.

Sir, there is another deduction that ought to be made whenever we speak of the contests of the army of the Potomac with the army of General Lee; and that is, that the best army of the rebellion, led by their best general, has stood and now stands front to front with the army of the Potomac. The army of the Potomac has not had to deal with raw troops. They have always had to fight on the soil of Virginia or of Maryland or of Pennsylvania with the veteran army of the rebellion, the army that carries the flag of the rebellion. That is a consideration that should always be remembered if we desire to do justice to the generalship or to the valor of the army of the Potomac. I believe that army is a noble army, and that it is generally well officered. That there are some men in it unfit for high commands, I believe, and the same remark is true of the other armies. There are many generals in the service unfit to lead great armies, but good brigade, division, and corps commanders. Our armies are now generally well officered from generals down to subalterns, and the armies are in splendid condition, much superior to their condition at any other period of our history. The spring campaign is now opening; and although the rebels may have some advantages of climate and of earlier preparation, I have undoubting faith that we are to triumph, and that the coming year is to crush out forever the military power of the rebellion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Doolittle, Hale, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wade, and Wilkinson—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. Now I desire to have the amendment I proposed read together with the section as it will stand if amended.

The Secretary read the amendment, in line seven, section one, after the words "lieutenant general," to insert the words, "who shall be commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, under the direction of the President, and who shall remain in chief command during the pleasure of the President;" so that the section will read:

That the grade of lieutenant general be, and the same is hereby, revived in the Army of the United States; and the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a lieutenant general, who shall be commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, under the direction of the President, and who shall remain in chief command during the pleasure of the President, to be selected; &c.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on this amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Hale, Howe, Ramsey, Sherman, Wade, and Wilkinson—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time; and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. It was my purpose to have given a silent vote on the passage of this bill, and I should have done so if the yeas and nays had not been called. I shall vote against the bill, and I will in a few words state the grounds upon which I intend to do so.

If I could be made to believe that the passage of this bill and the reviving of the grade of lieutenant general would be of any service whatever to the armies of the United States in their operations, I should certainly vote in favor of it; but it strikes me that the movement is more political than military, and that the effect of it will be to produce rather confusion in the administration of our military matters than to give them simplicity and efficiency. It seems to be conceded that the President of the United States has the power, as I suppose he undoubtedly has, to order any officer whatever, of any grade, to take the active, positive command. It seems furthermore to be conceded that according to usage or law the General-in-Chief next to the President is the highest military commander. Some gentlemen suppose that if this grade of lieutenant general is established by the passage of this bill it will make whoever may become the lieutenant general the commander over the General-in-Chief. I am not prepared to say whether according to statutory law or military usage such would be the result. I am not informed in relation to military matters and the grade which different commanders assume actually and positively in the Army; but it would leave the President certainly in possession of the power, if he chose to exercise it, to decide that the present General-in-Chief should be the commander of the lieutenant general.

Some gentlemen say that the object of this bill is to quicken the President in relation to that matter, to prick him on to the appointment of some more competent man to the office of lieutenant general than the present General-in-Chief, and who may take rank and command over the General-in-Chief. In that point of view, it seems to me to be an improper sort of indirection in the proceedings of the Senate. It has not that frankness and openness which, according to my judgment, all the action of the Senate in relation to the President or in relation to the Commander-in-Chief of our armies and navies ought to have. I think if he was to act with due dignity and self-respect he would totally disregard any suggestions or monitions or intimations that the Senate might give him in relation to this matter; that if he thinks the creation of the office advisable, and that it would result to the public good and to the efficiency of the Army, he should give the measure his approbation; and after it had become the law appoint whom he pleased to fill the office of lieutenant general. Certainly he ought to do so.

But, sir, I apprehend that the creation of this office will have the effect of producing some confusion in relation to the administration of the military affairs of the country between the lieutenant general and the General-in-Chief, in which probably the President may be brought to act a part. Therefore, upon that ground I would vote against the bill.

But I intend to vote against it upon other grounds. I have a high opinion of the military capacity of General Grant, but not that exalted one which some Senators have avowed. From the time of the capture of the Post of Arkansas by his army to the present, I think all his military operations have been eminently successful, and have been characterized by ability, courage, and fortitude. Previous to that time I think his military career was a failure. But, sir, we are not through with this war yet. There is a great deal still to be done to bring it to a successful close—enough to tax, I think, all the ability of all our military commanders and all the courage and endurance of our soldiery. We are not yet out of the woods, to use a common phrase. General Grant has not achieved his whole work. He is about to enter upon a new field of operations comparatively to him, and what will be the amount and measure of his success nobody can conjecture. I believe that it will be attended with success, and probably with signal success; but I do not feel enough assurance of those results to create for him the high office of lieutenant general, which, in my judgment, ought to be instituted only after the war is over, and then as a reward to crown the services and the genius of the best general that has appeared in the course of the war.

General Grant may fail. It is possible that he may fail in the coming campaign. He may not be able to sustain that just fame which he has won since his campaign up the Arkansas river, and especially the great campaign which he made preceding the battle of Vicksburg and in the capture of that stronghold itself. I think that in that campaign and in the series of battles that preceded the surrender of Vicksburg, he displayed very great military capacity, and a stubbornness and firmness of courage and of purpose, and fortitude as a soldier and a commander, and a singleness of devotion to his field of operations and to his profession, that are in the highest degree honorable to him. I hope and believe that he will be able to sustain this just and high fame which he has won; but he may fail in doing so. He may not be able to sustain it. If so, and he should make any mistakes, or any signal failures, it would not look very apposite and becoming that he should be the recipient of this grade of lieutenant general, which in my opinion ought to be the crowning honor and glory of the first military man that the country will bring forth.

If it added anything to his capacity, to his courage and resources, to the valor and endurance of his armies, if it promised to do any good whatever, to make our military operations more effective and successful, and above all to bring them to a speedy and brilliant close—for that is the great consummation which I desire from my heart of hearts—if these fruits would in any degree be more apt to result from the creation of this office and the appointment of General Grant to it, I should give what little influence I have to the measure; and then I would rejoice that the office had been created and that General Grant had been called upon to fill it. But, sir, believing that the passage of this bill, the creation of this office, and the installation of General Grant in it will effect nothing whatever material to the success of the operations of the Army; that the step is premature; that, in addition to that, it may result in a clashing of authority between him and the present General-in-Chief, and may also embarrass the President of the United States in some decisions of contested authority and rank between the two officers, and in other points of view, I feel constrained to vote against the bill. I have merely stated the grounds upon which I intend to give my vote, having desired that the vote should not be taken by yeas and nays, and that I might be enabled to give a silent vote upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Harding, Powell, Saulsbury, and Wright—6.

So the bill was passed.

ARMING OF KANSAS MILITIA.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to the Senate the reasons that have heretofore prevented the arming of the militia of the State of Kansas.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 125, to encourage immigration, with a view to have it come up as the unfinished business to-morrow morning. I do not think it will take long to dispose of it.

Mr. WILSON. I wish the Senator would give way to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is anything special I will do so.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to take up the joint resolution in regard to the pay of colored troops to-morrow, and dispose of it. It is very important to have action upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not interpose any objection to that, and will give way for that purpose; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this bill to encourage immigration. I wish to give notice that I shall call it up at an early day. I do not suppose it will take much time to dispose of it.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the joint resolution to equalize the pay of troops in the United States Army.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to having that resolution taken up and voted upon to-morrow, but I simply rise to notify the Senate that I shall deem it my duty, as soon as that resolution is disposed of, at an early hour to-morrow, to move to go into executive session. There are some matters that ought to be attended to at once in executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. POWELL. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment to allow me to have a bill taken up with a view of making it a special order.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I withdraw it.

Mr. POWELL. I move to take up the bill to prevent officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States interfering in elections in the States, for the purpose of making it the special order for some day next week. Any day next week that will suit the Senate will be satisfactory to me.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States.

Mr. POWELL. I now move that it be made the special order for Thursday of next week, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I now renew my motion for an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MASONIC HALL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BENNET, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for a charter of a Masonic Hall Association; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

NEW CONSULATES, ETC.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, laid before the House executive communications addressed to him in regard to an amendment to the laws on the subject of the administration of oaths to the owners of goods, wares, and merchandise liable to entry; and in regard to the establishment of new consulates in Canada; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FIRE IN GLOUCESTER.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a statement, which I know the House will be willing to hear, and on which I think they will be glad to take such action as I shall propose.

Mr. COX. What is it about? We may be involved in a protracted debate.

Mr. ALLEY. It is a matter connected with the recent fire in Gloucester, Massachusetts; and the proposition I intend to make, if the House permits its introduction, is dictated by every consideration of justice and every feeling of humanity.

Mr. FINCK. There will be no objection if we on this side of the House are allowed to record our votes against the enrollment bill.

Mr. ALLEY. If there be the slightest objection, I will withdraw the resolution when it shall have been read.

Mr. FINCK. I do not object.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, during the severe cold weather of the last week it will be remembered that the business portion of the town of Gloucester, in the State of Massachusetts, was almost entirely consumed by fire. The internal revenue collector of that congressional district has written to the Treasury Department to allow him to suspend the collection of the taxes for internal revenue for the present from the sufferers by that fire. It will be remembered by gentlemen of the House who have seen the account of it in the newspapers, that a great many families were turned out of doors, and such a scene of desolation and suffering has scarcely ever before been witnessed in that section of the country. The Treasury Department find that they have no power to grant the request of the collector of that district, and with its approval I submit a joint resolution for the action of the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Whereas the town of Gloucester, in the State of Massachusetts, has been recently visited by a terrible destructive conflagration in which almost the whole business portion of the town was destroyed: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be authorized under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the collection of taxes for internal revenue from the sufferers by said fire in such manner and for such time as the Secretary of the Treasury shall think expedient and proper.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I do not object to the resolution; but I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to amend it so as also to exempt those who have lost their stock by the severe cold weather in the West.

Mr. COX. I hope that the resolution will be referred.

Mr. KING. I object to the resolution. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. FINCK. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the conscription bill.

Mr. SHANNON. I object.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is called for. The call for committees for reports is in order; and under that call the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs; on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, it is now about eight years since I left these Halls. The country was then in the enjoyment of its uninterrupted career of prosperity. It seemed as though at length the problem of government had been solved, and that human wisdom had produced a system which, resting upon a basis of just and equal laws for individuals, consulted with the happiest success for the rights and interests of the political communities which composed the federation. From small beginnings three quarters of a century before we had grown to greatness. From thirteen colonies, feeble and poor at best, we had become a populous and wealthy nation, a rich and powerful empire. The great nations of the world had come to look upon us with respect, with admiration, and envy. Sectional causes of difference had indeed ruffled rather too rudely the calm surface of our prosperity; but prone to trust in that signal care of Providence which had hitherto befriended us, we dismissed lightly the apprehensions of evil which they were fitted to occasion us. We took counsel too readily of our wishes, and always rested in the conclusion that the Republic must be perpetual.

Such was the state of things at the close of my representative term in 1855. I return here in the midst of a revolution. Countrymen of the same lineage are arrayed in bloody conflict. Strange and unheard-of doctrines of government are promulgated by those in possession of authority; and powers and measures unknown to the Constitution are resorted to with desperate eagerness at the call of the novel exigencies which have arisen.

The division of the country by violence has been all along foreseen by the wise among us as the consequence of causes which might have been avoided. As it is, the future inquirer into the history of the events transpiring around us will be struck with amazement at the folly and madness which could thus permit to perish, if perish it shall, a Government so admirable after an existence but little extended beyond that prescribed by the Psalmist as the maximum of individual life. The fact of our extraordinary greatness, as compared with the brief duration of our institutions, furnishes the most conclusive attestation of their unparalleled excellence. Yet this has not sufficed, when once the demon of sectionalism has been evoked, to save this noble fabric of civilization from the ruin, it may be, which has been the common fate of nations. The wisdom and foresight of the fathers have been shamed; and together with the memory of their noble struggles, sacrifices, and sufferings in the cause of independence and freedom, their counsels and warnings have been cast to oblivion. In vain the common ties of language, manners, literature, and religion, of blood and country and glory, have raised their supplicating voice for the continuance of the Union.

Nearly three years of civil war have now discharged their relentless fury upon our unhappy country; and we are yet apparently as remote from any satisfactory adjustment of our differences as when we first flew to arms. These unlucky years have seen many of the peaceful pursuits of the country broken up, its vast resources wasted in unfruitful conflict, and the members of almost every household arrayed in the sable habiliments of grief. And still the contest rages. This ill-judged rebellion still interposes its huge and fearful proportions between the present and the return of prosperity to our country. The all-important and practical question which we have to determine is, what is the policy which the exigency demands? In order to a wise consultation upon this subject it is necessary to look to the past as well as the future. What is this Government, whose existence is now in such fearful peril, and for the maintenance of which the country is yielding so lavishly of its blood and its treasure? I am convinced that it is from loose and incorrect ideas of the nature of our Government, from allowing the heats of party strife to withdraw our attention from its true character, and to confuse our sense of the duties which we owe it, that have flowed the evils from which the country is suffering. Upon a subject of such transcendent importance as this silence in a representative of the people, hesitation or concealment, would, in my judgment, be alike criminal. I shall speak, therefore, under those deep convictions of duty which the times inspire, and with that unreserved freedom and boldness which are the birthright of an American citizen.

The true character of our Government, then, will be best perceived from a glance at its formation. It is well known that the idea of a union, more or less extensive, of the British colonies, was from a very early period not an unfamiliar one with our fathers. Such a union was formed by certain of the New England colonies as early as 1643, the object being the common defense against the Indians and the Dutch of New Amsterdam. The congress which met at Albany in 1722, and included other colonies than the New England, contemplated a similar union, as did the still more important one which was called at the same place in 1754, to consult for the protection of the colonies against hostilities by the French and Indians. The projected union, however, failed through jealousies on the part of the home Government, as well as among the colonies themselves. The idea of colonial union was at length fully matured in 1774, in the first Continental Congress which met at Philadelphia, consisting of the representatives of twelve colonies. Its object, it will be remembered, was to consult for the "common welfare" against the oppressive measures and unwarrantable pretensions of the mother country. While resistance was determined upon against the claim to tax the colonies without their consent, the idea of independence had not yet found acceptance in the colonial councils. In the spirit of attachment to Great Britain, the colonies would freely have united in conceding to her the benefit of her navigation acts could she have consented to renounce the fatal claim to the right of taxation. The measures adopted by that Congress had for their object to compel her to abandon that right, and British commerce was to be renounced till she did so. Two years later, by the mad persistence of the home Government in her unjust measures, the colonies were forced into independence.

Simultaneously with that act, the Continental Congress proceeded to prepare Articles of Confederation, which should express the nature of the compact between the States, and define the powers conferred upon the Congress, as well as those reserved to the States. Notwithstanding the greatness of the common exigency, diversity of interests, local prejudices, and jealousies prevented an immediate union by Congress on such articles, and not till in March, 1781, was the ratification of these articles completed by the thirteen States.

What is especially to be noted in the whole of these proceedings is the jealous care exercised by the several colonies in asserting their individual sovereignty and in guarding it against encroachment. Thus, in the action of the various independent political communities in appointing delegates to the Continental Congress, the "sole and exclusive regulation of their own internal government, police, and concerns" was explicitly reserved. The States consented to surrender only a very partial control over the subject of trade. The Congress was invested by the articles with no control whatever over individuals.

Under these articles the United States were enabled to close the war of the Revolution, and secure our independence. But, as requisitions for delinquencies in raising revenue could only be made against the States in their corporate capacities, there was no remedy when these were withheld by the States except a resort to civil war. This was the defect of the old Confederation, as it had been of all similar establishments of ancient and modern times—of the Grecian republics, the Germanic, Hansatic, the Dutch, and the Helvetic. The immediate and pressing grievance which paralyzed the energies of the Confederate Government was the numerous, diverse, and conflicting interests and regulations in regard to trade.

In order to secure the fruits of the Revolution it was necessary that the commerce of the country should be freed from the disadvantages under which it was placed by the discriminations imposed upon it by foreign Governments by the navigation laws which their own interests and cupidity had induced those Governments to adopt. It was not less necessary that the public faith should be preserved; that the debts contracted during the Revolution should be liquidated; and the treaty stipulations into which we had entered with European Governments strictly complied with. It was also necessary "to provide for the common defense." These were the great and pressing inducements to the formation of a new compact of Union. In it a remedy was sought also for the weakness and inefficiency of the Confederation by conferring upon the central Government still larger and better defined powers; and by distributing them through well-balanced legislative, judicial, and executive departments, to bring down those powers to operate upon individuals. In these three particulars: in the greater extent and more precise definition of the powers conveyed; in surrendering the control of the several States over the subject of commercial regulations; and in the distribution of the powers through a well-organized system, so as to act upon individuals within the sphere of those powers, consists the great and material difference of the Constitution of 1789 from the Articles of Confederation. It was these changes which converted the Government of the United States from a specious but lifeless and inefficient organization to one of vital and energetic power for great and beneficial ends. It was and is still not less a Federal Government. Neither in the circumstances which attended its formation and adoption, nor in the instrument itself, nor yet in the expositions of its founders, is there apparent any intention to substitute a consolidated Government in lieu of that of the compact of the States.

The Convention of 1787, which framed the Constitution, was composed of delegates from the several States, and not from the people at large. Propositions in that Convention were voted upon by the delegates, not as individuals, but by States. It was not a majority of the delegates, but a majority of the States, by which each proposition was rejected or became a part of the Constitution. As the people did not act as a whole in appointing a Convention to form a Constitution, neither did they in ratifying it; but the ratification was by conventions appointed by the people of the several States. This ratification was also made at different times; for while the Constitution was adopted September 17, 1787, the consent of Virginia, which as that of the ninth State was necessary to put it in operation, was not obtained until June 26, 1788. And though, as accepted by nine States, the new Government went into operation the 4th of March, 1789, North Carolina did not accede until the 21st of November following, more than two years after its adoption by the Convention; nor Rhode Island till May 29, 1790; nearly three years after that event; and those States, during the period of their hesitation, were treated by the legislation of the United States as foreign countries. By the seventh article of the Constitution it is declared that the ratification of the conventions of nine States "shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." The tenth article also declares that the "powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

It thus appears, from a consideration of the circumstances under which the Constitution was produced, and from the provisions of the instrument itself, that our Government is a compact between sovereign and coequal political communities, the States composing it. Gouverneur Morris, who was the individual in the Convention upon whom devolved the task of revising the language of the instrument before its adoption by that body, also declared "that the Constitution was a compact, not between solitary individuals, but between political societies."

I have thus recurred to what are seen to be leading facts and principles in the formation of our Government. This retrospect must convince us that it is historically true that our Government was formed by the States as parties, and not by individual citizens as members of one community. I hold it at the same time true that this Government, which is one of limited and specially defined powers, is of the same obligatory authority within the sphere of the granted powers as the State governments themselves within the sphere of the reserved powers. I see not how this can be otherwise, since both were created by the same authority—that of the individual citizens of the several States acting through their respective State organizations. The Government of the United States and those of the several States are therefore equally sovereign in their respective spheres. I therefore find no difficulty in a divided allegiance, and I hold that allegiance to bind the citizen in equal degree to the government of the State and to that of the nation, both proceeding from the same source—the people of the several States. In case of irreconcilable difference between the Federal and State Governments, there is no necessity that the parties to the compact should, each for itself, decide the dispute; for in the very instrument of compact they appointed an arbiter, the judiciary, by whose decisions they agreed to abide.

If these were still not sufficient, and the Constitution, even under the interpretation of its own functionaries, should be found in its working to bear hard upon individual States, there was still another peaceful remedy provided by the charter. This was the amendment of the charter itself. It is a consequence of these views that there is no cause which would justify withholding allegiance from the Government of the United States and resisting its authority, which might not be of sufficient magnitude and oppressive character to authorize resistance to the State governments. In other words, there is no cause resulting from the nature of the compact, or the relation of the parties, to do this as of constitutional right, but only that cause which exists in all governments, the ultima ratio populi, the right of the people to alter and abolish their Government when in their judgment it has proved destructive of its end. Nullification and secession are therefore, in my view, alike without warrant in the Constitution.

The South has been consistent since 1798 in adhering to the doctrine of State rights. When the Constitution first went into operation the doctrine that the Constitution was a compact between political societies or sovereignties received the consent of many of the greatest and best minds of the North. It was asserted as distinctly and emphatically by Morris, by Sherman, Johnson, and Oliver Ellsworth, afterwards Chief Justice of the United States, of the North, as it was by Madison and Jefferson. Nor did the doctrine rest merely on constitutional history and fact or abstract theory with the North. Repeatedly before this was done by any part of the South was the theory of State rights resorted to by New England as a justification for breaking up the Union. The first of these was during the administration of Washington, when the New England Representatives declared that those States would secede unless the debts of the States should be assumed by the General Government. The second was upon the occasion of the embargo act, passed December 23, 1807, as a retaliatory measure to meet the Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon and the British orders in council. The embargo being, in the view of the eastern States, designed as a blow at their commerce for the benefit of other sections of the country, open resistance was threatened in case the embargo was enforced. The violence of this outcry secured the repeal of the embargo in 1809. A similar disposition was manifested in New England again on the purchase of Louisiana. The proposition of a measure which has added so incalculably to the greatness and prosperity of the country was met with similar threats of dissolving the Union.

But a fourth time and with still louder and more unsatisfied clamor did New England threaten rebellion to the Government, and throw herself upon the doctrine of State sovereignty as authorizing a dissolution of the Union. This was during the Administration of Mr. Madison, and from dissatisfaction with its measures, the last of which was the declaration of war in 1812. Slavery then, as now, was held up to odium as "the rotten part of the Constitution" which must be amputated.

It mattered not then, as it has not in more recent times, that it was a part of the Constitution. This opposition took an organized form of expression in the Hartford Convention of December 15, 1814, in which Massachusetts was represented by twelve delegates, Connecticut by seven, Rhode Island by four, New Hampshire by three, and Vermont by one. A dissolution of the Union and formation of a new confederacy was the remedy to which that convention looked unless their terms should be complied with; and ulterior measures for an actual separation of the States were to be taken by a subsequent convention to be held in June following. Like South Carolina before the final act of separation, the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut sent commissioners to Washington to present their demands to the Administration. Among these was the high name of Harrison Gray Otis. The simultaneous arrival in Washington of the news of the peace of Ghent no doubt alone saved New England the honor of anticipating the southern States in separating from the Union.

It thus appears that in the heresy of secession and nullification as constitutional remedies for real or imaginary grievances, the North and the South were alike participants. While I have expressed my own disapprobation of the consequences deduced from those doctrines, it is impossible to deny that their full justification is found in the teachings and practice of the North. In my judgment both were wrong. Allegiance was in both instances equally due to the General Government within the sphere of the granted powers, as to the States within the reserved; and I do not think that in either case the grievance was sufficient to justify revolution.

As to the right of the General Government to coerce a State, in such circumstances, the preponderance of authority may be said to have been adverse. It is well known that a proposition to confer the power of coercing a State was made in the Constitutional Convention by Edmund Randolph, and was decisively rejected. It is also clear that it is not among the specially granted powers, and if it be found there at all, it is among those which are necessary to carry the granted powers into effect. It was the opinion of Johnson and Ellsworth, the delegates in the Constitutional Convention from Connecticut, and of Mr. Madison, from Virginia, that the Constitution does not attempt to coerce sovereign States in their political capacities; that the power which is to enforce the laws is to be a legal power, vested in the magistrates. The force to be employed is the energy of law, and this is to be exerted only upon individuals. Hamilton, if he did not expressly deny the existence of the power to coerce, certainly did not at least contemplate its exercise. He approved of the proceedings by Massachusetts, calling in aid the power of the General Government to suppress the Shay insurrection, but he remarked in that connection:

"But how can this force be exerted on the States collectively? It is impossible. It amounts to a declaration of war between the parties. Foreign Powers also will not be idle spectators. They will interfere; the confusion will increase, and a dissolution of the Union will ensue."

It is apparent from the history of the State rights doctrine that in framing a national Government there were many and great diversities to be reconciled between the independent States. Though speaking a common language, and possessing the common law as a common inheritance, the colonies of the different sections were marked by radical and striking peculiarities. The Puritans of New England differed not more in character from the Cavaliers of Virginia than the Huguenots of the Carolinas from the Quakers of Pennsylvania and the Roman Catholics of Maryland from the Dutch of New York. The prejudices of opinion and antipathies which the settlers brought with them from Europe were still actively cherished in their new abode. There were also wide differences of interest. The interests of the northern States were chiefly commercial, their wealth consisting in the ships engaged in the carrying trade and in the fisheries. The States of the South, whose property was more largely in slaves, were interested in planting. In forming a common Government these discordant elements had to be consulted and reconciled. To any one who has carefully studied the history of the Constitution it must be clear that if the full demands of the sections had been insisted on in the Convention that body would have terminated without results. But the occasion was one calling loudly for compromise, and the wise heads and patriotic hearts of the men of the Revolution were there to meet it in the proper spirit. New England demanded protection for her navigation, while the South required protection for her slave property. These demands were reconciled by the South surrendering to the common Government the right to tax the ships of foreign States and to impose duties upon imports—in other words, the control of the whole subject of trade—New England conceding in return to the South the right of importing slaves for twenty years, the right to have three fifths of her slaves reckoned in the basis for representation; and the right to the surrender of her fugitive slaves. This, as characterized by Gouverneur Morris, was the "bargain" between the sections, and by it slavery became a part of our national Government. Had these concessions not been obtained, it is but the simple truth to say that the southern States would never have become parties to the Government.

Such, then, was the Government left us by our fathers; and whatever fault we may find with the conditions which it involves, good faith required that we should strictly adhere to them. I believe the history of our Government will bear me out in the assertion, that whatever troubles we have at any time experienced have been in consequence of the exercise of the doubtful powers, and of a departure from the spirit of the compact. I might instance that departure in the case of the establishment of the national bank, and the assumption of the State debts. It was a further step in the same direction when by the tariffs of 1816 and 1824 and 1828 duties upon imports were levied not for the clearly constitutional purpose of an economical administration of the Government, but for the avowed object of protection to home manufactures. Happy, thrice happy for the people of these States would it have been had the sectional feeling of the country limited itself to such triumphs as it might hope to achieve through the exercise of the implied powers under the Constitution.

But it manifested itself further in a dissatisfaction on the part of the North with the compromises of the Constitution in regard to slavery. There had indeed existed almost contemporaneously with the adoption of the charter a small party of abolitionists, consisting chiefly of the Quakers of New England and Pennsylvania. These parties, during Washington's administration, had memorialized Congress for the abolition of the slave trade prior to the time fixed in the Constitution, and for the abolition of slavery within the States. This cry, which originated with fanatics, was caught up by politicians for party ends, and was used with great bitterness by the northern journals to intensify the hostility which that section entertained toward the measures of Mr. Jefferson's and Mr. Madison's administrations. This spirit of hostility to slavery continued to increase, and broke out with fresh virulence on the application of Missouri for admission into the Union. It thus assumed an unprecedented importance from its connection with a contest for political power.

Shortly after, the public mails were used to distribute over the South incendiary matter calculated to stir up insurrection among the slaves. Congress was besieged for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia; and John Quincy Adams persistently and defiantly presented petitions praying for the dissolution of the Union. States nullified by their legislation the acts of Congress passed in pursuance of the provision in the Constitution for the rendition of "fugitives from labor." Pennsylvania thus repealed, in 1841, an act placed upon her statute-book in 1780. And when a territorial government for Oregon was to be provided, the proposition to extend the Missouri line of 36° 30' to the Pacific ocean was rejected by Congress, and the Wilmot proviso, prohibiting slavery in Oregon, adopted. California was also admitted as a State without passing through a territorial condition, and with an anti-slavery constitution. The effect was to make a discrimination between the citizens of co-equal States, which the Constitution did not contemplate. Simultaneously there appeared in New England certain new social and political theories in relation to slavery.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 51.

That these theories were of foreign origin little doubt can be entertained. The unexpected success of our political institutions, the growing greatness of our American Republic, of our commerce, and all our industrial pursuits, had begun to affect England with fears for the permanence of her own superiority, and even for the duration of her political system. The success of so economical a Government, and one so favorable to the rights of man, seemed to be a standing reproach to the more expensive, exclusive, and unequal establishments of European absolutism. In addition to these motives, England had also a further one: we were her rebellious offspring. To see our Republic prove a failure and our federative system divided, so that one section could be fought against the other, was the aim of both her pride and power. It was therefore that the vigilant eyes of some of her political leaders soon discovered the opportunity afforded by our domestic differences for the introduction and fomentation of strife. Abolition emissaries quickly found their way to Boston. There their incendiary doctrines soon found a congenial soil. The seed "fell upon good ground and increased a hundred fold." Agitation of the slavery question in every form and upon every occasion has since that time been perseveringly maintained in the northern States, and especially in New England, in conversation, in lectures, by the press, in the pulpit, in the halls of legislation, and upon the stump, all of which tended only to one disastrous result.

Mr. Buchanan has been blamed for lack of energy in meeting the sudden crisis of the rebellion. It has been asserted that had he acted with proper promptness in garrisoning the fortifications in the six excited southern States the rebellion would have been avoided. But the truth is, there were no available troops within reach. General Scott, in his supplemental views to the War Department on the 30th October, 1860, stated that but four hundred troops were within reach for that purpose. It is evident that it was his great aim to avoid a collision, to avert civil war and save the Union, affirming the clear authority of the Government to enforce the Federal laws within a State, but finding none to beat back a seceding State into the Union. In the nullification troubles in 1832 General Jackson did not attempt to exert the coercive power until, on application to Congress, the force bill was passed. Did not Mr. Buchanan ask Congress for a similar bill, "or to authorize the employment of military force," and did not Congress fail to grant it? Agreeing with General Jackson in his views as expressed in his farewell address, in the utter inefficiency of mere force to preserve the Union, he urged, in his annual message to Congress on the 3d December, 1860, and again in his special message of January 8, 1861, the adoption of amendments to the Constitution of the same character as those subsequently proposed by Mr. Crittenden.

"Flat justitia, ruat cælum."

But Congress omitted to propose amendments to the Constitution. They omitted also to pass the Crittenden resolutions having the same effect. These resolutions, it was stated by several southern Senators, one of whom was Jefferson Davis, in the Senate committee of thirteen, would have been accepted by the South as a basis of final settlement. (See Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-Sixth Congress, volume 44, part 2, pages 1390, 1391.) Had Mr. Lincoln, after his arrival in Washington, but said the word "peace," those resolutions would have been adopted and the war avoided. South Carolina would have stood alone. At this crisis it was apparent that the danger of dissolution and civil war was both real and imminent. Mr. Lincoln was unequal to the occasion. The peace conference adjourned without important action. Congress adjourned leaving everything unsettled and the whole country shaken by the most violent agitation. The collision in the harbor of Charleston was the fatal consequence.

The reader of English history need but remember how feeble was the eloquence of Chatham in arresting the progress of the war with the American colonies after it had been commenced. The same authority reminds us of the mighty efforts of Fox to avert the war with France, which ended only with the battle of Waterloo and the exile of Napoleon. Peace is the policy of all Governments, the indispensable policy of a republic, whose great basis is popular affection. With us I believe it could have been preserved without sacrifice.

In the President's proclamation which followed he called for seventy-five thousand volunteers "to defend the capital, to recapture the forts, and enforce the laws." The volunteers thus called for came forward with a promptness and alacrity which did credit to their love of country, and indicated their attachment to that constitutional Government left them by their fathers, and their resolution to repel at all hazards the sacrilegious attempt thus made upon its existence. The people were still further assured of the conservative purposes and character of the war now proposed, by the instructions issued by the State Department to our representatives at European courts, as well as in the policy announced in the President's inaugural address of the 4th March, 1861, and in his message to the special Congress which met in July following. Mr. Seward declared in these instructions that—

"Moral and physical causes have determined inflexibly the character of each one of the Territories over which the dispute has arisen, and both parties, after the election, harmoniously agreed on all the Federal laws required for their organization. The Territories will remain in all respects the same, whether the revolution shall succeed or shall fail. The condition of slavery in the several States will remain just the same whether it succeed or fail. There is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail; for the rights of the States, and the condition of every human being in them will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration, whether the revolution shall succeed or fail. In the one case, the States would be federally connected with the new confederacy; in the other, they would, as now, be members of the United States; but their constitutions and laws, customs, habits, and institutions in either case will remain the same.

"It is not necessary to add to this incontestable statement the further fact that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrages he has come into the Administration has always repudiated all designs whatever, and whenever imputed to him and them of disturbing the institution of slavery as it exists under the Constitution and laws. The case now would not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such effort on his part would be unconstitutional, and all his actions in that direction would be prevented by the proper authority, even though they were assented to by Congress and the people."

Here is the language of the President on the 4th of March, 1861:

"Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the southern States that by the accession of a Republican Administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the published speeches of him who now addresses you. I do but quote from one of those speeches when I declare that 'I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so.'"

In the President's message to the special Congress which met in July 1861, Mr. Lincoln declares that "after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say, it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and laws," and that it may be expected he will adhere to the positions taken in the inaugural address. He adds:

"He desires to preserve the Government that it may be administered for all as it was administered by the men who made it. Loyal citizens everywhere have the right to claim this of their Government; and the Government has no right to withhold or neglect it. It is not perceived that, in giving it, there is any coercion, any conquest, or any subjugation in any just sense of those terms."

Well, Mr. Speaker, how long were the Administration true to these their solemn, public, and reiterated pledges? Why, sir, just until, on the faith of these solemn assurances a million men were induced to abandon the pursuits of peace, and rush into the armies of their country to fight in the sacred cause of constitutional government. Then, when the physical arm of the Government was deemed sufficiently strong for the overthrow of the South, the mask is cast off, a new purpose and object for the war is boldly avowed and proclaimed. The hideous form and repulsive features of abolitionism were at first disguised in the deceptive and alluring garb of patriotism. It was no longer to be a war for the preservation of the Union under the Constitution, but in reality for its destruction, and in the forum of conscience as well as in that of the supreme law places the radicals in the attitude of rebellion and revolution.

Of the abolitionists as a party, nearly a quarter of a century ago the true character was happily touched off by the pencil of Henry Clay. He says:

"With them the rights of property are nothing, the deficiency of the powers of the General Government is nothing, the acknowledged and incontestable powers of the States are nothing. Civil war, a dissolution of the Union, and the overthrow of a Government in which are concentrated the proudest hopes of the civilized world, are nothing. A single idea has taken possession of their minds, and onward they pursue it, overlooking all barriers, reckless and regardless of all consequences."

This party was then small and insignificant, but its numbers have increased until we now behold it numerous and influential enough to control the administration of the Government. Their influence was first felt in interfering with the conduct of the war, and in ostracizing and excluding from command the generals who had manifested a respect for the Constitution and who had shown skill in the field. They were not satisfied with passing a bill offering protection and freedom to the slaves of rebel masters who should come within our lines, not satisfied with directing the physical power of the country to the suppression of armed resistance to the authority of the Government, but they proceeded to carry the war directly against the property, the homes, and firesides of peaceful non-combatant residents of the seceded States. This was in violation, not only of the Federal Constitution, but of every principle of public law. While the effect of this policy has been to unite the South, the proclamations of the 22d and 24th of September, 1862, and of the 1st of January, 1863, have signally failed to disturb the relation of the slave beyond the hostile presence of our armies. The President, it is true, made a timid and weak resistance to the adoption of this policy, but the abolition pressure was imperative, and at length successful.

A measure involving such an utter disregard of party pledges, such a violent casting aside of constitutional obligations, such diametrical opposition to the recognized principles and to the usages of war, and such a thorough adaptation to widen instead of healing the breach occasioned by secession, could not be expected to be received with unquestioning acquiescence on the part of the law-abiding, Constitution-loving masses of the North. Hence vast stretches of authority are usurped, the indefinite power of arrests is assumed, and the time-honored writ of habeas corpus is suspended.

Thus, upon the alleged ground of the insufficiency of the ordinary processes of law to restrain disloyal practices, the military power is raised into a superiority to the civil, and martial law is extended over the whole country. Persons not military are made liable to arrest without legal process, in a summary manner, upon the indefinite charge of "disloyal practices." When so arrested they are also denied the privilege of that hereditary and constitutional shield of the liberty of the citizen, the writ of habeas corpus. Has it, then, come to this, that in a Government of the people the people are less worthy to be trusted than their rulers? In a nation the freest and most enlightened upon earth is the citizen to be told by the petty agents of his own creation that his liberty is not safe in his keeping, and that they, through an assumed superior intelligence, must take it in special charge? Sir, what man worthy of the name of freeman will be reconciled to the loss of his priceless birthright of liberty, regulated by law, by any such tyrant's plea as that?

I believe I do not misapprehend the character of my countrymen, and that they will not and ought not thus to submit to be spoiled of their dearest right by any usurping hand. What! are the people to be deluded with the idea that their liberties are to be preserved or that the Government is to be saved in the act of their destruction? Are those sacred fireside rights which the Anglo-Saxon brought with him from his native forests in Germany, and which he has never since lived without, to be trampled in the dust on any such flimsy and specious pretext as this? And have the sad days of the Roman time under the forms of the republic come upon us so soon? Are we to be the sport of imperial rule?

Sir, our institutions of government are created and defined by law, and to the rigid observance of the law we must hold their administrators. This is our only safety, as the history of free States has always taught, because it shows that "power is ever stealing from the many to the few." It is then a new thing in our history that the ordinary processes of law are not found sufficient to secure the Government in the exercise of its legitimate and proper authority. It is not only a new thing among ourselves, but is unprecedented in the history of that people from which chiefly we derive our origin, and from which we have inherited largely our laws and free institutions. Never in the history of England, even in the most turbulent times of revolution, has it been conceded to the monarch to arrest persons not military without warrant issued upon legal charges preferred under oath. This the common-law proceeding dates back so far in England that it cannot be determined when it began. It is, however, guaranteed by Magna Charta. Charles I did, indeed, try the experiment of arbitrary arrests upon vague and indefinite charges, like those of "disloyal practices," not preferred upon oath, but upon the mere arbitrary motion of himself or members of the Privy Council. The subversion of the constitution and substitution of the will of the monarch was also attempted to be effected by the Courts of High Commission and Star Chamber, which resembled the "courts-martial or military commission" of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, in not being governed by the common law or immemorial customs and acts of Parliament, but admitting for law the proclamations of the Executive and grounding their judgment upon them. The English nation, however, repelled the attempt with indignation; and by the celebrated Petition of Right arbitrary imprisonments and the exercise of martial law were abolished, and the obnoxious courts suppressed.

But it will be said that this proclamation of the 24th September does not contravene Magna Charta, since it is confirmed by act of Congress. The answer to this is that the act of Congress itself contravenes the provisions of the Constitution, the paramount law. When we turn to article four of the Amendments to that instrument, we are met by this stern requirement:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

Article six also requires that

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

The exercise of such arbitrary powers it was which lost Charles I of England the confidence of his subjects, and led to the establishment of new guarantees against such flagrant abuses on the part of the monarch. The practice of a similar tyranny in France, under the lettres de cachet, had filled the dungeons of the Bastille with innocent victims, until at the commencement of the reign of Louis XVI that hated prison was leveled to the ground in the indignant uprising of an outraged people.

What right, sir, has Congress to authorize arbitrary arrests in the face of the prohibitions of the Constitution? Are these prohibitions without meaning? or were they not on the contrary designed to meet just such exigencies as those in which the country is now placed, when, together with the possession of the physical and political power of the country, a party finds itself under the temptation to resort to usurpation in order to maintain its ascendancy? The Administration cannot, as in England, have recourse to the omnipotence of the Legislature to justify this abuse of power. The British Parliament is possessed of a legal omnipotence from the nature of the constitution, which is that of a consolidated Government and a monarchy. Even there, however, the subject has an adequate security against any violation of those great principles of personal security, personal liberty, and private property, which constitute the so much and justly lauded privileges of Britons, because the people themselves, through their representatives in the Commons, make a preponderant power in the Parliament, and the venerable landmarks of the rights of the subject have long been held sacred from encroachment. But in this country the national Legislature has no such large and unlimited powers. A written charter confers expressly all the powers which the Congress possesses, and clearly there is no authority contained in any of its provisions to arrest any one "without probable cause," and "upon oath or affirmation." Neither will the extension by Congress of martial law over the whole country cover the case. There is the same deficiency of authority here as before. Says Chief Justice Blackstone in his Commentaries:

"Martial law, which is built upon no settled principles, but is entirely arbitrary in its decisions, is, as Sir Matthew Hale observes, in truth and reality no law, but something indulged rather than allowed as a law. The necessity of order and discipline in an army is the only thing which can give it countenance, and therefore it ought not to be permitted in time of peace, when the king's courts are open for all persons to receive justice according to the laws of the land."

Does this "necessity of order and discipline" which this distinguished authority lays down as the only admissible ground for the application of martial law apply also to civilians outside of the Army? Are not the courts as to them, both State and Federal, except in the States in rebellion, just as open now for the prosecution of offenses against the Government and laws of the United States as under the condition of the most profound peace? The contrary will not be asserted. There is therefore no necessity for this extraordinary stretch of authority, except in districts, if there be any such, in which the regular administration of justice by the civil tribunals is rendered impracticable by the operations of war; and this is nowhere beyond the lines of the Army, except as to persons in the military service.

The rules and articles of war and the acts of Congress for holding courts-martial (chiefly that of the 14th of April, 1814) by which the Army is governed, were framed chiefly from the English system upon the same subject. Its principles and modes of proceeding are quite different from those of the common law, and in reference to them Blackstone remarked:

"One of the greatest advantages of the English law is that not only the crimes themselves which it punishes, but also the penalties which it inflicts, are ascertained and notorious; nothing is left to arbitrary discretion; the king by his judges dispenses what the law has previously ordained; but is not himself the legislator."

The learned commentator then takes occasion to regret that in being deprived of those advantages and being subject to military law, the soldier is placed in a condition of servitude; "for," said he, "Sir Edward Coke will inform us that it is one of the genuine marks of servitude to have the law, which is our rule of action, either concealed or precarious."

Another extraordinary measure inaugurated by the proclamation, and which constitutes the climax of despotic power assumed by the Executive, is the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus during the existence of the rebellion. Having usurped the power of arrest "without due process of law" in the face of the express prohibitions of the Constitution, it was an offense of gigantic magnitude for the President to suspend the operation of this great and important defense of the liberties of the citizen. In those bitter and unscrupulous civil contests which were waged between the party of prerogative and that of the privileges of the people, which inflamed the heart of England in the middle of the seventeenth century, the ancient common-law right of the habeas corpus was disregarded by Charles I, as well as by the Long Parliament. This was during the struggle between the Crown and the people. But after the constitution was settled as to this particular by the Petition of Right, and the 29th of Car. II, no sovereign had afterwards temerity enough to attempt an abuse of this great bulwark of English liberties. It is true that in a few instances within the history of the nation for two centuries back this great writ has been suspended by Parliament, the only power which could legally suspend it. The principal of these was during the transition from the reign of James II to that of William and Mary, in 1688. All through the American war of independence the friends and sympathizers of the American cause were bold in their condemnation of the policy and measures of the Crown, and it was held that this was but the simple exercise of the unquestioned right of the subject. Burke, Fox, and Pitt all thundered in the ears of the court their eloquent denunciations of the tyranny and injustice of Government toward their countrymen in the colonies, and no one ever proclaimed a "military necessity" of silencing them by forcible restraint of their persons.

The remarks which I have made in regard to arbitrary arrests apply with equal force to the suppression of journals which have spoken out in condemnation of these despotic acts of the Administration. Blackstone says, "the liberty of the press is indeed essential to a free State." The liberty of the press was our common-law right as British colonists, and for its protection, together with the freedom of speech and the right of peaceably assembling and petitioning the Government for a redress of grievances, the first amendment was added to the Constitution. These restraints are necessary, it is said, because by the indulgence of free discussion the arm of the Government is weakened, and its ability to carry on the war seriously impaired. But what an argument is this in a country of constitutional liberty, and where public opinion forms the substratum of all our institutions! And what an argument at a time when, above all others, free speech and a free press are most needed to point out and drive back the robbers who are daily carrying off the public treasure! It is an old precept to resist the beginnings of evil. It was Rousseau that said, "Liberty might be acquired, but could never be recovered."

In addition to all these aggressions the war policy of the Administration has saddled the country with a debt which at the termination of the struggle will exceed in magnitude that of Great Britain contracted in a century of foreign wars. The aggregate of the appropriations on the 4th of March, 1863, was $2,000,277,000. The appropriations are first or last the real expenditure. The total of the English debt is a fraction less than $4,000,000,000. The English debt bears an interest of three per cent., while the debt of the United States when consolidated will reach six per cent. This gigantic debt will tax enormously the earnings of industry for generations, while the substitution of paper money for the gold and silver currency established by the Constitution* has destroyed the relation of debtor and creditor; has

* Daniel Webster says:

"But what is meant by the 'constitutional currency,' about which so much is said? What species or forms of currency does the Constitution allow, and what does it forbid? It is plain enough that this depends on what we understand by currency. Currency, in a large and perhaps in a just sense, includes not only gold and silver and bank notes, but bills of exchange also. It may include all that adjust exchanges and settle balances in the operations of trade and business. But if we understand by currency the legal money of the country, and that which constitutes a lawful tender for debts, and is the statute measure of value, then, undoubtedly, nothing is included but gold and silver. Most unquestionably there is no legal tender, and there can be no legal tender, in this country, under the authority of this Government or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints or foreign coins, at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain, and of the very highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; and although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet, as Congress has no power granted to it in this respect but to coin money and to regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper or anything else for coin as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts. Congress has exercised this power fully in both its branches. It has coined money, and still coins it; it has regulated the value of foreign coins, and still regulates their value. The legal tender, therefore, the constitutional standard of value, is established, and cannot be overthrown. To overthrow it would shake the whole system."—Webster's Works, vol. 4, pages 270, 271.

destroyed legal securities, as well as the earnings of industry in ordinary investments. It has increased largely the prices of Government supplies, thus enhancing greatly the cost of the war. It bears severely upon the investments of widows and orphans, and is sacrificing the business of the country in the general ruin of the currency. This flood of assignats has stimulated into still more pernicious action all that crowd of corrupt and hateful influences which follow in the wake of war as sharks in that of the pestilent ship. The miserable crowd of contractors and speculators on the sufferings of their country, like so many leeches, are sucking out the life-blood of the nation, while preaching the unquestioning support of the Administration and all its reckless and abortive measures as the true test of patriotism.

The acts of the Administration under the double influence of Republican and abolition principles are marked by singular tergiversation and inconsistency. In their Chicago platform, as in all authoritative declarations, they declared it to be their intention not to interfere with slavery in the States, and to administer the Government according to the Constitution. In the territorial governments organized shortly after Mr. Lincoln's advent to power, in New Mexico, Colorado, and Nevada, when they had the power to insert a provision for the exclusion of slavery, no such exclusion was inserted; and although the Crittenden resolutions were rejected by Congress until the first battle of Bull Run, they were passed with great unanimity after that event. Notwithstanding these facts, however, and also Mr. Lincoln's message to Congress exhorting that body to prosecute the war solely for the restoration of the Union, we soon find leaders of the party introducing into Congress bills for the conversion of rebel States into Territories, for an indiscriminate confiscation of estates, and waging the war for the liberation of the slaves. We also find Mr. Lincoln, under these influences, recommending in his annual message in December, 1862, the call of a convention to secure the emancipation of the slaves in the States; and, without waiting for such constitutional authority, under the pressure of the abolition portion of his party, proceeding to issue proclamations of emancipation. Could human weakness and inconsistency further go?

The great and paramount object of all Governments is the protection of private property. It is the great basis of all civilizations. Without its recognition and stable protection there can be no such thing even as communities. The framers of the Constitution, regarding history as philosophy teaching by example, aimed to insert in that instrument a clause which, even in the midst of the most fearful commotions and party violence, would prevent a reënactment on this continent of those barbarous confiscations which marked the civil wars of the Romans, and are a stigma upon the history of modern Europe. They therefore, in the third section of the third article, used this clear and unmistakable language, that—

"No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

In disregard of this constitutional prohibition, this House passes a joint resolution explanatory of the confiscation act for the purpose of confiscating the fee and making it operative against the innocent as well as the guilty.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus endeavored to state the origin and true theory of the Government, and to assign with fidelity the causes of the present troubles. I have also noticed the measures with which the Administration has undertaken to meet the extraordinary emergency, and have pointed out their unconstitutional and pernicious character, and their utter deficiency in a true policy. Since we have thus far failed in reducing the rebellion with the unconstitutional weapons of restraints upon the liberty of the person, of speech, and of the press—of martial law, emancipation proclamations, and confiscation acts, it is fitting for us now to inquire whether the armory of Government does not furnish others of more potent energy and efficiency. There can indeed be no permanent peace upon those principles. The complete conquest and subjugation of an intelligent and high-spirited people history amply demonstrates to be a work of long duration and uncertain result. Superior resources and physical power may be sufficient to scatter military organizations, but it is quite a different thing to conquer and to subjugate. The history of the Anglo-Saxon race is full of illustrations of this truth. The Normans conquered that race at the battle of Hastings in 1066, but after a struggle of six hundred years the Saxon element had reasserted itself, and the English constitution was restored as it was before the Conquest. A great standing army would be necessary to keep the South in subjection, and she would occupy a position to the rest of the Union such as Ireland and India occupy to England, as Hungary to Austria, and as Poland to Russia.

This war was inaugurated to put down military usurpation. The calm, just, and ever patriotic judgment of a confiding people approved and cheered it on in its progress. It was not intended to be a war against communities, individuals, or their property and rights, but a war in defense of the Constitution, the laws, and for the preservation of the Union. This is still its true and proper object, and to this, if we would look for an early and stable peace, the Administration must return. The proclamations must be withdrawn, the confiscation acts repealed, and we must get back to the resolution adopted by Congress after the first battle of Bull Run. Mark well its clear and patriotic import:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Upon the principles upon which the war is now waged, there is no rallying-point for Union sentiment in the South. It is unusual for an invading army to advance without propositions of peace. Our Army has none. Unconditional submission to an enemy whose declared purpose is the destruction of their rights of property and social system is all that is offered them. Is it surprising that Union sentiment should be crushed out, that the South should be united almost to a man, and that its resistance should be intensified and embittered with an energy derived from desperation?

Above all things, Mr. Speaker, do I desire a restoration of the Union as it was. It is the grand experiment of civil liberty. Any sacrifice, any concession, any appropriation should be made to prevent its failure. We have a great mission, and no trivial consideration of the negro, or any other, should be permitted to interrupt it. It is our mission to demonstrate the problem of self-government, and to revolutionize other Governments by the silent force of a great example. While the common law and all the privileges and advantages of civilization have been transferred to this continent, nothing but the stable continuance of our admirable system of government is needed to attract within it the people of every clime.

Never were an aggregation of free and independent political communities better circumstanced geographically for the purposes of such a Union. On a scale of magnitude far surpassing the petty States of Greece, Switzerland, and the Low Countries on the Rhine, there was, as between themselves, the happiest adaptation for a common government. Looking on the north and east to New England, there was there no conflict of pursuits with any other section. Her climate was rigorous and her soil sterile, and her only means of development were found in commerce and in manufactures. She was in a position to do the carrying trade for her neighbors, and to work up their raw material. Crossing westward into the State of New York, we find her the possessor of great and peculiar resources, and of the national metropolis, designed by nature as the commercial emporium of the continent. A little farther south was Pennsylvania, filled with iron and coal, and favored perhaps more highly than any individual State with a combination of agricultural, mineral, manufacturing, and commercial advantages. To the west, in the great valley of the Mississippi, the production of the cereals was a wonder. But none of the States thus noticed produced rice, sugar-cane, cotton, or gold. These, again, were the peculiar products of the States lying between Pennsylvania and the Gulf, and of those on the Pacific. There was, therefore, among the several States those elements of unity, an adaptation to supply each other's wants, and a mutual dependence. They were further tied together by great rivers reaching far into the interior, and facilitating intercourse between remote points. There were on the Atlantic slope the Hudson, the Susquehanna, the Delaware—to omit others of minor name—and there was in the heart of the continent the great inland sea of the Mississippi, flowing due south from almost the arctic circle, and stretching his long arms of the Missouri and the Ohio from the Alleghany to the Rocky mountains. The great chain of the Alleghanies, extending from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, seemed also designed by Providence as another physical bond of union. There was in all this evidently the most admirable foundation for union, for that very Government, indeed, adopted by our fathers, combining in itself all the advantages of a consolidated empire for all purposes of defense against foreign aggression, and containing within the State organizations every provision to meet the wants of particular localities. Experience proved its great economy and eminent benefits; and the people of every State grew warm in their attachment to it, and wished for its perpetuity. The North had profited largely by her connection with the South, and by every variety of exchange. She had profited largely by the products of slave labor. New England, with her barren soil and severe climate, had yet, by her manufacturing industry with a tariff protection, and her coastwise and foreign trade, grown rich and more populous than any other portion of the Union of the same area. She had also disproportionate power for shaping the policy of the country to her own advantage in having with a small territory a representation of singular inequality in the Senate. With a total population of 3,135,283 she speaks through the mouths of twelve Senators in the national Legislature; while the State of New York, with a population of 3,880,735, is heard only through two. In view of the superior benefits which the North has derived from the Union, it must be admitted to be the expression of a grave truth that the Cavalier held the cow while the thrifty Puritan steadily milked her.

This war will be prosecuted, and its great purpose should be peace upon the basis of the Constitution. If we fail to accomplish this, through the obstinate and misdirected policy of the Administration, we shall have no permanent Government left in the North under the present Constitution. The cohesive power which constitutes the national bond would be gone, and with it would speedily perish the national debt. In the competition for commerce resulting in a line of free ports from the capes of the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande our foreign commerce, too, would dwindle, and the revenue derived therefrom would perish. It would be impossible in congressional legislation to reconcile the commercial interests of New York and the agricultural interests of the Northwest with the manufacturing industry of New England and Pennsylvania; free trade and protection alike would be obstinately demanded. An unceasing border war would be the inheritance of the States bounded by the line of separation. It is a still graver consideration that in the event of such a calamity no man of reflection can wink so fast as not to see that a portion of the States must become reunited by the instincts of empire, as well as by every consideration of interest, of trade, commerce, and security. Cast your eye over the map of the States, and you see that all the rivers, from the Hudson to the Rio Grande, have their outlet to the ocean through the southern States. The trade of the lakes, which is alone greater than all our foreign commerce, reaches tidewater west of New England, while that of the great basin of the Mississippi, with its tributaries, comprising fifty thousand miles of boatable navigation, can find its way cheaply by the currents alone to the Gulf of Mexico. The products of this mighty valley and the cotton of the South constitute the basis of the commerce of New York. It is idle to suppose that she can exist without a union with these grand divisions.

Pennsylvania must have a market for her iron and coal, and the products of her varied industry; while the Northwest is sure to follow her destiny marked by the water-courses, as every producing and trading people that had the power have always done from the days of the Phenicians down to the present time.

While the South has all the resources and geographical advantages which I have described, in all probability it cannot exist alone, even if successful, for any great length of time as an independent Power. A union with the northwestern and middle States would become a necessity. For the present, perhaps for a generation, the vast stake which European Governments have in the division of a Government based upon the popular will, and in the article of cotton, would secure protection to the southern confederacy. The keen eye of commercial and manufacturing capital, with the prejudice against slavery, would, however, render its life a short one. The world at large is too much interested in the growth and supply of cotton to trust, as heretofore, almost exclusively to the South for that supply in the future. European capital and enterprise, stimulated by the lessons of experience, will, within the next quarter of a century, open up commercial communications, plant settlements, and make the cotton grow in the interior of Africa, Australia, the East Indies, as well as Mexico, Central America, and the adjacent isles of the sea. When the supply is thus secured equal to the demand, independently of the South, then will the truce be at an end. An alliance, holy of political, would again send an army on the march, and the "amazona" would then become a stern reality. The policy, then, which governs the war and is carrying out the dissolution of the Union, if adhered to, is but laying the foundation for a Union in the valley of the Mississippi, as an inevitable consequence and result.

The question of slavery in the Territories led to the disturbance of a harmony which might otherwise have been perpetual. The Chicago platform inaugurated revolution. The States being sovereigns, and the public domain having been acquired by deeds of cession, by purchase, and by conquest, in the absence of a judicial decision recognizing the equal rights of the South in the Territories, upon what principle of equity or justice could that equality be denied? A legal, constitutional right, however recognized, it was well known could not have resulted in the spread of slavery; and yet a denial of it is the sad pretext of our troubles. Washington, impressed with a full knowledge of the antagonisms of society and the violence of party struggles for supremacy, at the close of his administration, still doubtful of the permanency of the experiment, warned his countrymen to a constant vigilance for its preservation. Jefferson, with that unerring sagacity which characterized his knowledge of human nature, admonished the people of the whole country that the array of parties upon a geographical line would result in the destruction of the Government.

This war cannot last forever. Sooner or later contending parties must become exhausted, the armies dwindled, credit destroyed, the land filled with graves and clothed in mourning, and an adjustment upon some terms will be the only cure for the evil. The uncompromising obstinacy of Charles I lost him his head; that of James II his crown; that of George III his colonies. Shall these States again be lost by imitating the example? Shall we not rather learn a lesson from that chapter in our history in 1812, when Mr. Clay, aided by Calhoun, pressed the war of that period upon the Administration of Mr. Madison in resistance to the British pretension to the right of search? The war lasted for three years and some months. There was great sacrifice of life and vast expenditure of money. During that period the Navy upon the waters of the Chesapeake and the Atlantic covered itself with imperishable glory, and our soldiers poured out their blood like water upon the river Raisin and the Thames, at Tippecanoe and Lundy's Lane. And yet Mr. Clay, at the head of the American commission, met the British commissioners at Ghent, and there negotiated a treaty of peace without saying one word of the matter in controversy, and which yet was deemed honorable and satisfactory. Nearly fifty years have elapsed since that period, and the right remains unadjusted to this day. In the mean time our relations with England, social and commercial, have grown more intimate and important.

Mr. Speaker, there is everywhere an anxious and earnest looking forward to a termination of this contest. I believe there is no obstacle so potent against a return to peace as that spirit which has given a new policy and a new object to the war. To refuse, because of the institution of slavery in the southern States, to adhere to the Union of our fathers is all one as if we should refuse to treat with the Ottoman Porte or the Barbary Powers because the one is the sovereign of a nation recognizing polygamy, and the other the slavery of the whites as well as the blacks. The man possessed with a single idea is of all the most unfitted for a statesman. That high character implies a condition of mind which contemplates things as they are, and which forbears the removal of a less mischief when this would be productive of a greater. He must aim in his policy at the production of the best good of society, but will carefully refrain from great, sweeping innovations, preferring to leave the correction of evils to the gentle hand of time, which, as Lord Bacon expresses it, "is the greatest innovator," well assured that no Government can be successful which does not adapt its policy to the various characters of the people to be affected by it, and to its diversities of industry and sectional interests.

Statesmen in every European Government may be impressed with the superiority of republican institutions. They would, however, be deemed infatuated to the last degree, if, taking advantage of some partial indications among the people, they should seek to bring on a crisis. They, with better judgment, adhere to the existing order of things, well knowing that changes, to be beneficial, must be permanent. It was not at a single bound that England, the freest of the monarchies, leaped from the fetters of the feudal system. That was the accomplishment only of centuries of struggles against the power of the barons, under the guidance of enlightened princes, great statesmen, and able lawyers; and after all, some of the most objectionable features of that system cling to her still. France, indeed, attempted, by a single convulsive effort, to shake from her the bondage under which she had groaned for centuries. She succeeded in obtaining a feverish interval of freedom, only to relapse into the old despotism; and now, with her journals silent and liberty prostrate, how much better is her condition than before the revolution of 1789?

It was error, maddened error, as well as treason in the South seceding as a remedy for her grievances. Great revolutions are only justified by great oppressions. The South should have remained in the Union, and fought her battle with the abolition phalanx under theegis of the Constitution. She laid the foundation of the Government and reared its superstructure, and the broad folds of its flag furnished her ample protection. She should have done this from patriotic considerations and ancestral recollections, and sternly discarded the ignis fatuus counsels of her Yanceys. But let New England remember that the South, in this rebellion, is but acting out doctrines once maintained in all sincerity by herself. Let her remember that southern slavery was planted by her own enterprise, her ships reaping nearly all the profits of the slave trade, which the Constitution protected till 1808. These reflections should incline us, while still prosecuting the war for the support of the Constitution and the integrity of the Union, to moderate our demands according to the standard of justice. Let us all remember that it is an easy thing to destroy, but a long and difficult one to build up. The struggle for the establishment of human rights upon a positive basis of constitutional law has been long and tedious, successful, and again doubtful.

Civilization may be said to have commenced its march on the plains of Judea, with the establishment of the Jewish theocracy. Spreading thence to India and Egypt, from the latter it was transported to Greece, where it shone brightly in its classic literature, and in its efforts toward a system of self-government. Thence it was transferred to Rome, where it beamed with renewed luster. Peculiar causes operating in Italy resulted at the same time in the Roman republic. These, the first recorded efforts for a democratic Government, possessed inherent defects, and both, at the period of the Christian era, were absorbed in the imperial despotism of Octavius Cæsar. The empire ran its career of centuries till at length the hopes of the human race lay buried for a time in the tomb of the dark ages. They awoke again with the revival of learning in the twelfth century, and received an undying impetus in the ages of the Reformation, and of discovery which followed. With the exception of the Italian republics, which possessed no enduring vitality, and at a later day those of Holland and Switzerland, monarchy, everywhere, the world over, was the only accepted form of polity.

It was at length, after six thousand years of struggles by the race for the attainment of a perfect Government, that our wise forefathers, struck with the favorable conditions for a renewal of the experiment, resolved to attempt it on this continent. Starting with the representative feature and the free principles of the English monarchy, they searched the storehouse of free commonwealths for enduring materials for the new structure. To the selection and arrangement of the political machinery which they needed, they brought qualifications never before equaled in the framers of States. Deep insight into human nature, the profound knowledge of history and of law, and unblemished patriotism were theirs. Their perfect work stands before us; nay, it is in our keeping. Oh! let us not, let us not, I implore you, permit the grand experiment to fail through any remissness or perversity of ours.

It is indeed an easy thing to destroy; but to call into being, whether in material affairs or in those of morals and politics, great and useful works, taxes the highest faculties and resources of man. It is especially so in framing the institutions of government. For this, the learned sage and the man versed in practical affairs must join their anxious and patriotic labors. For the adoption, amid opposing interests, of any system, is needed the long and patient conference, the steady forbearance, the timely concession and compromise. The selfish principles must be held in check. A curb must be laid upon the passions. But for the destruction of the same system it is needed only that we forbear the exercise of the virtues and benevolent affections and give full sway to the selfish principles.

The temple of Diana of Ephesus was the boast of the ancient world. The treasures of kings and all the art skill of the times had been profusely lavished upon it to render it the richest and most magnificent of the structures of earth. Yet the torch of Eratosthenes, infatuated with the ambition of immortality, though it should be one of infamy, was sufficient in a few hours to lay it in ashes.

Alas! that these reflections should find so practical an application in the events of the times. We had a good Government. We possessed already what revolutionists in other Governments set out to attain, and no pretensions to statesmanship should have been admitted which sought to jar the system or break it up.

I have read of a knight of the middle ages who was the possessor of a shield of extraordinary richness and workmanship. The material was of the finest gold, and the device was emblazoned with the rarest skill of the artist. The whole was of matchless beauty. It was yet disfigured by a single blemish. In an evil hour its possessor listened to the persuasions of an artificer who proposed to remove it by again subjecting it to the heat of the furnace. The experiment was made; but the same heat which removed the stain destroyed also the image upon the shield, and the whole was reduced to a shapeless mass in the crucible. He might make a new shield of the gold, but the one so cunningly sculptured, and so highly prized, was gone, alas! forever. The people of the United States are in the position of the knight, and their priceless shield is their constitutional Government. The stain, if you will, is the institution of slavery. In the fires of civil war to which the empirical artists have resorted to remove it, it may be obliterated, but the Government itself, under the operation, will be dissolved. New Governments may indeed be formed of the materials, but that of the American fathers will be no more.

Under Democratic rule, prior to the triumph of the Chicago platform, the nation was at peace, united, prosperous, and happy. Instead of a frightful civil war, desolating the land and filling with strife and bitterness the paths which lead to our dwellings, we pointed with pride to our national power, our commerce, our manufactures, our constitutional liberty; to our national monuments and works of art, which everywhere decorated the line of our progress, and were held up as the trophies of a Christian civilization.

But, alas! the change. Byron, the immortal poet, when writing his immortal verse amid the ruins of the Roman empire, said:

"Alas! the lofty city! and alas!
Alas! for Tully's voice, and Virgil's lay,
And Livy's pictured page; but these shall be
Her resurrection; all beside—decay."

In the gloom that covers the land, from the great Atlantic, where the light of the morning sun is first seen, to where his setting rays go down in the western ocean, without some patriotic sacrifice to reestablish the broken columns of a once mighty Government, the time may not be far remote when the genius of American liberty may say, Alas! for the fame of Washington and the memory of Franklin, the eloquent stories of Irving and of Prescott, the eloquence of Clay and of Webster; these may be her resurrection—all beside decay.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed an act (S. No. 51) to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. It has.

FIRE IN GLOUCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give way a moment that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ALLEY. Objection has been withdrawn to the resolution I offered a short time since in reference to the fire in Gloucester, Massachusetts.

Mr. KING. I do not design to make any objection if the gentleman will allow an amendment; otherwise I shall.

The resolution was read.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, objected.

AMBULANCE SYSTEM.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 30) to establish a uniform system of ambulances in the Army of the United States; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WARDEN OF THE JAIL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FENTON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 86, to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FINCK objected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, when the bills thereon were taken up and disposed of as indicated below.

EXPENSES OF LEVY COURT.

An act (S. No. 81) to apportion the expenses of the levy court of the county of Washington upon the basis of population was the first bill taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

NOTARIES PUBLIC, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

An act (S. No. 82) concerning notaries public of the District of Columbia was the next bill taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON CITY SAVINGS BANK.

An act (S. No. 15) to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank was the next bill taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

An act (S. No. 26) to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, was the next bill taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

An act (S. No. 77) to amend an act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company was the next bill taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

An act (S. No. 79) to incorporate the Providence hospital in the City of Washington, District of Columbia, was the next bill taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WARDEN OF THE JAIL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

An act (S. No. 86) to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia was the next bill taken from the table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. FENTON. I move to put that bill upon its passage now, and upon that I demand the previous question.

The bill was read.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from New York not to press that bill now, but to let it be referred.

Mr. FENTON. Its passage will save a large amount of money to the Government, and I cannot withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. Is there an appropriation in that bill? The SPEAKER. There is not. It establishes a new office, creates a salary, but makes no appropriation.

Mr. COX. Will it be in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. COX. I make that motion.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Brooks, James S. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, King, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James K. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Gravelly, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McDouge, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—72.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. LAW. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is not during the demand for the previous question.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. FENTON moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McDouge, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—76.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Francis P. Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Law, Lazear, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—56.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. FENTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. COX. I have been requested by a committee of citizens of this District to offer a resolution asking the use of this Hall for a meeting to consider the condition of the Indians.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of this House be appropriated on Friday evening next for a public meeting, when addresses will be delivered by John Ross and others in regard to the condition of the Indians.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to the color? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir. I do not agree with the gentleman's views as expressed in the Buckeye Abroad. [Laughter.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. Before moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I propose to extend for one hour the time fixed for general debate. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KING] desires to have half an hour, and my colleague from the Warren district [Mr. SCOFIELD] also desires to have the same length of time.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, on which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KING] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I regret the necessity imposed upon me of saying anything in relation to the local affairs of Missouri. I am one of those who are content with settling our difficulties among ourselves at home, before the people, who have the right to be the arbiters between us. But in order to gain some political advantages (I know not what else could have induced gentlemen to bring Missouri affairs before this House) gentlemen have seen proper to make a statement of facts here on which I take issue with them. I do so in justification of the people of Missouri, of the State militia, of the enrolled militia, of the provisional regiments of the State, and of our late lamented Governor. I am not here particularly the advocate of General Schofield. He has, in his military capacity, permitted some things to be done in Missouri to which I have objected. I do not intend on this occasion to allude to them, but will seek some other occasion.

But the honored position of the Governor of our State, and of the militia and military authorities of the State have been brought in question. By whom? In the first place, some forty or fifty members of the Legislature have thought it their duty to manifest against the Governor a spirit, if not of malignity, at least of hatred and ill-will. They have presented, rather delicately I think, a protest to the Senate of the United States against the confirmation of the nomination of General Schofield. I leave that matter to the Senate. I have nothing to say for or against it. But these gentlemen have made in that protest one assertion to which I make exception, and of which I deny the truth. They state that the military authorities of Missouri, the Governor and General Schofield, combined together with a view to deprive the soldiers of Missouri from voting. I say that that charge is not true. Our convention passed an ordinance by which the soldiers belonging to the State could vote in any portion of the country where they might be. It was stipulated how it should be done. The returns were to be made to the county from which the soldiers came. The county clerk, according to our laws, was to examine the poll-book, and if in accordance with the law, their votes were to be counted. I know from my own experience that these poll-books were so made out that no clerk could receive them. It may be that in that way some of the soldiers may have been deprived of their votes. What had General Schofield to do with this? No more, Mr. Chairman, than you had. Yet it is one of the accusations against him.

I come now to the reasons offered by my colleagues from the St. Joseph district, [Mr. LOAN,] from the metropolitan district, [Mr. McCLURG,] from the Springfield district, [Mr. BORD,] and from the second district, [Mr. BLOW,] They have arraigned the military authority of the United States. They have even thrown out accusations against the President of the United States. I feel under many obligations to the President for opposing what I call their false clamor in reference to the people of Missouri. What have they said? In the first place it is necessary to know whether these gentlemen are capable of being the military censors of the Governor and the commander of the department of Missouri. Who are they in a military point of view? My colleague from the St. Joseph district [Mr. LOAN] reached the position of a brigadier general of our militia. He reached that position without any military merit, and left it because the Governor had no further use for him. What was his course? I would commend with sincerity to the committee on the conduct of the war that they should examine the military general orders of my colleague, and then they will be better able to determine whether he is a fit censor of the military conduct of the commanding general of the department of Missouri.

Then there is my colleague from the metropolitan district, [Mr. McCLURG.] Before I refer to him particularly, however, I must describe the different characters of our militia. We have what is called the Missouri State militia, who are really in the service of the United States. The Governor of the State saw the necessity to have troops for Missouri, and an arrangement was made by him with the President by which he was to raise ten regiments of one thousand men each, which should be mustered into the service of the United States under the agreement that they should be kept for service in Missouri, and not taken out of the State except for the purpose of defense of the State. Well, it is one of these regiments that my colleague from the metropolitan district commanded as colonel. The only time that I ever heard of that militia hanging fire was when he went in pursuit of the rebels. They took south according to their usual practice. When my colleague's eighth regiment reached the Arkansas line they stopped pursuit of the rebels, and went on a hunt for that line. [Laughter.] He said that his contract was not to go out of the State. Some of the others went a little across the Arkansas line, and they said that they would carry out the spirit of their contract. They were not going to adhere to the mere words of the agreement. My colleague found the Arkansas line, and would go no further.

Mr. McCLURG. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. McCLURG. I give notice to this House that I will at the proper time meet my colleague's statements. I will only say now that they are false—every word false.

Mr. KING. Does my colleague say that nothing occurred when they reached the Arkansas line?

Mr. McCLURG. Ordinarily I have respect to gray hairs, but I pronounce the statement of the gentleman [Mr. KING] false, and I will take occasion when opportunity may offer to repel the charge more at length.

Mr. KING. Did nothing take place on the Arkansas line?

Mr. McCLURG. No, sir.

Mr. KING. I was not there, but I have heard from men who were there that the thing occurred just as I have stated it. I will state, in justice to the eighth Missouri regiment, that it was understood it was not their fault. I do not believe it was their fault. I shall show before I sit down that they were of the number who went after Shelby across the Arkansas river. My colleague, seeing that no laurels were to be won in that way, resigned his commission. So far as I know, he could not deploy into line or set a squadron.

Then, again, comes another of my colleagues from the Springfield district, [Mr. BORD,] a military man too. He set out to win laurels on the tented field; he was in command and got to be colonel—legitimately and properly no doubt. I was glad to hear when my young friend had reached such high honors, and I expected necessarily to hear that he would win very high honors; but he soon came to the conclusion that that was not the field for him to win honors and laurels in, and he resigned his position and took it into his head that he would change his position, and thereafter seek laurels in the civic and forensic forums of the country, and who doubts the wisdom of the choice of my colleague, [laughter,] seeing that such distinguished honors have been won on his present theater of action? [Renewed laughter.]

I will pass from my colleague from that district, and here I come to the second St. Louis district. And who represents that? Why, sir, I do not know exactly where to put him, [Mr. BLOW,] but I think his proper place is with the peace party. I commend him to the peace party; it is said there is one in the House here. I do not know exactly who compose it, but he certainly belongs to the peace party; for I have never seen and never heard of any demonstration made by him that showed that he ever thought this war ought to be put an end to by the clangor of arms and by fighting.

I have thus briefly reviewed the position of these four gentlemen, and now this House is well prepared to determine whether or not they are fit censors of the military operations of the department of Missouri. Why, sir, you would believe they ranked with Napoleon in military knowledge and military tactics by their being able to find fault in every turn and winding of the troubles we have had in Missouri. What do they say. Here is their letter:

"Until General Curtis assumed command of the department of the Missouri, about October, 1862, General Schofield, as district commander, had unlimited control of military affairs in Missouri, and his administration proved a most signal failure. Porter, in northeast Missouri, was allowed to collect, in the summer of 1862, a band of guerrillas numbering some five or six thousand, with which he ravaged the country and murdered the loyal citizens for a long space of time. Poindexter, in the central part of the State, north of the Missouri river, had a similar band of about sixteen hundred, with which he committed all kinds of outrages on the loyal citizens."

Now, sir, what would be inferred by gentlemen of this House? That these men had been allowed to do these things with perfect impunity. But what are the facts? I take up the case of Poindexter first. Yes, sir, Poindexter did undertake to ravage the country with twelve or fifteen hundred men he got together. They gathered together there as if by concert, and the first I knew of them they appeared in armed bodies. They came up into the district of my colleague from St. Joseph, [Mr. LOAN,] and he a brigadier general at St. Joseph. The first I heard of Poindexter was in the county below mine. In twenty hours after he was heard of there the enrolled militia of my county were in their saddles, and did not wait two weeks or a month for transportation. They started, being distant forty miles, and the Carroll county militia, in conjunction with Colonel Guitar, of the ninth militia, encountered some portion of Poindexter's men at Grand river and run some of them into the river, some they killed, and the remainder they scattered. The enemy retired due north on the railroad to Utica, nearly seventy-five miles from St. Joseph, where my colleague lives, but my colleague did not overtake them, though he had the use of a railroad at that. I understood for a week that my colleague was fixing up to go to our aid against Poindexter, but he waited too long for transportation.

Our militia run Poindexter across the road ten miles up to Spring Hill, and there they pressed him so tight that he put off in an eastern direction. Colonel Guitar was watching his movements, but my colleague fell into the rear a long way off, and afterwards Poindexter was encountered by Colonel Guitar. Our militia pressed ahead, and Poindexter's force was scattered.

Mr. LOAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOAN. Will the gentleman tell me who was in command of those forces from his county?

Mr. KING. Who was the head officer of the militia that followed up Poindexter I cannot tell. I can tell very clearly that my colleague was not.

Mr. LOAN. I desire to say a word in explanation of this matter.

Mr. KING. I have no objection, if it does not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done only by unanimous consent. Is there any objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOAN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say that when Colonel Guitar drove the rebels under Poindexter across Grand river I was then on the way, having received instructions from General Schofield the evening before. They crossed the railroad an hour after my train passed. I received the information by telegraph. At eight o'clock I was in the saddle after them, while General Guitar was resting his forces. I drove them through the Spring Hill country until the next day, when General Guitar, lying on the road as I drove them past, took up the pursuit. We were in the saddle for thirty-four hours, and I never in that time saw any of the gentleman's county militia in the command.

Mr. KING. I remember very well that the gentleman [Mr. LOAN] fell in the wake of the pursuing party after Poindexter. I remember all that. My colleague says that he was on the way when Poindexter got clear out of his reach. I believe he was. I heard he was. Our militia had driven Poindexter more than seventy-five miles. He aimed to get to Randolph county, where he lived. His forces were scattered. General Guitar kept on the right hand side of the railroad, while our militia followed them on the other side, supposing they would turn to the right. They were again encountered and again scattered. They then got into small detached parties, and got into Randolph county, where is the residence of one of my colleagues, who will bear testimony to what I say.

The Randolph militia rallied, and in a short time they picked up some two hundred of the Poindexter men—Poindexter himself among the rest. He was taken to Macon City, a military post, and on a dark and stormy night he attempted to break, and did break from the guards. They fired at him and he was wounded. But he got off and made his way back to Randolph county. Hearing that mercy had been promised to all who would surrender themselves, and his wound being bad, he came in voluntarily and surrendered himself. His band was entirely dispersed. He was taken to St. Louis, and remained in Gratiot street prison for nearly a year. He was indicted, and stands to-day indicted in the United States circuit court of St. Louis for high treason, and is now out on bail. That was the end of the Poindexter raid.

The House might have been led to believe, from what gentlemen have said, that these men were regular freebooters and were allowed to carry on their operations uninterrupted on the part of the people. Nothing of the kind. Poindexter, so far as his operations were concerned, went the way of all flesh, and has never troubled us since. That is due to our Missouri militia.

My colleague says that Porter had five thousand men assembled under his banner. Porter was a little lower down the country. There were three brothers of these Porters, active, energetic men. They had their forces in Calloway county. General Guitar, with about a thousand men, encountered Porter at Moor's Mills, in Calloway county. Porter's forces were four to one larger than those of General Guitar. It was the hardest fought battle ever fought on the north side of the Missouri river during the war. Porter was routed, and retreated northward, crossing the railroad somewhere about Macon City. Colonel McNeil was in command with our militia down about Palmyra. He came up, took the lead in the pursuit with fresh horses, and followed Porter to the county seat of Adair county. McNeil fought with and routed Porter's forces, which then took an easterly direction toward the head of Yellow creek. There Lieutenant Colonel Woolfolk of the first Missouri State militia again encountered them, and finally these five thousand men of Porter's were dispersed and scattered to the four winds. Porter with a few of his men got across the Missouri river, started south, and got to near Rolla, where he was encountered by another portion of our State militia, and was killed; and there he was buried. Such was the end of Porter.

These gentlemen, sir, would have the commander of the department of Missouri and the militia of Missouri to be brought into disrepute because Poindexter and Porter had been allowed to ravage the country. They undertook to leave the impression that it was because there was a sort of rebel sympathy among the Missouri militia, and that they permitted this ravage of the territory of their State. I deny that they allowed these marauders any sort of mercy. They cleaned out Poindexter and Porter, as I have already shown.

There is another charge, that under the Administration the movements against the rebellion have been intrusted to the hands of those who are in sympathy with the rebellion. Let me quote the language of those gentlemen. They say:

"Under this Administration Federal guns, as a general rule, in western Missouri, and it is believed throughout the State, have been intrusted to the hands of those in sympathy with the rebellion, to the almost entire exclusion of those of known loyalty. And one of the consequences resulting therefrom was, that a band of guerrillas, some fifteen hundred in number, penetrated to the city of Boonville, the geographical center of the State, murdering the citizens, and plundering, burning, and destroying property along their route. Another was the massacre and destruction of property at Lawrence."

In reference to the Shelby raid, I have the report of General Brown. It is charged by my colleagues that the militia by their disloyal associations and organization permitted Shelby and his freebooters to ravage the country, that they were allowed to do what they pleased, with no one to interfere with them. I hold in my hand the report of General Brown. Let us see what the facts are in reference to that raid. I will not quote it all. On the 10th of October, 1863, General Brown reported that after ascertaining that Shelby had crossed the Osage and moving in a direction toward Boonville, he had him closely pressed by Lieutenant Colonel Lazear of the first M. S. M., a part of the fourth M. S. M., and portions of the fifth and ninth provisional regiments E. M. M., making in all about one thousand men. On the 11th the enemy were hotly pursued in the country between Otterville and Boonville. On the 12th it was discovered that Shelby must be in or about Boonville, and Lieutenant Houts, of the seventh M. S. M., with a small force was sent forward, who encountered the enemy's advance, killing one, and mortally wounding the commander and two others. Shelby, being hard pressed, left Boonville in a south west direction, crossing the Lamine. General Brown, crossing the same stream near the mouth of Blackwater, attacked Shelby's rearguard, forcing the enemy to make a stand, when a sharp fight commenced, and after a running fight for several miles, the enemy were forced to give battle on the Salt Fork of the Lamine. They opened with musketry and artillery. General Brown then goes on in his official report to say:

"We fought him until dark, in the midst of a drenching rain. The enemy lost sixteen killed and a number wounded. One man of Thurbur's battery killed, being the only casualty on our side."

"Here I was joined by Lieutenant Colonel Lazear's command. My united forces consisting of the seventh M. S. M., Colonel J. P. Phillips, detachments of the first M. S. M., Lieutenant Colonel Lazear, the fourth M. S. M., Major Kelly, the fifth Provisional E. M. M., Major Gentry, the ninth Provisional E. M. M., and four small guns of Thurbur's first M. S. M. battery, amounting to about sixteen hundred men."

"At three o'clock a. m. of the 13th I ordered Lieutenant Colonel Lazear to march with his command to a road to the left direct to Marshall. At daylight I marched in the enemy's trail toward the Arrow Rock and Marshall road, and thence toward Marshall. The enemy attacked Lieutenant Colonel Lazear at eight a. m. near Marshall, the latter occupying the town. I arrived on the field about half past nine o'clock. Finding the bridge and ford across the Salt Fork disputed by about a regiment of the enemy, Majors Suess and Houts, seventh M. S. M., with three companies and two pieces of Thurbur's battery, engaged them, and covered the crossing of the main force about three quarters of a mile below, attacking the enemy on his left flank, while Major Suess, after crossing the bridge, attacked them in rear. The enemy soon gave way, and, on being hard pressed, broke in every direction, losing his best piece of artillery, a ten-pounder, the main body retreating toward Miami, Colonel Phillips, taking up the pursuit, fighting him to a point six miles south of Miami, and ten miles from Marshall. Here Colonel Phillips bivouacked during the night, following the enemy to the Missouri river, and thence south through Waverly next day, capturing all of his transportation, ambulances, five wagon loads of fixed ammunition, five hundred pounds of rifle powder, and a number of mules and horses."

"Part of the rebel force, about three hundred, under Hunter, was heard from, moving east, and I dispatched Major Houts, with two companies of the seventh M. S. M. and two companies of the forty-third E. M. M., commanded by Captain Hart, in pursuit. Major Kelly, with a battalion of the fourth M. S. M. and Gentry's battalion of the fifth Provisional E. M. M., marched toward Sedalia, arriving there on the night of the 14th. Lieutenant Colonel Lazear, of the first M. S. M., marched toward Lexington, pushing forward rapidly, and got ahead of Colonel Phillips, who gave up the pursuit (his horses being nearly worn out) to Lieutenant Colonel Lazear. Colonel Wier, of General Ewing's forces, who had moved north through Clinton, on the night of the 13th had arrived at a point ten miles south of Marshall, and on the morning of the 14th marched west, with the expectation of being able to intercept the enemy south of Lexington; shortly after relieved Lazear's troops, the former having fresh horses, and pursued the enemy west of Warrensburg."

"I returned to Sedalia on the night of the 14th, leaving two companies of the seventh M. S. M. to scout the country east and west of Marshall as far as the Missouri river for stragglers from the shattered rebel forces. On arriving at Sedalia I dispatched Colonel Hall, of the fourth M. S. M., with fresh troops in pursuit of that part of the enemy which had gone east and had crossed the Pacific railroad near Otterville, relieving Major Houts's command. Colonel Hall followed this part of the forces of the enemy across the Osage, and gave up the pursuit when he found General McNeil's troops had obtained the advance with fresh horses."

"As soon as I became satisfied that the enemy were broken up into small bodies, scouting parties were ordered to move through all parts of this district, and attack straggling bands, and secure as much abandoned property as possible. This has been successfully done."

"The enemy entered this district at Warsaw on the 8th with sixteen hundred well-armed men, soon increased to about eighteen hundred by two bands that joined him from the east. Within twenty-four hours afterwards he was attacked, and for four days a running fight was kept up until he was forced to make a stand at Marshall with the result as stated."

"When the raid began the troops of the district were stationed over a tract of country one hundred and twenty miles square, occupying thirty-seven posts. In seven days they were concentrated, and marched two hundred and eighty miles, (some of the command over three hundred,) without trains, and but a scanty subsistence, three days and nights in rain, and have killed and wounded a large number of the enemy, capturing about one hundred prisoners, with a part of his artillery and arms, and all of his trains, ambulances, and ammunition wagons. As the skirmishing and fighting extended over one hundred miles of thickly wooded country no reliable report of the exact loss of the enemy can be made."

"The loss on our side was five killed, twenty-six wounded, and eleven missing and captured, making a total of forty-two. We had seventeen horses killed, thirty-four wounded, and sixty-one broken down and abandoned on the march. Total loss of horses one hundred and twelve."

"The troops of this district deserve the especial consideration of the major general commanding, for their courage, endurance, and the cheerful manner they have done their duty. Without being invidious, I may be permitted to express my obligations to Colonel George H. Hall, Colonel John F. Phillips, Lieutenant Colonel B. Lazear, Majors Foster, Houts, Suess, Kelly, Williams, and Gentry, and Captain Thurbur, for their active cooperation, and to the members of my staff, Lieutenant Colonel T. A. Switzer, Dr. R. P. Richardson, and Lieutenant R. G. Loaming, for their assistance."

"It is with peculiar pleasure that I refer to the orderly conduct of the troops in the respect paid to the rights of the citizens, notwithstanding their privations and exposure on their fatiguing marches."

"To the citizens of Sedalia and the country generally, and to the enrolled Missouri militia who readily obeyed the call to arms, the State is in part indebted for the unsuccessful issue of the raid."

Then came General McNeil, then in command of the southwest district, the same who won his star by his gallant conduct in so signally aiding to drive Porter and his band from North Missouri. I here read from his official report, which shows he put an end to the Shelby raid, which will stand as a beacon warning against such raids in the future, especially when they will have to meet the Missouri militia.

I read from the report. General McNeil says:

"I at once addressed myself to the work of concentrating force enough for pursuit when the enemy should cross the Osage on his retreat south."

"With about two hundred and sixty men and a section of Rabb's battery I marched to Bolivar, where General Holland was in camp with part of two regiments of enrolled militia and a demi-battery under Lieutenant Stover. Leaving the general directions to observe and pursue Coffee and Hunter, if they should cross the Osage at Warsaw, I marched in the direction of Lamar, via Humansville and Stockton, to cut off Shelby, who was reported in full flight south of Snyder, with General Ewing in pursuit. At Stockton I was joined by Major King, sixth cavalry M. S. M., with three hundred and seventy-five men of the sixth and eighth M. S. M. The force had entered Humansville from the north, in pursuit of Hunter and Coffee, four hours after I had passed through it toward the west."

"Major King attacked and drove this force through Humansville, capturing their last cannon."

"Finding that Shelby had passed through Stockton in advance of me, I marched to Greenfield and Sarcoxie via Bower's mill, and on the night of the 19th camped at Keltsville, when I soon learned of scouts of Colonel Phelps, commanding at Cassville, that the enemy had crossed the telegraph road at Cross Timbers that day about noon."

"I kept up a rapid pursuit, following the trail of our flying foe via Sugar creek and Early's ferry to Huntsville. Our advance party, entering Huntsville with a dash, took quite a number of soldiers, (of Brooks's rebel command,) with their horses and arms. I was there joined by Colonel Edwards, eighteenth Iowa infantry, with three hundred men of his regiment, and Major Hunt, first Arkansas cavalry volunteers, one hundred and seventy-five men, and two mountain howitzers. This gave me an effective force of six hundred cavalry and three hundred infantry, with four guns, two of these being 12-pounder mountain howitzers. We had here information that Shelby and Brooks had united their forces, on War Eagle creek, and that Hunter and Coffee were also there, the combined force amounting to twenty-five hundred men. We marched toward this camp to attack, but found that the enemy had gone."

"On the 24th we marched across a tremendous mountain, called Buffalo mountain, and finding the enemy in camp in a snug little valley on the other side attacked and drove him at sundown, dropping into his camp. The mountain on the other side was too steep and the passes too narrow for a night pursuit, and we had to content ourselves by waiting for the light of the morning. At early dawn we struck again into the mountains; our advance, under Major Hunt, first Arkansas cavalry, was skirmishing with the enemy all day, driving them before us. On the 25th, while engaged in an attack on the enemy's rear-guard, who were posted in a narrow pass, Lieutenant Robinson, of the first Arkansas cavalry, was mortally wounded. He was brought into camp, and died that night at ten o'clock."

"On the 27th we marched into Clarksville, and learned that Shelby had made good his escape and crossed the river, and that Brooks had gone down into the valley of the Big Piney, with instructions to pick up stragglers from the rebel army and to cut off any train that might be coming to me from Fayetteville."

"My cavalry and artillery horses were too badly used up to permit of pursuit across the river, so I turned my course toward Fort Smith."

"Although I have been disappointed in my earnest hope to attack and destroy the forces under Shelby, I am confident of having done all that man could do under the circumstances. We have driven the enemy so that he had to stick to the road, and thus prevented a widely extended pillage both in Missouri and Arkansas."

"We have taken forty-four prisoners, besides discharging as many more who were conscripts. We have killed and wounded many of his men, and driven numbers to the mountains where he will not easily get them again. The captures in horses were also large."

"My officers and men bore the fatigue and exposure of this campaign without tents and on small rations, in a manner to excite my admiration. Colonels Edwards and Cathey were earnest in their coöperations in duty. Majors King, Eno, and Hunt were always ready for any duty assigned to them. Major King deserves especial mention for his gallant attack on the enemy at Humansville on the 15th, in which he captured the last cannon the enemy brought into Missouri with him, a six-pounder brass gun. Major Hunt, with his battalion of Arkansians, were, on account of their knowledge of the country, pushed forward in the advance from Huntsville to Clarksville. This duty was promptly and cheerfully performed by the major and his gallant command, who drove the enemy from every position, killing and wounding many, and taking prisoners at every charge."

"To Captain Rabb, chief of artillery, and Lieutenant Wicker, Rabb's battery, and Johnson's section of howitzers, I am under obligations for services which mark them as true soldiers. Lieutenant Barlie, quartermaster of the sixth cavalry, Missouri State militia, acted as chief quartermaster of the expedition, and gave unqualified satisfaction. Lieutenant Sell, commissary of the same regiment, acted as chief commissary, acquitting himself with great credit."

You will see that General McNeil drove them until there was scarcely one of them left. He drove them across the Arkansas river. He took from them in the mean time the only cannon they had left. That, Mr. Chairman, is the kind of sympathy that these rebels had when they came into Missouri. It refutes the charges made against my people. Shelby is a man of observation. He is a man of intelligence. He lived in La Fayette county, on the border of Saline. Last August my colleagues, every one of them, came to Washington in conjunction with others, and made statements of the disloyal sympathies of the people of Missouri. As soon as Shelby heard that, he believed what they said to be true, and he took it into his head to gather up a band and make a raid. General Brown states that Shelby had eighteen hundred troops while he had only a thousand. Upon the statements of my colleagues Shelby took it into his head, "As there are no United States troops there, I can go in, and the militia will be 'hail fellows well met.' I have seen what their Representatives say about them."

They will mess with me; they will give me every facility to ravage the State." But he was mistaken. He found a Tartar.

This was not like the case of General Price. When he came to Lexington he had four thousand troops, one half of whom were ragged, destitute, some barefoot, some without hats or jackets. This was the kind of force he had. Yet when he came, the beau-ideal military commander of these gentlemen, General Frémont, was commanding the department of Missouri. He had twenty to thirty thousand men. Price arrived at Lexington on the 12th of September, and remained there till the 1st of October. He might have remained for two weeks longer with impunity. He started off on the right road, the Fort Scott road, making his escape from the country. It took Frémont two weeks to find which way he had gone, because he was fortifying at Jefferson City, one hundred and thirty miles east of Lexington, which fortifications are to be seen now as a monument of his folly, if they have not been removed within a few months. Even at St. Louis they were digging ditches and raising up embankments, and there those intrenchments stand today monuments of folly for fear that Price with his army would come there; and it took them about two weeks, as I know, to find out which way Price had gone. Not so with the Missouri militia. They did not wait two or three weeks to get transportation for thirty or forty miles. No, sir. As McNeil says, and as Brown says, they evinced all the alacrity which it is possible for men to do, and underwent all the privations that men could endure. Comparisons, I believe, are sometimes odious. They are not well to be made sometimes, but I necessarily make them here in order to justify the alacrity with which the Missouri militia defended themselves and their country.

We have no use to-day for any soldiers of the United States in the State of Missouri. Our own militia are sufficient. I was glad when the United States soldiers came there. We were unarmed and unorganized when they came to our assistance. I greeted them then as I would greet them to-day. Some thought they ought not to have come there; but my opinion was that they did not come an hour too soon. But times have changed since. We have now no need for them. We had then no arms. The rebels had got the start of us. While we were standing in amazement and astonishment at the boldness of their acts, they supplied themselves with arms. Somehow or other they had arms. After a while an order came that we should all be disarmed. The consequence was that we had nothing to fight with. Then began the thieving, robbing, murdering, assassinations, arson, and all kinds of offenses known to the catalogue of crime. The troubles commenced, and we appealed to our Governor for protection; and I was asked, "Why did not you fight yourselves? Why did you not defend yourselves?" "How can we do it? We have no arms; you have taken our arms away from us. Give us arms; let us feel our manhood, and we will defend ourselves." Finally the militia were enrolled, and those who sympathized with the rebels were told to step aside. Some complained that the militia were put into the service while the rebels were exempt. We did exempt them, because we did not know but what we would have to fight them. There were rebel sympathizers all around us. Since we have got our arms we ask no odds of our enemy in Missouri—the enemy of our Government and our country.

What will our Missouri militia say when they come to see the conduct of these gentlemen? What will they say? In the letter which they addressed to the President they tell him that this matter of the organization of the State militia is a subject of serious consideration, and that doubts have been expressed as to the authority of the State government to organize this militia; that they have had the opinion of the most distinguished jurists of that State that there was no authority for the Governor to have the militia enrolled in order to ascertain our strength. It would have been agreeable to me to have had the names of those distinguished jurists. I suppose I would have had to measure them by the standard of my colleagues; and if I had done that, I probably should not have been astonished at their opinion.

But who was a better jurist than Governor Gamble, the head of the bar of that State, an able man who has distinguished himself in this Capitol, in the United States Supreme Court, a man distinguished everywhere as a jurist, a man who never acted upon impulse? If I were to pin my faith to any man's judicial opinion as to the power of the Governor and our State to arm the militia, I would do it on the opinion of Governor Gamble.

But with my notions, I do not want anybody to tell me we had a right to defend ourselves and aid our Government in putting down this rebellion. I know the Governor had no right to order men into service in conflict with the General Government. Claib. Jackson tried that, and he misled many a poor man; men for whom my better heart rises in pity, not in sympathy with them as rebels at all, but because under a traitor Legislature and a traitor Governor they were organized into a State guard and were drawn into the rebel ranks under false pretenses. Speeches were made all over the country, and these men were not told that they were expected to rebel against the Government. To one young man they would say, "Come and join my company." "I do not care about that." "Well, if you will not do that, you will be drafted. Join, and you shall have a hand in choosing your own officers." In that way the enthusiastic young men of the country were drawn into these traitorous—as they turned out to be—rebel companies. Before they knew it, they were in a trap. Then they were told, "You are into it now, and if you return you will be hung or shot." Thus some of the best young men in the country were driven into this rebellion. I knew at the time that the move was intended against the Government. Not so with Governor Gamble.

When these gentlemen undertake to libel the Missouri militia, I ask them to designate where that militia failed to do its duty; and when they do designate the times and places, I will engage to answer them, as I have done in the cases of Poindexter, Porter, and Shelby. There is no doubt as to the loyalty of the Missouri militia. But very great complaint is made about what is called provisional regiments. I will tell the House how that organization came about. Many men in the enrolled militia had their business to attend to, their farms, and their crops. Their lands had to be left uncultivated while they were in pursuit of Poindexter, Porter, and Shelby. There were some eighty regiments. It was found that some men could well be spared, having no business to attend to, and no families to support, and therefore it was arranged that these provisional regiments should be got up into which all the young men who chose to remain in the service might be transferred. There was nothing wrong in that. And yet it has been charged that this movement was treasonable toward the Government. It was no such thing.

I must recur again to the delegation which visited the President last August, and refer to their transduction of the Missouri militia on that occasion. This delegation in their communication to the President say:

"We desire, Mr. President, distinctly to invoke your attention to the organization by Governor Gamble of the enrolled militia of Missouri. It is a matter in which, in our judgment, the Government of the United States is concerned. We have already stated that it is the opinion of many of the ablest jurists of our State, that the organization of that militia force is without any warrant of law."

The delegation further said:

"In regard to this whole matter of the enrolled militia, we would further respectfully suggest whether it is consistent with the Constitution of the United States for such a force to be organized and kept under arms by any State authorities; and we hope it may please you, Mr. President, to cause that point to be investigated. But whether so or not, we beg leave with all respect to protest against the further continuance of that system in Missouri."

To all of which the President complimented the Missouri militia and turned a deaf ear to their importunate demands.

But, again, let us recur to what General Brown says of our militia. In a letter received a few days since, connected with some needed legislation for our militia, he says:

"I have had the honor to have had under my command during the past twenty months about an equal number of each class of these troops, and I should do great injustice to the militia if I did not bear witness to their loyalty, bravery, and efficiency in the field. They have not been outdone by their companions in arms in the other branches of the military."

Again, General Rosecrans, on taking command of the department of Missouri, thus speaks of General Schofield:

"In relieving General Schofield, who, in assuming the arduous duties connected with the command, relinquished high prospects of a brilliant career as commander of Thomas's old division in the then opening campaign of the army of the Cumberland, I tender him my compliments for the admirable order in which I have found the official business and archives of this department, and my best wishes as well as hopes that in his new field of duty he may reap that success which his solid merits, good sense, and honest devotion to duty and his country so well deserve."

I place the opinions of these distinguished generals about our militia and the commander of our department in contrast with the great military experience of my colleagues.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. Dawson] who addressed the House this morning informed us that it was just eight years since he had spoken here before. I knew that, not because I have followed his personal history, but I knew it by the tenor of his speech. He must have turned down a leaf just eight years ago, and begun to-day where he left off then. The speech might have been appropriately made during the earlier years of the administration of General Pierce. I wish to remind him that the question involved in the struggle now furnishing so many sad pages for history is a question of division: "Shall the great Republic be divided into two small ones?" That is the question now before the country. Those who took the affirmative of this question, in the first place, took up arms with which to defend it. They knew they could not maintain it in debate. They knew they could never satisfy the American people that a Government always so tender of the interests of its poorest citizen, and so strong to defend him, could be as useful when divided into two nationalities not more than half as strong, territorially ill-shaped, and politically hostile. They did not try, but haughtily said to the country:

"Think of division as thou wilt,
We try the question, hilt to hilt."

They gave but one reason for it. They said that some people—I believe they said a great many people—had spoken unkindly of their system of labor. That was all. I defy any gentleman to point out any other reason given by them for the position taken. But do not misunderstand me. I do not mean to say that so large a number of gentlemen, talented as we know, honest as we formerly thought, were moved to espouse disunion from a trivial motive. Their motive was as I have stated it to be. But, in my judgment, it was very far from being a trivial one. They wished to preserve that system of labor, why? Because they had $2,000,000,000 in it. They had more than that, for I believe they were never distinguished as an avaricious people. Their aristocracy, family pride, political power, (a great item,) their habits of life, and what is as valuable to them as anything else, their cherished vices, ease, and idleness, all were in it. Of course they wanted to preserve it. They knew, however, that the institution was founded in wrong, and could not bear to be talked against. In a free forum it must go under. Allow me to use a figure. An iceberg breaking away from the pole and floating down into warmer latitudes gradually loses its frigidity, and dissolves in the warmer elements around it. So slavery, originating in the barbaric periods of the world, and floating down to this benighted age, was beginning to melt away in the warm breath of debate. To preserve slavery, therefore, debate must cease, or slavery be taken out of hearing—silence or secession seemed their only alternative. When silence could not be obtained they chose secession.

I know some other things were said. I know they said that the North would not turn out with constitutional alacrity to catch and return their fugitive bondmen; but they, like other similar complaints, were rather incidents of the main trouble than original causes of dissatisfaction. They were thrown out only to catch the minnows found in the great ocean of northern politics. The great leaders cared nothing for this small percentage of loss, smaller than in many other kinds of investment. They cared nothing for the few leaves that were here and there detached and lost in the ordinary breeze; it was the little streams of thought that were slowly washing the soil away from the root of the tree that alarmed them. Therefore, while we of the North talked about walling slavery in, lest freedom should be contaminated, they were considering how to wall freedom out, that slavery might remain pure. They decided upon disunion. They stated their purpose clearly, and took a name that indicated it honestly. They called themselves disunionists. They even pointed out the line where the surveyor should blaze the trees and separate the free from the slave republic. They kindly gave to the twenty or thirty millions of unmixed white population the sterile hills of New England, the bleak shores of the lakes, and the head-streams and flatboat navigation of the Mississippi. The body of the Mississippi, with its stream of commercial wealth, unfailing as its own waters, the long Atlantic and Gulf coast, the vast country lying below Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Iowa, and stretching westward without limit, embracing the soft climate and warm soil of the South—all this, said they, we will take for the master and his slave.

Thus the issue was made up on the one side. There was no alternative left for the other. Those opposed to division were compelled—you will remember how unwillingly—to take up arms and submit the cause of the Union to the chances of battle. They organized under the appropriate name of the Union party. The old flag was hoisted, the long roll beaten, and the opponents of division everywhere called upon to "fall in." Straightway, then, began some to make excuses. Says one, "I am opposed to division; but coercion is unconstitutional: I pray you have me excused." James Buchanan said that in his last annual message. Says another, "I am opposed to division, and I think coercion is constitutional; but I believe it is impracticable. I think the United States is not strong enough to put down a rebellion so extensive, and led by men of so much ability, pride, and courage. I cannot, therefore join you to try. I pray you have me excused." Says a third, "I am opposed to division, and I believe that coercion is both constitutional and practicable; but there is an easier and better way. You can compromise. They only ask you to cease talking against slavery, and if you will not agree to that I too shall ask to be excused." And so these three classes, each for a different reason, moved off by themselves, and formed the nucleus of what subsequently became a great party of neutrality, observation, and criticism. It was said the other day by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] that there were but two parties in this country, patriots and traitors. I beg leave to differ from my friend. I think there are three, patriots, traitors, and neutrals. But I will not quarrel with him if he should say, as I think a high-spirited Kentuckian would, that he had more admiration for the mad courage of treason than for the mean cowardice of neutrality.

Let me pause here to answer the question sometimes yet asked, "Why did you not compromise? If they only wanted you to agree to cease talking about their system of labor, why did you not agree?" It was not lack of dough—we had, I am ashamed to acknowledge, dough enough to make a whole oven-full of compromises. It was not because the Unionists were not pliant, but because the disunion leaders were not fools. They knew that a contract for silence could never be enforced unless your republican Government was converted into an absolute monarchy. What is a republic, except the right to think and to express your thoughts by your voice and your vote? The Frenchman trades, travels, and seeks his pleasure as freely as an American. The Emperor takes no note of these. It is the free thought or the insurgent conscience that wears the imperial chain in France. These leaders knew that talk would go on in spite of contract, and therefore they did not ask and would not accept your worthless parchment. They had tried it. They had the Atherton gag and the Democratic and Whig resolutions of 1852 forbidding discussion, and the whole power of the Pierce and Buchanan Administrations to enforce their views. Former Administrations, although much devoted to the interests of slavery, found time to attend to some other matters. Polk, I think it was, explored the "Dead Sea" of the Old World, and Fillmore sounded the depths of a dead sea at home for himself and his party; but Pierce and Buchanan devoted themselves entirely to this single purpose. They put on the master's collar and wore it as a thing of honor, and never seemed prouder than when they saw their southern friends spelling out the inscription, "This is Gerth, the bondman of Cedric the Saxon." These influences were ably wielded by an experienced corps of slave Representatives in these Halls and around this Capitol. They were men that combined the opposite qualities of gentleness and severity so fitting to a leader. They knew how to win the bold and overawe the timid. They were gentlemen among bullies and bullies among gentlemen. But with all these powers combined they could not close the mouth—will it please you any better if I say fanatical mouth?—of Wendell Phillips alone. And so they spurred you too pliant offer.

Three years have passed—years fraught, as it seems to us at a distance, with great ruin to the South, with loss and heavy sorrow, as we know, to the North. How stand the three parties now? The disunion emblem is still upborne, less firmly than at first; and the area on which its hateful shadow falls is two thirds less than in the beginning. Still it flies its signal word—"division." All the proclamations and messages of Davis, his governors and generals, all the laws and resolutions of his congress and State legislatures talk of nothing, ask for nothing but division. Will the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD], who talks to us so much about peace, take notice that in all those official documents, if they can be called official, division is the only aim and end proposed?

How stands the Union party? Well, sir, our flag, I believe, is still floating, held more firmly than in the beginning, sustained by the courage—no, sir, that is not the word I mean exactly; by the patriotism of the American people—and that is not the word I want to express my particular shade of meaning; it is upheld, I believe, by a stronger sentiment than courage or patriotism—by the sense of duty and stern conscience of the American people. And if you want to find which is strongest, pride and courage on the one hand, or conscience and sense of duty on the other, read the history of the Cromwellian war, and you will learn that the proud Cavalier has to yield in the end to the conscientious Roundhead. And so it will be now. The motto of the Union party is the same as it was in the beginning. We unite the language of Jackson, "The Union it must and shall be preserved," and the language of Webster, "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

But where stands the neutral party; the party of "ifs," "ands," and excuses? Have you been here for three months now, occasionally presiding over this House, and do not know that there they stand—[pointing to the Democratic side of the Hall]—as they stood three years ago, occupying the same position of bloodless neutrality? They have not changed their ground, though they give a different reason for holding it. They do not now say that coercion is unconstitutional. They do not now generally say that it is impossible, nor that anything you can give to the rebels by way of compromise will make their condition any better than it was before they rebelled. They generally concede that the rebellion must be suppressed by force of arms or the Union be divided. But they say the President is always so unfortunate as to select unconstitutional means to effect what they now see, though they did not at first, is a constitutional purpose. And so they remain spectators; spectators in a war which involves the life of this nation and the fortunes of forty millions of people whose interests are associated with it. More than that; it involves the fortunes of the oppressed and middle classes all over the world; for ours is the world's representative Republic. But to do them justice, I must say they are not indifferent spectators. There they stand, glass in hand, or "nose all spectacle bestrid," looking anxiously for some fortunate mistake in council or some cheering disaster in the field, which will fulfill their evil predictions and justify their position of neutrality before the world. Their music is a line of Yankee Doodle and a half line of Dixie, filled out with the "rub-a-dub-dub" of complaint and evil prophecy.

But, although neutral, they are not idle. They have a great deal to do. They have to see that this war is conducted with Christian tenderness on our part, though met with savage atrocity on the other. They have to see that treason-tainted, slave-earned wealth escapes confiscation, though it impose a heavier burden on the honest earnings of loyal men. They have to see that your credit is decrased, and the taxes necessary to support it denounced, and then to complain to the country that "legal tenders" are not equal to gold. They have to see that a favorite general has an unlimited and untrammelled command, and that he is not held responsible for opportunities neglected or battles lost. They have to see that all possible, at least all constitutional objections are thrown in the way of the exercise of the elective franchise by the Union soldiers in the field; and that the freest elections are secured to the unpardonable secessionist in the rebel and border States. They have to see that practical amalgamation goes on undisturbed by any unconstitutional interference with the slave system of the South, while they falsely charge theoretical amalgamation on the virtuous people of the North. They have, too, to see that that portion of their followers who overestimate the abilities of the negro or underestimate their own, or perhaps have a proper appreciation of both, are held to party vassalage by constant dread of negro emulation. They have to see that their weaker brethren are educated into the belief that the negro is only fit for a slave and can never be anything else; and then to distress them with apprehensions that they may yet be compelled to compete with him in the industrial and professional pursuits of life, where brains, not color, will ascribe to each his just measure of success.

These are only specimens of the multitudinous labors of this neutral organization. If I were to go on with a full catalogue I would exhaust your patience and my strength. I want, however, to call the attention of the committee to one thing more.

The main allegation, the one always relied upon to justify their neutrality before the world, is that the war is conducted with a view of overthrowing slavery as well as the rebellion. If this allegation were true, what a position for a statesman to take; what a position for any man to take who expects to leave a name that will be remembered when he is gone, and a posterity condemned to bear it! It might do for James Buchanan—for God in His infinite mercy has provided that no child shall wear through life a name of such deep dishonor—but for nobody else. But, sir, it is not true in the sense in which it is alleged. It is not true that the war is carried on for the purpose of abolishing slavery. Those who believe it mistake an incident for the purpose of the war—the means employed for the end desired. You might as well say when we battered down Pulaski and Sumter that that was the object of the war.

The President's great proclamation is urged in evidence of this allegation. The President saw that Great Britain was furnishing arms to the rebels. He invited that nation to desist, and accompanied his invitation with some promises and some threats. Great Britain desisted. The President saw that the slave was furnishing the rebels with food, clothing, labor, and fortifications; and he invited the slave to desist, accompanying that invitation with no threats, but with a single promise, the promise of freedom. That is all there is in the proclamation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman states that the object of the proclamation of emancipation was to disturb the labor which supplied the rebels with food, &c. I know that the President has given that as the object of the proclamation; but I ask the gentleman if that can be so, in view of the fact which he recollects, that the proclamation itself advises the slaves to remain quiet and continue to labor for wages?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I do not now recollect the language of the proclamation, but I do not understand that he advised them to work for the rebels. The advice given was designed to avoid apprehended insurrections. The purpose of the President was to diminish the support furnished to the rebel cause by the slave. This purpose might have been strengthened in the honest heart of the President by some kinder sentiment than a cold military policy, and if so I will leave it to others to see that he is properly denounced. It is enough for me to know that it was a master-stroke of military strategy which no general has to my knowledge as yet publicly condemned. As far as possible, the slave has since brought us not only his labor, but an army of one or two hundred thousand men. Who now wants this promise recalled? If not recalled, who wants it violated in the future? Who wants the colored army disbanded and sent back to their rebel masters and white men drafted in their stead? Will you of the neutral party dare to answer these questions in the affirmative? If you carry the next election will you violate the President's promise to the slave? Will you say to the negro soldier, "Leave the battle-fields of our country and seek again the cotton-fields of your rebel master. Your blood has stained, though not dishonored the one, the unpaid sweat of your brow shall hereafter moisten and enrich the other?"

Again, the President saw, or rather the people saw—for our cautious President, I am glad to say, does not attempt to do the people's thinking, and sometimes hardly keeps out of the way of the wheels of rapidly advancing popular sentiment—that every State redeemed from this un-republican system of labor was thus placed beyond confederate desire. Such a State was considered by the rebel builders unfit for an edifice whose corner-stone was slavery. They wanted no free State in their confederacy to preach anti-slavery by a prosperous example. They said this at Montgomery when they made their constitution, and have always said it since. We knew it was true if they had not said it at all. If the border States become free they do not want them in the confederacy, while without them their territory becomes so insignificant that they do not want a confederacy.

The Administration, therefore, encouraged emancipation in the loyal slave States as the best mode of bringing the war to a successful issue. Under that encouragement slavery has been abolished in the District of Columbia and three or four States. The neutrals have opposed and denounced this progress step by step. If intrusted with the power at the next election they are pledged to undo all that has been so wisely done. They will reestablish slavery in the District of Columbia, and, so far as their influence will go, in all the border States. They must, to be consistent, reenact the slave code and rebuild the slave prison, and having got all things in readiness, they must call upon their party friends, and, armed with lassoes and handcuffs, start out upon a grand hunt for the emancipated and scattered bondmen.

On the other hand, the Union party have resolved that, with the blessing of God, this country shall not only remain an undivided country, but, now that the necessities of the war and the humanity of the age require it, it shall become a free country. The shadow of your flag shall never grow less, nor shall it darken the life of the humblest man beneath it. The Union shall be restored, and the United States, the simple name that Washington gave us, shall be the name and indicate the character of this country for all time to come. And it shall be a name that the poor will love and the proud fear all over the world.

The CHAIRMAN. When the bill was last under consideration the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] moved to amend the clause "for pay of commission, warrant, and petty officers and seamen, including the engineer corps of the Navy, $19,423,241," by adding thereto the following:

And that the same be paid in gold or its equivalent: Provided, That the relative value of any paper currency tendered shall be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury, and his certificate shall be conclusive evidence thereof if dated thirty days before payment is made.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "gold or its equivalent," and inserting in lieu thereof "lawful money of the United States." The pending question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA and ORIN were appointed.

The amendment was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 35, noes 68.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For the construction and repair of vessels of the Navy, $22,800,000.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to increase that to $26,300,000. It will be found on comparing the estimates of appropriations with the sums mentioned in this bill that they are widely different. The discrepancy between the two is so great that if the amount of appropriation for the naval service for the year 1864-65 should be limited to the sums mentioned in this bill it must change the purpose of the Navy Department and impair the efficiency and extent of our naval force. I cannot suppose it is the desire of any persons to cripple any Department of the Government, least of all do I suppose that it is the desire of anybody to cripple the Army or Navy of the United States while they are engaged in waging a gigantic war.

And, sir, I understand that the Committee of Ways and Means do not intend to cut off from consideration in Congress the subject of building iron sea-going steamers, for which an appropriation was asked by the Navy Department; but that they defer the consideration of that subject for the present, intending that if Congress shall see fit to enter upon the work that an appropriation shall be made by a special bill for that purpose. The Committee on Naval Affairs have not yet had that subject under consideration, and I simply desire to say at this point that we make no controversy upon the subject of an appropriation for iron sea-going vessels at this time, but only desire to give notice that we may hereafter bring in a bill asking such an appropriation for iron sea-going steamers as shall put the Navy of the United States somewhat on a par, in respect to those vessels, with the navies of France and England.

But in addition to the abridgment of this item of the appropriation bill, there is an abridgment of the appropriation for maintaining the present naval force, and it is to that particular point I desire to call the attention of the committee, for it is to that and to that alone the amendment I have offered applies. It will be found on turning to the estimates of appropriations that the Bureau of Construction, from which the item before us emanates, asked originally for $13,775,000 for repairs, maintenance, wear and tear, labor, and materials for five hundred and fifty-six vessels. That item, on being closely scrutinized and diminished to the utmost that the chief of the Bureau of Construction says will answer the purpose, has been reduced to $11,500,000.

The next item is for the completion of sixteen fast steam sloops-of-war, $7,200,000. This item is for the completion of the hulls of those sixteen vessels, for which the machinery has already been ordered, and is in process of construction. No abridgment, therefore, can be made of that item, because the hulls of the vessels will be wanted when the machinery is done.

The next item put into the original estimate was for the construction and repairs of vessels, materials, and labor for the western waters, for which item I think the Committee of Ways and Means estimated $3,000,000. The amendment I have offered increases the amount $1,000,000 for the purpose of furnishing those western waters with an adequate supply of ships. And I desire to say the Navy Department has informed me that is the lowest sum with which those rivers can be properly guarded.

The original estimate for the other item, namely, for blockade purposes, was $4,000,000, and it was reduced by the Committee of Ways and Means to $2,000,000. In the amendment I have proposed is $1,000,000 additional for the purpose of keeping up the supply of blockade vessels. This has been ascertained to be necessary after the most careful and searching scrutiny of the actual wants of the service in that particular.

It may be said that a very large proportion of the vessels engaged in the blockade service are purchased vessels—vessels not built by the Navy Department. It became absolutely necessary that the Department should have a large number of vessels for blockading purposes, and as they found it impossible to build them, they were obliged to go into the market and purchase the best vessels they could find. Of course, vessels not built for the naval service, but for the merchant service, will depreciate more rapidly than vessels built under the auspices of the Navy Department and for the naval service.

If we take the experience of the past as a guide for the year to come, an appropriation of $26,300,000 will be the lowest amount which the Department believes it can get along with. And the opinion is that if that amount is appropriated there will still be as much probability that they will have to come in at the end of the year for a deficiency as that there will be any excess.

I hope, therefore, that inasmuch as the appropriation asks for nothing except for the actual wants of the service, there will be no opposition to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee of Ways and Means came to consider the naval appropriation bill it found a very large demand made in the estimates of that Department, amounting to $142,000,000. The committee was very anxious to reduce the estimates where that could be done without injury to the public service, and had before it all the chiefs of bureaus connected with the Navy Department. After careful questioning of them, although of course each one sustained his original view, the committee was of opinion that for the coming year a considerable reduction might be made from the amounts estimated for; and in the course of the examination the committee reduced the amount $37,000,000, believing that that reduction would not cripple the service, but only curtail some items of expense and postpone them to another time. Among these was the item for the repair and maintenance of five hundred and fifty-six vessels-of-war, $13,775,000. It was found that this item was entirely conjectural. There were no data from which the Department could even approximate the sum that might be necessary. It was thought by the Committee of Ways and Means that that sum might well be reduced $3,000,000 without injury to the public service, knowing that no matter how much is appropriated it has always turned out that there is a deficiency. I have never been in Congress when there was not an appropriation asked for deficiencies over the appropriations of the preceding year; and it may be possible that though the committee has attempted to restrict the outlay for the repair of vessels to $10,000,000, it will exceed that amount. For all new constructions there are separate provisions made. The Committee of Ways and Means was of opinion, from the examination, that it was just about as competent to guess the amount that would be needed as were those who estimated for it, for they admitted that they did not know.

The next item is for sixteen screw steam sloops-of-war, $7,600,000. These are nearly finished, and it is hoped that in the opening of the season they will be put into service. We did not cut down the appropriation asked for completing these vessels, but left that precisely as it stood. That will be adding to the five hundred and fifty-six vessels already in the service sixteen screw steam sloops-of-war.

Then there was an estimate for the purchase, construction, and repair of vessels for the western waters, which a member of the committee from that part of the country, who seemed as well acquainted with the subject as those who undertook to instruct us, was of opinion might be reduced to $3,000,000. He thought that that was sufficient to purchase and keep in repair all the vessels necessary for the western waters. Under that view, and in that belief, the Committee of Ways and Means, with the desire to keep down the appropriations to the lowest possible amount, agreed to report an appropriation of $3,000,000 for that purpose, in addition to the vessels that they have there now.

The next was for the purchase and charter of vessels for naval and blockading purposes, $4,000,000. The committee was clearly of opinion that with the five hundred and fifty-six vessels now in service and the sixteen new ones just at hand there would be no necessity for the purchase of old vessels, which has been such a great mistake generally, if it was not justified by absolute necessity. The committee was unwilling to report an appropriation of $4,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing up old vessels from A, B, C, and D.

I have no doubt they would be all honestly purchased, [laughter,] but they might be purchased by those who did not know how nearly rotten they were, and who might be so easily deceived by cousins and friends. Therefore I hope the bill will be allowed to stand as it is.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out the word "dollars" in the twelfth line. I desire to say in reply to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that I think there was a misunderstanding between some members of the Committee of Ways and Means and the chief of the bureau from whom this estimate emanated. I regret very much that the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Blow,] who is on the Committee of Ways and Means, is not now in his seat, as I think he has been over this part of the estimate with the chief of the bureau, and if I am not mistaken has come to the same conclusion with regard to the necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. I mean to say that the gentleman from Missouri was in the Committee of Ways and Means when this item was considered, and that the vote on it was unanimous.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The investigation to which I referred has taken place since that time. He has since made the investigation, and, as I understand, concurs in the propriety of this amendment.

I entirely concur with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and with every other gentleman in this House who desires to limit the amount of money appropriated by this Congress to the necessities of the country. But I entirely disagree with him and with every other gentleman in the House who supposes that the mere saving of money is true economy in times like these.

I do not want on my hands any part of the responsibility of withholding from any Department of the Government the necessary amount of means to carry on successfully this war and bring it to a triumphant close. I believe it is impossible for the Navy Department to carry on and perform the work committed to it, and for which it is held responsible, unless Congress gives to it the means which it believes to be necessary for that object. And I am quite surprised that there should be any disposition manifested here to restrict the Department in so important a branch of the public service in times like these.

Gentlemen may suppose that this war is nearly ended. Well, sir, I do not know whether it is or not. But because we do not know whether it is or not, it seems to me it would be the height of imprudence to withhold the necessary means for so important a branch of the public service as this, at least during the year to come. I believe this amount is absolutely necessary to accomplish that object. These ships-of-war are decaying, they are wearing out, and unless appropriations are made to supply deficiencies for their wearing out the Navy will be left before the close of the next year in very much the same condition in which it was at the time the war commenced.

I hope this appropriation will be made, and I believe that if the subject should be more fully investigated the necessity for it will become still more apparent. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I object to the withdrawal of that amendment, because it is to strike out the word "dollars," and that is the principal part of the original amendment. I therefore think the gentleman from Massachusetts had better hold on to his amendment to the amendment. [Laughter.]

I want merely to say that I do not suppose there is any committee here that wishes to limit the means which should be given to the Army or the Navy. But, as I said before, after a most careful scrutiny, the Committee of Ways and Means reported $22,000,000 instead of $32,000,000, as asked by the Navy Department.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. They do not, as I understand, ask for that amount now.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Rice,

Mr. GRINNELL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Rice, of Massachusetts, and STEELE, of New Jersey, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to the appropriation on the fifth page, under the head of "steam engineering," for the purpose of asking him whether it should not be included at this point of the bill in the general appropriations for the Navy Department. It is this:

For the purchase of nautical and astronomical instruments, books, maps, and charts; and for the repairs of instruments, and binding and backing books and charts, $101,042.

Mr. STEVENS. I think so; and I will move, therefore, to transfer the clause referred to by the gentleman to this portion of the bill at the end of line forty-two, page 3.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. Before the committee passes from the paragraph under the head of "yards and docks," I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as well as that of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to the annual report from the Bureau of Yards and Docks, in which I find this paragraph:

"I would respectfully draw your attention to the subject of purchases by Navy agents in open market of supplies for the Navy. It so happens that particular firms or parties, whether dealing in the articles required or not, often furnish these supplies, without, perhaps, offering them for general competition among dealers in the merchandise required. This I have in vain endeavored to correct when it has been noticed. I would therefore suggest that Navy agents should be compelled to establish their offices in the navy-yards where requisitions are made, where supplies are received and inspected, and where they should be paid for, and to act more under the immediate direction of commanders of stations than they are now subjected to, or else that the agencies be abolished and a commissioned paymaster be directed to perform the duties of Navy agent, upon his duty pay. I am fully aware that such a reform would meet with determined opposition, but my long experience has nevertheless prompted me to run the hazard of suggesting it for your consideration."

Now, sir, to comply with the request of the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the appropriations under the head of "Yards and Docks:—"

Provided, That Navy agencies be abolished, and that commissioned paymasters be directed to perform the duties of Navy agents upon their duty pay.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a question of order. I think it is not in order upon a bill of this kind to insert an amendment making a new law.

Mr. BROOKS. Upon the point of order I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no statute law creating Navy agencies at all; you cannot find it. It is an assumption of the Executive Department without authority of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if there is no law creating these agencies, this will create a law in respect to them. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. BROOKS. This only provides the mode and manner of expending the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the question of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. BROOKS. I make the amendment in another form.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object. If the gentleman will introduce a new bill containing those provisions, perhaps I shall vote for it. Let the question come up by itself, and not be brought in here to embarrass this bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my amendment. I do not wish to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I wish merely to state that these naval supplies cost the Government millions of dollars unnecessarily by reason of the means made use of to secure them. They are the worst means which human ingenuity could devise to supply the Navy. These Navy agents have commissions, assumed without law, which they take and hold despite the Executive Department of the Government. Those commissions in some cases amount to $100,000 and $200,000 for a single Navy agent.

Mr. PIKE. Let me say a word.

Mr. BROOKS. Not now. One of the Navy agents in New York some years ago withheld nearly $200,000, one $30,000, and one $40,000. The Navy agent under the last Administration, Mr. Sanders, withheld an indefinite sum—an amount not made known to the country, and never likely to be. It is to correct these things that I call the attention of the House to this subject. I have discharged my duty, and I have no more to say.

Mr. PIKE. A bill has been prepared to correct the present mode of purchasing naval supplies, and in good time it will be offered. When that bill comes before this House will be the proper period for discussion, and not now when we have an entirely different bill before us.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORTNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 96) to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and

An act (No. 97) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session, (Mr. DAWES in the chair.)

The Clerk read, as follows:

Marine Corps.

For pay of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, clerks, messengers, steward and nurse, and servants; for rations and clothing for officers' servants; additional rations to officers for five years' service; for undrawn clothing, and additional pay to musicians of the band, $791,785 80.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be applied to the payment of the bands of musicians known as "marine bands" stationed at any navy-yard of the United States.

I simply desire to say in support of that proposition that this is an addition to the expenses of the Navy that can be dispensed with. It is purely a fancy arrangement, and I think that these bands should be abolished.

Mr. PIKE. We have taken away the sailor's grog, and I hope that we will not take away his music.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For building marine barracks, officers' quarters, and gateway at navy-yard, Mare Island, California, $150,761 30.

Mr. KASSON. My impression is that the Committee of Ways and Means determined to strike out one or two appropriations for Mare Island navy-yard. I call the attention of the chairman to it, to know whether I am right.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee reduced it. The sum asked was over two hundred thousand dollars.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Boston:

For additional amount for joiners' shop, additional amount for coal-house, extension of shear wharf, railroad tracks, and repairs of all kinds; and for extension of water front, by purchase of two lots adjoining navy-yard, at a price not exceeding $135,000—$319,500.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to strike out these words:

And for extension of water front by purchase of two lots adjoining navy-yard at a price not exceeding $135,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have looked with a great deal of care into the report of the Secretary of the Navy and all the sources of information within my reach to know what this was. I desire to know from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means upon what it is founded?

Mr. STEVENS. The navy-yard at Boston, as represented by Admiral Smith, who came before the committee with plans and surveys, needs an extension of water front. He insisted that to make this yard efficient, in consideration of the increased business there, it was absolutely necessary to have this water front. He had communicated with the owners to know what they would sell for. Many of our vessels are sent to Boston for repairs, and many of them occupy this very front now. It was simply upon his statement, made not only now but formerly, that this appropriation was inserted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether two years ago an appropriation of $122,000 was not made for the enlargement of this navy-yard at Boston, and whether that money was expended for that purpose?

Mr. STEVENS. In answer I will say that there was another piece of land purchased at that time. I have here a communication from the Department, which, if gentlemen desire, I will read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I find in the estimates which have been sent in by the Secretary of the Navy in regard to appropriations which the Department desired for this navy-yard there is no estimate whatever for the purchase of lots.

Now, sir, I do not know the fact, but I will say I believe it is of no use for any man here to undertake to strike down any appropriation. I saw the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means himself endeavoring to resist a motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which added in one fell swoop three or four millions to this bill, and which was adopted in spite of the remonstrance of my distinguished friend. And I have no doubt the committee will agree with me, as well in this as in any other proposition, to save money to the public Treasury.

Now this proposition came here without a recommendation from the Secretary of the Navy, but upon a statement made to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means by some man in the Department that they wanted these lots; and thereupon the committee put in an appropriation of $135,000 for that purpose. They say the price shall not exceed $135,000; but we all know that means just that sum. And without knowing anything about the value of these lots, and without knowing that the whole thing may not be an attempt of lot speculators to sell these lots, we are asked to vote for this appropriation.

I wish to make another suggestion to the committee, which I think is important. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and every gentleman familiar with the rules understand distinctly that no appropriation of this kind is in order as an amendment to an appropriation bill. Rule 120 distinctly provides that no appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law. Now I undertake to say that this is just what the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means protested against in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. But as this has been put into the bill by the Committee of Ways and Means, and as the bill itself has been referred to this Committee of the Whole, we cannot raise the question of order upon it. But had the bill been read at the Clerk's desk—and I hope in future every bill which comes in will be read there—we might have raised the question of order, and the Speaker, under the rule I have cited, would have been obliged to rule this appropriation out. This is a provision of law in an appropriation bill. It is a new law by which Congress directs that this land shall be purchased for $135,000, and that, too, without the Secretary of the Navy coming in here, through his report, and making estimates for that amount.

I object, therefore, to this item, in the first place because we have no sufficient information in regard to these lots to enable us to vote understandingly, and in the second place because it is a provision which, under our rules, has no business to be in the bill. It may be possible that it would be a convenience to the Navy Department to have these lots, yet I take the ground in regard to this expenditure, and every other expenditure, that I will not vote for any appropriation of this character unless I am convinced that the exigencies of the public service imperatively demand the appropriation.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to say one word in regard to this matter. The Charlestown navy-yard is very much restricted for want of dock room. The proposition here is to buy a piece of land running to a point in the rear, and embracing a water front of about two hundred and seventy-five feet. There was last year or the year before, as the gentleman from Indiana has suggested, an appropriation of $122,000, and with that money a strip of land was bought for a similar purpose. The large number of vessels which are being repaired at that yard, besides those being built there, necessitates more dock room. And one of two things we are compelled to do: we must give them a wet dock or more water front. It is cheaper, of course, to give them more water front.

As has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, no recommendation was made in this case in the annual report. Very likely the reason was that, although negotiations had been going on for some time between Admiral Smith and the owners of the land, the owners were not willing to sell. But I understand that since the annual report was made the owners of the land have offered it for the sum covered in the appropriation.

As to the matter of economy I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is much more economical for Congress to appropriate $135,000 for Charlestown, and $300,000, as is suggested by Admiral Smith in his report, for the Philadelphia yard, than to have to build another navy-yard at a cost of several millions. We all know that our Navy has run up from seventy-five vessels to five hundred and fifty-six vessels; and that a very large sum is now demanded for another class of vessels, an increase which, at the proper time, I shall oppose. An increase of vessels is demanded not only of another class, but also of a similar character to those already built; and it is necessary to have more room at the navy-yards. I shall therefore vote for this appropriation, as I shall for a similar appropriation for the Philadelphia navy-yard; and I shall do so on the ground of economy, so as to save the necessity of increasing the number of navy-yards.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word, "dollars." It is true, as has just been suggested, that at the time the annual reports were made the Department was not prepared to make this recommendation, for it did not know whether the land could be got. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, did not put this item in the bill because "some fellow about the Navy Department" came and asked them to do so, but because it was recommended by the Department. The appropriation was sustained at great length and with much ability, before us, by a gentleman of the name of Admiral Smith, as honest a man as can be found anywhere or in any Department of the Government. I ask that these papers be read, in order to show how it was.

The Clerk read the following letters:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 7, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication of this date, accompanied by a sketch addressed to me by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, recommending the purchase of certain premises for the purpose of securing more water front for the Boston navy-yard, for which there is great necessity. The conditions upon which the desirable privilege can be procured are considered favorable, and I respectfully recommend the subject to the earnest consideration of the Naval Committee, and to the early action of Congress should they deem the purchase advisable.

Very respectfully, &c.,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. H. RICE, Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 13, 1864.

DEAR SIR: In my letter of the 7th instant to the Secretary of the Navy, reporting the price of a portion of the water front near the navy-yard, Boston, I stated that the purchase should be authorized within twenty days. I have a letter this a. m. from the owners of this property stating that an extension of time may be considered until May the 1st next, as it would, I found, be impracticable to obtain an appropriation for said purchase within twenty days from the 7th instant. I do not believe this water front can be purchased at a fair price after the time (May 1) expires.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOS. SMITH.

Hon. A. H. RICE, Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, Capitol, Washington.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, January 7, 1864.

SIR: After negotiating for terms on which a portion of the best water front in Boston harbor, adjoining the navy-yard, may be secured, I find that about two hundred and eighty feet on the channel as indicated within the red lines on the inclosed sketch, containing about eighty thousand feet, can be bought for the sum of one hundred and thirty-five thousand ($135,000) dollars; provided the purchase be made forthwith, or within twenty (20) days.

I consider this purchase of the greatest importance to the Government, as all our navy-yards are so circumscribed in area and particularly in water front, that we find it impossible to provide dockage and wharfage for all the vessels of the Navy which come to the yards, especially at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia.

Under these circumstances, I beg leave to suggest that you ask an appropriation for the purpose indicated, without delay. Another opportunity will probably never again be offered to procure this desirable privilege.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow another paper to be read—a letter from Commodore Stringham?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am willing to have them all read. Reasons are always as thick as blackberries when appropriations are wanted here.

The Clerk read, as follows:

UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD, BOSTON,
COMMANDANT'S OFFICE, January 22, 1864.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 20th instant in relation to the property of Messrs. Oakman and Eldridge, and in reply have to refer you to my communication of the 21st instant on that subject.

I consider the purchase of this property by the Government as of the utmost importance to this yard, as it contains two hundred and seventy-six feet water front of deep water, which would add greatly to our facilities for work on the repairs of vessels. I deem it so important that I would recommend its purchase at almost any price.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. H. STRINGHAM, Commandant.

Rear Admiral JOSEPH SMITH, Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am not at all surprised at the case made out before the committee for the purchase of these lots, for I have never known any appropriation to be asked for that there were not reasons given for it. But the reasons given here are not such as satisfy me that it is our duty to vote this appropriation. What is there to convince this committee as to the value of this little strip of land, for which we propose to pay $135,000; this little strip of land in Charlestown, Massachusetts? I do not believe that half the city would sell at public auction for that amount, if you take out Bunker Hill monument, which stands on precious soil. But yet, on this showing, here we are asked to vote these lot speculators the sum of $135,000. Clever and patriotic and glorious men! In the first instance they would only give us twenty days to decide; but as the bill lingered along here they gravely send in a communication that if we will take it they will extend the time up to the 1st of May. Sir, I have no doubt they would extend the time almost indefinitely, as they well may, if they can get this sum for that little patch of property. I do not believe there is any necessity for the Government having this property at this time. I believe that we have room enough there for all the legitimate purpose of the navy-yard. I shall go against the establishment of any more of these navy-yards.

But I am rather surprised to see my friends who generally hold so tight a hand upon our appropriations coming in here and advocating this expenditure.

Sir, I say here, as I said before, that if this appropriation were necessary, it is in the wrong place. It is in this bill in violation of our rules. It should have come here as a separate measure, and should not have been made dependent upon any other thing. It was the duty of the Committee on Naval Affairs, if those lots were necessary for the use of the Government, to have obtained the information upon which the House could intelligently act; they should have brought it in here in a separate bill accompanied by a report, so that the House could know upon what they were called to act.

Mr. PIKE. If my friend will allow me, I will suggest in regard to the value of this land that Massachusetts is somewhat more restricted in her limits than Illinois, and consequently for the same quantity of land a larger price is to be expected. I think if the gentleman will look into the matter he will find that this offer is after all favorable to the Government, especially after our experience in purchasing the adjoining lots, which, after a dicker of four or five years by the Navy Department, ran up in price from $80,000 to $120,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. One word more. I wish it to be borne in mind that the gentleman from Iowa, understanding how the Government has been imposed upon in all these purchases, has introduced a bill which has passed this House, and which will pass the Senate, I have no doubt, providing for the condemnation of such property as may be necessary for the use of the Government, and paying a fair price for it instead of paying these enormous amounts to parties who have the Government in their power. If, therefore, this appropriation shall be stricken out, and these lots shall be found necessary for the Government, they can be condemned and only a fair price paid for them under the bill of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PIKE. If my friend from Illinois will allow me for a moment, I will suggest, further, that those lots have in them valuable wharves, and for that reason among others this price of $135,000 is considered by those who understand the value of the property to be a fair price.

Mr. STEVENS withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last two words, merely for the purpose of making a single remark in addition.

Mr. Chairman, there was an appropriation made some two years ago, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, for the enlargement of the Charlestown navy-yard. But the enlargement which at that time took place was then or immediately afterwards considered insufficient. The premises then acquired have been in constant use since, and the Navy has increased, until a further enlargement has become absolutely necessary.

Gentlemen must bear in mind that the Norfolk navy-yard and the navy-yard at Pensacola have been and are now in a disabled condition, so that if the enlargements proposed at this and at the Philadelphia navy-yard should be made, the capacity of all the navy-yards in the country will still be much less in proportion to the size of the Navy now than before the rebellion commenced as compared with the size of the Navy then.

Now, sir, my friend from Illinois says it was the duty of the Committee on Naval Affairs to have informed themselves in respect to the necessity there is for this purchase. I will state to my friend that the Committee on Naval Affairs have not been derelict in their duty in that respect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend will permit me to say that my statement was also that the Committee on Naval Affairs should, if satisfied of the necessity of this enlargement, have brought in a separate bill for that purpose, accompanied by a report, so that the House could have had before them the proper information on which they could act.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will state in answer to my friend from Illinois, that he is one of the oldest members of the House, and of course knows that the proper mode of doing business here is learned only by experience. The other purchase for the enlargement of this navy-yard, which has been commented on by him, was made precisely in the same mode in which it is proposed to make this purchase; therefore, no one objecting to the mode by which the other purchase was made, it was fair for the Committee on Naval Affairs to presume that that was the proper and legitimate mode.

Now, sir, as to the necessity there is for the purchase of this land, I will say that there is no deep water adjacent to the navy-yard at Charlestown which can be made available for the purposes of that yard, except that which it is proposed to include in this purchase. As I understand it, the owners of this land originally owned but a small portion of that which it is proposed to purchase. They purchased the balance some two years ago, and they propose now to dispose of it to the Government at precisely the price which they paid for it. All the parties conversant with the value of land in that vicinity that we have seen consider the price of this property very low; and I submit that there is not a particle of evidence before the House to show that this is not a fair price for the land, and that it would not be an economical purchase for the Government.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the value of the land?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It is recommended by the commandant of the yard, Admiral Stringham; by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Admiral Smith; and by the Secretary of the Navy himself. I believe the price of the land is about one dollar and sixty-eight cents a foot; and, notwithstanding the gentleman from Illinois states that the patriotic city of Charlestown is not worth more than that, let me tell him that he could not get any land outside of what it is proposed to buy for anything like that sum.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I say that there is no evidence before the committee of the value of the land.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insert "$184,000."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I accept that, because it makes the bill conform to the estimates.

Mr. HOOPER. I rise to oppose the amendment.

I wish to say that I am perfectly familiar with this property. I know that the navy-yard for ten years has been wishing to obtain possession of it, and has never been able to do so till this time. It is offered at a fair and reasonable price. If we do not buy it now I do not think we can get it for anything like that price hereafter. I hope therefore the amendment will not be adopted.

I believe the amount of the bill is what the Secretary estimated the property can be bought for down to the 1st of May. The gentleman from Illinois complains that this was not in the original estimates. The reason was that the negotiations had not been brought to a point where the estimates could be laid before Congress. It was not until the session commenced that the parties were willing to make an offer. This is the amount of the supplemental estimates.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on his amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and ENGLISH, were appointed.

The amendment was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 45, nays 60.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found correctly enrolled an act to appoint a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia; when the Speaker signed the same.

MEMORIALS OF COMMODORE MORRIS.

Mr. WHALEY, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of the sisters of the late Commodore Morris, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at five o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of William Rogers Hopkins, formerly assistant professor in the United States Naval Academy, in which he sets forth certain services which he rendered there for which he has received no compensation; and he also alludes to his summary dismissal from the Academy on groundless charges, on account of which he also expects certain compensation. I ask its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of citizens of Rome, Oneida county, New York, in which they ask Congress to immediately abolish slavery throughout the United States, and also to adopt measures for so amending the Constitution as forever to prohibit its existence in any portion of our common country. As this petition concerns the powers of Congress and legislation, I ask its reference to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER also presented a petition from citizens of African descent, asking Congress to pass an act of universal emancipation, and to grant the elective franchise to colored people; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for the establishment of a daily mail route from Lawrence, through the towns of Black Jack and Stanton, to Ossawatimie, to connect with the present route No. 14153; and the suspension of route 14223 from Ottawa Creek to Ossawatimie; of route 14172 from Leavenworth to Pratt's Mission, Monticello, Olathe, Spring Hill, Paola, Paris, Moneka, Mound City, Mapleton, Dogtown, and Marmaton; and of route 14222, from Harrisonville to Wilmington; Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Chippewa Agency, Minnesota, to Superior city, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented five petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the sale of the mineral lands of the Rocky mountain country, and that liberal aid may be given to aid in the construction of the Northern and Central Pacific railroads; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of F. Gustave Fincke and others, of Brooklyn, New York, praying for the passage of an act declaratory of certain terms used in the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of George Ticknor Curtis and others, members of the bar of New York, against the passage of any act dividing the judicial district of the southern district of New York; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, in favor of giving to colored troops already enlisted or who may hereafter be enlisted into the service of the United States the same pay in all respects as is given to other enlisted soldiers, and earnestly urging the immediate passage of such an act; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of a grant of lands to that State in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of the public lands sold for the benefit of certain Indian tribes; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the negotiation of treaties and the enactment of laws which will enable the Government of the United States to speedily remove all Indians residing in a tribal capacity within the limits of that State to some point beyond the boundaries of the same; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the negotiation of treaties and the enactment of laws which will enable the Government of the United States to speedily remove all Indians residing in a tribal capacity within the limits of that State to some point beyond its boundaries; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SAULSBURY, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War of the 16th of January, 1860, communicating the report and estimate of Captain Newton in relation to the construction of a wharf at Lewes, Delaware, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of Edward P. Vollum, assistant surgeon in the Army, praying for remuneration for losses sustained by shipwreck while traveling under orders, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That James F. Schenck have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 134) to repeal all acts or parts of acts granting allowances or bounties on the tonnage of vessels engaged in the Bank or other cod fisheries; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDUGALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 135) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," passed July 1, 1862; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is upon the table a message from the House of Representatives asking for a second committee of conference on the internal revenue bill. I think it would be well enough to take up that matter and dispose of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will present to the Senate the message from the House of Representatives referred to by the Senator.

The Secretary read the message, which announced that the House of Representatives had non-concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 192) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; had further insisted on their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate; had asked for a second conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and had appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. J. A. KASSON of Iowa, and Mr. J. L. DAWSON of Pennsylvania managers at the second conference on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hardly know, Mr. President, what is the proper motion to make to accomplish the object which I have in view; but it has occurred to me that a motion that the Senate recede from its vote adopting the report of the committee of conference, and agree to the further conference requested by the House of Representatives, will be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate may further insist, or may simply agree to the conference asked for by the other House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My query was whether it was necessary for the Senate to recede from its vote adopting the report of the first committee of conference. That report was adopted by the Senate, went to the House of Representatives, and was there disagreed to. It occurred to me that it might be proper for us to recede from that vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator proposes to recede from the former vote of the Senate, and to agree to the second conference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My motion is that the Senate recede from the former vote accepting the report of the first committee of conference, and agree to the second conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The impression of the Chair is that that should be the form of the motion. The question is, "Will the Senate recede from its former vote agreeing to the report of the first committee of conference, and agree to the second conference proposed by the House of Representatives?"

Mr. HALE. "Reconsider," not "recede."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps "reconsider" would be the proper term.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It means the same thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose so. The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the Chair was authorized to appoint the committee; and Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. HENDRICKS were appointed.

LAND GRANT TO A MINNESOTA RAILROAD.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 31) making a grant of lands to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company in the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask my honorable friend from Minnesota to allow the bill to go over. My colleague [Mr. Howe] is not here, and he and I have not had an opportunity to confer in relation to this bill. There were some remonstrances presented to the Senate on the subject, but they did not go to the committee until after the committee had reported the bill. I hope he will consent to let it lie over. He can call it up at an early day.

Mr. RAMSEY. Had we not better give it one reading at this time?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It has already had two readings. It was read twice before it was referred.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. WILSON. On the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin I move to postpone the further consideration of this and all other matters in order to take up the joint resolution to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

Mr. RAMSEY. Before that motion is entertained I should like to submit an amendment to the bill.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer an amendment to the bill, which I desire to have printed. It is to strike out in the thirteenth line of the first section all after the word "Minnesota," and to insert what I send to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's amendment will be received, and it will be in order after the amendments reported from the Committee on Public Lands shall have been first acted upon. Those amendments will be first in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the bill is to go over I should like to have that amendment printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made.

Mr. WILKINSON. I see that the colleague of the Senator from Wisconsin is now in the Chamber.

Mr. RAMSEY. As the Senator's colleague is now present, probably there will be no objection to proceeding with the bill. I think it will take but a few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that I have not had an opportunity to consult with my colleague about this bill. It concerns railroads within our State. There have been some remonstrances sent in here on the subject which did not reach the committee in time, and were not considered, as I understand.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the bill is to be postponed I hope the Senator will consent to have it come up at an early day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I prefer that it should go over until we can have a consultation about it.

Mr. RAMSEY. I shall not object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ACTING ASSISTANT PAYMASTERS.

Mr. HALE. As the morning hour is not concluded, and there are one or two bills reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs which have been neglected hitherto, I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will allow them to be taken up. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 108.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts waive his motion?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; I will waive it until one o'clock, when I believe the joint resolution I have indicated will come up as the unfinished business.

The motion of Mr. HALE was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 108) relating to acting assistant paymasters in the Navy, which was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with an amendment to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That any acting assistant paymaster now in the volunteer navy service, who shall have performed his official duty with diligence and fidelity, may be transferred to the regular naval service as assistant paymaster therein, after undergoing an examination by a board of naval examiners and found to be qualified for said office: Provided, The age of such acting assistant paymaster shall not exceed thirty years.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That whenever the President of the United States shall nominate any acting assistant paymaster in the volunteer naval service, on account of his faithful, diligent, and efficient discharge of duty in the volunteer service, to be an assistant paymaster in the Navy, it shall be no objection to his appointment and confirmation that he is over twenty-six years of age: Provided, That he be not over thirty years of age: And provided further, That the number of paymasters and assistant paymasters as authorized by law be not increased thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I will offer an amendment to this bill. If he objects to it I shall not press it; but I think it might very well be added to this bill. It is to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the students of the Naval Academy designated for examination for admission thereto shall be between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut to amend his amendment so as to strike out the words "designated for examination," and to insert "when examined." They may be designated three or six months before they are examined.

Mr. DIXON. I agree to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. HALE. In regard to this amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, I have not the slightest objection to it in the world, only that it does not seem exactly congruous to the bill. However, I have no objection to it.

Mr. DIXON. It seems to me there can be no objection to it from any quarter.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no objection to it. The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time; and passed.

Mr. HALE. The title should be amended by adding "and for other purposes."

Mr. JOHNSON. I think we had better alter the title so as to show what the amendment is. The last amendment related to midshipmen in the Naval Academy, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title will be amended so as to read, A bill relating to acting assistant paymasters in the Navy, and regulating the appointment of cadets in the Naval Academy.

PAYMASTERS' CLERKS.

Mr. HALE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 104, also reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 104) to regulate the pay of clerks to paymasters in the Navy was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that the annual pay of clerks to paymasters in the Navy shall be as follows: Clerks to paymasters at each navy-yard, excepting Mare island, $1,200; at Mare island, $1,500. Clerks to inspectors of provisions and clothing at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cairo, $1,200; at other inspections, $1,000. Clerks to paymasters or assistant paymasters of receiving ships at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cairo, $1,200; of other receiving ships, and in store vessels, $1,000. Clerks to paymasters or assistant paymasters in vessels having complements of five hundred and over, $1,000. In vessels having complements of three hundred and over, and less than five hundred, $800; in other vessels, $700; but no paymaster or assistant paymaster is to be allowed a clerk in vessels having complements of less than one hundred persons, excepting in supply steamers and storeships.

Mr. HALE. This is a bill raising salaries, which I generally oppose. I will not say a word about it, but will simply ask that the report of the committee on this subject may be read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following report:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John F. Denson, paymaster's clerk in the Navy, praying an increase of the compensation of paymasters' clerks in the Navy, have had the same under consideration, and report:

That, having addressed a communication on the subject to the Secretary of the Navy, the following reply has been received:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 2, 1864.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, inclosing a petition in relation to the pay of paymasters' clerks in the Navy, which has been referred to the Naval Committee of the Senate, and requesting the views of this Department touching the subject of the petition.

In reply thereto; I respectfully submit herewith a report of this date, from the chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, to whom I referred the subject, and who has cognizance more directly of matters pertaining to the duties and pay of clerks in the paymaster's branch of the service. In addition to this report, I would refer the committee to the last annual report of this Department, as well as that of the chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, accompanying it, in which the subject of increased pay is mentioned and discussed.

Returning the petition, I am, very respectfully, &c.,
GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
 BUREAU OF PROVISIONS AND CLOTHING,
 February 2, 1864.

SIR: The communication of Hon. ALEXANDER RAMSEY on behalf of the Naval Committee of the Senate, having been referred by you to this bureau for its suggestions upon the subject of the compensation of clerks to paymasters in the Navy, I have the honor to return the same with the following remarks upon the subject of the desired increase of pay:

The paymaster of a navy-yard pays the officers on duty at the station, and all other officers whose accounts are borne on his books, as well as all the mechanics and laborers of the yard, numbering from fifteen hundred to four thousand persons. His clerk should be an intelligent and thorough accountant and bookkeeper, and a man of great integrity and industry.

The inspectors in charge of provisions and clothing receive, inspect, prepare for issue, and distribute all the provisions, clothing, and small-stores used in the Navy, amounting, in the aggregate, to over six million dollars annually. These stores are inspected, packed, and prepared for sea use under his superintendence, and he acts as naval storekeeper for all articles in the paymaster's department.

He supplies all ships fitting, or refitting, at his station, and makes all shipments of provisions, clothing, and small-stores, to distant stations, preparing the invoices and other papers incident to the shipments. The returns of the receipt and expenditures of stores are to be made weekly, monthly, and quarterly, involving a great deal of labor, and requiring industry and accuracy in their preparation.

The clerks of these inspectors should be good bookkeepers, and be familiar with commercial usages; and the receipt of large amounts of stores from contractors, and by open purchases, makes it important that the clerks should be men of honesty and ability.

The paymaster of a recruiting ship takes up the accounts of all the recruits shipped at that station, as well as those of vessels coming in to repair and refit, whose crews are temporarily transferred to the receiving ship for subsistence and safe-keeping. These men are provisioned, and receive such clothing and small-stores as may be wanted for their comfort, which involves the necessity of daily issues and charges to the men constantly coming on board and leaving, and whose accounts must accompany them.

The paymaster in such a ship requires a clerk who is prompt, intelligent, and reliable, and a good bookkeeper and rapid accountant, since sudden transfers of large bodies of men are frequently made.

The clerks of paymasters of yards and of inspectors in charge of provisions, &c., now receive by law but $750 per annum, and the clerks of paymasters of receiving ships but $700, without rations or perquisites of any kind, while the first clerks to commandants at all yards receive $1,200. The pay of "clerk of the yard," and the first clerk to naval storekeeper, is $1,200 at all yards except Philadelphia and Portsmouth, where their pay is $900. One exception to this is found in the pay to clerks at Mare Island, where their pay was fixed by law in 1862 at $1,500 alike for clerk to commandant, for clerk of the yard, for the clerk to naval storekeeper, and for clerk to paymaster and inspector.

It is safe to add that the labor and responsibility of the clerk to paymasters and inspectors are as great as any of the foregoing.

There are, in addition to the foregoing, several classes of clerks and writers at navy-yards, whose duties are little more than those of copyists, who yet receive higher rates of compensation than paymasters' clerks. Thus, clerks to naval constructors at most navy-yards receive $1,000 per annum; second clerks to commandants, $950; second clerks to naval storekeepers, $900; and writers at yards, at least $2 50 per day, or $782 50 per annum.

There seems to be no justice nor reason in these discriminations against the paymasters' clerks.

Much better pay is given to quartermasters' and paymasters' clerks in the Army employed in duties similar to those of clerks of paymasters and inspectors of provisions and clothing in the Navy.

At the clothing depot at the Schuylkill arsenal two clerks are paid $1,800 each; two others, $1,400 each; one, $1,200; three, $1,000 each; and three, $900 each; and clerks to paymasters in the Army receive $973 75 per annum, and are now petitioning for higher pay.

Inadequate as the compensation of clerks on shore is, it is still smaller at sea. Their highest pay by law is $500 per annum, and one ration of thirty cents per day. From this small sum they must pay for their clothing, food, and all their expenses. Those who have families can spare them but a wretched pittance; and single men save but little or nothing from their pay, unless they resort to unauthorized traffic or to speculations.

The interests of Government require that the person who necessarily has constant access to large quantities of provisions, clothing, and small-stores, should be paid sufficient at least to save him from the sense of injustice which might lead him to embezzle public property, or resort to other unlawful means to increase his small salary.

The pay of clerks on sea duty is the only pay in the Navy which has not been raised since the enactment of the law of 1832. But, on the contrary, it has been diminished by the change in the rates of vessels-of-war.

Thus the law of 1842 gives to a paymaster's clerk in a line-of-battle ship $700 per annum, and in a frigate $500. No vessel of the former class ever goes to sea now, but the heavy steam frigates like the Wabash have taken their places.

The paymasters' clerks in such ships, though their duties are as arduous and more complicated—having on the books the additional classes of persons necessary in steam vessels—receive but $500 per annum and one ration per day, while the pay of paymasters' clerks in vessels with complements of less than two hundred and forty persons is only $400 per annum and one ration.

These clerks have free access to the provisions, clothing, and small-stores on board ship. Upon their capacity, care, and honesty depends, in a great degree, the safe-keeping of the stores, and their issue without waste; and the prompt performance of the paymasters' various duties is greatly influenced by the ability and correctness of their clerks.

The pay proposed in the accompanying bill is believed to be in no instance greater than the existing compensation of other clerks of the Navy and Army having as laborious and responsible duties.

The highest pay therein asked for—with one exception at Mare Island—is that given to the lowest class of clerks in Washington, namely, $1,200.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. BRIDGE, Chief of Bureau.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

The committee believe that paymasters' clerks are justly entitled to the increase of salary provided by the bill accompanying the foregoing communication, and therefore report the same to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the vote is taken I wish to make but a single remark to the Senate. If the Senate feel at all disposed to entertain this proposition and begin to increase salaries, they had better ask themselves where it is to end.

Mr. HALE. I feel bound to say that I should not of myself have introduced the first proposition of this kind; but since the war commenced the Senate has done very little else besides raising rank and salaries, and it seems hard that these gentlemen should receive less than half what is paid to the same class of clerks engaged in other duties. I think it is an act of great injustice to them. For instance, the clerk of a paymaster of a ship at sea receives $500 a year and one ration a day of thirty cents, which is about $100 more. The lowest clerk at Washington receives $1,200, the paymasters' clerks in the Army receive nearly $1,000, while these men receive a very small pittance. The proposition has been before the Naval Committee for years. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, and by the chiefs of the bureaus, and unanimously recommended by the committee as an act of simple justice to a very deserving class of officers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator if they are not entitled to their share of prize money? Are they not on the ship's list, and entitled to a share of prize money?

Mr. HALE. That is a question I am not prepared to answer; but I do not think they are.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly they are.

Mr. GRIMES. They are entitled to draw in proportion to the salary they receive, whatever that may be. Everybody that is on board who goes to make up the complement of the ship is entitled to draw prize money in proportion to his pay; but that would not be a fair criterion by which to judge this case, because it is well known that not one man in fifty who has enlisted into the naval service of the United States has been entitled or ever will be entitled to prize money. But here is the question: What is the necessity or how urgent is the necessity for these officers, and is it not possible for the assistant paymasters themselves to perform all the duties that are required of them and of their clerks too, if they have a mind to do so? Are not the assistant paymasters on board these ships pretty much gentlemen, and do they not require these clerks of theirs to do all the duty except merely signing their names? That is the question that I would put.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state that I have received within a few days a letter from a captain of marines at Mare Island, California, in which he states that he does not for his salary receive as much as the common laborers at that yard; and yet I cannot introduce a bill here to increase his salary, because it is very well understood that the Government cannot stand any general increase. If the salaries of these clerks are to be increased, I do not see how you can refuse an increase to other classes of officers; and if this business begins, I do not see any end to it but bankruptcy.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I think the correct criterion is to give the pay which will command the talent desired. If gentlemen who are competent refuse to serve for the salaries we are now paying, the salaries ought to be raised. I have heard, however, of none who have resigned on account of the smallness of their salary; and hence, in my opinion, the pay now given commands the talent required, and therefore an increase is not necessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe these places are very much sought for, and I believe the ordinary course is that where these paymasters have clerks, they are generally nephews, or cousins, or somebody they want to take with them for the additional pay.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt that there are cases where the salaries ought to be raised. A paymaster stationed on board a large receiving ship does require a clerk; for instance, on board the receiving ship at New York, there is a vast amount of business done. So a paymaster who is the inspector at the depot at New York, or who may be the purchasing agent, requires a clerk. But it does not occur to me that it is necessary that there should be an increase of the salaries of all the clerks of the paymasters, and for the very good reason just assigned by my colleague. I have never heard of any scarcity of these clerks; I do not know that we are not able to get good clerks for the salaries we do pay. I think it very likely, however, that it might be well to increase the salary of a few of these men; but I do not think it is worth while to pass such a sweeping bill as this.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, resulted—yeas 11, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Foster, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Ramsey, Wilkinson, and Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Salsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilson—25.

So the bill was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and appointed Mr. ELIHU B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. ARCHIBALD McALLISTER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. REUBEN E. FENTON of New York, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 86) to provide for the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

VOLUNTEER NAVAL APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HALE. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 76, which is a short bill from the same committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 76) relating to appointments in the naval service was read the second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter all appointments in the volunteer naval service of the United States shall be submitted to the Senate for confirmation, in the same way and manner as appointments in the regular Navy are required to be; and all such appointments hitherto made shall cease and determine at the expiration of sixty days from the time of the return of the vessels in which those holding them are respectively employed.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out of the last clause of the bill that which declares that all persons who shall come in within sixty days shall cease to hold office unless confirmed. I wish to make it prospective merely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

And all such appointments hitherto made shall cease and determine at the expiration of sixty days from the time of the return of the vessels in which those holding them are respectively employed.

Mr. GRIMES. I cannot see any possible advantage in passing the bill as it is reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, unless it be to prove the truth of that passage of Scripture which declares that the first shall be last and the last shall be first. What will be the operation of it? The first clause of it says that hereafter all appointments that may be made shall be sent to the Senate and be confirmed. That nobody has any objection to. That is what the Senate agreed to a year ago, that all appointments made after that time should be sent here for confirmation. It then goes on and says that all the appointments that have hitherto been made shall cease and determine within sixty days from the time of the arrival in any American port of the ship on which the appointee now is, unless he shall be confirmed; and I believe even that latter provision is not in the bill. The result will be that the men who are now on our foreign stations, or in our ships on our coast coming in after we adjourn and not being confirmed by the Senate, will cease to hold office, and they will take rank on the Register behind those who will be confirmed by us before we adjourn at this session of Congress. That cannot be the purpose of Congress; that certainly is not the intention of the Naval Committee; that, I apprehend, would work as a great hardship upon the persons who were first appointed and who have been serving so for the last two and a half or three years.

Mr. HALE. I have no feeling on this subject—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will pardon the Chair. It is now past the morning hour, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HALE. I move that the consideration of this bill be continued for the present. Let the unfinished business of yesterday be passed over informally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be done if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HALE. I will only make a statement to the Senate of the reason that governed the committee. As was said by the Senator from Iowa, the same proposition was presented last year. There are now upon the list 72 lieutenants, 485 masters, 395 ensigns, 764 masters' mates, 138 assistant surgeons, 21 engineers, 111 first assistant engineers, 162 second assistant engineers, 390 third assistant engineers, 31 gunners, 16 carpenters, and 219 assistant paymasters, receiving an aggregate compensation of nearly three million dollars annually, who have been appointed in the naval service without any confirmation by the Senate. These gentlemen, who are now holding office, were appointed under this condition:

"That the temporary appointments made or which may be made by the Secretary of the Navy, of acting lieutenants, acting paymasters, acting assistant surgeons, acting masters, and masters' mates, are hereby ratified and confirmed as temporary acting appointments until the return of the vessels in which they are respectively employed, or until the suppression of the present insurrection, as may be deemed necessary; and the rate of compensation allowed the several grades specified is hereby legalized and approved."

There will be no difficulty such as is suggested by the Senator from Iowa, because this bill simply carries out the provisions of the act under which they were appointed.

Mr. GRIMES. It only carries out the first part, not the latter part. The latter part says they shall hold office until the suppression of the insurrection.

Mr. HALE. They shall hold "until the return of the vessels in which they are respectively employed, or until the suppression of the present insurrection, as may be deemed necessary."

Mr. GRIMES. You do not put that last clause in your bill—that which relates to the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. HALE. I do not.

Mr. GRIMES. Then there is no parallel.

Mr. HALE. What the committee thought was that there would be no sort of difficulty in requiring the Secretary to send these appointments with the other appointments to the Senate upon the return of the vessels in which these officers are now acting.

Mr. GRIMES. Then they will go below the others on the Register.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa knows very well that it is competent for the Secretary—and he frequently does it—to have them take rank back to the time of their first appointment. We have a nomination pending before the Senate at this moment of a commodore, nominated for confirmation, to take rank in July, 1862; and it will be perfectly competent to take care of that point. I have no feeling about it. If the Senate think the appointment of these officers ought to be confirmed to the Secretary of the Navy without the confirmation of the Senate I have no objection, but I think it is wrong.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no feeling about it either; and by moving to strike out this latter clause I am not deciding, and I do not intend to indicate any opinion, as to whether the nominations of these men ought to be sent here for confirmation or not. I am willing to go for the first clause of this bill, which requires that in the future they shall be sent here; but that is not the purpose of the bill, or rather it will not be the working, the practical operation, of the bill.

The first clause says that "hereafter all appointments in the volunteer naval service of the United States shall be submitted to the Senate for confirmation, in the same way and manner as appointments in the regular Navy are required to be." To that I do not object. I suppose nobody is going to object to that. I am perfectly content to sit here and pass on all these nominations—on the nominations of warrant officers, if you please, of acting masters, although it is something that has never been done before and never thought of before.

But then the bill goes on and says that "all such appointments hitherto made shall cease and determine at the expiration of sixty days from the return of the vessels in which those holding them are respectively employed." It absolutely discontinues them, absolutely turns them out. It does not say that they may be continued until the next meeting of the Senate. As I said when I first rose, it makes them the last men on the Register, it puts forward young men who have gone into the service latterly, and whom we shall confirm during this session of Congress, and it puts at the foot of the list men who have been two years or two years and a half in the service. It seems to me that a harder, a severer blow could not be struck at the volunteer naval service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to strike out the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill as it now stands.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter all appointments in the volunteer naval service of the United States shall be submitted to the Senate for confirmation in the same way and manner as appointments in the regular Navy are required to be.

Mr. COLLAMER. I apprehend that in the drawing of this bill the first part was drawn with a view to the latter part being kept in, that those who had been heretofore appointed should be reported here and acted upon with the new appointments. Now, with the latter part struck out, all the appointments heretofore made will remain without being acted on by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is intended to be so.

Mr. COLLAMER. If that is the intention, I have nothing to say.

Mr. HALE. That was not the intention of the committee; but the committee submit to the Senate. The Senate have so ruled, and it is not for us to say that the Senate have not done wisely.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the chairman of the Naval Committee if he has considered whether, if this bill shall be passed, the President will be at liberty to make an appointment during the recess of the Senate?

Mr. HALE. Just precisely as in the regular Navy. The action in the regular Navy is made the measure of action in the volunteer Navy in express terms.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Is it too late to amend the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not amendable without reconsidering the last vote.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to reconsider, in order to bring the bill back to the stage where it is amendable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is now before the Senate, and open to amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I propose to amend the bill by inserting as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That courts-martial shall have power to sentence officers, who shall absent themselves from their commands without leave, to be reduced to the ranks to serve three years or during the war.

This is an exact transcript of the law as it now stands in regard to the Army, and I am told by officers of the Army that it has had a most beneficial effect. I have offered it here at the instance of gentlemen who feel an interest in the Navy, and seem to think it will have a beneficial effect there.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill be read as amended. The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he does not want to add something to show that the last section applies to officers of the Navy.

Mr. GRIMES. The word "ranks" is improperly used there; but I hardly know what to substitute for it.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the last section by inserting the word "naval" before the word "courts-martial."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That modification will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend that section by striking out the word "ranks" and inserting "rating of ordinary seamen."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That modification will be made, if there be no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by adding the words "and to courts-martial."

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 24th instant, the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 27) relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service.

EXCLUSION OF COLORED PERSONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate joint resolution No. 23 now comes up as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senate proceeds with the consideration of that resolution, with the permission of my colleague I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday accepting the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to the effect that no legislation was needed in order to secure to colored citizens their rights in the railways of the District of Columbia. I make the motion to reconsider merely that I may call the attention of the chairman of the committee to that report, and ask him the reason on which it is founded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will entertain the motion. The Chair hears none. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the Senate discharged the Committee on the District of Columbia from the consideration of the subject alluded to.

Mr. GRIMES. I think it is unnecessary to reconsider that vote in order to bring the matter again before the Committee on the District of Columbia and before the Senate, for this reason: when it was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia the subject was taken under consideration in a very full meeting of the committee, and the charter of the company whose servants are said to have perpetrated the outrage upon the colored surgeon in the United States Army was thoroughly examined, and the conclusion reached—I believe I am correct in saying

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 52.

unanimously—by the committee that there is nothing in the charter that authorizes the company to make any distinction between persons of any lineage or color.

My friend, the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] yesterday submitted a report embodying the opinion of the committee, and I think I may say the unanimous opinion of the committee—at any rate unanimous so far as I know—to that effect, that there is nothing in the charter which authorizes any restraint or any restriction upon any person riding in the cars.

I will say a word further which I ought to say. There was some discussion here the other day in regard to the turning out of the cars of Dr. Augusta. I learn from an investigation I have made that that occurrence took place on the Fourteenth street road, where there were no cars for colored persons run. Since that time, or since the attention of the Senate was called to it by the introduction of a resolution by the Senator from Massachusetts, cars for the use of colored persons have been put upon both the Seventh street and the Fourteenth street roads; and the president of the company tells me that he has put an additional number upon the Pennsylvania avenue road.

I do not think under the circumstances that it is worth while to reconsider the vote and return the consideration of this subject to the Committee on the District of Columbia; because that committee hold that every person has a right to ride in the cars, and that a colored person has the same remedies open to him for any infringement of his rights by the company as anybody else.

Mr. SUMNER. If I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee one moment, I should like to know whether it was the understanding of the committee that the ejection of a colored person from a car was illegal.

Mr. GRIMES. As I understood it.

Mr. SUMNER. That the ejection was illegal?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. If that is the opinion of the committee, of course there is no occasion for additional legislation unless it be that the question of law has been drawn into doubt. Sometimes, for instance, we have a declaratory statute where there has been a doubt thrown upon a legal right. I fear there has been a doubt thrown upon what I do not doubt is a legal right in this case. But if the committee having this matter in charge have unanimously come to the conclusion that there is no need of any further legislation in order to protect what they regard as an undoubted legal right, I am not disposed at the present moment to recommend any further proceeding; but I desire to have it understood by the railroad company, I desire that they should take notice that they violate the law, and that whenever they exclude a colored person from any one of their cars they do it in violation of law. Of course such a railroad corporation cannot be entitled to any favors hereafter from Congress. If it comes forward for any additional immunities or privileges, it cannot expect any grant of them from Congress. Would it entitle itself to any favor here, it must begin by acknowledging the rights of all persons without any distinction of color.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt the chairman of the committee is right in saying that there is in the charter no authority to discriminate between any description of persons, the black or the white; and whatever would be the case in reference to such a charter in the States where slavery exists, where to a certain extent the negro is not upon the same footing with the freeman, it certainly cannot apply to the District of Columbia, where by your legislation already passed you have placed them in all respects upon the same footing. You have emancipated all those who were slaves before, and slavery cannot exist in this District at any time in the future, at any rate without the consent of Congress. That being the case, if there is not in the charter an express authority to discriminate, if the company undertake to discriminate except for some good cause, (and you can imagine a good cause why a particular man should not be permitted to enter the cars,) they would clearly be responsible. If a man were in such a filthy condition that nobody else could sit in the cars with him, it would be proper to exclude him, and we can very well imagine that might be true of a white man as well as a black man, and the right of exclusion would also apply to a man having a cutaneous disease. It is absolutely necessary to the safety of the traveling public that there should be some police power in order to protect those who travel in the cars, because, although I am as willing as the Senator from Massachusetts (and I am sure he would not be willing to go further than I should in that particular) to protect this description of people, I certainly would not place them upon a better footing than the white man. All that he seeks is, and all that as I suppose public opinion anywhere seeks to accomplish is, to put them upon equal rights, the enjoyment of all the rights under the law which the laws may give; but he would not say that it was not in the power of the company, without being responsible in actions for damages, (a question to be passed upon hereafter if such a case should arise,) to exclude from the cars any description of person, white or black, whose presence in the cars would be attended with inconvenience, or peril to life or to health.

I rose merely for the purpose of saying, Mr. President, that as I understand the charter, and I have had occasion to look at it, it contains no provision at all by which there is in the company any power to discriminate between these two classes of people.

Mr. WILLEY. Perhaps it may be proper that I should make a remark or two in reference to the report which is the subject of discussion this morning, from the fact that I made that report, and, at the instance of the Committee on the District of Columbia, examined the statute. On examination I find what I think every Senator will find, that there is no distinction whatever, directly or by implication, against any person on account of his color; that in this respect all passengers stand upon a perfect equality; and that the remedies against the company for any failure to accommodate passengers, or any violation of the law whatever, are as free and as full and as open and applicable to persons of color as to any other persons. It seems to me there can be no dispute about the proper legal effect of the charter of the company in this respect.

The proposition before the committee was to consider whether it was necessary to make special provisions for colored persons in order to secure to them equal privileges with other members of the community. The law is as open to a colored person as it is to a white person. So far as that matter is concerned, all members of the community stand, as I conceive, upon a perfect equality. I do not suppose that was the object of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to make a distinction in favor of colored persons over white persons; but any special enactment in regard to their privileges on this road certainly would be a distinction against white passengers, while it would not enlarge under the law, in any respect whatever, the privileges and remedies of colored persons. What, then, is the necessity for any action on this subject on the part of the Senate or on the part of Congress? The law is now full and perfect in all its provisions and adaptations to secure the colored persons in the enjoyment of the privileges of this railroad.

I will say further, Mr. President, that if the Senate or the Congress of the United States shall undertake to become the custodians of the rights and privileges of the citizens of Washington, and when any of those rights or privileges are withheld we are to take the matter in charge and prosecute the remedies for all persons who may be injured, we shall soon have our hands full of business, not of a very pleasant character, in my humble estimation. On the other hand, Congress has done all that can be done. It has amply provided by law for the enjoyment of the privileges of colored persons in a manner and to an extent equal with that of any other person in the community. What more can be done? What more ought to be done? If they have been aggrieved, let them apply to the law and let the courts redress their grievances, in the same way that white persons would be bound to apply to the law and to the courts for a redress of their grievances.

This, I think, was the unanimous opinion of the committee. It certainly was mine, as a member of the committee. Under the instructions of the committee, I drew up the report which was submitted yesterday, and upon making which the committee was discharged by vote of the Senate from any further consideration of the subject. The committee being of this opinion, it would be useless to refer the matter back again to them, unless it is under some positive and direct instructions of the Senate, because we believe there is no distinction whatever against persons of color, but that they are free and equal in every respect in regard to these railroad privileges.

Mr. WILSON. I am very glad to hear the remarks made by the Senator from West Virginia. I think in law he is right, but in practice it is an undeniable fact that the spirit of the old law and the old practices still lingers to some extent here in the District. I am told by very respectable men here that it is with the greatest difficulty that colored men can obtain of the city authorities licenses to do their business—licenses that are freely granted to white men. If there is any embarrassment of that kind, and the city authorities do not yield to the laws and to justice, I think the legislation of Congress should force them to do so. I think they should be made to understand that there is no inequality in law in this District, and that these people have their rights, and that those rights must be acknowledged, or "somebody will be hurt."

I saw in a paper a day or two ago a statement that the same officer who was put out of the cars was turned out of the Supreme Court room in this Capitol. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, if he has any information of that kind, why this man was turned out, who turned him out, and who is responsible for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As this seems to be an occasion for the expression of private opinion with reference to this subject, and as other gentlemen have indulged in the expression of their private opinions, I must take occasion to say that I most heartily approve of the action of the officer on board that railroad car. I think he deserved the thanks of the community. When these negroes go about sticking their heads into railroad cars, and among white people, and into the Supreme Court room, I think an officer is perfectly right in telling them they have no business there; because it is evident that the reason they do so is simply to gain notoriety, and to see if they cannot bring themselves into conflict with the officers of the railroad cars or the officers of the Supreme Court.

Now, suppose that this negro was turned out of the Supreme Court room; what authority is there in Congress to say, by any legislation of theirs, that the thing shall not occur in the future? That court have control of their own proceedings; they have jurisdiction over their court room, and they have a perfect right to say who shall be admitted in that court room, and who shall not.

I do not like to indulge so often in remarks of this kind with reference to this class of people, but, lest it should be supposed that the opinions expressed here meet with universal approval, I feel constrained on all proper occasions to dissent from them.

Mr. GRIMES. I also saw the statement in the newspapers to which the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded, that a surgeon wearing the uniform of the United States had been turned out of the Supreme Court room, and I supposed some gentleman would put to me this inquiry, as they did the other day about his being thrown out of the cars, and I thought I would take the precaution to inform myself. I therefore wrote a note to one of the judges to know what were the facts. In his answer he says:

"There is no rule or practice of the Supreme Court excluding any person whatever during its session. Its proceedings are in open court."

He then goes on to say:

"If the colored surgeon to whom you allude was turned out of the court room?"

And I infer from the wording of this letter that they did not know anything about it—

"It was without any authority from the court, or any member of it, and equally without our knowledge. As to the fact, I know nothing of it except from rumor."

If Dr. Augusta was turned out of the court room he was turned out by some of the bailiffs or under-officers of the United States marshal, who has the appointment, I believe, of those officers, and not by the authority of the Supreme Court.

In regard to this other matter, if we should pass any law in addition to that which we now have in regard to the railroads, we should be compelled to remit these colored men to their legal remedies where they are now. If they are turned out, as we hold the law, they can sue the railroad company for their ejection, for the trespass; and what can we do more than that if we should adopt any additional legislation? I think they stand upon stronger and better ground at present than they would by the adoption of the kind of legislation proposed.

Mr. SUMNER. After the declarations that have been made on the floor to-day, I am at least for the present satisfied, and I certainly shall not proceed any further with my motion. Let me say I was particularly grateful to the Senator from Maryland for his very explicit statement of the law on the subject. I do not doubt he is entirely right. It has always been my opinion. I am glad to have it confirmed by that distinguished Senator and lawyer. I am also grateful to the Senator from West Virginia who made the report, and who has so explicitly stated his own conviction, and as I understand him, also the unanimous opinion of the committee, to the effect that these people had legal rights precisely as white persons to the full enjoyment of all the privileges of the railway in this District. If they have such legal rights, they are at this moment unquestionably exposed to what I must call outrage. If a white person were ejected from the cars who otherwise was perfectly respectable, we should all feel that it was an outrage. Is it any less an outrage because the person ejected is simply guilty of a skin not colored like our own? For myself I confess that to my mind it is a greater outrage, because our obligations are greater in proportion to the humility and weakness of those with whom we deal.

But, sir, I have no desire to proceed any further in this question. I am for the present satisfied with the declarations that have been made. My hope, however, is that the railroad corporation will at once take notice and act according to law. I now ask permission to withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn. The special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday, is now before the Senate.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. COLLAMER, to add to the joint resolution the following:

All persons enlisted or mustered into the service as volunteers, under the call dated October 17, 1863, for three hundred thousand volunteers, who were at the time of enlistment actually, and for six months previous had been, resident inhabitants of the State in which they volunteered, shall receive from the United States the same amount of bounty, without regard to color: Provided, however, That the foregoing provision shall not extend to any State which the President, by proclamation, has declared in a state of insurrection.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont how far he understands this proposition to extend. We have passed an act authorizing the enrollment and enlistment of colored persons, slave or free, in all the States; and we provide by that act—

Mr. COLLAMER. What act do you speak of?

Mr. WILSON. The enrollment act. We provide by that act that a commission shall be appointed who shall estimate the services of the slaves of loyal men in those States, and pay them a sum not exceeding $300, and we have made it retrospective.

I understand the practice of the Government has been in Missouri, Maryland, and to a considerable extent in other sections of the country, to recognize this fact. We have raised in Maryland, I suppose, something like six or seven thousand colored soldiers.

Mr. JOHNSON. Eight thousand.

Mr. WILSON. Eight thousand, I am told by the Senator from Maryland. Governor Johnson told me a day or two ago that they had fourteen thousand in Tennessee, and we must have raised several thousand in Missouri. What I wish to understand is, whether the Senator's proposition would not cover the cases where we propose to pay the loyal masters. That is the difficulty. The provision proposed is certainly just, and it ought to be adopted so far as concerns most of the States. The Senator excludes the rebel States; but it seems to me in view of the legislation already had it would be hardly just to apply this legislation to Tennessee, or to Maryland, or Missouri, or to those States where we have already entered into obligations to pay a sum not exceeding $300 to the loyal masters. I call the Senator's attention to this point. I am anxious to do all we can do in this direction; but at the same time I want to guard properly the Treasury.

Mr. COLLAMER. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is not the twenty-sixth section of the enrollment bill that he alludes to?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have not that statute before me; but if it can be found, I desire that that section might be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.) The Chair will ascertain whether the enrollment act is in the possession of the Senate or not.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it that the State of Tennessee would not be covered by my amendment. That was one of the States declared to be in a state of insurrection by the proclamation of the President, and of course this amendment would not reach that State.

A suggestion has been made to me by some gentlemen about the time for which these persons were actual residents and inhabitants of the State. I have provided in this amendment that these persons were residents of the State and had been such for six months prior to the time of their enlistment. I do not know but that may be too long.

I will state my object in offering this amendment. Our colored men in Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York were enrolled under the former enrollment act precisely like other people, were subject to draft precisely like other people, and some of them were drafted. When the President called for three hundred thousand men and informed us that if they volunteered it would clear the State or the district from the draft to the amount of the number of men that volunteered, we thought as a matter of course that it was a proposition to take the men who were subject to draft and let them volunteer instead of standing to be drafted; and inasmuch as all colored people of the proper age were subject to be drafted, there could be no reason in the world why they should not volunteer. They did volunteer in my town to the number of between forty and sixty. They received the bounties from the town and the State, from $300 to $500, like white people, and they received the pay of the State, seven dollars additional per month, which our State pays to all her soldiers. They supposed and expected, and everybody supposed, there was no sort of distinction about it, and that they were to receive the bounties like other people. When they came to be mustered in, as I stated the other day, while the white men were paid the Government bounty of $300; the colored men did not receive anything. As there may be gentlemen present now who were not here at that time, I will state that they were men between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, able-bodied men, every one of whom could have earned his two dollars a day at home.

Mr. POMEROY. Did it occur lately?

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir; and since I came here they have been sent off, and they must have been sent off without their bounty. I said before, and now repeat, that every one of those men signed his name, without making his mark, to his papers of enlistment. They cannot realize, it is difficult for them to understand, how there can be such a distinction made without any possibility of reason. That those men must have that bounty is beyond all question. It must be paid. But shall the State be compelled to pay it instead of the Government of the United States paying it to the men they asked to volunteer? The Government told those men that if they did not volunteer they would be drafted; and now because they have volunteered they are going to make a distinction about paying them their bounties. If such a course should be taken by Congress, deliberately and understandingly, I do not know how I can go home and justify before my people the refusal to make this payment.

Mr. JOHNSON. On what ground did they refuse to pay them?

Mr. COLLAMER. There was an old act which authorized the President to employ colored people and pay them ten dollars a month and put them into the military service; and inasmuch as that, they said, was the only United States law expressly about paying colored men, they could not pay them any bounties. This is the way I understand it. The mustering officer said so. These colored men were enrolled with the white people under an express law of Congress in my State. They stood on the enrollment, subject in all respects like other people, and yet when we come to this point and this stage of the business the Government refuses to pay them. They went away. To be sure they went away under great disappointment, because they had relied on the additional bounty of $300 to provide for their families while they were gone; but they said, "Well, we have come to serve the country, and we will go, trusting that the Government will do us justice at some time."

Now I ask that justice may be done them. I thought it advisable to draw the amendment in such a manner that those men who had been called out and volunteered under the call of last October for three hundred thousand men should receive the same bounty from the Government without regard to color, provided they were inhabitants of the State at the time.

If the twenty-sixth section of the enrollment act is in the possession of the Secretary, I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the section indicated.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male colored persons, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations, and every such colored volunteer on being mustered into the service shall be free. And in all cases where men of color have been heretofore enlisted or have volunteered in the military service of the United States, all the provisions of this act, so far as the payment of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable as to those who may be hereafter recruited; but men of color, drafted or enlisted, or who may volunteer into the military service, while they shall be credited on the quotas of the several States, or subdivisions of States, wherein they are respectively drafted, enlisted, or shall volunteer, shall not be assigned as State troops, but shall be mustered into regiments or companies as United States colored volunteers.

Mr. COLLAMER. That section is rather too long, with my feeble hearing of it, for me to undertake to say now what would be its precise application in relation to my amendment. I observe that the great body of it relates to those States that have been declared in a state of insurrection. They are excepted in the proposition that I have made. It does not include those States at all. I do not see, on first impression, as it strikes me, that it makes any difference. We propose to pay these colored people as you pay other people. You pay it to their masters if they are slaves. My amendment provides merely that these colored men, if they were inhabitants of their States at the time they volunteered, and had been resident there for six months, and had not been sent for and brought in from other States, shall be counted and they shall receive the same bounties as white people. That is all there is of my proposition; and I can see no reason why it should not apply. Whether it would by possibility extend over some of the ground covered by the twenty-sixth section of the enlistment act I cannot say; but my impression is that it would not.

Mr. SUMNER. So far as I understand the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, I am in favor of it. I believe I am right in saying it is a proposition on a general bill to provide for a special class of cases, and the Senator from Vermont, in explaining it, told us what first induced him to think that this special class of cases ought to be provided for. It was a hardship occurring in his own State with reference to certain persons enlisted there; and he was so much impressed with that hardship occurring in his own State that he thought he could not go back to his people again without making an effort to see that hardship redressed; and he proposes to redress it on this general bill. I am in favor of redressing it even on this general bill; but I cannot forget that only the other day, when a case of much greater hardship, striking not into one State but into several States, and indeed all over the country, was proposed to be redressed on this very bill, Senators on this floor objected to it, not because it ought not to be redressed, but because it should not be redressed on this bill; and, if I am not mistaken, the Senator from Vermont himself made that very objection.

Mr. COLLAMER. As I understand the case to which the gentleman now alludes, I think he made it very clear that the enlistment papers under which the men had been mustered into the service showed distinctly under what law they had been mustered in. I at that time insisted that it needed no law to redress that grievance; that if the enlistment papers signed by the men described the time of service and the nature of the pay, and Government mustered them in, they must pay the sum named in the enlistment paper. It will not do for the Government to say to an officer, "You have enlisted these men under such and such conditions, and have put them into their articles; you had no right to do that in relation to colored troops." What then? Dismiss them. They did not do that. They said, "You had no right to enlist them in the way you did; but we will muster them in; and yet we will not pay the sum agreed upon." That is the way I understood that case, and understanding it in that way, I said and believed that we should call on the Government to fulfill that written contract, and if it should be refused by the Government on proper attention being called to it by the proper auditing officer, then would be the time to pass a law to carry it into effect more specifically. That is the view I had of that case; but as I understand this case, there is no such condition of enlistment.

Mr. SUMNER. The difference between the two cases is that the first was stronger than the second case. The Senator has stated his position now precisely as he stated it the other day. He did say that in point of law on the statement made in the Senate the Government was bound to pay those colored troops. I never doubted that in point of law they were bound to pay those colored troops. But, sir, neither the Senator nor myself, nor the Senate alone, has the construction of the public statutes or the disposition of the public moneys. The construction of the statutes depends upon other officers of the Government. The disposition of the public moneys depends also upon other officers of the Government. The statute, by the officer who has been consulted, has been construed differently, and the officers of the Government who have the disposition of the public moneys have refused to pay those colored troops what I have no doubt in point of law they are fully entitled to; and that brings me to the precise point that their case was one of unquestionable hardship. They had, as the Senator from Vermont so ably put it, by the very terms of their enlistment entitled themselves to the full wages of thirteen dollars a month; but those wages have been refused; and now the question is, how shall they obtain their wages?

The Senator says they should look to the Government for the pay which belongs to them. But they have looked to the Government, and in vain. What then is left for them? To look to Congress, which after all is the great power in this country, the great regulator, the power which where one branch of the Government fails is to remedy the defect. They have looked to Congress. The subject has been debated again and again day by day; and when I had the honor of presenting it the last time—and this brings me now to the precise point to-day—it was opposed by Senators, not on the ground that the claim was not a good one, but that it should not be put on this bill.

If that objection was valid against the claim to which I refer, it is valid against the claim now presented by the Senator from Vermont. I do not think it is valid in either case. I believe that if any persons have enlisted in the national service and through any ambiguity of legislation or any misinterpretation of that legislation their rights have been drawn into question, it belongs to Congress as the conservator, as the guardian of the rights of every citizen, to see that they have the proper remedy, and Congress ought to go forward swiftly to see that they have the proper remedy especially in a case where men have already hazarded their lives and shed their blood for their country.

Feeling therefore, sir, that the two cases are entirely parallel, with this difference, that the case which I presented on a former occasion is much stronger than the case which is now presented by the Senator from Vermont, I propose an amendment to his proposition, as follows:

Provided also, That all persons whose papers of enlistment shall show that they were enlisted under the act of Congress of July, 1861, shall receive from the time of their enlistment the pay promised by that statute.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment moved by my colleague. The proposition, I think, must strike every one as eminently right and just in itself, and particularly after the explanation made by my colleague. It is simply a proposition to pay what, upon any fair interpretation, had been promised to be paid, and which in the exercise of fair dealing and good faith we cannot refuse to pay.

After the call of last October for three hundred thousand more troops, and with the view probably to facilitate the raising of the required number of men, and if possible to avoid the necessity of a further draft, it was deemed expedient by the War Department to offer a bounty of $300 each for new recruits to all who, within a prescribed period of time, voluntarily enlisted in the military service of the country for three years; that is to say, this bounty was to be paid to all able-bodied male citizens or persons of proper age who should so enlist; or, in other words, to all accepted volunteers. This is simply a proposition to redeem that promise—a promise published and proclaimed everywhere throughout the country; in every nook and corner of the country; at the threshold of every hamlet in the country—a promise everywhere and by everybody understood as applying to and embracing all accepted volunteers, without exception of class or color—a promise everywhere and by everybody so interpreted and so relied upon, and so acted upon. Now the question is, shall we not redeem that promise?

Under that call and under this offer of bounties the Government have invited and have accepted the voluntary services of men of color, as volunteers, and have sent them to the field to aid in the suppression of this rebellion. I submit that any discrimination between these and other soldiers of the Union; between these and other volunteers enlisting under the same circumstances, at the same time, and under the same offer; any discrimination between them in respect to the payment of this bounty—paying it to one class and withholding it from the other—is alike invidious and unjust, and, I may add, in direct violation of the spirit and meaning of the offer which had been held out to them.

In my own State, as in many of the northern States, these persons of color are citizens, recognized as citizens, enjoy the civil rights and privileges and immunities of citizens; are subject and amenable to the laws as citizens; exercise the elective franchise, do military duty, are liable to enrollment and draft, and constitute a part of the State militia as citizens. In short, they owe allegiance to the Government, and, in turn, the Government owes protection to them, as citizens. Now when the Government calls for volunteers, when it offers bounties to volunteers, it is understood that the call and the offer have reference to and embrace all able-bodied male citizens or persons of suitable age actually enrolled and subject to draft, including black as well as white citizens. So everybody understands it. The Government has, indeed, been liberal and generous and even bountiful to those who have volunteered in its service in its defense; and it has deemed it expedient to hold out strong pecuniary inducements for voluntary enlistments, and to offer liberal bounties for volunteers, in order, as I have before remarked, to secure, as soon as practicable, the requisite number, under the call of last October for three hundred thousand men. Under this call, and under these inducements so held out, many colored persons, black men, if you please, yet strong and able-bodied men, brave and patriotic men withal, have volunteered, have been accepted, have been mustered into the service of the Government, and have actually been sent to the field. They expected, as they had every reason to expect, to receive the bounty offered by the Government to volunteers. They had no reason to suppose or to apprehend that they were not included within this offer. They certainly come within the literal terms of the order. There is nothing in the terms or in the language of the order making the offer of these bounties which indicated that any discrimination was to be made, nothing which indicated that this bounty was to be paid to the one class and not to the other, nothing which indicated that this bounty was to be paid to volunteers of light complexion only, and not to volunteers of dark complexion as well!

These men, Mr. President, entered the service in full faith and reliance on the promise of the Government in this regard—on its faithful fulfillment—and that they would receive the proffered bounty; and this was the general, I will say the universal expectation. Nobody entertained any other idea than that this bounty was to be paid to all accepted volunteers alike. If it had not been so intended, if it was not intended to include this class of persons, if it was intended that there should be any discrimination in favor of one class and against the other, it should have been so expressed, so that nobody should be deceived or misled by it. These persons should have been notified in some form, or at least had some means of information, that the order for the payment of this bounty did not mean exactly what it said; that it did not mean to include them; that it was not designed to extend the bounty to them, volunteers though they were. Common justice and fairness would seem at least to have required thus much. As it is, and if they are not to be paid this bounty, they have a right to complain, they have good cause to complain that they have not been fairly dealt with; that they have been enured into the military service of the Government by offers and promises, merely delusive, never to be fulfilled. Such an imposition certainly was never contemplated by the Government, or by any department of the Government, or by any authorized agent of the Government.

What number of volunteers of this class have entered the service under this call and under this offer I am not advised; but whatever may be the number, whether it be more or less, they take the place of and expose themselves to the dangers and accidents of war, in the stead of just so many other or white volunteers, and to whom this bounty would have been paid without a question; so that the cost to the Government cannot be any more in the one case than it would have been in the other; and the payment of this bounty cannot be withheld in the one case any more than it could have been in the other consistently with honor and good faith. The obligation is quite as imperative in the one case as it would have been in the other. It is not a mere question of expediency or of policy, resting in the judgment or the discretion of Congress or of the Government. It is much more than that. It is a question of honor, a question of honorary obligation to these volunteers. It is a question whether we will discharge an obligation to which we have already been committed by solemn pledge and by public proclamation.

Mr. President, this obligation must be discharged, this bounty must be paid, if we would regard our own engagements, if we would keep our own promises. This pledge must be redeemed if we would maintain the national honor, if we would cherish and uphold the national faith.

I have only to remark in conclusion that as a general rule, or, more properly speaking, as a general principle of justice and of policy, all persons of the same rank employed in the military service of the country should be placed on the same footing in respect to compensation; there should be no discrimination in this regard. This is clearly the dictate both of common justice and of sound policy.

The original resolution, amended as it has been upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, recognizes and adopts this general principle. The amendment moved the other day by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] in the form of a substitute to the original resolution recognizes this same principle; but neither the original resolution nor the proposed substitute reaches the case in question; and therefore there is occasion for the amendment moved by my colleague, and which I hope will be adopted.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] is a good one. I am glad it has been introduced. I think that it is eminently just, not simply in reference to the cases alluded to by him, which this amendment will cover, but in reference to all such cases; for there are others in the country which were not alluded to particularly in the remarks of the Senator from Vermont. But without referring to my own State I am for it, because I think it perfects and improves the legislation of Congress in this regard. I think I am right in saying that the enrollment act which was passed here a few days ago had a provision in it that when a colored man is enlisted in the service of the United States voluntarily, if some man claims him as a slave that man is to get $300; but if he is a freeman, and nobody has put a robber's hand on him, $100 is to be paid to the man himself. Then the discrimination is only $200. We only invest $200 more in a man as a kind of premium for somebody to own him.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is one other feature in that bill which the Senator will pardon me for alluding to: that $300 is to be paid out of the commutation money.

Mr. POMEROY. I think this amendment will correct that existing legislation, for I believe it is not simply retrospective, but it is prospective. It corrects that legislation for the future as well as for the past, and establishes a precedent that ought to be followed, and that I think ought to have been in the enrollment act. I cannot conceive of a greater injustice than to take a person from a state of slavery, and put the uniform of the United States upon him, and march him out into freedom and into manhood, and pay him nothing, while you pay his master $300. Is it not to be supposed that a man assuming a new relation, that of freedom, taking care of himself, has somebody dependent upon him? Is it not a most reasonable request that if there is to be $300 paid for him he shall have it? There is hardly any man who is not responsible for somebody in this life, and if the Government support him after his enlistment he ought at least to have the $300 on entering upon his new relation, if not to support himself, to support somebody that may be dependent on him. I consider it an outrage to take a man and put him into the service of the United States, and if he is free, if he always has been free, to give him $100, and if he has never been free to give him nothing. I think this amendment will correct that legislation, and in that respect I am for it, for I do not think the legislation, as it passed in the enrollment act, ought to have been supported.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, on the 3d of March last we passed the enrollment act that provided for the enrollment of all citizens. The Government enrolled, I think, in nearly all the loyal States, certainly in all but Kentucky and West Virginia, the free colored men fit for duty. Those free colored men were liable to draft, and in some States they were drafted. Some of them enlisted into the service before the bounties of the 17th of October were offered. They are in the service of the country, enlisted for the bounties which the local authorities paid them.

The other day we amended the enrollment act, and we provided that colored persons, slave and free, should be enrolled and be liable to be drafted. We provided that when a colored man is drafted, if he is a slave, the $100 bounty paid to drafted men shall go to the master. But we say to every slave in the loyal States, "If you will enlist into the service of the United States, the day you are mustered into the service you are forever a free man." That is what we say to them; and we provide for a board of examination, and to pay the master a sum not exceeding $300. I think it a wise measure, and the Senator from Kansas will pardon me if I say that I hardly see the consistency of voting, a year ago, to pay Missouri $20,000,000 to free her slaves, and then sticking over the payment of $300 out of the commutation money for a soldier to fight the battles of the country. Sir, I voted for both, and I will vote for every measure that tends to break down and destroy and extirpate from the country the system of slavery; and if money is necessary to be used I will use money for that purpose, and think it a good use of money.

Sir, the Senator from Vermont proposes that colored persons who have enlisted under the call of the 17th of October, which offered a bounty of $300—an offer that has been extended to the 1st day of March—shall have the bounty of $300. That I understand to be the proposition, applying everywhere except to the States declared to be in insurrection. I am for that proposition. I see no reason why the colored man who follows the flag of the Republic should not receive the same pay and the same bounties from the nation, and the same bounties from the local authorities, as the white man. In the hour of battle they incur the same danger, and the blood of the one is as dear to him as is the blood of the other to him.

There is only this difficulty. By the enrollment act we have pledged ourselves to pay the loyal master in the States of Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, whose slave has enlisted or shall enlist a sum not exceeding $300. The pledge is made to them. Now, I do not want to pay this money twice, and I want this amendment so modified that it will not do so. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to that point. We do not differ at all in regard to the duty of Congress to provide that the free colored men of the country who have enlisted into the service under the call of the 17th of October for three hundred thousand men, and who are now serving the country, shall receive from the Federal Government the same bounty as is paid to white soldiers. I want the provision so shaped that it will not touch the cases in Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, West Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, where we stand pledged to the loyal masters to pay a sum not exceeding $300 for each of their slaves enlisted. What we want to do is to establish equality and justice by practical legislation.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Massachusetts did not entirely apprehend the point that I made, or tried to make, in the dissent that I expressed from some of the provisions of the enrollment act which was passed a few days ago. I do not object to paying a bounty of $100 to the soldier; but the point is that a discrimination is made against the man who comes out of slavery. It was no fault of his that he was in slavery; he never enslaved himself or consented to it voluntarily that I know of. What I protested against was simply the discrimination to the amount of $200 against him because of a misfortune, a necessity over which he had no control. That is the objection which I think lies to that provision of the enrollment act to which I have objected. If this amendment will in any way remedy that, I shall most gladly vote for it.

In regard to the vote that I gave on the Missouri question, I think that when Missouri hung in the balance, we not knowing at that time whether she would be saved to the Union or was to go out, believing that the freeing of her slaves would secure her to the Union, I was willing to vote $15,000,000, or any other reasonable sum. I did not propose to vote that money on the ground of its being a "just compensation" to the masters, for as a general thing I think that they who have had the unpaid labor of these men for a lifetime have had compensation enough; and it is time that compensation began to work the other way. I cannot for the life of me see how it is that justice is always on the one side, and always discriminating against the oppressed and never for them. I believe it is time we learned that they have some rights which white men are bound to respect; and if misfortune or circumstances that they could not control have deprived them of their own labor for a lifetime, and we undertake to introduce them now to manhood and freedom, I ask, is it too much to set them up with $100 bounty? Are we weighing out justice as we ought to do if we give the money to the master who has had their services for a lifetime? I think eminent justice lies in this direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. NESMITH in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.]

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont when I can do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A further amendment is not now in order, the pending question being on an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Let the vote be taken on that.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. LANE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I believe the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Massachusetts is the same as the one voted upon a few days since.

Mr. SUMNER. Substantially the same. This is a slight change of that.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the result is the same.

Mr. SUMNER. The purport is the same. There is a little change in the language; that is all. It is that where according to the enlistment papers it appears that they have enlisted under the statute of July, 1861, they shall have the pay prescribed in that statute.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, Tuck, Van Winkle, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Salsbury, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wright—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move further to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont by inserting the word "free" after "all," for the reason that all slave persons who have enlisted or may enlist are already provided for by law; and this amendment as I propose to amend it will reach the case of all the free persons of color who have enlisted and who ought to have the bounty.

Mr. POMEROY. How are all slave persons provided for by law?

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope that the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] will not be adopted. The other day a bill was passed here which I voted against, and in looking over the record I am very glad that I did vote against it; and that was a bill which proposed to muster slaves into the service of the United States, and to pay $100 each for all who are drafted and $300 each for all who volunteer, the money to go to their masters. This amendment as it was originally introduced by the Senator from Vermont, if it passed, would result in paying about six hundred dollars for every slave who should volunteer and be mustered into the service. It is now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to insert the word "free," so as to guard the Treasury of the United States; and the Senator says that the slave recruits are already provided for. Yes, sir, you have provided for them; you have provided that they shall enter the service of the United States; you have provided that they shall be placed upon the roll, that they shall peril their lives, that they shall be killed in battle, and you have provided to pay their masters who do not serve in the armies of the Union. That is the way you have provided for the slave soldiers. Now, sir, I wish to read an extract or two that I have cut from a paper, showing the conduct of these brave, patriotic, and devoted slaves to whom you do not propose to pay one cent of bounty.

It will be recollected by the Senate that a few days ago General Butler marched a force up to attack Richmond. He marched his men as far as Bottom's Bridge, where they met with obstacles in the way, and were compelled to retire. There were some colored troops in that expedition, most of whom had been slaves—the class of soldiers whom you propose to exclude from these bounties, and whose late masters you propose to pay. I do not believe there was a slaveholder in that expedition; but there were in it many men who had been slaves. A correspondent giving an account of the expedition says:

"As a result of this hard marching, on the first day out over two hundred had fallen out of the United States regiments from exhaustion. When our forces reached Bottom's Bridge, and discovered that their attempted surprise had been exposed, it is estimated that fully one half of the white soldiers who commenced the march had given out, and the roads back to Williamsburg were lined with stragglers. But I have the authority of a captain in one of the white regiments for the statement that not a single colored soldier fell out from illness, exhaustion, or any other cause, and when the rolls were called before the ordered retreat, every single sable son who had started on the march was present and answered to his name!"

A few days ago a large number of our soldiers escaped from Libby prison and attempted to reach our lines. Many of them were detained in Richmond, being unable to get outside of the limits of the city, and were cared for by the Union people there; and after getting out, they had to depend entirely upon the negroes for subsistence and for protection. The following interesting account is given by one of the officers who thus escaped:

"Some of Captain Phelps's party and others were pursued and fired upon. All of them kept out of the sight of whites, but trusted implicitly the blacks, and never had their trust betrayed. After the first officers had discovered themselves to the negroes and asked for food, on the Chickahominy, the negroes organized into relief squads and searched the woods for the fugitives, carrying them food from their scanty rations, and helping them in every way in their power."

Now, sir, I am opposed to this whole system of legislation. I suppose that it is the deliberate judgment of the Senate that these very men, these very slaves of Virginia, who searched the woods to pick up our escaped prisoners, should be taken up and put into our armies, and that the bounties which are provided by law should be paid over to their masters, who, I will warrant you, never offered these escaped prisoners a single potato to eat in the time of their exhaustion, and never offered them a place to sleep at night.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable Senator will pardon me. He is mistaken in that. Some of the officers in their escape from Richmond, passing down the Peninsula, were entertained by the whites, and entertained bountifully, and provided for with everything they had, good Union men and Union women—Union women whose husbands had been shot on account of their desertion from the rebel cause.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear that there are good Union men down there; but I will venture the assertion that they were not slaveholders; or if they were slaveholders, that they would not ask the Government to pay them $300 for the services which their slaves could render in defense of this Union. I make the statement on the authority of one of the escaped prisoners, an extract from whose letter I have read here to-day. I will just read again a single line from that letter. "All" the officers "kept out of the sight of whites, but trusted implicitly to the blacks, and never had their trust betrayed."

I have read these things for the purpose of showing the great impropriety and injustice of this kind of legislation. I never will consent, and I will raise my voice against it, and I will vote against the proposition that shall insert the word "free" into any bill which may be passed here discriminating as to the pay which this Government shall give to any of the persons who serve in the armies of the Union. Why, sir, are not the services of a slave soldier, if he perils his life, just as good as the services of a free man? If a slave regiment or a slave army can save this Constitution and Union, do we not owe those men just as deep a debt of gratitude as we owe the white soldiers or the free black soldiers? Indeed, we owe them more. If there is a class of men who, after having been ground to the earth, after having had the hard and iron heel of this nation pressing upon them, after having been lashed to slavery for years, and from their early infancy, will yet come up and serve this Government in the armies of the Union, let us not insert in any bill which provides for paying bounties to our soldiers the word "free." No; the greater wonder is that after having been treated by this nation as they have been treated, one of them can be found to raise his arm for the defense of the Union. It is a marvel that after two years of war we have not learned a lesson, have not learned to open our eyes to the great questions of the hour and of the day.

I hope this amendment will not prevail. I do not know but that it may draw some money out of the Treasury to carry out the view I have expressed, but better far that there should be trouble in this country with regard to its Treasury, than that it should commit so great a crime as to employ men in the service of this nation, place them in the ranks, and then forever disgrace the nation by not paying them for the services which they have rendered. No nation in this enlightened age, in my humble judgment, can stand up before the public sentiment of mankind and make such a distinction as this. There is a principle, an elevated principle, involved in this proposition.

In my humble judgment the bill which was passed the other day never should have been passed. The slave owes service to this nation just as much as the freeman. Slaves are declared in the Constitution to be "persons," and the nation has just as great a claim upon an able-bodied black slave as it has upon a free white man; and having rendered this service to save the nation it is the duty of the Government to mete out exact and equal justice to this class of men, and the nation will be disgraced if it does not do it.

Mr. President, I hope that the time has gone by when we shall write the word "white" or the word "free" into any of the laws of this nation. I hope never to see a bill introduced or passed by Congress again where any distinction whatever in regard to rights shall be drawn as to any class of men in this country. And I think after one or two years more of fighting, if the two years we have already had are not sufficient, and after we shall have lost two or three hundred thousand more men, and have spent two or three thousand millions more of treasure, we shall learn the lesson that we ought to have learned a year and a half ago. I should very much rejoice if the proposition which was offered by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, who is not now present, [Mr. COWAN,] should pass, or something very much like it, wiping out all distinctions as to the soldiers and putting them on an equality, that every man who fights and shows his devotion to the interest of this country and to the cause of the Union shall be placed on a full and entire equality.

Mr. WILSON. I choose, Mr. President, in legislating here, not only to be guided by principles, but to be governed by the practical issues that present themselves for our solution. The Senator from Minnesota has now chosen to arraign the act against which he voted the other day. I am willing that the Senator shall defend that vote of his here and elsewhere; and I must say to him in all kindness that I think it is a vote which he will have to defend elsewhere. I am willing that he shall denounce that measure which has received the sanction of Congress and which the President of the United States has sent here to-day with his approval. That act says to every slave in the loyal States, "Enroll your name among the defenders of the Republic, and the hour you are mustered into our armies you are a free man forever more." The Government of the United States by that act for the first time in our history has declared tens of thousands of slaves in the loyal States free upon their own will to become free. It is incomparably the greatest emancipation measure that was ever passed by the Congress of the United States, and I would rather have my name to that bill which asserts the power of this nation to emancipate every slave in the country who will enroll his name among the defenders of the Union, than to any measure for which my name stands recorded in favor of the freedom of mankind. Sir, I glory in the vote, and I glory in that measure. Put it to the loyal American people, this day and this hour, and it will carry an immense majority of the friends of emancipation.

Now, sir, what are the facts in regard to the use of colored men? When the war commenced and a few men proposed to use black men in the armies of the country, the proposition was met by a stern resistance in the Army and out of the Army; the public voice of the country was against it. But as the war went on, reason assumed its empire, prejudice began to melt away, and the necessities of the country called for the use of the colored men in the armies of the United States. Then it was that we passed through Congress, after a stern resistance and most determined opposition in both Houses, an act authorizing the President to employ colored men, and to pay them the sum of ten dollars a month.

We are now trying to right the inequality of pay. We have in the measure before us a proposition to equalize the pay, uniform, clothing, arms, equipment, organization, everything between the white and colored soldiers in the service of the United States. That is the measure before us.

Mr. WILKINSON. Except slaves.

Mr. WILSON. Slaves stand on the same footing as white men, except as to bounty. By the law a free colored man in Maryland goes to the recruiting officer, enrolls his name, and is mustered into the service, and receives ten dollars a month pay, but no bounty whatever. But under the law we passed the other day, which the Senator from Minnesota denounces, the slave enlists and receives the same pay as the freeman and his freedom. We propose in this joint resolution to increase the pay and put the colored man on the same footing as the white soldier except bounty. That we leave to be determined by the President. We have provided, however, that by enlisting he becomes a freeman, that his master has no claim upon his services in the future, and that the $300 commutation money paid under the draft, or so much of it as a board shall determine, shall go to the master.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise merely to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts, and it is this in its simple form: upon what principle of law or justice is it that he gives to the owner of the slave, so called, the $300 bounty, and not to the slave who becomes a soldier?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The slave gets his freedom.

Mr. HOWARD. I say nothing about his freedom. I ask, on what principle of law or justice is it that the Senator from Massachusetts gives to the owner of the slave $300 bounty, and gives nothing to the slave who becomes a soldier? Where is the principle of justice or of law upon which that proposition is to be supported? I desire to hear the views of the Senator on that point, with all respect to him.

Mr. WILSON. The case is a plain one, and I think the Senator understands quite as well as I do. We find slavery existing in certain loyal States. We claim on the part of this Government that slaves owe duty to their country as well as freemen, and that the Government has a claim upon the services of slaves as well as freemen.

Mr. HOWARD. One further question, if the Senator pleases. If the Government has a claim upon the services of the slave, how is it possible that the master can have any after that claim shall have been made? How can the master assert any claim whatever after the Government has asserted its claim?

Mr. WILSON. You have a claim to the services of your minor son. That white boy owes service to his country, and he owes service to his father. You enlist him or you draft him into the military service; you use him; and he goes back to his father; and his father may claim his future services because you have not undertaken to relieve him from that claim of the father until he is twenty-one years of age.

Mr. WILKINSON. To whom do you pay the son's bounty?

Mr. WILSON. The bounty is paid to the son; but you do not relieve him from service to his father after his time is out in the Army. He goes back again to his father, and the father has a claim upon his labor and his services until he is twenty-one years of age. You do not deny the father's right; you have interrupted it, and when the interruption ceases the father resumes his right.

If you take the slave and use him until his time expires, and then let him go back to his master, he would have no claim upon the Government. I do not say that the master has any claim in justice and equity now; but we must look at the practical facts as they exist. The master claims the services of the slave, and you step in and declare that those services are forever ended, that the slave is a freeman, that much he has secured. Then we say to the master that the $300 commutation money paid in, or so much of it as a board shall award, he shall have in extinguishment of his claim as a consideration for the freedom that we have given to his slave.

Slavery exists in the country by local authority. Patriotism demands that we get rid of it because it stands in the way of the unity of the country and the strength, stability, and fame of the country. Congress has adopted this provision as the best under the circumstances to accomplish the desired object. I think it wise. I am willing that the Senator from Minnesota shall think otherwise; I do not rebuke him for voting against it: I hardly recognize his right to arraign me for voting for it.

There stands this great measure, the greatest anti-slavery measure ever passed by Congress. I think it will destroy slavery in any State in a hundred days after the Government shall enter upon its execution. Suppose the Government should say to the slaves in Kentucky, the only loyal State that carries the flag of slavery, "Enlist into the service of the United States those of you who are fit for military duty, and from that hour you are freemen forever," would not the result be to take the vigorous young manhood among the slaves of the State? Then what would the slave system in that State be worth?

Mr. WILKINSON. With the consent of the Senator I should like to ask him a question. If you should say to the slaves of Kentucky, "Come into the service of the United States, enlist and serve the Government in its armies, and we will not only give you freedom, but we will give you the bounty besides," would not that be at least equally anti-slavery?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly it would be equally anti-slavery, and I wish it could be so; but the Senator knows that such a measure had not the shadow of a chance to pass this Congress.

Mr. WILKINSON. The reason it cannot pass is because the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will not bring in and sustain such a measure.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the Senator to refer to the measure last passed or the one pending?

Mr. WILKINSON. I refer to a bill providing for the employment of slaves and giving them the bounty which you now give to the masters. I understood the Senator to say that such a measure had no chance to pass Congress.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the Senator to refer to the act we have passed amendatory of the enrollment bill, by which we agreed to pay $300 to the master, or to future legislation?

Mr. WILKINSON. Future legislation.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator means future legislation, I am willing to follow him or coöperate with him in doing full justice to the slave who enters our armies. I am trying to secure practically all I can now secure. General Butler, to whom the Senator has referred, says he has authority to pay ten dollars, and that is as good as a larger amount. He has put four or five thousand colored persons into the service, paying them the bounty of ten dollars. He says, however, that two or three months' pay in advance would be for the benefit of the enlisted colored soldier.

Sir, we propose by the measure pending before the Senate to equalize the pay, equalize everything but the bounties, and we authorize the President to pay the sum of $100 to colored persons where ever he shall deem it necessary. The drafted white man gets $100 now; the drafted black man gets nothing at all by the present law. Now we propose to put them on an equality with regard to pay, and we leave it with the Government to pay $100 bounty in sections of the country where it is necessary. We have not arrived at that condition when we can afford to squander the resources of the Government. I will go as far as the man who goes furthest in using money to exterminate the system of slavery, the cause of all our woes; but I feel to-day, as I have felt from the time the first gun was fired in this rebellion, that the only danger of the country is the want of money to carry on the war. I think we have made a great mistake that we have not increased, and increased largely, our taxation, and I desire a system of taxation that will double or treble the taxes now put upon the country. If we had raised $500,000,000 more than we have raised during the last two years by taxation, we should have saved more than that in the expenses of the Government and the people.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure, Mr. President, that I know what is the exact question before the Senate. I understand the proposition made by the member from Vermont, because he explained it himself, and perhaps I understand the amendment suggested by the member from Massachusetts; but I rise not so much for the purpose of addressing myself to the questions which strictly arise upon either of those amendments as to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON] and the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD], who have participated in this debate. I listen, of course, in common with all the Senate, to everything that falls from them with all deference and respect. I understood the honorable member from Minnesota to say that as far as he was informed the masters of the slaves who had been enlisted into the service of the United States have not participated at all in that service themselves.

Mr. WILKINSON. I intended to apply my remarks to the insurrectionary districts, to the States in rebellion. What I said was suggested by a report of the escape of our prisoners from Richmond, and had allusion more particularly to the white slaveholders in the rebellious States.

Mr. JOHNSON. That in some measure gets rid of what I supposed was the injustice that would have been the result of the Senator's statement unexplained. I was about to say that if I understood him correctly, (and the public may understand him as I do when his remarks are published,) I understood him to say that the masters had not shown as much loyalty as the slaves. Now, Mr. President, speaking for Maryland, I think I am at liberty to say that there is no class of our citizens more devoted to the Union, and more determined to use all their effort physical and pecuniary to extinguish this rebellion, than a great portion of the slaveholders in the State; and they have done it, too, notwithstanding influences which perhaps if they had existed in other States might have proved sufficient to weaken at least the patriotic energies that are now there exerted. The most of them have owned very many slaves; their fortune consisted in part in the possession of that property; but, notwithstanding that, they were anxious, as I have heard them say over and over again, not in individual cases, but in many cases, that if the rebellion could be extinguished and could only be extinguished by the immediate emancipation of their own slaves, no matter what might be the effect upon them of such a result, they would willingly meet the sacrifice. They are much more wedded to the Union than they are wedded to any of their mere local institutions, and especially more than they are wedded to the particular institution which now, I thank God, as they do, very many of them, is about to expire in Maryland.

The honorable member from Minnesota in order to make good his statement deemed it proper to read to the Senate certain letters which have appeared in the newspapers of the day, and as I understood him, or rather as I understood the correspondent upon whose authority he spoke, the black men in this last expedition which General Butler fondly supposed he could make in the entire ignorance of those who were to be surprised, evinced much more gallantry, much more endurance, and, as far as gallantry and endurance were concerned as evidences of patriotism, much more patriotism than the white soldiers with whom they were associated. I should like to know of the honorable member from Minnesota where those white soldiers came from?

Mr. WILKINSON. I think the Senator from Maryland mistakes entirely. There was nothing said about patriotism; it was physical endurance that was spoken of; and the reports say that while many white soldiers fell out of the ranks from exhaustion, not one black man left the ranks on that march. It was a mere question of physical endurance.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is very likely the case. Then the comparative absence of physical endurance on the part of the white in comparison with the black soldiers who were in that expedition was, if I am correct, to be found in the ranks of soldiers not taken from the slave States. Now, I do not know what may be the physical endurance of soldiers who come from the State of Minnesota, or the State of Massachusetts, or anywhere else. I know what their gallantry is; I know what their bravery is; and I know that they are capable of achieving almost anything that any soldiery has proved itself in the past capable of achieving; but I think it by no means follows that because the institution of slavery is to be found in any one State all these qualities are not to be exhibited precisely to the same extent as they are to be found in the free States. For what is the difficulty that we are now meeting? Who are the men against whom we have been battling for three years? For the most part slaveholders, brought up with that institution around them, with all its influences upon them; but we know, and we know to our cost, that in point of endurance, as well as in point of everything else that makes men gallant and brave in the field, they are not behind our own troops—not better, I admit, but not inferior. Nobody dislikes the institution more than I do; nobody is more aware of the sad effects that it has upon people in very many particulars; but speaking upon the strength of the philosophic remark made by Mr. Burke years and years ago, when England was attempting to fasten us with what we considered slavery, there is in the institution itself an influence which makes a man cling to the freedom which he possesses with an undying grasp.

Now, sir, as to the honorable member from Michigan, I have but a word to say. He seems to think—and my friend to whom I have just referred appears to be of the same opinion—that nothing has been given to the slave. Nothing? That is astonishing to my mind. What was his condition before? That of a slave. What were the consequences of it as far as we had any reason to judge, and what would have been the consequences of it if this rebellion had succeeded, and the rebellion had succeeded in taking within its grasp all the loyal border States? Slavery for themselves and for their posterity forever. What do we tell them? "Come into the service of the United States and you shall be free, you and yours; the shackles that have bound your limbs shall fall from them; you shall stand erect in the presence of your Maker as free as any white man who treads the soil." Is that nothing?

But is that all? The moment he does it he gets the same pay with the white soldier, and you have passed a bill already that gives him not only the same pay but the same bounty in the future. Is that nothing? But the proposition of the honorable members is that you are to go back, make your legislation retroactive, pay them the bounty from the first. What is to be the result upon the Treasury? The loyal master gets his $100 in one class of cases, and $300 in the other, and you propose now to give to the slave from the time he enters the service of the United States $300. What draft will that not be upon the resources of the country?

The honorable member from Minnesota has told us that it is not a question of money. It is a question of money, Mr. President. I share not in the apprehension that fills now the public mind that the war is to terminate, and disastrously for the United States, because of the failure of our financial ability. I share not in that despair, provided but only provided that Congress and the Executive husband their resources, spend nothing except what is necessary to achieve the end that we have in view. That done, economy of expenditure, fidelity in the executive department—I do not mean the higher officers—fidelity in every branch of the executive department, honesty in a word, as well as an intelligent appropriation of the finances of the country for the purposes to which they ought to be applied, and we have resources enough to carry on the war for years. The enormous debt which we have already accumulated has been owing in a great measure to the absence of these securities. I blame not the President. He was new, and almost any man would have been new, to the exigencies which surrounded him. He came from a village of comparative unimportance in the great West. His life had been spent in the honorable prosecution of his profession, within a comparatively narrow sphere; and when he was called here to administer this great Government at a time of imminent peril, which would have required the energies of the most firm and the wisdom of the most wise, it is not surprising that for a time, perhaps, he failed in bringing to the discharge of his duties all these qualities; and misconduct has been the result on the part of subordinates, wasteful expenditure, frauds innumerable, resulting in a loss that arithmetic can hardly calculate. But we are able to bear the burden now upon us.

It is to be hoped that the career of these men will be arrested. That it will be arrested if the President can arrest it, and the members of his Cabinet can arrest it, I have no doubt. That it will be arrested as far as depends upon them, if your military officers of high grade can arrest it, I have no doubt. That done, and Congress faithful to the discharge of its own duties in the particular of husbanding the resources of the country, and I shall be greatly mistaken (I should despair of human constitutional liberty in the future if it were otherwise) if we shall not be able to carry this war on to a triumphant termination, even if it lasts three or four years longer.

But with all the respect which I ever feel to anything that falls from any member of the Senate—for we are all embarked on the same voyage, we all have in view the same end, we differ only as to the means—with all the respect that every man should hold for the opinions of another, when his motives are identical with his own and correct, I submit to both the honorable members to whom I have particularly adverted, whether it is right, unless some great object is to be attained, looking to the accomplishment of the end which we all have in view, to saddle the Treasury with a demand upon it which will swell it to millions if their propositions are accepted.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read it: to insert after the word "all," in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] the word "free;" so as to read, "all free persons enrolled and mustered into the service," &c.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand, Mr. President, that if this amendment shall become a law, it will be but carrying out the policy of the act which we passed a few days ago, by which the slave volunteering into the service of the United States receives nothing in the shape of bounty, and by which the drafted slave also receives nothing. If I misunderstand it, I should like to be corrected. Sir, I can vote for no such measure, because the proposition carries with it what I regard as a gross injustice and a gross illegality. I hold that what is called the slave population of the United States owe allegiance to the Government of the United States; and that so far as allegiance is concerned, they are under precisely the same obligation to maintain the Government that their so-called masters are under, and that the Constitution of the United States makes no distinction whatever in this respect between what are called masters and what are called slaves. I hold, in contradistinction from the doctrine laid down by the eminent Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that the Constitution of the United States does not recognize any property in what are called slaves. It recognizes no property in man. It does not recognize man as being a subject of property. Here is the point of departure between that Senator and myself on an abstract question of constitutional law. He holds, if I understand him rightly, that the Constitution does recognize, and in some way guaranty to the master a property in his slaves. I hold the contrary. I hold that the Constitution of the United States is an instrument for the guaranty and support of freedom to all mankind; and that whenever a person, be he black or white, or of any other complexion, comes under the immediate and exclusive influence and power of that instrument, he becomes a free person, whatever condition he may have been in previously.

This is a point in which I differ from him. It is a radical point, a point involving elementary principles, elementary principles of human right. I hold that no man ever was born to be a slave; that all men were created equal before their Maker, and that they ought to be treated as equals before the law.

We were told the other day by the learned Senator from Maryland that the common law of England at a period later than the decision in the Sommersett case recognized property in man. The question arose upon the appropriate interpretation to be given to that clause in the Amendments of the Constitution which declares that private property shall not be taken without just compensation. I ventured the remark upon that occasion that when the Constitution speaks of private property it does not refer to men, be their color whatever it may, but that it refers to those articles which are recognized as fit and proper subjects of property by the common law of England; and I also ventured the assertion that by that law slavery was not recognized or tolerated within the limits of England. Upon that subject I referred to an elementary writer perfectly familiar to all lawyers, Mr. Justice Blackstone; and the Senator from Maryland seemed to take me to task—certainly in a very good-natured and courteous way, with which I find no fault—for advancing that idea; and he referred me, with an air that certainly implied that I ought to be better acquainted with my Blackstone than I appeared to be, to that great author, for the purpose of contradicting me. I will not set up my own opinions as against the learned Senator from Maryland; I am a very inconsiderable personage, and choose not to take up the cudgels against that eminent gentleman; but he must pardon me for allowing Justice Blackstone to speak for himself on this point. What does the great commentator say? He says, in the first book of his Commentaries:

"Upon these principles the law of England abhors and will not endure the existence of slavery within this nation; so that when an attempt was made to introduce it, by statute 1 Edw. VI. c. 3, which ordained that all idle vagabonds should be made slaves, and fed upon bread and water, or small drink and refuse meat; should wear a ring of iron round their necks, arms, or legs; and should be compelled by beating, chaining, or otherwise, to perform the work assigned them, were it never so vile; the spirit of the nation could not brook this condition, even in the most abandoned rogues; and therefore this statute was repealed in two years afterwards. And now it is laid down that a slave or negro, the instant he lands in England, becomes a free man; that is, the law will protect him in the enjoyment of his person and his property."

Mark the language, sir. "Upon these principles the law of England abhors and will not endure the existence of slavery within this nation." What then must have been the condition of a slave within the realm of England? Suppose him to have been carried from the plantations to London, or any other place within the realm, what would have been his condition? Could the master assert property in him? No, sir; the law of England, the common law to which I appeal for an interpretation of the language used in our Constitution, forbids it; it forbids all property in man, if the claim to such property involves a condition of slavery.

Again, sir, let us see what Chancellor Kent says on the same subject, how far according to him slavery is recognized by the common law. He says:

"The law of England will not endure the existence of slavery within the realm of England. The instant the slave touches the soil he becomes free, so as to be entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of his person and property, though he may still continue bound to service as a servant. There has been much dispute in the English books whether trover would lie for a negro slave; and the better opinion is that it will not lie, because the owner has not an absolute property in the negro; and by the common law it was said one man could not have a property in another, for men were not the subject of property."

And he refers to some dozen adjudicated cases arising and determined in the courts of England which establish that proposition.

But, sir, the Senator took occasion to inform us that Lord Stowell in a subsequent decision, at a period long since the establishment of our Constitution, had reversed or attempted to annul the decision of Lord Mansfield in the Sommersett case. So far from being correct in this remark, in reference to the decision of Lord Stowell in the case of the slave Grace, (for that I presume is the case to which the Senator referred,) the direct contrary is the truth. Lord Stowell does not make a single declaration in the course of that elaborate judicial opinion in which he attacks or dares attack the opinion of Lord Mansfield in the Sommersett case. He does not intimate anything to the contrary. All of any importance decided in that case by Lord Stowell is embraced in the marginal notes which I will take occasion to read. After recognizing in the clearest terms the great leading principle that by the common law of England within the realm of England there can be no such thing as property in slaves, the learned judge proceeds and says:

"By a residence in England the slave code is suspended, not extinguished." * * * "Slaves coming into England are free there, and cannot be sent out of the country by any process to be there executed." * * * "Slavery in the colonies is not the creature of law, but of custom, to which the maxim, malus usus abolendus est, is not applicable." * * *

"The law of England discourages slavery within the limits of these islands, but gives to it an almost unbounded protection in its colonies." * * *

"The statute law of this country looks on slaves in the colonies as mere goods and chattels, as subject to mortgages, &c., and has established courts of the highest jurisdiction for carrying such provisions into execution."

The case was this: the owner of the slave Grace took her from Antigua, in the West Indies, to England, where she remained with her master about a year, and then followed her master back to Antigua. The slave was imported into the port of Antigua without the payment of any duties, or without answering the charges which existed by law. The question arose upon the seizure of this slave for the payment of some duty due at the port, being in a colony where the local law declared her to be a slave, and as by that law she was treated as a slave she was regarded as such in the court of appeals of England, to which the case was carried. The whole case showed that at common law, in England, there is not and cannot be any such thing as property in slaves, in other words, property in man; while at the same time the English courts recognized the right of the colonies, which have legislative powers granted them by their charters or by act of Parliament, to establish and recognize slavery there; and that is all there is of the case.

My main proposition remains unshaken, that by the common law of England there is no such thing as slavery within the realm of England. There is no such thing as slavery in Scotland, and has not been for, I presume, a hundred years. There is no such thing as slavery in France. The moment a slave brought from the French colonies is landed upon the shores of France, he becomes ipso facto free. Such is also the rule, I believe, in every other civilized country in Europe.

Now, sir, I take this ground, that slavery exists solely and exclusively by force of the law of the place where it is claimed to exist; and that beyond the limits within which that law is in operation the slave becomes by the mere transit ipso facto free. The Constitution of the United States takes no cognizance whatever of those local laws; and so far as the black man is concerned, as he owes allegiance to the Government of the United States, and may be called upon like a white man to defend it by arms, he is, in all constitutional respects, when called upon to render military service, as free a man as you and I. The moment he is mustered into the service of the United States he becomes subject to the control of another power. He is totally emancipated and set free from the control and the will of his former so-called master, and passes to another dominion. It is a necessary legal result, unavoidable and indispensable; because the moment he enters the military service he becomes, in his capacity of a soldier, as free as you or I; as free as any other soldier, subject to obey the orders of his superiors, but possessing the right and the privilege, under the usages of war, to be elevated even to the highest command of the Army, if he deserves it.

I ask any man with a proper sense of justice in his bosom, to say nothing of the principles of universal public law, how it is possible that this man, having once taken arms to defend his country, having been subjected to military drill and discipline, can be reduced into the condition of a slave, a mere chattel, a thing to which ownership attaches? This, to my mind, is impossible. I insist upon this: that when the Government of the United States calls upon the people of the United States to render their aid in defending the country and in waging a war, the power it exercises implies no distinction between colors. It must regard all alike free and equal.

This is the ground upon which I put it: that so far as the Constitution is concerned in the carrying on of a war which calls or may call upon all the able-bodied men in the country to render their personal aid in its prosecution, the black man is necessarily to be treated as a free man, as a person, and not as property, whatever may have been the light in which he was viewed in the State where he happened to be. Believing this, I believe it is but justice in us to give these black men precisely the same rewards and encouragements, be they what they may, that we extend to the white men. I will consent to make no difference, no distinction between them; because, without any disparagement to the white race, and without intending to give any offense to any individual here, I regard all men who are engaged in prosecuting the wars of the United States as companions in arms and as brethren. In this respect it is impossible that the Constitution should not regard all as equally free. The very nature of the service is totally incompatible with the idea of slavery, with the notion that one man can have a property in another.

I cannot, therefore, vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, because it seeks to make a distinction between the soldiers of the Republic, exposed to the same perils and hardships, the same dangers of whatever description, and to the like death. It proposes to make a distinction between them which is greatly to the prejudice of the man who happens to wear a black skin, but whose valor and usefulness are regarded, even by him as equal to those of the white man.

This was one ground upon which I opposed the enrollment bill the other day, upon which the Senator from Massachusetts has made some very earnest, not to say eloquent remarks. I opposed that bill because it made, first, this distinction: it gave to the master the bounty which in justice and in honor belongs to the slave. The Senator thinks he has done enough for the black man when he has given him his freedom on being mustered into the service. I regard it as no gift; I look upon it as no gratuity to the black to give him his freedom. He becomes, under the Constitution, ipso facto, free the moment you put him into the military service of the United States. It is no gift to him. It is no benefit whatever to him as a man, as a person. I know that other Senators differ with me on this subject; but these are my fast, and I think well-considered convictions. You call him to aid you in your wars; your necessities remit him to the condition in which nature herself placed him. The hand of robbery becomes palsied. Freedom, his birthright, accrues to him as a responsible being, and he again enjoys what it was not yours to give, and which human force and crime have withheld. The Almighty, not you, restores to him the gift of liberty. He owes you nothing for it; no, not even gratitude.

There was another serious objection to the enrollment bill to which I have referred, which the Senator from Massachusetts did not see fit to allude to. It was this: that the money which is to be raised by commutation in the loyal States is placed in the hands of the Secretary of War, to be by him invested in the purchase (if I may be allowed that term) of black soldiers in the slaveholding States, while those States which contribute the money get no credit whatever for the contribution. It is, it seems to me, an act of injustice to those States; and with all possible respect for the Senator from Massachusetts, from whom I regret very much to differ, I think he, even in the old Bay State, will find some little embarrassment when he is called before the people to account for his vote on that bill. He may possibly succeed (for he is an ingenious gentleman) in satisfying his constituency of the propriety of that vote; but, sir, I could not undertake to defend such a vote before my constituents. They would ask me at once, "Why did you vote for a bill disposing of our money in the purchase of black troops without securing to the State of Michigan, which you represent, some little credit for the money thus paid out?" I could not answer the question. I could not answer it the other day in debate. I cannot answer it now. I shall not undertake to answer it before my constituents.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has given us his opinions; but the Senator must remember, when he declares that a slave mustered into the service of the United States becomes immediately a freeman, that such has not been the construction of the Government of the United States nor the action of the States.

During the war of the Revolution many black men fought in the ranks of our armies; and when the war was over many of those brave black men were claimed as slaves, and were treated as slaves, and they and their posterity held as slaves.

In the war of 1812 we called slaves into the service of the United States—and Andrew Jackson called them, in an address to them, "fellow-citizens"—and after those men had helped to win the glories of New Orleans they were claimed, and they and their children held, as slaves.

It has never been asserted by the Government of the United States that a slave mustered into our service becomes free when he is mustered in until the President of the United States signed the enrollment bill. The House of Representatives in passing the bill did not assert this power. The House of Representatives provided that the colored soldier should become free, or rather that the sum of $300 should be paid to the master on his freeing the slave who should enlist, and the sum of $100 should be paid to the master on his freeing the slave who was drafted. In the committee of conference I took the ground that I would not consent that a man should wear the uniform of the United States for a moment as a slave. I insisted that he should be a freeman when he was mustered into the service by the authority of the Government of the United States, whether the master consented to free him or not. The committee of conference agreed to that proposition, and it has been sustained by both Houses of Congress; and now, for the first time in our history, it is asserted by this Government that when a slave is mustered into the service of the United States, that moment he is free, and free forever. I may over-estimate the importance of that declaration by the Government of the United States. I thought it was a great, high, and noble position to take, and the nation will hold it, and will stand by it.

But Senators complain that we make some consideration to the masters of the slaves. Have they forgotten that early in this war they voted $300 for each slave to the slavemasters of the District of Columbia, when we made the capital of the Republic free? Not as a matter of strict justice, but as a matter of peace and harmony, for the repose of the country and the maintenance of kind feeling, we agreed to pay them $300 for their slaves. They have accepted it; and I believe there are but very few among them who would restore slavery in this District if they could. Who regrets it? A year ago most of these very gentlemen voted $20,000,000 to aid Missouri in emancipation. Do they regret that vote? They voted for the resolution that they would aid the loyal border States in emancipation. Do they regret the passage of that resolution? I do not.

Sir, I voted for all those measures in good faith, not, perhaps, as a matter of justice, for I do not recognize the right of a man to own another, but I recognize existing institutions around us as practical facts to be dealt with; and if a little money will smooth the way in this work of emancipation and of destroying slavery and bringing the people of the country together in union and harmony, brothers of a common family, I am willing to vote it. Sir, when I see an opportunity in the Congress of the United States to take one step, I will take that step. If I do not get all I want, I will take what I can get; and then I will clutch at the next opportunity and take the next step. I believe that we should act in that spirit, and for one I intend to do so.

I tell the Senator from Michigan—and I know he recognizes it as well as I do—that we never could have passed that measure through the House of Representatives declaring these slaves free on being mustered into the service, without making some consideration to those who claimed their services. This proposition came, I understand, from a distinguished gentleman from the State of Maryland, a gentleman who during the past year has rendered services to the cause of emancipation in Maryland and in the country that the loyal anti-slavery men of the country will not soon forget—I mean HENRY WINTER DAVIS. We amended it. We improved it. We did not leave it to the master to take the compensation on the freeing of his slave, but we said to the master, "Your slave is free when he is mustered into our service, and we will tender you so much." We are masters of our own position. I think it is a great advance; not that we shall not advance further to-morrow or the next day, but it is a great advance for to-day; and I am glad I had the privilege of giving a vote to push the cause along so far.

But, sir, I suppose we shall not have a vote on this measure to-night, as I was told by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] who has left the Chamber, that he wished to examine the subject a little further, and perhaps to make some remarks upon it. I desire now to call attention to another subject. A message has been received from the House of Representatives announcing that they have disagreed to our amendments to the bill reviving the grade of lieutenant general, and asking a conference. I desire to have that message taken up, with a view of agreeing to the conference on our part.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Before we dispose of the joint resolution now under consideration, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, and have it printed.

Mr. WILSON. I will give way to the Senator for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the amendment will be received and ordered to be printed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In connection with it, I should like also to have the amendments proposed by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Massachusetts printed.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. LANE of Indiana, and Mr. JOHNSON.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, a copy of the proceedings of the general court-martial for the trial of Assistant Surgeon Webster; a report of the General-in-Chief of the Army on the management of general hospitals; general orders in relation to the medical department; general orders containing regulations relating to hospitals, and copies of letters conveying instructions in regard to hospitals, dated, respectively, January 28, August 5, and December 31, 1863, and January 29, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

EXTENSION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. WILSON. I ask leave to submit a resolution. I do not wish to have action upon it to-night; but I desire to introduce it now, and I should like to have it read so that Senators may reflect upon it by to-morrow:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to consider the expediency of extending the provisions of the joint resolution of January 13, 1864, concerning bounties, to the 1st day of April next.

CONSOLIDATION OF SURVEYING DISTRICTS.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to postpone all prior orders, and take up Senate bill No. 117. It will take but a moment to pass it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 117) to provide for the consolidation of certain surveyor generals' districts. It directs that, until otherwise directed by law, the surveying district of public lands for the Territory of New Mexico shall be extended to embrace the Territory of Arizona; that the surveying district of public lands of Colorado shall be extended to embrace the Territory of Idaho; that the surveying district of public lands of Oregon shall be extended to embrace the Territory of Washington; that the surveying district of public lands of Kansas and Nebraska shall be extended to embrace the Territory of Dakota; and proposes to repeal all acts and parts of acts creating the offices of surveyor generals for the Territories respectively added or attached to other surveying districts by this act; and all the books, papers, and records belonging to the surveying districts hereby discontinued and attached to the other districts, are to be transferred to and deposited in the offices of the surveyor generals to whose districts those territorial districts have been hereby attached.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the joint resolution we had under consideration a short time since, to equalize the pay of soldiers, with a view of leaving it as the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers of the United States Army.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SOLDIERS OF WAR OF 1812.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, for reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to amend section seventy-five of an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay interest on the public debt," which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MEXICO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to this House the correspondence on the present state of Mexico since that published by the last Congress.

Mr. FINCK. I object. I ask to make a statement.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I object.

Mr. BOYD. I ask to introduce a bill.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for the purpose of reference.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask leave of absence for a short time.

No objection being made, leave of absence was granted.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent—and I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] will not object, as I think I have objected to nothing of his—to take from the Speaker's table the bill which just came in from the Senate, for the purpose of disagreeing to the Senate amendments, and asking a committee of conference. It is a bill (H. R. No. 26) to revive the grade of lieutenant general in the Army of the United States.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is called for. The call for committees for reports is in order; and under that call the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, on which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, addressed the House for an hour. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. KNAPP obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. The morning hour has expired, and I propose to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to take up the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 26, reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army.

Mr. COX. Does not that require a vote?

The SPEAKER. It does.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and that the House ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, McALLISTER, and FENTON the managers of said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report appropriation bills from the Committee of Ways and Means, especially the deficiency bill, which is needed.

There was no objection.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 156, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864, and for other purposes, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order for next Tuesday, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have the bill and Senate amendments printed; and also to have printed all of the estimates and letters from the Departments in reference to the several items of appropriations.

Mr. STEVENS. That would make a voluminous document.

Mr. BROOKS. I think not. It is information that the House and country ought to have.

Mr. STEVENS. If the House does not object I will not. They can order it if they want it.

Mr. BROOKS. I make the motion that the bill and amendments of the Senate and the estimates and other information upon which the appropriations are founded be printed for the use of the House. This bill when originally reported from the Committee of Ways and Means appropriated about seven million dollars. The amendments of the Senate add $93,000,000 to it, making $100,000,000 in all. It is necessary for us to know upon what those appropriations are founded.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate added about eighty-seven million dollars.

Mr. PENDLETON. The request of the gentleman from New York is reasonable, and I hope it will be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

PERUVIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back Senate bill No. 65, to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863.

The bill was read through.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to put the bill on its passage. It makes an appropriation for an adjudicated case.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Wednesday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. It is important that the bill should pass at an early moment, unless there is some objection to it. I ask that the bill be read, and if there is no objection I will ask to put the bill upon its passage.

The bill was read.

Mr. COX. The bill has not been printed. Does the gentleman intend to press it to a vote to-day? I have no objection to the consideration of it now if the gentleman does not intend to press it to a vote this morning.

Mr. STEVENS. If there is any difficulty about it, of course I do not ask to have a vote upon it. I will explain in a single word what the meaning of the bill is, and then gentlemen can object or not, as they see fit.

The first section merely changes the provision of the act of March, 1863, which authorizes the loan to be made payable after ten years and within forty. What is asked here is that $200,000,000 of that loan—the same loan authorized by that act—shall be allowed to be put into the five instead of the ten years' minimum time. There is no other change in the first section. The loans which have heretofore been made, of $500,000,000, were five-twenties. That has been a very popular loan, and it was thought it would be very likely to be taken if the same five years were inserted in the future loan of $200,000,000.

The second section provides that where there were subscriptions made for five-twenties beyond the law which authorized the issue of $500,000,000, and the money already paid into the Treasury before that law expired, the parties making such subscriptions shall have the right to receive five-twenties now for the money so paid. That sum amounts, I understand, to between ten and eleven million dollars. The money was paid into the Treasury, but the authority to issue the bonds having expired, the Secretary of the Treasury asks authority to issue the like kind of bonds for the amount of money already paid.

There are no other provisions in the bill.

Mr. BROOKS made an inquiry entirely inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. STEVENS. The bill does not authorize any additional loan. It only takes $200,000,000 from the loan of 1863, which was $900,000,000, and allows them to be issued as five-forties, instead of ten-forties.

Mr. COX. Is the ten or twelve millions proposed to be issued an increase of those already issued?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir. The $500,000,000 had all been taken before the expiration of the law, but there had been subscribed ten or eleven millions more than was authorized to be issued, and this bill gives the Secretary authority to issue an additional ten millions for the money which has been paid.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman regard that as a matter of good faith with those who have already invested in five-twenties?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know what faith is broken by it. I do not know that there was any understanding that no more stock than $500,000,000 should be issued.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me, considering the large amount involved in this loan, that this bill should be printed, and undergo some consideration. I shall not object to reporting the bill at this time, if the gentleman will allow the bill to be printed, and its consideration postponed, so that we can examine the matter.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman has a right to object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object if it is the understanding that the bill be printed and postponed for consideration.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the gentleman going on with the bill if it is not pressed to a vote to-day.

Mr. STEVENS. Let it be read a first and second time, and I will move to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

No objection being made, the bill was considered as read a first and second time, and recommended to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. I now desire to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the naval appropriation bill.

COMPENSATION OF INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means, with a view to put it upon its passage, the bill to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not object, provided the bill is to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FENTON. I withdraw the request.

DISPOSITION OF CAPTURED COTTON.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back bill of the House No. 213, relative to the capture of cotton and the disposition thereof by the military forces of the United States, and moved that it be recommitted and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I now insist on my motion. The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. I want to call the attention of the committee this morning to that feature of the bill to which I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means yesterday, and in order to do that I ask the unanimous consent of the committee to go back to the item appropriating for Mare island, California.

There was no objection, and the item was read, as follows:

For building marine barracks, officers' quarters, and gateway at navy-yard, Mare island, California, $150,781 30.

Mr. KASSON. The error arose from inadvertence in finally passing on the bill in Committee of Ways and Means. My colleagues on the committee will remember that we endeavored to apply to these items that principle of appropriation that what is necessary to be done immediately for the efficiency of the service in the present war ought to be appropriated for, and that what could be postponed without detriment to the public service ought to be postponed.

In that view, I now propose, and I believe that in doing it I am in accordance with the Committee of Ways and Means, to strike out some of the items included in this clause. Taking them in their order, as they are to be found on page 255 of the Treasury estimates, I propose to strike out the appropriation for the commandant's house, for the captain's house, for bachelors' quarters, and for the gateway.

Mr. SHANNON. What gateway is that?

Mr. KASSON. It is the main gateway of the yard, for which this estimate is thought necessary.

I will make my statement plain with the estimates before me. The estimate upon which this appropriation is made amounts to $250,781 30, on which estimate there is applicable an existing appropriation previously made of $100,000, thus making for all these items $150,781 30 additional. In order to make up that amount they have embraced these several items and amounts: for men's quarters, $139,058 44; for commandant's house, twenty-seven thousand and odd dollars; for captain's house, thirteen thousand and odd dollars; for quartermaster's house, thirteen thousand and odd dollars; for bachelors' quarters, thirty-six thousand and odd dollars; for gateway, twenty thousand and odd dollars.

Now, my object is to reduce the appropriation to the amount that may perhaps be necessary for present purposes there, which would be done by simply making provision for men's quarters; and for the purpose of bringing the matter before the committee I will move to strike out from the one hundred and fifty-third and one hundred and fifty-fourth lines the words "officers' quarters and gateway," and to strike out from the one hundred and fifty-fifth line "$150,781 30," and to insert in lieu thereof "$39,058 44."

Mr. HIGBY. I would like to have the gentleman from Iowa explain what this provision in relation to a gateway is.

Mr. KASSON. I will answer the question. The chief of the bureau having charge of the subject was before the committee, and we found that this matter was simply what it purports to be, the erection of an entrance which, some of these days, will undoubtedly be magnificent, admirable, and attractive; but that it is not necessary for the purpose of the Navy at the present time, or perhaps for some years to come.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish the gentleman from Iowa to tell me where this $30,000 is to be applied?

Mr. KASSON. We merely proposed that it should be added to the unexpended balance of $100,000, and it would be left to be appropriated for building the marine barracks.

Mr. HIGBY. This is not to affect the appropriation for barracks?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir.

The question was taken on Mr. KASSON's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the clause in regard to the Philadelphia navy-yard, by striking out "for the purchase of two lots adjoining navy-yard, Philadelphia, extending from Front street to the commissioners' line in the Delaware river, at a price not exceeding $90,000—$214,945," and inserting "$124,000;" so that it will read:

Philadelphia:

For repairs of dry-dock, pitch-house, dredging; repairs of damage to store by fire, and for repairs of all kinds, $124,000.

That amount will cover all that is estimated for by the Department, deducting the item of $260,000 for the dry-dock, which the Committee of Ways and Means seems to have stricken out. As a much better argument on this subject than any I can offer, I desire to submit the views of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject at last session.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"For dock; dredging; repairs of all kinds, and for the purchase of two lots adjoining the navy-yard, extending from Front street to the commissioner's line in the Delaware river, upon condition that a more extensive navy-yard shall not be provided for on said river, $330,458."

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out all after the word "kinds," in the first line, and to insert "$50,000;" so as to make it read, "for dock; dredging; repairs of all kinds, $50,000."

Mr. Chairman, I know something about the two lots referred to in this clause, and I think the price fixed is about three times the amount they are worth. I do not myself think it proper to make a purchase of this kind in an appropriation bill. If the lots are to be purchased at all, there ought to be a commission appointed to examine them and determine their value. From my own knowledge of them, I think the price named here is three times what they are worth.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would ask the gentleman whether, if these lots are not purchased, it will become any more necessary to take League Island?

Mr. STEVENS. Not at all. I suppose it has no influence on that question. I cannot vote for this purchase, because I know it would be a bad speculation."

The argument made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means seems unanswerable, and I presume there will be no objection to striking out this item.

Mr. STEVENS. At the time this appropriation bill was up last year the Committee of Ways and Means had no information on the subject except what was contained in the estimate. I had been informed by some persons who I suppose did not like this negotiation that the price was too high. This year the Superintendent of Yards and Docks came again before us, after having found that it could still be got at the same price for which it was offered last year, and asked that it be added to the navy-yard. I took the pains when in Philadelphia to look into this matter. I found that it was an entirely different thing from what it had been represented to me before. Although I had taken the responsibility of moving to strike it out before, on representations which I thought were true, I found that they came from rival speculators.

The admiral convinced the Committee of Ways and Means that this piece of ground was absolutely necessary, whether League Island were accepted or not. He informed us that if League Island were accepted it would take some eight or ten years before that place would be in a condition to be used for the purpose of repairing vessels. The Committee of Ways and Means was entirely satisfied that this proposition was right, and that the adding of this piece of ground to the navy-yard would save great expense to the Government either in getting up a new navy-yard below, on the Delaware, or sending vessels to Boston for repairs which could be done at the Philadelphia navy-yard. The Committee of Ways and Means, therefore, was of unanimous opinion that this appropriation should be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania be kind enough to state whether, in the event of a naval station being established at New London or at League Island, this appropriation of $90,000 would not be an entirely useless expenditure of money; also, what is the extent of this piece of ground for which it is proposed to pay $90,000?

Mr. STEVENS. We asked that question of the admiral. He said he thought it would not affect the necessity for the appropriation; that if they determined upon another site for a navy-yard it would take ten years before it could be put into a condition so as to be serviceable for the purposes needed.

I will mention while I am up that the committee agreed under the recommendation of Admiral Smith to transfer the appropriation made last year of $750,000 for a dock at the navy-yard at New York—to transfer so much as is necessary, $260,000, for a dock or some convenience of that kind at Philadelphia, and a like amount for the New York yard, allowing the balance to go back into the Treasury. We have provided in this bill for the transfer of that appropriation, under the earnest request of those who have it in charge at the Navy Department. By this transfer some five hundred and sixty thousand dollars would go back into the Treasury. This, then, by reason of that transfer, becomes an imperative necessity. Under all of the circumstances it must be admitted that this is necessary for the repair of our vessels.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman what is the area of the land that it is proposed to purchase?

Mr. STEVENS. A little over one hundred feet of water front; perhaps one hundred and ten feet. I know that it is over one hundred feet.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman let me ask him another question? Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means furnish the House with the data upon which the appropriation is founded? There is no recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy. Certainly, if there is any recommendation, from the Navy Department in favor of this appropriation, it ought to be put in the possession of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I stated before that last year the Navy Department did recommend it, but that I became possessed of information to induce me to believe it was a job, and it was rejected. The Department said that as the House had struck it out on the motion of the Committee of Ways and Means they would not renew it until we were satisfied the title could be made and the price was a proper one. Hence it was left out, and brought in afterwards by Admiral Smith in the way I have mentioned.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow whatever recommendation was made to be laid before the House. I do not think that the House ought to appropriate so large a sum without definite information.

Mr. STEVENS. Admiral Smith was before the committee in person with maps and plans, and made a verbal statement. We did not ask him to reduce it to writing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a little surprised, when an appropriation is proposed upon this floor in favor of Pennsylvania, to notice the want of alacrity on the part of the able delegation from that State in coming forward to its defense when it is objected to. It is certainly in extraordinary contrast to their readiness in advocating an appropriation for $700,000 to Pennsylvania in an early part of the session. I propose now to stand up as the champion of that State, and especially of the Philadelphia navy-yard. If I understand the proposition before the House, the Committee of Ways and Means have, in the usual way, reported an appropriation of $90,000 for the extension or enlargement of the present navy-yard at Philadelphia. That appropriation has been approved unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs, who are supposed to be conversant with that special subject.

I understand it to be objected by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that this thing has not been estimated for and recommended by the Navy Department. If the gentleman will turn to the report of the chief of Yards and Docks, who has these matters specially in charge, he will find the following:

"The extent of the present yard is entirely too small for the object in view, but land and good water front adjacent, sufficient to increase the yard to about double its present area, can be obtained at a fair price, say about $300,000."

I hold in my hand a letter from the commandant of the yard, addressed to the members of Congress from Pennsylvania upon this floor at the last session of Congress, and I suppose his facts and reasons exist now as then. It is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, June 19, 1862.

DEAR SIR: When I last wrote to you I did so through an amanuensis. I am not much better now, but must again bring to your notice the interests of our navy-yard. This new project of the Mayor and City Councils of moving the yard to League Island is all a matter of speculation with a party here to draw four or five million dollars from the Government, out of which they would make splendid fortunes, while the United States would be a loser at every turn. If the city even buys the property, and presents it to the Government, the latter would still be a loser, for it would take at least four or five years to prepare the place before an attempt could be made to use it, and this, too, at an outlay of millions; besides, the island is unfit for it, being constantly overflowed, which would render an immense expenditure necessary for filling in, wharfing, making docks, &c., &c. Now, at our present location we have most of the requisites for a very efficient navy-yard.

We have a floating dry dock, surpassed by none in the world, erected at a cost of over a million dollars, which would be entirely destroyed by this removal, and another one be necessary at the new location, costing perhaps double the sum. We have ship-houses, timber-sheds, store-houses, work-shops, steam-works, and almost all we need to make ours a first-class yard, and all those buildings built and paid for. All we want is more space, which we can have to a large extent south of us, the property—Merrick's and all—with the additional buildings necessary for our purposes, not costing one twentieth of the sum which League Island would cost. Besides, it is absolutely necessary for the protection of the Government interests that we should have and acquire the two adjoining lots at once; for, admitting the probability of removing the present yard to League Island, long before we could occupy that place the Government would lose five times the amount asked for the lots because of the unnecessary labor we have to perform in consequence of our crowded space as I endeavored to show you in my last letter. Whatever be the result of the present movement, these lots ought to be bought, in order to save more than five times their cost, and besides, end the matter as it may, the property will be increasing in value every year, and would far more than pay for itself eventually sold.

Will you give this matter your attention, and endeavor to get an appropriation for the purchase, giving us a chance to do the United States justice in our operations, and saving vast sums of money now expended for useless labor, if we had this space to operate upon?

Signed by commandant of yard or his secretary.

G. J. PENDERGRAST, Commandant.

Therefore it comes to us recommended by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, recommended by the commandant of the yard, approved by the Committee of Ways and Means, and also recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. The present yard consists of only seventeen acres, the smallest navy-yard in the United States. This proposed addition will nearly double its capacity. Every gentleman must be sensible that with the addition to our Navy in the last two years, with the improvement in naval architecture which has entirely revolutionized that service in the world, there exists a very large necessity for increased naval accommodations. I do not suppose this enlargement will meet that necessity, but I do suppose that if the Government enlarges this yard, as a matter of economy, to make it useful for any purpose, it will obviate the necessity of this immense swindle which is contemplated concerning League Island, which would cost the Government untold millions of dollars. I shall vote for this proposition as a stopper to that.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the House received a message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had rescinded its agreement to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H.

R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue; and for other purposes, and further insisted upon its third, fifteenth, and sixteenth amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agreed to a further committee of conference asked for by the House of Representatives on the said bill; and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. HENDRICKS as such committee on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the appropriation of this sum of money will, as seems to be the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut, dispense with the necessity of expending vast sums of money at New London, Connecticut, or League Island, I think this expenditure would be wisely made. But if the gentleman means that this sum of money should be appropriated for the benefit of the Philadelphia navy-yard for the mere purpose of an argument against the purchase of League Island, I should protest against such motives in legislation. The gentleman seems to apprehend that unless the Philadelphia navy-yard is enlarged "the League Island swindle"—I indulge in mere quotation—may be consummated, and if "the League Island swindle" is not consummated, then that the New London project will be adopted. That may or may not be considered the fair and legitimate inference from the gentleman's argument. I therefore freely yield to the gentleman from Connecticut to state whether he considers that this appropriation of $90,000 for the purpose of nearly doubling, as is said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the capacity of the Philadelphia yard will be able to dispense with the necessity of laying out a vast sum of money in the future in establishing a navy-yard either at New London or at League Island. So far as I am concerned, representing a western constituency, among whom no money for such purposes is expended, and where the subject of economy has more weight than any local consideration, if the gentleman says that the enlargement of the Philadelphia navy-yard will dispense with the necessity of founding a navy-yard to be completed, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, years hence, at New London or League Island, I think the appropriation of this $90,000 will be well made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I renew the amendment. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this appropriation will not be hazarded by complicating it with any other scheme, whether at League Island or elsewhere.

The simple fact in regard to this matter, so far as I know—and I believe I understand it pretty well—is that the necessity for enlarging the navy-yard at Philadelphia arises from the greatly increased number of vessels in the Navy. It is precisely the same reason which requires an enlargement of the navy-yard at Boston, and which will require increased facilities for repairing ships at Norfolk, Port Royal, and Key West. The facilities which the Government at present possesses for carrying on this work are entirely too small. I had recently an opportunity of making a personal inspection of the crowded condition of the navy-yard at Philadelphia. Vessels were lying three or four deep at the wharves, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the operations of the yard could be successfully carried on.

As nearly as I can estimate it, the amount of space made by this purchase would be equivalent to an enlargement of more than half the present capacity of the yard.

Aside from immediate facilities for the repair and construction of vessels there, which are very much needed, I think that if this purchase be made the yard will be available for the number of years that must elapse before it will be possible to construct a new navy-yard at any other point, and that the value of the property will be likely to be greatly enhanced at the time the Government will have to dispose of it, instead of decreasing in value.

I hope no opposition will be made to this appropriation, because I believe that the purchase of this tract of land will be a very economical operation for the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the enlargement of the navy-yard at Philadelphia to the extent now proposed will dispense with the necessity of building a navy-yard either at League Island or at New London, Connecticut?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will say to my friend from Indiana that I do not think the purchase of this piece of land has any connection with the subject of building a navy-yard at League Island or anywhere else. The project of building a navy-yard at League Island is connected with the idea of constructing iron naval vessels. The idea is not to build a new navy-yard like the existing yards of the country, but a yard that shall be especially adapted to the construction of iron sea-going vessels and other vessels of a similar description, and it is not at all likely, as I said before, that the purchase of this piece of property will affect in one way or the other the establishment of a navy-yard at League Island.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do the Committee on Naval Affairs propose to report a bill for the purpose of establishing a navy-yard either at League Island or New London during the present session of Congress?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that that is one of the subjects now under consideration by the Committee on Naval Affairs. Under the order of this House, that committee have had the subject under very careful and laborious consideration and investigation for several weeks, and have examined some of the spots at which it is proposed to locate this yard. They will be prepared to report as soon as they shall have possessed themselves of the facts in the case in order that they may present to the House reasons for or against. But the recommendation of this appropriation by the committee has no connection with the League Island scheme.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will not prevail. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs I have been very strenuous in my efforts to cut down to the lowest possible extent the appropriations for the Navy, but I am led to believe from the testimony which was adduced before the committee that the sums appropriated for the extension of the yard at Boston, and the extension of the yard at Philadelphia, are imperatively necessary to the success of our Navy at the present time. I think there is no one appropriation, no one item in this bill, more material to the best interests of the Navy than are these two. I say this without reference to League Island or any other navy-yard within the United States. I speak only in regard to the interests of the Navy as involved in this question. I think the best interests of the country require us to make this appropriation.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that it was necessary for the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to rise in his place and undertake to defend the interests of the State of Pennsylvania. I do not know that this is the time for members from Pennsylvania to be drawn into a discussion of the merits of League Island or the merits of New London as a naval station. It may do very well for the gentleman from Connecticut to endeavor to prejudice the Committee of the Whole in regard to League Island, but I do not think he has succeeded in the remarks he has made. Sir, I waited for the chairman of the Naval Committee to let us know something about the $90,000 proposed to be appropriated here. We have heard now from the chairman; we have heard from other members of that committee. I do not think this committee is now willing to be drawn into the discussion as to where a great iron naval station should be located.

I do not know where the big swindle is of which the gentleman spoke. It may be in New London. I do not think it is in Philadelphia. I think we have presented to the Naval Committee a location for an iron naval station which is the best the country affords, and I am glad to be able to express my belief that that question will be considered fairly by the Naval Committee. When that committee shall report we will then have before us all the facts, on which we can act with intelligence and authority. The members from Pennsylvania are willing, on this very small matter of an appropriation of $90,000, to leave it to be decided by the committee which has had all the facts before it.

I think the committee has given us views on the subject which show that this appropriation should be made and this strip of land bought. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has informed us that it is a mere strip of one hundred feet water front, to be added to the Philadelphia navy-yard. He tells us that it is necessary. Admiral Smith, chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, approves of it! Certainly he does! He may have told the gentleman from Connecticut that now was his opportunity to strike a blow at League Island by asserting that the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks was willing that Philadelphia should have an extension of one hundred feet to her navy-yard, provided the gentleman from Connecticut and those opposing League Island would satisfy the House that Philadelphia and Pennsylvania were getting a great boon from the Government. I am not surprised at the letter which the gentleman from Connecticut has read from the commandant of the navy-yard. That commandant is neither a Philadelphian nor a Pennsylvanian in sentiment. It would suit me if the Secretary of the Navy would have some one presiding over that yard as commandant more in unison with the feeling of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania on the subject of League Island. May I ask the gentleman whether that letter was not written by Commodore Stribling?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. By Commodore Pendergrast?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Commodore Pendergrast is dead and gone. I think he died while commandant of the Philadelphia navy-yard many months ago. He has been succeeded by another commandant equally hostile to the League island project. I am not aware that either of them knew or knows anything about League island. I am sure the knowledge of these officers as to the value of this island for the purposes of a great naval station for iron vessels and armature, with their known prejudices against the location, is not to be relied on, as is the experience of those who have lived upon and near it and know its every foot of land.

I merely rose, Mr. Chairman, to say that the Pennsylvania delegation did not desire this project to be discussed upon a mere collateral appropriation, which, in the good judgment of the Naval Committee, has been recommended as necessary for the purposes of the Navy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I oppose the amendment. I never knew, Mr. Chairman, a gentleman preface his speech with a declaration that it was to be a short one that he did not make a long one; and I never knew anybody to commence by deprecating discussion that did not go into a discussion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania deprecates dragging this controversy before the committee, and immediately thereafter he goes at some length—certainly within the limit of his time, but filling his time—into a discussion of this swindle of the Delaware. Now, sir, this committee will bear me witness that I only introduced this question by the letter of the commandant of the Philadelphia navy-yard—the late commandant who I am now informed for the first time is dead and gone, and who it is strongly intimated died because he was not in unison with the people of Philadelphia on this question. I quoted that letter for this reason: the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] stated that there was not a line or word of recommendation from any officer of the Navy Department or of the Government in favor of this appropriation, of any officer who was conversant with the subject, and I quoted that letter as the very highest authority. If anybody knew the necessities and capacity of the yard it must be the commandant.

In that letter addressed to the Pennsylvania delegation in Congress were certain charges against the League Island project. I am not the maker of the note. I do not know that I am the indorser. I gave it currency believing it to be true, and I wanted it to go before the committee and the country.

I think that the committee will bear me witness, and you, Mr. Chairman, will do me the justice to acknowledge that I put my action and vote in favor of this enlargement of the Philadelphia navy-yard upon the ground that it was recommended by the proper Department, and from the proper committee of this House.

It will be seen that this is the smallest yard in the country, comprising only seventeen acres. It was tried to its utmost capacity before the war, and tried far beyond its capacity since, so that vessels are compelled to be sent to New England and southern yards, where they could gain entrance with much more ease than at this yard. This will increase the now limited facilities of the Philadelphia navy-yard, and the land is offered at a fair price; and we are told that the Government can get back all that it will pay for it, and perhaps more, if we ever wish to sell that yard. It is upon these considerations I predicate the vote I shall give upon this appropriation.

The amendment, by unanimous consent, was withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I renew the amendment; and I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of advocating the original proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means. My action will not be controlled by the reasons which seem to govern the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE,] whose hostility to the establishment of an iron-clad navy-yard at League Island, in the Delaware river, and which grows out of the fear he has for his own pet project at New London, has been thrust forward in this debate without the least pretext for it. I deem, sir, that the proposed enlargement of the Philadelphia navy-yard is called for by the best interests of the Government. If at any future period a navy-yard should be constructed at League Island, as I trust that it soon will be, and it shall become necessary to sell this land, the Government will lose nothing, but, on the contrary, will be able to dispose of it at an enhanced price. The appropriation is a necessary one, and is, we are told by the Department, as economical as it could be made with a view to answer the demands of the Navy. The reasons advanced by the Committee of Ways and Means for the appropriation are plain and practical; it is founded upon the estimates and recommendations of the Department; it is needed and judicious, and I trust that it will secure the approval of the House.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Chairman, there need be no nervousness on the part of the member from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] in reference to the delegation upon this floor from Pennsylvania. We are not now considering the claim of Connecticut for a new navy-yard, nor whether an iron-clad navy-yard shall be established at League Island. The gentleman has propounded the question why we do not take more interest in this matter. Sir, I beg leave to say to the House—and I will be sustained by the Representatives from Pennsylvania on both sides of the House—that we take a more enlarged view of our duties. We are not confined to the narrow limits of a State; we are here as the representatives of the whole country. While we feel State pride, as all men do, yet, sir, we act with reference to the merits or demerits of the measures presented for our consideration. Gentlemen will find that we do not advocate League Island or any other place as Pennsylvanians. We do not advocate it because it is located in Pennsylvania or near Philadelphia. I come myself from the interior of the State, and I do not advocate it because it is upon the border of Pennsylvania. We take a more enlarged view of the question; and when it comes fairly before us we will decide that which is best for the American Navy. I do not see why there is this extraordinary clamor and this nervousness because perchance the establishment of a navy-yard at League Island may be advocated here by gentlemen from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to say to the House, that if League Island has not advantages to recommend it to the favorable consideration of the House, let some other place be selected; but until it is demonstrated before the House and we are entirely convinced that League Island has not superior claims, let us pass on to the public business that demands our attention.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Naval Committee, I must enter my protest against a discussion relative to the merits of League Island or New London, or any other location in connection with this simple question of the purchase of additional land for the enlargement of the Philadelphia navy-yard.

So far as I know, sir, the members of that committee have taken up this question upon its merits alone. They have not been influenced in their recommendation upon a simple point of this kind by the feelings or interests either of League Island or New London, of Pennsylvania or Connecticut. We have taken it up as a business matter, considering the importance of the enlargement of the navy-yard upon the grounds so well stated not only by members of the Committee of Ways and Means, but by members of the Naval Committee, and we have, as our unanimous opinion, come to the conclusion that the purchase of this little tract of land will be of great benefit to the country, inasmuch as it will nearly double the facilities of the navy-yard at Philadelphia.

I rose simply to protest as a member of the Naval Committee against this matter being involved in any degree in the consideration of the question of a future navy-yard and its location.

Mr. KELLEY. I concur, Mr. Chairman, in the propriety of the remark of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] that we should exclude from the discussion now pending all considerations with reference to the question of a new navy-yard for iron vessels. That will be before us at an early day, when I shall be prepared to show, and think I shall be sustained by the facts of the case, where that yard should be located. But that question has no connection with the one now before the committee, and should be excluded from the discussion.

Sir, wharfage and dockage are the great wants of our Navy at this time, and I affirm without fear of contradiction that to-day, at this very hour, there are more Government vessels lying in hired docks and at hired wharves in the city of New York alone than there were in the American Navy on the day on which the rebellion broke out.

Within two weeks past a majority of the members of the Naval Committee have seen that the docks and wharves for a considerable distance south of the Philadelphia yard are rented by the Government, and that our vessels in large numbers are lying at them; so too to the north of the yard several docks and some of the finest wharves are engaged by the Government and occupied by transports and other vessels.

During the last Congress I opposed the purchase of the strip of land for the purchase of which it is now proposed to make an appropriation. I did it because I then thought a job was attempted, inasmuch as a price beyond what it was worth was asked for the land; but the proviso in this bill limits the purchase money to $90,000, and my judgment is that it will be a bargain at a price within that sum. It has a valuable though not extensive wharf front, and it cuts off the southern boundary of the yard from the line of a street laid down on the plan of Philadelphia, and which will be opened to travel; so that should that yard be exposed for sale for commercial or general purposes its market value will be enhanced far more than $90,000 by the Government owning the street front along its southern and longest boundary.

I hope, sir, that by the future legislation of this session a necessity will be created for the early sale of that yard, and thus the $90,000 to be appropriated by this bill be converted into a much larger sum for the Treasury at an early day. This purchase will meet a present and pressing want of the Navy. Having opposed this purchase during the last Congress, I feel it is but justice to myself and those who remember my vote on that occasion to say that on the terms proposed by the present bill I think we could not do a more judicious thing than to provide for the purchase.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the amount now proposed the same that was proposed in the last Congress?

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; the sum was then one hundred and twenty thousand dollars odd, if I remember, and that is a very material difference. I am not sure that it was not $150,000.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the appropriation of $30,000 for completion of extension of building at Pensacola. While I am not opposed to proper appropriations for the repair and keeping in full operation of the navy-yards on the seaboard, I cannot but feel that these two appropriations for Norfolk and Pensacola of a large sum of money are of a very questionable character. One of these navy-yards is destroyed; the other, situated on the coast of Florida, cannot be made available for any general purposes.

We are keeping up and enlarging so many of these navy-yards that the expense is becoming enormous. It is well to consider the result. I have looked over the naval appropriations for some years past, including the year preceding the war, and I find that as late as 1860 the appropriation for the Navy was but $12,000,000; in 1862 it was $30,456,294; in 1863 it was $42,741,336; in 1864 it was $92,713,205. And now the Secretary of the Navy asks an appropriation of $142,618,785. Thus from an appropriation of $12,000,000 at the beginning of the war, with a respectable Navy then in the service, we have increased by rapid progress until $142,000,000 are now required, a sum double the whole expenditure at the close of the last Administration; and, sir, you have no assurance that this enormous increase will not continue in the future, year after year, if the present order of things shall continue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there had been a corresponding benefit from this extraordinary increase of the Navy, no citizen should utter a word of complaint about it; but with all of this extraordinary outlay in the building and purchase of vessels, it seems to be a fact, a most humiliating one, that we have not a vessel engaged in our trans-Atlantic commerce that floats under the American flag. I should hope, out of a just national pride, that this was an error. Our ships are being sold to English and French owners—I say it with reluctance—that they may sail in safety under the flags of those countries; a foreign flag to protect American commerce! Quite recently apprehensions were felt that our possessions on the coast of the Pacific would not be safe from the piratical marauders which, under the patronage of Great Britain, have been sent out to burn and destroy our property on the high seas. Thus with this lavish appropriation of money, this immense Navy of six hundred ships, our commerce is crippled, virtually destroyed. Our ships are either driven from the ocean or placed under the flag of foreign nations. The insignificant navy of pirate vessels sent on to the high way of nations through the instrumentality of British cupidity, without one single harbor subject to the control of their owners, is actually employing our whole Navy, so far as employed at all. The great difficulty, sir, is, not that the Government has not been sufficiently lavish in expenditure or our Navy officers and sailors skillful and brave, but that the administration of the Navy Department has not been in proper hands. It has indeed, sir, been a failure. Such is the judgment of the country. If the President of the United States had listened to the voice of the country, the condition of the affairs of our Navy might have been greatly improved; certainly they could not have been worsened. To the want of ability, or at least of ability of the proper kind, in the head of the Navy, are to be attributed the misfortunes to our commerce, and the want of life and vigor and activity to that branch of the public service. The American Navy with a proper head, with an able chief, could not fail to be effective. Everything that is done in that Department seems to be a mistake. Up to this time, and with this extraordinary expenditure of public treasure, we have been scarcely able to blockade the ports on our coast against a people who have not a single port under their control, and who had not a vessel-of-war when the war began.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am very much surprised that the gentleman from Indiana should make the alleged insufficiency of the Navy a reason for withholding the appropriations necessary to keep it in an efficient condition. If he will turn to the communication from the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks he will find that the item of $50,000 asked for the Pensacola navy-yard is simply to keep in repair and efficiency the existing means at that yard. The necessity of doing this will become very apparent to the mind of any gentleman who will for a moment reflect that this is one of the points to which the vessels of the Gulf resort when they need repairs and supplies. I entirely sympathize with the remarks of the gentleman in regard to the necessity of protecting American commerce. It is as much a source of disappointment and mortification to me as it can be to him or any other American, that our commerce should be to so great an extent driven from the seas, and that the carrying trade of the world should be transferred from under the American flag.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announcing that the Senate had passed an act relating to acting assistant paymasters in the Navy; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. But, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Indiana is entirely mistaken in attributing that result to any inefficiency upon the part of the Navy Department. If he will recall the increase of facilities which have been made by that Department since the rebellion commenced he will find that there is no parallel in the history of the world in the amount of labor which has been performed by that Department. There is no record in any time where the navy of any country has been increased within a space of three years from seventy-six vessels to nearly six hundred. But that, sir, is the case with the American Navy.

It seems to be a very small matter for one vessel at sea to discover another vessel at sea and capture her; but it will be apparent to any one, I presume, that it is impossible for any vessel, however swift, to capture any of these roving pirates, unless she can first come in sight of them. As far as my recollection serves me no one of our American naval vessels has yet come in sight of one of these roving cruisers, these pirates, at any point on the ocean and given battle to her.

In conversing upon this subject with an old shipmaster a few days ago, he told me he had sailed from a port in company with three or four hundred sail of vessels, and in less than five hours had been in a position where not a single sail could be seen.

Now, how perfectly absurd it is to say that it is owing to a lack of efficiency upon the part of our naval vessels that they do not catch these roving pirates, when not one of the vessels of the American Navy has come in sight of a pirate.

Of what use is the speed of a vessel flitting from one corner of the ocean to the other in pursuit of vessels that cannot be seen and the locality of which is unknown? There has been no opportunity for any one of the vessels of our Navy to engage on the high seas with one of these pirates. And one of the best arguments that can be submitted in favor of the speed and efficiency of the American Navy is the fact that these roving pirates are very careful to keep out of the way of our naval vessels. If they could compete with our Navy in speed, in power, or in general efficiency, they would be likely to seek to be brought in contact with them. But instead of that they run away from our shores. We next hear of them among the West Indies, then across the Atlantic, then, doubling the Cape of Good Hope, they fly to the East Indies and to the uttermost parts of the earth—anywhere, to escape the American Navy.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I merely want to say one or two words in reply to the general remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in furtherance, as they seem to have been, of the attacks which are now so common upon the head of the Navy Department. I am no special partisan, perhaps no admirer, of the head of that Department; but still, when an attack is made in an unusual way upon the head of a Department upon the occasion of an appropriation for the ordinary expenses of carrying on the war, it does seem to me to require some reply, some attention, especially coming from the source it does.

What the gentleman would have the head of the Navy Department do that he has not already done he does not inform this committee. But he would have the President act in the matter and provide us with another Secretary of the Navy. Well, suppose he had done so, what could a new man have done? What could anybody have done that the present Secretary of the Navy has not done? He has called in aid of the Navy the best mechanical and professional talent of the country. At an early day in the war he sent out invitations to the inventors of the country to furnish plans for naval vessels, and in pursuance of that invitation plans were furnished and accepted, and vessels have been constructed, of the achievements of which the whole country is proud to-day, and those achievements have called the attention of the world to a new mode of constructing naval vessels.

The fact the gentleman from Indiana alludes to, that these vessels have not, at the same time that they were superior for defense, been able to pursue a flying enemy and overtake him in unknown seas does not militate against the skill of their construction or their efficiency and superiority, but simply illustrates the fact that the Lord, when he created the earth, made the oceans very large. [Laughter.]

I did not rise for the purpose of pursuing the general subject, but merely to ask the gentleman from Indiana what he would have had done that has not already been done? He has some idea of the subject; will he tell us what it is? In my judgment the verdict of the historian will be that the Navy Department has been well and efficiently managed, and has accomplished its full share in the work of suppressing the rebellion. If compared with the Army it certainly will suffer no discredit, for the Army will find no difficulty in finding an enemy in full force within three days' march of the capital, while the Navy has been pursuing the skulking foes in all parts of the world; and if the leading pirate has finally been cornered it is in an obscure harbor on the other side of the globe. The great job the Navy has had to do has been to find the enemy; when found they were easily disposed of. When we see what the Army has done, I think that we must give credit to the Secretary of the Navy for what he has accomplished.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is an old maxim, that holds good in all the relations of life, that the tree is known by its fruits. At this time rebel vessels are now leaving Nassau and entering the blockaded ports upon our sea-coast almost without interruption.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in arguing another question informed us not an hour since that there are more vessels lying at hired wharves in the city of New York alone than the whole naval force of the Government at the time the war began. I do not know whether that can be explained. What are those vessels doing there? It seems strange that we should have so many vessels lying at a single port, when blockade-runners loaded with supplies and munitions of war are daily entering the principal seaport of North Carolina, and furnishing the enemy with supplies. I presume that the head of the Department is in the proper sense responsible for the efficiency of that Department. If not, who is responsible? I mention the fact that our commerce has been driven from the high seas. I mention the fact that, with a few exceptions, gallant achievements that made the American heart thrill with pride, the Navy has accomplished nothing during the war corresponding with its magnitude. I regret the fact, but it is unfortunately true. You propose to keep up that old system adopted between the North and South. You have eight navy-yards, at which we have large numbers of officers at unnecessary expense; and where they have been abandoned or destroyed, as at Norfolk and Pensacola, you propose to reestablish them.

I read with some degree of interest and care a speech delivered in the other branch of Congress comparing our Navy and our system of scattering our navy-yards along the sea-coast with those of other nations, showing the extravagance of our system. At the Norfolk navy-yard, destroyed by the rebels, and for which no recent appropriations have been made, you are proposing by this bill to appropriate for the salaries of that navy-yard alone $22,500, and a corresponding appropriation at Pensacola of $27,500. These expenses are multiplied in every one of our navy-yards from the Pacific coast to Maine. In this way our finances are exhausted, and the public energy is frittered away under an inefficient Department; and instead of a powerful Navy, corresponding with the expenditure, conducted with economy, we have a Navy, manned, it is true, by gallant seamen, and yet without an efficient chief, so far as results are concerned, one that adds, at the best, nothing to our ancient fame on the high seas. In the war of 1812 the genius of the citizen who presided over the Navy Department enabled our Navy to drive English ships and English commerce from the ocean. Inspired by his spirit and energy, the gallant Perry, in a few months, organized a Navy, heaved the trees of the northern forests into ships, and swept from the great lakes of the North the gallant navy of Great Britain. Has the present head of the Navy Department, with the tremendous resources at his command, seamen as gallant as their fathers, accomplished anything in comparison with his predecessor? And yet opportunity has not been wanting. And now, with an expense running from $12,000,000 up to $142,000,000 in four years, with the public enemy without a navy or dock-yard or navy-yards, with a few pirate ships our commerce is destroyed upon the high seas; and, with the exception of a few remarkable and honorable instances, the achievements of the Navy have accomplished nothing. It has done nothing but blockade ports which the rebels had no power or ships to open.

It seems to me, therefore, to be proper to inquire whether these large sums of money could not be applied by competent officers so as to secure better results, that the Navy may rival your gallant Army in its achievements. But to do this, sir, the chief who presides over the Navy must be equal to the task of organizing with judgment and ability great achievements.

Mr. PIKE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, he who reads American history a few years hence will, if he be an American, be justly proud of the achievements of our Navy Department and Navy. They have performed, sir, what the world at large pronounced an impossibility when it was undertaken—established and maintained such a blockade as never before was attempted in history, and maintained it with a power that challenges comparison with the most effective blockade that history records. Look at the long line of coast under blockade. Look at the host of prizes taken by our Navy, and at their commercial value. Look at the number of the finest steamers in the world now in our Navy that are prizes taken by the Navy. Sir, there is nothing like it in history. In 1812 we were at war with a great maritime Power, and our vessels met the enemy's upon the sea and vanquished them wherever they met them. But how different has been the great duty of our Navy in this war! It has been chiefly to maintain the blockade. Small chance for honor has been afforded our gallant seamen and officers, because our enemy is not a maritime power, and has no naval force with which to meet them. But, circumscribed as its field is, the Navy has in this way achieved no small share of honor. The gentleman hails from the Northwest, and I ask him what the Navy has done near the mouth of the Mississippi, and up its waters—what part the Navy has taken in opening that great artery of western commerce, the Mississippi—what part the Navy took in restoring New Orleans to the flag of our country?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman asks a question.

Mr. KELLEY. And the gentleman can answer it in the next five minutes, but not now.

Sir, read British history, read the journals of the day published during the late war and the revolutionary war, and you will find that England mourned over a list of merchantmen captured by American privateers that shamed their navy and brought it into temporary disfavor. Does not the gentleman know that Paul Jones and others commanding privateers ran into the very ports and harbors of Great Britain? There never was, I repeat, so extended a blockade as our Navy has maintained. There never was such alacrity, skill, and success exhibited by a navy in the capture of prizes as has been manifested by our Navy during this war. And what was its extent and condition when the war began? Why, it numbered but seventy-six vessels, and of those twenty-nine of the largest had been ordered by the preceding Secretary of the Navy, Isaac Toucey, to the yards and the possession of the conspiring traitors. There were but four vessels, and those the four smallest in the Navy, at the immediate command of the Department when Sumter was fired on. Our largest and best vessels were dismantled or laid up in ordinary in southern yards. The balance of our Navy was scattered upon the most remote stations in the world, upon the African coast, upon the Pacific coast, and other distant stations. There were at the disposal of the Government at that time but four small vessels, manned by two hundred and fifty men, exclusive of officers and marines, and carrying but twenty-five of the thirteen hundred and seventy-six guns then afloat, and they were the nucleus around which the Department has created a Navy of over six hundred vessels, while establishing and maintaining a blockade such as was never before even contemplated, and changing the whole system of naval warfare. We are ready now to put afloat a gun whose projectiles will pierce the iron sides of the most powerful vessels of the navies of either Great Britain or France. They can build nothing that will withstand our 20-inch gun. By the action of our Monitor near Fortress Monroe we revolutionized the naval system of the world, and yet we are to be told here upon the floor of the American Congress that we should blush for the doings of our Navy.

Why is it, it is asked, that so many vessels are laid up at rented wharves? It is because our Navy was utterly incompatible with our national character and the vast extent of our commerce. It was that we had made no provision for maintaining a Navy adequate to the maintenance of the honor of the nation or the protection of its commerce in case of war. Now is the time that we should do it. Why are vessels laid up? Why did not gentlemen on the other side give us an early passage of the bill by which soldiers could be transferred to the Navy? You were told that there were vessels lying waiting for service because the men could not be got to man them, and yet you would not pass the bill by which men could have been transferred from the Army to the Navy.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. ODELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ODELL. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the bill to which he refers met with any opposition on this side? On the contrary, it was passed as soon as it was returned from the Military Committee.

Mr. KELLEY. I think that the filibustering which delayed general legislation came all from that side.

Mr. HOLMAN. I oppose the amendment. I simply wish to say to the gentleman that the achievements of our arms even on the great river of the Northwest are attributable more to the Army than to the Navy. Even so far as the gunboats are concerned, he must remember that the enterprise of a gunboat fleet on the Mississippi was inaugurated by the Army, and not by the Navy; and it is not so very long since those gunboats were transferred from the Army to the Navy. Their achievements were performed in a great measure by men who left the ranks of the Army and manned the gunboats, transports, and steamers intended to run the rebel batteries on the Mississippi. Of the gallantry of these men, whether in the Navy or from the Army, of the cool and resolute courage of the citizen pilots, too much cannot be said in commendation. Their courage and constancy is the redeeming feature, however inefficient the management of the Department. Of the skill and energy of officers in active service, of the courage of their men, in the Navy as well as the Army, the whole country is justly proud. It is not this of which I complain, but of the general conduct of the Navy Department.

When the gentleman speaks of the large number of blockade runners that have been captured, he must recollect that the argument cuts both ways. It shows the little apprehension that was felt by blockade runners of being captured, and of the number that flocked upon the coast to try the venture. But when the gentleman refers to the uninterrupted achievements of our Navy, why does he not say something of that unfortunate expedition set on foot with such lavish and extraordinary expenditure to capture the hotbed and cradle of southern treason, Charleston, in the destruction of which every loyal citizen feels so intense an interest? What did your great fleet of iron-clads do there in presence of the rebel fortifications and batteries established in front of Charleston? What was accomplished there was accomplished by your gallant Army, pressing forward under obstacles insurmountable. While the nation was led to believe from the boastful manifestoes of the Navy Department that in the course of a few days the invincible iron Navy was to batter down that stronghold of treason, watching for it day after day, week after week, month after month, the unwelcome fact came before the country that so far as the naval expedition was concerned it was a miserable failure, a tremendous error of judgment on the part of Secretary Welles, a wild and totally impracticable scheme. If there is any blushing to be done it ought to mantle the cheek of any one who defends a Department which has shown itself so unworthy the prowess, skill, courage, genius, and lavish expenditures of the American people, or defends the President of the United States for having, in defiance of the public judgment, kept that high official in a position so beyond the scope of his ability. That is the cause for blushing on the part of the Representatives of a free people, in a Congress emanating from the people, in a Government where the public voice ought to be heard and the public judgment respected.

Mr. KELLEY withdrew his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I renew it. I did not design, Mr. Chairman, to participate in this debate. I do it now with great reluctance, for I cannot say anything without hurting somebody. And yet the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. HOLMAN] do not permit me to remain silent. He says that the blush should mantle on the cheek of everybody in connection with the attack of the Navy on Charleston.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will not misapprehend me. I said that the blush should kindle on the cheek of an American citizen in seeing still maintained in his position a person at the head of the Navy Department against the common judgment of the entire country.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I shall not differ with the gentleman in that judgment. It was because I knew I should have to say something that I had rather not say that I did not wish to speak upon this bill. But when the gentleman spoke of the attack upon Charleston as a miserable failure, I have to say that the charge of Balaklava was not more brilliant nor more insane. It was not a naval expedition undertaken on the judgment of naval officers, or advised by the officer in command charged with its execution. It was devised in the Department without consulting the officer who was charged with its execution, who was always ready to obey every order, however in conflict with his experienced judgment. No, sir, if there be shame and humiliation in connection with the attack upon Charleston, it is because the Department thought a cotton-spinner was better than an admiral to plan the execution, and weigh and adjust the relative powers of attack and defense. They ought to have remembered that the ablest officer of the Navy thought that no amount of heroism, no amount of impenetrability of iron-clads, no amount of daring on the part of our fleet off Charleston would enable thirty guns on iron-clads on one side to silence three hundred guns in fortifications upon the other, but that in order to make a successful attack upon Charleston it must be a combined attack by a land and naval force.

But the admiral in command of the fleet, though he was not consulted as to the plan of attack, and although the result accorded with his experience and judgment, when the order came, made the attack; and in forty minutes one half his force was disabled. He withdrew, meaning to renew the attack the next morning; but upon the reports of his captains unanimously concurring that a resumption of it must end in disaster, the attack was not renewed. The Navy Department was informed of that fact, but he was met with slurs and insults, to which the published correspondence and the Secretary's report bear testimony; and at last he was relieved under false pretenses: a better man might take his place and execute the plan in which he had failed.

Months have passed of enormous waste of gunpowder, and Charleston remains in the hands of the enemy still. Sumter, whose battery at the time of Admiral DuPont's attack was unbroken, is now a heap of ruins, and yet the Navy is no nearer Charleston. The result would have been different if the Department had taken the advice of Admiral Du Pont and sent twenty-five thousand men to attack by way of Stono and James islands, while the fleet attacked the batteries in front.

But the men who are now in control of the Navy Department keep in retirement the most brilliant officer of the Navy since the days of Decatur, because the Department's crude experiment failed and it was advisable that the Department should not appear in fault, because it might be awkward to confess that it did not ask Du Pont's advice on the plan of the attack nor take it when it was volunteered; and when the attack which the Department devised failed, through the inherent inadequacy of the force provided, in kind and quantity, they thought the iron-clad reputation might suffer by an exposure of the real facts.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe I must oppose this amendment; but I rise more for the purpose of asking this House whether they will not go on and pass some of the appropriation bills, instead of squandering the time of the nation by irrelevant and insane speeches? We have got now five or six large appropriation bills untouched, and at the rate at which we are going on, midsummer will reach us before we shall pass them.

If gentlemen after the debate is closed will confine themselves to motions which they make, to the strict merits of their amendments, we shall be able to get through; but if they go on constantly making political harangues, which of course must be answered, we shall never be done.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I have no doubt remembers that "there is a time for all things," but evidently believes that all time is for his things, [great laughter,] and that is finding fault and maligning the Administration. I do implore the House to give no countenance to such a course until we have done with the appropriation bills, and then they may talk nonsense until doomsday if they wish.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as I have stated my reasons for making this amendment, and I presume the committee desires to proceed with the bill, I am now willing to withdraw it.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I oppose the amendment. I do not feel called upon, Mr. Chairman, to stand up in vindication of the Navy. It is well known that I am no political sympathizer with that Department, nor do I desire to occupy the time of the House in making insane speeches which are so much discouraged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

I do not propose to enter into the controversy which may have sprung up between the Army and the Navy. I do not propose to say anything in regard to the contest which may have sprung up in the Department alluded to by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] relative to the jealousy or rival claims of commanders in the Navy; but I do feel called upon, as one familiar with the subject, when I am told that the attack on Charleston was one of the events that should shroud the country with mortification—an assertion against the entire policy and ability of that peculiar class of vessels in that contest—I say that I feel called upon as one familiar with the subject to stand up and vindicate them.

Mr. Chairman, are gentlemen aware of the fact that that little fleet of iron-clads which made the attack upon Charleston cost not more than one of the ordinary men-of-war? Are they aware of the fact that the whole manning of that little fleet was less than is necessary for an ordinary man-of-war? Are they aware of the fact that that fleet received two thousand shots, and not one penetrated; and that not a solitary life was lost except that of the gallant Rodgers, and that was from no defect not easily remedied? Are they aware of these facts, and of the fact that this country alone has presented to the world a naval vessel that is impregnable to any projectile yet invented?

We are told, sir, of the great success of the English and French naval iron-clads, relying on four and a half inches of plate. What did we see at the navy-yard at Washington? A French plate manufactured in one of the most celebrated manufacturing in France was brought out here. It was six inches thick, and in one single shot it was shattered to atoms by one of our 15-inch guns. Why, sir, the American Navy to-day stands far in advance of any navy in the world; and that result is owing to the iron-clads.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I do not propose to prolong this discussion, but I desire to call attention to the following memoranda prepared by the Bureau of Statistics of the Navy Department:

"The vessels which in the report of the Secretary of the Navy are called 'fast or rapid vessels,' are altogether of timber, and are particularly applicable to the present war. They vary in dimensions from two hundred and ninety to three hundred and thirty feet in length, and in beam from forty-one to forty-seven feet. Their draught of water will be from fifteen and a half to seventeen and a half feet. These vessels are intended for great speed, and have very powerful machinery; the vessels being sharp are expected to maintain a continuous speed of from fourteen to fifteen knots, and for a short run may even exceed this. The difference in the size of the vessels is mainly due to the armament, which for the smaller vessels will be six 9-inch guns and one 50-pound rifle gun. The larger vessels will have covered decks, in order to accommodate more men, who will be required for the heavier armament of eighteen 9-inch guns and two rifled guns. Particular service may occasionally require a variation in the armament.

"The steam machinery has been contracted for for all these vessels, and the Government is under obligation to furnish the vessels to those contractors that they may put up their machinery.

"Six of these vessels are building in the navy-yards, and are being hastened forward, when others of them will be immediately commenced, and the remaining vessels will be built by private parties under a public advertisement. This would have been done earlier but for the strikes of the workmen, which have scarcely yet calmed down, and the holding back of these vessels added very much in bringing the machinists' strike to a conclusion.

"The Department found its first duty in the commencement of the war to be to purchase a great number of vessels for the blockade, for the regular naval vessels then in service were more of a character to meet foreign ships-of-war in battle than to catch blockade runners; and these purchased vessels, though good for merchant work, were not so suitable for the hard usage of continual service, and they are thus depreciating rapidly every year. The number must, however, be kept up, and this is one of the reasons of the large amount of money needed to repair them; next year it will be greater still, unless their places can be supplied by new vessels.

"The next care of the Department was to build some substantial vessels of light draught of water that could run up all the rivers and bays. The small gunboats did this; and still later it has provided 'double-end side-wheel steamers,' which will no doubt answer a good purpose. They are strong and fast vessels.

"There was still wanted a fast class of vessels for offshore work, that could overhaul vessels at sea and before they came within the range of the light-draught vessels, as the blockade runners have come to using faster vessels than those with which they commenced. These are the vessels on which the Department is now engaged. They could not well have been made before, for all the machine shops have been engaged on the light-draught vessels, and on the repairs of the purchased vessels, and on the monitor vessels.

"That press is now passing by, and all these shops have the contracts for the machinery of these large, rapid vessels which taxes their ability to its full extent.

"Besides the vessels above named, which are wholly of wood, and without armor of any kind, (for they cannot carry it,) there are eight wooden vessels of monitor class building in the navy-yards, for which contracts have been made for the machinery, the armor plating, and the turrets. Four of these vessels are in length three hundred and twenty feet, and will draw twelve and a half feet water. On the outside of the hull there is a wood backing of eighteen inches thick, in which are laid bars of iron four by six inches; on the outside of these there is then placed an iron armor of four and a half inches in thickness; the deck armor is in thickness two inches.

"Each of these four vessels has two turrets, of which the thickness is twelve inches, and each revolving turret will have in it two 15-inch guns, and each vessel will thus have four guns.

"These vessels are afloat, a large portion of the armor on, and the machinery and turrets well advanced to completion. They will be able to go along the coast and will fully protect any harbor.

"The remaining four are similar, but larger vessels building in the navy-yards; they are three hundred and fifty feet long, and will draw about fourteen feet water. The turrets for these four vessels are to be fifteen inches in thickness, the deck three inches in thickness, the side armor six inches in thickness, laid on bars of iron eight inches square and four inches asunder, and these bars on a wood backing of fifteen inches thick, in addition to the thickness of the hull of the vessel; all this necessarily requiring larger vessels than those first named, and they will not cost less than $1,250,000 each. But when made, an enemy must get out of sight to feel safe. These vessels will each have four guns of fifteen inches, or of twenty inches, as may be found best.

"The Dunderberg is building in New York under contract with Mr. W. H. Webb, and is intended by him for a sea-going steamer, to make fourteen knots at sea. This vessel is in every respect planned and arranged by Mr. Webb, the contractor, without the interference of any one else. She is built of wood, of angular sides, having an armor of three and a half inches on the hull, laid on a thickness of several feet of timber. She carries eight 11 inch guns in a house or casemate on the deck, the iron plating on the casemate being four and a half inches. On the top of this casemate or house there are to be two revolving turrets, in thickness eleven inches of iron, in each of which will be two guns of fifteen inches. This vessel is to have masts and sails for cruising. Besides this she is to have a ram or cutter of iron and wood, with which at a speed of fourteen knots she would be dangerous to any vessel whether of iron or wood. This vessel is to draw twenty and a half feet water, and will mount twelve guns. The cost by contract will be $1,250,000.

"The Dictator and Puritan are iron vessels building by Mr. Ericsson, having all the peculiarities of his monitor vessels, with some modifications which experience with the other vessels of this class has pointed out to him as necessary and advantageous. The monitor vessels draw about eleven feet water; these vessels will draw twenty feet. The Dictator is to have one turret and the Puritan two turrets, and in each turret there will be two guns of fifteen or of twenty inches. The thickness of the turrets was to have been twenty-four inches of iron, but the projector finds that by a different mode of construction fifteen inches will be sufficient. These vessels are intended by Mr. Ericsson as sea-going steamers, and they will be formidable vessels. Their efficiency for harbor and coast service is conceded by all, and these two large ships will test the practicability of the system of turrets for sea service, and it is by a trial of this kind only that such a question can be settled. The armor on the hull is six inches in thickness, laid on bars six inches square, and these bars rest on a wood backing of three feet in thickness.

"For such large vessels of war with armor-plating, there can be no question but that the proper material of which to build them should be iron. Iron shipbuilding is comparatively new, and it will require a little time for the Government to get into it. The British iron steam frigate Achilles, of the same size as the Warrior, has been built in Chatham dock-yard altogether by the shipwrights who built the wood vessels. The greater portion of the work is done by machinery, and a good mechanic in wood will answer just as well as an iron-worker, and all the riveting can be equally well done by them. Such, however, is represented to be the fact in the case of the Achilles.

"The smaller classes of vessels will for many reasons for a long time yet be of timber. All the stock of seasoned timber, and indeed the timber of every kind in the navy-yards, has been used, and the Government, like the merchant builders, is glad to get any kind that is to be had, and it is all green. The pressing need of the country has not justified the asking of sums of money to lay in a stock of timber to season, all the funds having been wanted to build the vessels and get them off as quickly as possible. The Department has not asked for money for this purpose, but there cannot be a more judicious and economical expenditure than in laying up a supply of seasoned timber. A neglect of this will occasion enormous sums to be expended in repairing; and this is one reason, added to that of the hard work the vessels have to undergo, of the great amount required for repairing, rapidly increasing as the vessels become older.

"The purchased vessels, of which so large a part of our blockading force is composed, were all built of unseasoned timber, for private builders cannot afford to keep it on hand, and the Navy-built vessels are in almost the same condition.

"The expense of the Navy is large, if comparison is made with former years, but in fact the Government has had to create a Navy, and, at all sacrifices, to meet the necessities of the case. This had to be done under rising prices, and they have not yet reached the maximum. Materials and labor are still steadily advancing. We have been compelled to meet a state of things wholly unlooked for. Foreign nations have been gradually building up their navies, while we into two years have had to compress what otherwise would have been the work of twenty years. A comparison with foreign navies is not quite fair to the Navy Department. In the Russian navy every available vessel was put forth by Great Britain, of which she had some four or five hundred, and with all her vast preparations in her dock-yards she had to build a great many by contract, and we all know how many American vessels were chartered as transports. She did not have to make a new navy, as we have had to do.

"It would be folly for any man to pretend to extraordinary accuracy in a naval estimate in time of war. In times of peace with comparatively few vessels it is only a nearer approximation, for in so perishable a fabric as a ship it is impossible to tell in what condition she will return to port, or how much money is to be expended on her. Experience only shows a more rapid depreciation for each year of a ship's life, that the life of a steam vessel is shorter than that of a sailing vessel; and it will doubtless be found that a steamer of wood covered with iron will be the shortest-lived of all. But now in time of war all these incidentals are vastly increased.

"For the last fourteen or fifteen years the estimates for the ship-building portion of the Navy Department have been made on the same general principles, and the introduction of a deficiency bill for this object has been rare. When the appropriation asked for has been reduced from some necessity or reason, it is believed the Department has tried to meet the case by economizing in parts that would least prejudice the interests of the Navy.

"The Department now desires nothing more than will enable it to meet and fulfill the great duty it has before it, which if curtailed too much it cannot do. It is thought that the sum of $22,800,000 reported will not be sufficient to meet the wants of the Navy embraced in it for the coming year of the war. The wear and tear ought not to be less than $11,500,000; the sixteen steam sloops, $7,200,000; the western waters' navy at the minimum, $4,000,000; the purchase and charter of vessels at $3,000,000; and the extra labors $600,000—making in all $26,300,000, in place of the $22,800,000 as reported. The sum of $3,600,000 will also be needed for the armored vessels in construction. With this reduction to $25,200,000 the Department may be able to meet the demands that will probably be made on it; and it is not beyond a reasonable probability that there may be even a larger sum needed than that asked for."

Mr. BROOKS. I avail myself of this opportunity to present some statistics. I may not have another opportunity. I refer to them as unanswered as against the present administration of the Navy Department.

Alphabetical list of vessels captured by rebel privateers. Reported up to January 30, 1864, with port of clearance, destination, date, place of capture, and tonnage. Prepared by Captain I. H. Upton, Secretary American Shipmasters' Association.

Recapitulation.

Total number of vessels, 193. Total tonnage, 69,704.

Value of vessels, at $50 per ton, $4,485,200. Value of cargo, at $100 per ton, $8,970,400. Total value, $13,455,600.

The amendment, by unanimous consent, was withdrawn.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to criticise the figures produced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] Unfortunately, the condition of things complained of could not at once be changed. It is impossible to prevent nations professing to be neutral from sending vessels to depredate upon our commerce. It was impossible, at the commencement of the war, when the Buchanan Administration had scattered the naval vessels in all parts of the earth, to have as efficient a Navy as the exigency demanded.

But, sir, I have myself witnessed the efficiency of the Navy Department upon the western waters. We have seen its efficiency in preventing the iron-clads built by the confederates from coming out to sea from the Atlantic ports. I believe the nation has cause to be proud of the administration of the Navy Department.

I do not intend to reflect upon any gentleman, much less upon any of our gallant officers. I do not intend to cast any reflection upon the officer alluded to by the gentleman from Maryland, but at the same time I think the remarks of the gentleman in regard to the management of the Navy Department were totally unwarranted. Sir, the "cotton-spinner," to whom the gentleman alludes, is well known in his profession as eminent as is the officer to whom he alludes and to whom he gives such lofty praise. He is as gallant in his bearing, has risked as much during this rebellion, has been as prompt in the discharge of his duties as a functionary as any officer in the Navy, not excepting the distinguished officer alluded to by the gentleman from Maryland.

I wish, sir, to allude to another fact: the Navy Department has shrunk from no investigation. The Navy Department has not called upon its friends in this House to shield them from inquiry and investigation when it has been asked by a member of this House. When have they hesitated to put at the head of an investigation the man who demanded an investigation? Can the gentleman and his friends say as much for their favorite in the Cabinet? Did they not, in solid phalanx, vote against an investigation leveled at one officer in the Cabinet and asked for by a gentleman belonging to the Republican side of the House? And was it not intimated that the investigation was denied simply because the gentleman who moved it might, by courtesy or in some other way, be placed upon that committee?

Sir, the administration of the Navy Department shrinks from no investigation. The gentleman himself, or any other gentlemen in this House who make these railing accusations, who get up on appropriation bills and in five-minute speeches let out their gall and bitterness upon the administration of the Navy Department, are invited to investigate its affairs. The friends of the Navy will not give a single vote to shield that Department from an investigation; whereas the gentleman from Maryland and his friends stand in solid phalanx to prevent an investigation of the doings of another Cabinet officer when asked for by a member of the Republican party.

I ask the committee to look upon these facts. I desire the gentleman from Maryland to stop the utterance of his logic and his eloquence, and, if it is possible, to assail the administration of the Navy Department by facts presented through the inquiry which is now pending in both Houses of Congress. The actions of the Navy have been as heroic and their achievements as great as those of the Army. If you will look at the reports of General Grant, or General Sherman, or of any other officer acting in the West, you will find that they give the highest praise to the efficiency of the naval squadrons on the western waters.

The same is true in reference to every officer of the Army who has commanded in conjunction with the Navy upon the Atlantic sea-coast; and I defy the gentleman to search the official records of the reports of the Army officers acting in conjunction with the Navy, and lay his hand on one instance of inefficiency in the conduct of the Navy in this war.

So far as I am concerned, I have myself witnessed their action upon the Mississippi river; and although my testimony is of little value, and of no value at all in comparison with that given by the particular officers who commanded in those great expeditions, yet I am here to say that they did all that men could do under the circumstances, and that they contributed as much as the Army itself to open the Mississippi river and to achieve those great conquests which have given us the mastery of the entire West.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have merely a word to say in reply. I am very unwilling to do injustice to any one. I moved myself one investigation of matters connected with the Navy Department, and I referred it to the regular Naval Committee. I do not suppose the gentleman referred to that investigation in the remarks he made about objections to other investigations. I was careful so to refer it because I did not wish it to appear, or to give an opportunity to say, that the investigation would be under my control or under the control of persons sympathizing with me in that particular.

With reference to the conduct of the Navy I think it deserves all the gentleman has said of it, and I believe there is no one in this House who has had a better opportunity to see its inner workings than the gentleman who alluded to it. In reference to its conduct toward the gentleman to whom I referred, I think the words I used are within what will appear to be just, if the Department will open its records and publish its own correspondence, word for word and letter for letter, with Admiral Du Pont; and if the Department will publish that correspondence, be it good or bad, be it in their favor or in his favor, I shall have no word to say.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. The gentleman has a way of getting it; he can call for it by a resolution. I wish I could say the workings of the Treasury Department could be got at by that means.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman will not understand me as the defender of the Treasury Department.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. The gentleman voted to shield it from inquiry.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I did not see fit to vote for the resolution.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I wish the gentleman had seen fit to behave toward the Navy Department as he did toward that. He is here to move an investigation against the Navy Department, while he shielded the Treasury Department from an investigation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. There was a marked difference in the two cases. In reference to the Navy Department the facts came immediately within my own knowledge, or from a source in which I had sufficient confidence to justify the motion. I do not know of any facts in reference to the Treasury Department, or I would move an investigation myself.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a point of order. This whole debate is foreign to the amendment, and I call the gentleman to order.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill. The following clause being read:

Mare island:

For continuation of grading and paving, $10,000; scows, lighter, and stages; foundry and machinery for same; machinery for saw-mill; continuing coal-shed and wharf; steam-hammer and tools for smithery; rigging and sail-loft; repairs of all kinds; excess of expenditure on wharf; guard-house; machinery for machine shop, and gas works, $224,595.

Mr. HIGBY said: I move to amend that clause by inserting after the word "wharf" the words "continuing sea wall." I find upon investigation, and by adding up the several items of estimates submitted to the House by the Department for the several works contained in this clause, that there is an excess of $10,000 in the appropriation of $224,595 which is found at the end of the clause. By looking at the estimates you will see that after striking out the three items which have been struck out by the Committee of Ways and Means, and $10,000 out of the estimate for continuing the grading and paving, $224,595 is appropriated for the remainder. That, according to the estimates which were made at the Department, and which I have in manuscript, gives an excess of $10,000 for the several items therein embraced. I have moved this amendment so that while it will not increase the appropriation it will direct the way in which this $10,000 shall be appropriated. Although the amendment does not appear in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and although it has not been acted on by the Committee of Ways and Means, there is no appropriation for that Department more necessary than this $10,000 which is to be found in the manuscript estimates which were sent to the Department.

The island upon which this navy-yard is situated is one of those shoals which stretch along within half a mile of the mainland. It is very long and narrow, and contains several hundred acres. The sea-side, very much exposed to the action of the water, is wearing away by the surging of the sea, which has already broken in quite a distance and floated away several acres of land. It is making its way across the island to a point where the greatest expenditures have been made in erecting the most costly buildings. There is no land to spare. The object of this appropriation of $10,000 is to build a wall to protect the sea-side from the ocean. It is for that reason that I propose to insert these words. I understand that this provision was stricken out last year by the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not know whether it has been this year, but I do not find it in the report of the Secretary of the Navy. I have examined this matter for myself by ocular demonstration. I know that the appropriation is needed, and I desire to insert these words here. It will not increase the appropriation, and I hope the amendment will pass.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman from California is wrong in supposing that the gross sum appropriated in this paragraph ought not to be changed if his amendment should be adopted.

The estimates for Mare island, which are to be found on page 208 of the estimates, foot up $374,735. The Committee of Ways and Means, upon examination, concluded to reduce the first item for grading and paving from $20,000 to $10,000; and they rejected three items, for commencing a timber-shed, $44,000, for commencing a store-house, $56,000, and for wharf, &c., $40,000; making altogether, with the $10,000 reduction of which I have just spoken, $150,000 to be deducted from the gross sum estimated for. That leaves $224,000, the sum reported in this bill. This is therefore an addition to the sum which we reported.

The committee were of the opinion that this was no time to commence new works costing such a large amount. For the mere commencement of a timber-shed $44,000 is asked; for the commencement of a store-house $50,000; and for the mere commencement of a sea-wall $40,000. The committee did not feel at liberty, in times like these, to recommend the commencement of new works, however proper they might be at other times, and which we should have to complete at an untold cost. We have therefore made this change, and it is for the House to say whether they will add an appropriation of $10,000, which would be almost useless, which would be buried up in the ocean. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HIGBY. I have mistaken the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy, if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is correct. I make the estimate $224,000 for the purposes provided for in this clause, whereas the Committee of Ways and Means make it $234,000. Add the $10,000 appropriated in the first two lines to the $224,000, and it makes $234,000. I do not see how the $10,000 can be expended unless my amendment be adopted. It does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will take the $374,735, the gross amount of the estimates, and deduct from that the sums I have named which the committee omitted it will leave precisely $224,000. Without that $10,000 it would be only $214,000.

Mr. HIGBY. I have subtracted from the gross amount of the estimates the items stated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I find the balance to be $234,000.

Mr. COLE, of California. My colleague is entirely correct, I think, because I have gone over the figures also, and I find that after striking out the items that the committee did not allow, the balance is $234,000. This amendment does not ask for any additional appropriation. The estimates of the Secretary show that the amounts to be expended on the different objects embraced in this clause will not exhaust the appropriation provided for, but will leave a surplus of $10,000. The clause appropriates $234,000, but the items on which the money is to be expended would only consume $224,000. I have figured it up; but if there is any doubt about it, I hope the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will allow the clause to be passed by for the present.

Mr. HIGBY withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I renew the amendment, and will merely try to explain this matter to the gentleman. The whole amount estimated for was $334,000. The Committee of Ways and Means struck out $44,000, $56,000, and $40,000. Add to this the $10,000 struck off the other item, and it makes $150,000 deducted from the estimate. I cannot figure it up in any other way.

Mr. COLE, of California. The amendment only proposes to add three words "continuing sea wall" to the clause. I can see no harm that that will do if there be no appropriation recommended. It does not involve the expenditure of a dollar.

Mr. STEVENS. It takes from other items of the bill, however. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I am not mistaken in this calculation; but I think that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is mistaken. I hope that he will let this part of the bill be passed over, in order to give an opportunity to members to go to figuring. My colleague [Mr. Cole] and myself have figured it up, and have examined the matter closely. The Committee of Ways and Means is wrong about it. The putting in the amendment proposed will make it fair and square. It will not increase the appropriation one dollar, but will make it square with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy. The Committee of Ways and Means should bear in mind that this $10,000 has been made a separate item. That is where the mistake lies. If I were mistaken I would ask for an increase of $10,000; but I am not mistaken, and I think if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will examine it more closely he will find I am correct. It is better to adopt my original amendment, and have this matter thus corrected, than to find afterwards that there has been a gross blunder committed. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HICKEY's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line two hundred and thirty:

For improvement and repairs of hospital at Memphis, $7,000.

For improvement and repairs of hospital at New Orleans, $3,000.

Mr. Chairman, I find no provision in this bill for the maintenance of the two hospitals to which the amendment that I offer applies. At Memphis the Government took possession in March last of the large building known as the Commercial Hotel, which at the present time contains between two hundred and two hundred and fifty patients. The amount named in this amendment is not for any new work, but simply to keep the building in the necessary repair. The same is also true, so far as the appropriation is concerned, in its application to the hospital in use in the city of New Orleans, for which no provision is elsewhere made. I will say that this appropriation is deemed to be necessary by the chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, whose letter I have, in which he says:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY,
February 17, 1864.

SIR: Referring to our interview of this morning, I beg leave to repeat what I then had the honor to state, that the estimates for naval hospitals at Memphis, Tennessee, ($7,000), and at New Orleans, ($3,000), are designed to keep in repair buildings already occupied by the Navy, and to make such occasional improvements therein as the greater comfort of the sick and wounded may require.

The hospital at Memphis supersedes the one formerly located at Mound City, Illinois, the removal being made necessary by considerations of greater convenience to the Mississippi squadron. On the 15th instant it contained two hundred patients, about the daily average number since the 1st January.

The hospital at New Orleans has also been in operation for several months under the general direction of the fleet surgeon of the Western Gulf blockading squadron, which is largely made up of vessels of such limited dimensions as to afford no sort of accommodation for any one except the hearty and robust. Sick and wounded are necessarily removed from the small vessels to more proper quarters. The hospital building was transferred to us from the Army unfinished and unfurnished, and hence requires many small expenditures to insure comfort.

Very respectfully, &c., W. WHELAN.
Hon. A. H. Rice, Chairman of the Naval Committee, House of Representatives.

The question was taken on Mr. Rice's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means has directed me to offer an amendment to the clause for Mare Island, California, by striking out "piling and preparing foundation of north wing of ordnance building; and for repairs on magazine buildings and pile wharf, $41,363," and inserting in lieu thereof "29,368," so as to make it read:

Mare Island, California:

For two small magazines at north end of the yard; enlargement of shell-house; preparing gun park; building skids, and shot beds; machinery and tools for ordnance shop, $29,368.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out of the clause "for pay of superintendents, naval constructors, and all the civil establishments of the several navy-yards and stations" the words "$125,688." This appropriation is made upon the basis of no increase of salary," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And the pay of commanders and storekeepers' first clerks and the clerks of the navy-yards at Boston, New York, and Washington, namely, that of class second in the Executive Department, namely, $1,400; and at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Philadelphia, Norfolk, and Pensacola, the pay of this class shall be that of first class, namely, $1,200 per annum; and the pay of the civil engineer at the navy-yard, Mare Island, California, shall be $3,200.

Mr. PIKE. I understand this is an amendment to increase salaries.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will state that this amendment comes under the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and that it is recommended to him by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, who has particular charge of the subject. The pay of the clerks and engineers of the Navy is fixed by law, and hence the necessity of stating the amount of the salary in the amendment. It provides only a small increase of pay for these officers at two or three points. It is recommended, as I said, by the proper bureau and by the Secretary of the Navy. It is acceptable, as I understand, to the Committee of Ways and Means, who have considered the subject, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PIKE. This is, as I supposed it was, a proposition for an increase of salary; and it seems to me that this moment, in the present situation of the Government, is a most inopportune time to increase the salary of anybody, at any point. For one, I am entirely opposed to any increase of this character.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. I submit that as the salary of these officers is fixed by law, it cannot be changed in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was trying to get the Chair's attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman could have obtained the floor by rising to a question of order at any time.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend, in line two hundred and eighty-one, by adding:

For salary of one clerk at $1,200, one clerk at $1,000 per annum, at the New York navy-yard, $2,200.

I offer the amendment by direction of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The number of clerks attached to the New York navy-yard, I understand, is now fixed by law, and new clerkships cannot be created in this way in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I will merely say that at present these clerks are paid by the day, and it is a great deal better that they should have a fixed salary as they have at the Boston navy-yard.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I change my point of order, and submit that as the salary of these clerks is now fixed by the day it cannot be changed to a yearly salary in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists on it the Chair will have to sustain the question of order.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, no; I do not insist on it. It is for the benefit of the Government, but if the gentleman from Indiana objects to it, let it go.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend under the head of "Naval Observatory" line two hundred and ninety-three, page 13, by striking out "four" and inserting "three," so as to make the paragraph read: "for salary of assistant astronomer, three aids, and clerk, $8,000," and by adding at the end of the paragraph, "and $4,000 thereof shall be equally divided among the three aids as their salary."

I will state that the amendment does not propose to increase at all the amount to be appropriated; it simply divides the salary heretofore paid to the four aids among three, who are now doing all the work, and who are now very inadequately compensated. These aids to the Observatory are gentlemen of liberal education, who, in addition to the care of the instruments connected with the Observatory, are themselves practical astronomers, who make observations, and who work out the observations made by other persons there. Their salary is $1,000 a year, scarcely the amount which is received by mechanics or clerks who have expended no such sums of money and no such amount of time as is necessary upon the part of these gentlemen to fit them for their scientific labors. The work is now being performed by three aids, and the proposition is to put the whole work of the four upon three, and divide among them the additional salary which would accrue thereby.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend in line three hundred and ten, as follows:

For bounties for the destruction of the enemy's vessels, as per act of July 17, 1862, for the better government of the Navy, $250,000.

I will simply state that this is an appropriation to carry out the provisions of an existing law.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the law?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have cited the law in the amendment. The law of 1862 provides bounties for the destruction of the enemy's vessels, but no appropriation has been made for carrying that law into effect. A number of the enemy's vessels have been destroyed, and parties are entitled to certain bounties, but there is no appropriation for the payment of these bounties. I call the attention of the committee to the thirtieth page of the report of the Secretary of the Navy in which he refers to the subject. He says:

"The fourth section of the 'Act for the better government of the Navy,' approved July 17, 1862, provides 'that a bounty shall be paid by the United States for each person on board any ship or vessel of war belonging to an enemy at the commencement of an engagement, which shall be sunk or otherwise destroyed in such engagement by any ship or vessel belonging to the United States, or which it may be necessary to destroy in consequence of injuries sustained in action, of $100, if the enemy's vessel was of inferior force; and of $200 if of equal or superior force; to be divided among the officers and crew in the same manner as prize money.'"

"Since the enactment of this law there have been repeated cases in which the right to the bounty has accrued to the officers and crews of vessels of the Navy, particularly on the western waters; but there have been no appropriations to which the expenditure could properly be charged, the claims to the bounty have remained unsettled, and the just expectation of those entitled to the reward have been disappointed. The amount necessary to pay the claims which have accrued would probably not exceed $250,000; and it is desirable that an early provision be made for the payment of this just debt. In the event of an appropriation for the purpose, a board will be appointed by the Department for the examination of the claims, or they may be ascertained in any other manner which Congress may be pleased to direct."

The amendment of Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means reported an additional section, which in some way between the Clerk and printer has been lost. It is not in the printed bill, and I now move to add it as a new section.

The Clerk read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of building a floating dry-dock for monitors at the New York navy-yard, and also at the navy-yard at Philadelphia, at a price not exceeding $360,000 each, the sum of $520,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of the appropriation of $750,000 for a floating dry-dock at the navy-yard at New York, provided for by the act making appropriations for the naval service of the United States, approved March 3, 1863; and the balance of said appropriation be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, as I have stated before, that was a part of the bill as it was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, but by some mistake it did not get into the printed bill.

It can be explained in a few words. Last year, when it was supposed that very large iron-clad vessels were to be built, an appropriation was made of $750,000 for the purpose of constructing a floating dry-dock at New York, as none in the country then in existence could take up those vessels. But those vessels were not built, and there is no appropriation reported for them in this bill.

The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks reported to us that there was no place at the New York navy-yard where such a dry-dock could be built, and he recommended two of inferior size to accommodate the iron-clads now building, one in New York and one in Philadelphia, at $260,000 each. He recommended that this appropriation should be transferred for that purpose. That is all there is of the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were severally read and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BONDED GOODS.

Mr. STEVENS. There is a bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from the public stores and bonded warehouses, which I hope the House will now take up and pass. It will not take up fifteen minutes, and will put a great deal of revenue into the Treasury. It has been reported from the Committee of Ways and Means. If there be no objection, I move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be now considered.

Mr. WARD. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take it up.

Mr. WARD. I withdraw my objection to its being considered in the House, if I am allowed to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly. I now move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make a personal explanation.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to cast my vote on the conference report on the enrollment bill. When the vote was taken I was confined to my room by diptheria, and could not be present.

Mr. FINCK. I hope that same privilege will be extended to us on this side who also were absent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky was sick at the time, and I do not object to his recording his vote. But I do object to all others.

Mr. FINCK. Then I object to the gentleman from Kentucky voting.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to know whether this subject is entertained by unanimous consent or not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] is upon the floor and addressing the House by unanimous consent. The Chair asked if there was any objection, and there was none.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio that when I asked to record my vote the other day I expressly said that I was called from the House by sickness, and he again renewed his objection to my recording my vote.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the gentleman will find, by turning to the debate on that day, that he did not express himself so strongly as he now does. He spoke of his being weary and of going away.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman will find that I made that exact statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] recording his vote?

Objection was made.

Mr. SMITH. I voted for that bill in all its stages up to the time I was obliged to leave the Hall. If I had been here at the time the vote was taken on the report of the committee of conference, I would have voted for it.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to state that I voted against the passage of the bill, and had I been here at the time of the vote on the adoption of the report of the conference committee, I should have voted against it.

BONDED GOODS—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call up the bill from which the Committee of the Whole was discharged, before I was interrupted by these applications to record votes.

The bill which was taken up provides that all goods, wares, and merchandise, now in public stores or bonded warehouses, on which duties are unpaid, and which shall have been in bond more than one year, and less than three years, at the time of the passage of this act, may be entered for consumption, and the bonds canceled at any time before the 1st of June next on payment of duties and charges according to law; and repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of the bill. The act to take effect from and after its passage. It also provides that the term "license," in the first proviso to the fifteenth section of the act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes, approved July 14, 1862, shall be held to extend to all vessels authorized by law to engage in the coasting trade, whether sailing under registers or enrollments and licenses.

Mr. WARD. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to amend the bill by striking out "June" and inserting "September."

Mr. STEVENS. I see no objection to that, and I move to amend the bill accordingly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. KALBFLEISCH, (at fifteen minutes past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that it is a matter of any consequence, but I observe from the reading of the Journal that it does not contain any recognition of the fact that the bill (S. No. 76) relating to appointments in the naval service and the disrating of officers by court-martial was amended. The amendment is not embodied in the Journal, although I think it occurred in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will reflect that that was the action of the Committee of the Whole. The Journal of the Senate never shows the action in committee.

Mr. GRIMES. It was not the action of the committee. The amendment was made after the bill had passed out of committee and had actually passed the Senate, because I had it reconsidered in order to get it back into the Senate so that I might amend it. I do not know that it is a matter of any consequence; but I thought perhaps it might be necessary to have some notice of the amendment on the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That being the fact, it being acted on in the Senate, it should be entered on the Journal, and if the Senator desires it the Journal will be corrected.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know what the rule is about the making up of the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is that the Journal shall show the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. If it does not make any difference with the bill—

The VICE PRESIDENT. None at all.

Mr. GRIMES. Then it does not make any difference whether it appears on the Journal or not.

The Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILKINSON. I present the petition of D. M. Barney and others, contractors upon the mail route No. 10773, the route leading to California. They allege that they were engaged in carrying the mail over the southern route so called, until the 1st of July, 1861, when, in consequence of the rebellion, they were directed to carry the mail over the central route; that in consequence of the rebellion and the change of the routes by the Government a large outlay of money has been incurred by them, and they ask that their contract may be extended for five years in consequence of these extraordinary expenditures which they have incurred. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOWARD presented the memorial of James V. Campbell and others, citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying for the formation of a properly organized ambulance and sanitary corps for the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Anoka county, Minnesota, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Anoka, by the way of Cedar Grove, Bethel, and Linwood, to Wyoming, in Chicago county; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of making only such treaties with the Indian tribes within that State as will provide for their removal therefrom, and secure to said State the right to tax such lands as may be acquired of such tribes as soon as sales of the same are made; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of an increase of mail service on the route from Topeka to Council Grove, in that State, to six times a week; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the bill of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, (S. No. 498,) with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations thereon, with accompanying papers on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of A. T. Spencer and G. S. Hubbard, praying for compensation for services performed in carrying the mails on their line of steamers between Chicago and the ports on Lake Superior, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 136) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gordon S. Hubbard. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Gustavus A. Belzur, praying for compensation for losses sustained while in the discharge of his duties as sutler of the seventy-fifth regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, in consequence of the capture of his goods by the rebels between Washington, D. C., and the army of the Potomac, have directed me to report adversely against the prayer of the petition, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it may be acted upon now. I move its indefinite postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on discharging the committee from the further consideration of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of John Colburn, commander in the United States Navy, protesting against the action of the late advisory board in withholding from him a recommendation for promotion to which he considers himself entitled; also the memorial of Henry French, commander United States Navy, praying that he may be restored to his rightful position in the Navy, which he alleges has been wrongfully and unjustly withheld from him by the board of officers to scrutinize the active list of the officers of the Navy; also the petition of George W. Doty, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying that some action may be taken in relation to the omission, by the late advisory board of naval officers, to recommend him for promotion; also the memorial of R. W. Meade, a commander in the United States Navy, praying for the passage of an act for the fair and impartial trial of officers to whom injustice has been done by the board under the act of July 16, 1862, with the accompanying papers; also the memorial of Commander Edmund Lanier, United States Navy, praying for relief from the action of the late advisory board in failing to recommend him for promotion; and also the petition of Lieutenant Egbert Thompson, United States Navy, protesting against the action of the late advisory board in failing to recommend him for promotion, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to ask to be discharged from their further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 17) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Laura M. Newcomb, of Providence, Rhode Island, widow of the late Commander Henry S. Newcomb, United States Navy, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Black Hawk, Iowa, praying that a pension may be granted to the widow of Captain Frederick S. Washburn equal to that of colonel, from the time of his death, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 137) to exclude disloyal persons from the public lands of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 138) to regulate proceedings in cases between landlord and tenant in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

POSTAGE ON LETTERS.

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire whether any legislation is necessary with regard to postage upon letters sent to the President and Vice President of the United States; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the Commissioner of Pensions be referred to the Committee on Pensions; and that they be requested to inquire into and report what additional facilities, if any, are necessary to aid pension agents in order to secure the prompt payment of the claims due to pensioners.

WATERING PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of watering Pennsylvania avenue during the present session of Congress.

REMOVAL OF GENERALS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the Articles of War as to prohibit to all military commanders below the President of the United States the power of relieving from duty any general officer, except when placed in arrest upon charges filed, or when wounded, or on surgeon's certificate of disability, or upon limited leave of absence, or when captured by the enemy, leaving with the General-in-Chief and with department, corps, and division commanders the power to change the commands of their respective general officers; and to report by bill or otherwise.

REMOVAL OF GENERAL SCHOFIELD.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate copies of any protests he may have from Governors of States in the department of Missouri against the removal of Major General Schofield from the command of that department, if, in his opinion, they can be furnished without injury to the public service.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 94) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Paymaster E. C. Doran.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865;

A bill (No. 230) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties;

A joint resolution (No. 42) authorizing payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read; and

A joint resolution (No. 43) authorizing the settlement of the accounts of J. N. Carpenter, a paymaster in the United States Navy.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to give notice of an amendment that I intend to offer to the joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861. I ask leave to submit the proposed amendment now, with a view to have it printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce an amendment to a joint resolution now before the Senate for the purpose of having it printed. The Chair hears no objection, and the order to print will be made.

DISQUALIFICATION OF COLOR.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to call up a short bill, and I move to postpone all prior orders with a view of taking it up. It is a bill proposing to repeal the law which prohibits colored people from being employed as carriers of the mail, which was reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with an amendment. I desire to have that bill taken up and acted upon now.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 62) to remove all disqualification of color in carrying the mails was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that hereafter no person, by reason of color, shall be disqualified from employment in carrying the mails.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. 2. And he it further enacted, That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to say a word in relation to the amendment. In relation to the bill, it is sufficiently explicit in itself; but the committee were of the opinion that if persons of color were to be employed and rendered eligible to be employed as carriers of the mail by those who have contracted to carry the mail and who wish to employ them, it would be unsafe to commit to their hands the mail, when they could not themselves be witnesses against those who should violate that mail, steal it, rob it, commit depredations on it. Inasmuch as in many of the States persons of color cannot be witnesses in the courts, we thought it was necessary to add this section to make them witnesses in the United States courts, in order to render the bill safe to the community.

By our general law, the rules of evidence in the courts of the United States are the same as those existing in the particular State in which our courts sit; and therefore in those States where such a law exists these colored people cannot be witnesses, and hence they cannot be safely intrusted with the carrying of the mails; but it is within the power of Congress to render them competent witnesses in the United States courts, and therefore the committee reported the amendment which is the second section of the bill.

Indeed, I may say, Mr. President, that the general practice and the tendency of opinion now is to take away all disqualification of witnesses upon any ground, and to leave their testimony to go to the jury and the court for them to weigh it and do justice. In many of our States now, even the parties to an action are competent witnesses; and no objection in point of law exists in nearly all the States on account of a man's religious sentiments. All those disqualifications have been swept away, and we think it time to do it here in relation to colored people, and to make them competent witnesses in the United States courts. The courts and the juries of course will judge of their credibility. Especially should that be done if the mail is to be committed to their hands.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. When this proposition was before the Senate at the last session, to authorize colored persons to carry the mail, I voted against it. I shall vote against it now; but if the bill be passed, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by the committee is proper, that they shall be made witnesses in the United States courts. In many of the States colored persons are excluded from giving testimony where white persons or any other than colored persons are parties to the suit. That is the law in my own State. If this bill passes it will authorize these persons to testify in the Federal courts who are not permitted to testify in the State courts, because the Federal courts by our statutes adopt the practice of the State courts as far as practicable.

I am unwilling to pass this bill, believing that there is no necessity for it. There are plenty of white persons in the United States competent and honest and faithful who may discharge all these duties, and I see no necessity for opening the carrying of the mails to colored persons. I do not believe they will, in the ordinary course of events, prove more competent or more faithful than white persons.

It will not be supposed by any one acquainted with my record that I am not fully anti-slavery in my views, but I do believe these radical counsels against the prejudice, it may be, or against the public sentiment of the country, will produce a reaction and do great harm instead of good. Emancipation is going on well enough now, and I am willing to leave it precisely where it is, and I shall give no vote for the mere purpose of agitation, which can by possibility do no good. We have had for the last week discussions upon the subject of slavery. One question arose in reference to the railroads in your city here. I feel compelled to say that in my opinion the railroad company have adopted precisely the best and the most convenient mode for the transmission of passengers, white and black; that it is better they be kept separate. In the present condition of public opinion, and in the present legislation upon the subject, that is not only right and proper, but the best course that can be adopted, and I am unwilling to go into any of this useless agitation which can result in no possible good.

I believe it is well at this time to look to questions affecting the interests of white men as well as the interests of black men, and that the interests of both at this time are best consulted and best promoted by no legislation of this kind. I know I shall differ with most of my friends, as I did at the last session of Congress, but I shall vote against this measure, believing that no good purpose will be effected by its passage.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am proud to say that I represent a State the people of which have intelligence sufficient to sift all testimony presented, and justice enough to receive the truth from the lips of individuals without reference to color. The people of Kansas have long since eradicated this much of their prejudices against the oppressed African. I hope, sir, the bill as amended by the committee will pass.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hail as an omen of good the remarks which have fallen from the distinguished Senator from Indiana. I think they will be received by the country with pleasure, and that the remarks which have been made here this morning by that Senator will have a good effect throughout the country. I shall enter into no discussion of the merits of the bill now before the Senate; but I will simply ask this question: where is the practical good to be subserved by the passage of this bill? Has the public service suffered detriment in the past from the exclusion of negroes from carrying the mail? Has the mail been unsafely carried by reason of the exclusion of that class of persons? Is there to be any public benefit to result from the passage of this measure? Is it a practical question, or simply a question of sentiment, a question of theory, which is now presented to the Senate?

Mr. President, nearly every morning since the commencement of this session of Congress some measure or other has been called up and seemed to have the preference, which had exclusive reference to the negroes of the country. Surely, sir, your legislation has gone far enough for so short a period of time. Surely sufficient time of this session of Congress has been devoted to the interests of that class of people, without absorbing every day during the session in the consideration of matters in which they are peculiarly interested.

I put the question to the Senate, and I put the question to the country for their consideration, what is the possible motive for the introduction of this bill and for the passage of this bill by Congress? I repeat, is any public good to result from such an enactment? Has the public service suffered detriment in the past from the exclusion of this class of persons from the carrying of the mails? Will the public service be benefited in the future by the adoption of this measure? I apprehend not, Mr. President; and when you do allow them to carry the mails, with the provision that they shall be competent witnesses in the Federal courts, those who are acquainted with that class of persons, who live in communities where they are very considerable in numbers, and have knowledge of their character, will find, I am apprehensive, that instead of the public service being benefited by such an enactment and by their having the privilege of testifying in courts of justice when your mails are robbed and destroyed, when the public service is injured in any manner in the carrying of the mails, they will be found very ready witnesses to testify that some person has waylaid them upon the road, and that some white man has done it.

I think we are legislating against reason, against our own race, by such enactments as this; and rest assured, Senators, that if it shall become the law you will find that the result which I have predicted will occur, and that when passion shall have subsided, when excitement shall have died away, when the people of this country shall again come to think soberly and reflect seriously upon the relation of races, it will be regretted by many of those who even favor it now.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken, I desire for only one moment to call attention to the origin of the legislation which it is now proposed to sweep out of our statute-book. I think if the Senator from Indiana who opposes the bill under consideration were fully aware of the origin of the legislation which it seeks to remove, that we should have his vote, notwithstanding his eloquent speech.

I have before me the American State Papers, the first volume, relating to the Post Office. In that volume, on page 27, is a letter from Gideon Granger, dated March 23, 1802. He was at the time, it will be remembered, Postmaster General of the United States. This letter is addressed to the Hon. James Jackson, Senator from Georgia. It is as follows:

GENERAL POST OFFICE, March 23, 1802.

SIR: An objection exists against employing negroes, or people of color, in transporting the public mails, of a nature too delicate to ingraft into a report which may become public, yet too important to be omitted or passed over without full consideration. I therefore take the liberty of making to the committee, through you, a private representation on that subject. After the scenes which St. Domingo has exhibited to the world, we cannot be too cautious in attempting to prevent similar evils in the four southern States, where there are, particularly in the eastern and old settled parts of them, so great a proportion of blacks as to hazard the tranquility and happiness of the free citizens. Indeed, in Virginia and South Carolina (as I have been informed) plans and conspiracies have already been concerted by them, more than once, to rise in arms, and subjugate their masters.

Everything which tends to increase their knowledge of natural rights, of men and things, or that affords them an opportunity of associating, acquiring, and communicating sentiments, and of establishing a chain or line of intelligence, must increase your hazard, because it increases their means of effecting their object.

The most active and intelligent are employed as post-riders. These are the most ready to learn, and the most able to execute. By traveling from day to day, and hourly mixing with people, they must, they will acquire information. They will learn that a man's rights do not depend on his color. They will, in time, become teachers to their brethren. They become acquainted with each other on the line. Whenever the body, or a portion of them, wish to act, they are an organized corps, circulating our intelligence openly, their own privately.

Their traveling creates no suspicion, excites no alarm. One able man among them, perceiving the value of this machine, might lay a plan which would be communicated by your post-riders from town to town, and produce a general and united operation against you. It is easier to prevent the evil than to cure it. The hazard may be small and the prospect remote, but it does not follow that at some day the event would not be certain.

With respect and esteem,

GIDEON GRANGER.

Hon. JAMES JACKSON, Senator from Georgia.

There, sir, is the origin of the offensive legislation which we now seek to remove. It grew out of a proposition to sustain slavery, communicated in private to a Senator from Georgia. The legislation is a part of that system which Congress has so long imposed upon the country under the domineering influence of slavery, and it was expressly recommended on the ground that if colored persons were allowed to carry the mails "they would learn that a man's rights do not depend on his color." It was to subvert that principle that the offensive legislation was enacted. But now, since the resurrection of our day, since liberty is at last asserting her rights in the Republic, Congress, it seems to me, can do nothing less than to go back to its original policy under Washington and the fathers of the Republic, when no such legislation existed.

I do not like to take time on a question which seems plain as justice. But out of the origin of that old legislation I derive an unanswerable argument against it. The legislation is nothing but slavery installed in an act of Congress. But even if it had not this character, it would be offensive as an injustice to the colored race. And here let me express my dissent from the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.] He thought we ought to favor the white race. But do not forget that you cannot do injustice to the colored race without injuring that white race which you desire to favor. No, sir; there can be but one rule for all, and that is the rule of justice.

This is what I have to say on the original proposition. The amendment which has been reported by the committee has of course my cordial concurrence. I have already during the present session introduced a special bill in the same sense. On a former occasion, or on several former occasions, I have tried to ingraft that proposition on other bills then pending. I am glad to meet it and welcome it on the present bill. I think the suggestion of the committee, that it is important in the support of the original measure, is one which ought not to be neglected by the Senate. The bill, therefore, in its original proposition, and also in its amendment, ought to be passed. It will add to the judgment against slavery and its abuses. And it will also add to the securities and privileges of an oppressed race. This is enough.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the letter just read to the Senate, a letter from a former Postmaster General of the United States, and a northern man, in my judgment is one of the most sensible letters that has ever been read in the Senate of the United States, or written by any man in the United States. It carries back the mind to the early days of the Republic, when kindly feelings existed between the people of the North and the people of the South, when there was no disposition on the part of the people of the North to excite servile insurrection in the southern States; when there was no feeling cherished that the slave might rise in arms against his master; when the scenes of San Domingo had impressed upon the minds of the people both North and South the necessity of preserving the public peace and of doing no act which could mar the harmony of the Republic. Sir, Mr. Granger, by writing that letter, showed to the country that he had a heart and a soul in his bosom, that he took no delight in scenes of blood, in servile insurrection. He knew the relations existing, and happily existing in his day, between the white race and the negro race, and as a gentleman and a Christian he wished to save his country, not only North but South, in every section of that country, from any such scenes as those to which he referred, those which had occurred in San Domingo.

It was not then supposed to be a Christian duty to incite the slave to insurrection. That feeling which can rejoice in the effusion of innocent blood by members, although in a subordinate relation, of the same household was not then supposed to be Christian sympathy. Sir, if the spirit of the times have changed, when the historian shall write up the truthful record of the past and of the present, and shall do justice to the spirit which animated the men of the past and of the present, he will have no difficulty in saying that the men who lived in the days of Mr. Granger, who shared his feelings, were the men if whose counsels had been faithfully followed the present unhappy state of the country would not now be presented. I am glad that that letter has been read to the Senate; I am glad of the speech so appropriately made by the Senator from Indiana, because I think while the speech will be hailed by conservative men and reflecting men throughout the country with pleasure, that letter will recall to a great extent the minds of the thoughtful men of this country to the early days of the Republic, and that they will contrast in the silent quietude of home the spirit which animated the men of that day with the spirit which is animating the men of the present hour. Sir, I am glad, I repeat, that that letter has been written, and I will follow the lights of the past, the sunlight of the past, rather than the ignis fatuus of the present.

Mr. POWELL. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, in my judgment, should not be adopted. That amendment proposes to allow all persons, without regard to color, to be witnesses in the courts of the United States. In many of the States negroes are not permitted to testify as witnesses against white persons. That is the law of my own State, and the law of Indiana, as was stated by the honorable Senator from that State. It is the law in all the slave States, and in many of the free States; and I can see no reason why we should, by legislation here, change the rule. I think it is better to leave it, as it has heretofore been left, to the States to prescribe who shall be witnesses. The Federal courts, by their rules, allow such persons to become witnesses in their courts as are allowed in the State courts. I think that is eminently wise and proper.

You frequently have an appeal from the decisions of the State courts to those of the courts of the United States. If you have one rule as to testimony in the State court, and another rule in the court of the United States, you see at once the confusion that will exist. You try a certain class of cases in the State courts. By the laws of the States certain persons are excluded from being witnesses in certain causes, or where the rights of certain persons are being litigated. You try the case by that rule of testimony in the State court. You take that case to the Federal courts. If you have there a different rule of testimony you see at once the endless confusion that must follow. In order to keep up harmony and good feeling between the States and the national Government it is eminently proper that the States themselves should regulate all those matters. The practice, as it has existed heretofore, of allowing the rules of the State courts to govern in the Federal courts of that locality is certainly the correct one. I therefore hope that the amendment reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will not be adopted.

As to the general character of the bill, I know that nothing that I can say here will prevent this fanatical and radical kind of legislation; but I would ask the Senate, has there been any detriment to the public interest in consequence of negroes being excluded from carrying the mails? Certainly there has been none. If you pass this bill, it can do no good; it will not promote the public interest; it will not advance the public service; it will be distasteful to the people of some of the States. That will be the result of it, without doing any good in any event whatever. No good can possibly result to the country from it. The only result will be that Senators who entertain the views of the Senator from Massachusetts who a moment ago addressed the Senate will be able in their electioneering documents to say that such and such laws have been passed in favor of the negro, and add this to the list. It will be a gratification to that ultra-radical sentiment that in my judgment has done more than everything else to bring all the woes and ills by which we are now surrounded upon the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we can vote on this now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the vote will be taken.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to hear the amendment before the Senate read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if the special order is not now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so stated, but it was passed over informally, the Chair hearing no objection, the vote being requested by several Senators.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the question now presented to the Senate, except to say very briefly, in the first place, that it does not properly belong to the bill to which it is proposed as an amendment. I understand it is proposed as an amendment to Senate bill No. 62, which is "a bill to remove all disqualification of color in carrying the mails." I cannot see the propriety of attaching to a bill regulating the mail service of the country a proposition to regulate the question of the competency of witnesses in courts. The one question is properly considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; the other, before it is considered by the Senate, ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and let that committee present the reasons for or against the measure. It seems to me that this consideration would be enough to induce the Senate to reject the proposition as an amendment to the bill now before the Senate.

But, sir, as an original proposition upon its own merits, I desire to say that I cannot support it. I think such a measure would not be agreeable to the State that I represent. They have decided for that State that they will not allow Indians or negroes to testify in the courts, except in cases in litigation between Indians and negroes. I do not say that the legislation of the State should be conclusive in the courts of the United States; but, sir, the circuit court of the United States in Indiana has adopted the State law on the subject of the competency of witnesses, and the mode and manner of bringing testimony before the court; and the effect of this proposition would be to change the law of the State of Indiana very materially.

I cannot see why the Senator who proposes this measure stops where he does. If it is right to bring the negro into the court that he shall testify in a case between white men, that he shall be competent to impeach the testimony of a white witness, I cannot see why the Senator should stop there, and not also make him competent as a juror in the United States court. If his intelligence and integrity are such that we may trust him as a witness, not only to overcome the testimony of the white man, but also to be called as a witness to impeach the credibility of a white man in a court of the United States, why not place him in the jury-box, and let him decide what shall be the verdict in the case between two white men? I cannot see how gentlemen can discriminate. It is a question of integrity and intelligence, they say, and that the integrity and intelligence of the negro may be trusted in opposition to the testimony of the white man. Then why shall he not take his seat among the peers of the white man, and decide as a juror the rights of the litigating parties?

I understand the position to be taken in the Senate of the United States—it has been illustrated by the debate all day yesterday—that the negro is now the peer of the white man; that he shall take his seat in the same cars; that there shall not be any police arrangement or regulation to exclude him from the cars of the white man, although there is a sufficient accommodation provided for him separately, but that he shall be forced into social equality with the white man. Now we go one step further: that he shall be heard in court as a witness against the white man, upon whose testimony the white man's rights shall be taken from him when litigated with another white man, upon whose testimony the white man shall be convicted of the crime that is charged against him, and shall suffer the penalties of the law; and further, that he shall be heard to impeach the credibility of the white man; that the negro may be called to say that the white man is not a man of good character, and therefore ought not to be believed in court.

These all stand upon the proposition that the negro is the equal of the white man; that he is his peer. If that be so, let us have it frankly said here and said by law. If it is the opinion of the majority of this body that the negro shall not only be a witness but that he shall be a juror to decide the case, let them say so. If negroes are to control the result of verdicts by their testimony, why shall they not control the result of verdicts by their judgment as jurors? Let us have it fairly and squarely before the country, that we may know how far we are going in this direction.

Sir, I cannot consent to give a vote on this subject without saying this much. I think it is an unfortunate step. You may say here that the negro is the equal of the white man; but you cannot make him such. You may say that he shall be trusted as the white man is trusted; but you cannot give him the qualities that inspire confidence among white men toward each other. I know in reply to this it will be said, as I have heard it said on the stump very often, that we need not fear the testimony of negroes, because the fact of their position in society will be considered by the jury in weighing their testimony; but that does not answer the objection.

This is a proposition based upon the idea that the negro is the equal in law, socially and politically, of the white man. I say it is an unfortunate step. In Indiana we hold that it is the right of the State to define the status of the different classes of people in the State. This amendment proposes to interfere with that right, and to place in the courts of the United States as witnesses a class that the people of that State have said should not thus appear. It may be done; they may be forced upon society in all its relations as the equal of the white race; but that legislation will not make them equals.

For one, I do not believe they are our equals. I do not believe they are our equals in the Army, in the courts, or anywhere else; and for that reason I voted against the bill proposing that they should have the same pay in the Army as white men. Their services are not worth so much; and I care not who says to the contrary, I do not believe, nor can any weight of testimony make me believe, that the negro is the equal of the white soldiers that go from the State of Indiana. They should not be paid so much. They cannot command so much at home for their labor, because they lack those qualities that secure a high rate of compensation to the white man.

Sir, our race is honored by a history that distinguishes it. In all the pursuits of life our race has gone onward and upward. Standing alone, it has progressed for a thousand years without a step backward. In the arts, in the sciences, in literature, in law, in all the departments of art and learning, our race has gone onward and upward for a thousand years. Standing alone, the negro race has gone downward and downward for a thousand years. When brought in contact with our race, I admit it has made some steps upward; but standing alone, dependent upon its own quality and its own ability to raise itself, the tendency of the negro race has been downward. Standing alone, depending on its own ability and high qualities, the tendency of the white race for a thousand years has been upward and onward. With such facts standing before us, I am hard to be convinced that the negro is the equal of the white man; and I am not content to see a law passed by the Congress of the United States placing the negro upon a platform of equality with the white race in the courts of the country, the sanctuary of our rights.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Indiana if in his opinion riding in a public conveyance with another either creates or becomes evidence of social equality between the parties? The principal objection alleged by the Senator, if I understand him, to this bill is that it will inaugurate social equality, and he enforces this conviction by alleging that Congress has heretofore enacted laws establishing equality between the colored people and white people of this District in not prohibiting the common use of the street cars by both classes. I desire to know of the Senator from Indiana if, in his opinion, that is evidence of social equality, to be found together on a public conveyance?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator expect an answer now?

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator chooses to give an answer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not say that it is conclusive evidence of that; but when the majority of the Senate assume that they have a right to social and political and legal equality, and hold that therefore they cannot be denied a position in the cars with the white people, although accommodations are provided otherwise for them, I say that does show what the majority desire.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator's reply will not be very satisfactory to himself when he comes to consider it more coolly. He alleges that Congress has established or attempted to establish social equality between colored people and white people in this District, and states as proof that they have the legal right to ride on a public conveyance together, may be hauled from one end of the city to another by a common carrier.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the Senator has asked me a question I suppose he will be content that I shall interrupt him one second further. I know the Senator would not desire to misrepresent any argument that I attempted to make here. I did not say, I would not be understood as saying, that the mere fact that the negroes were allowed by action of Congress to ride upon the cars with white people established their equality with the white race; but I say, as I said before, that the fact that the majority in this body require that they shall ride in the same cars; that they shall receive the same pay in the Army as the white soldiers; that they shall receive the same bounties as the white soldiers, and now that they shall be heard in the courts as witnesses, shows the purpose of the majority to place them on terms of social, political, and legal equality with the white race. I did not refer to any particular action of this body, but I referred to the general tendency of our proceedings, giving nearly all the time of the Senate to the consideration of the interests of the negro, but very little of it to the white man.

Mr. HARLAN. If I understand the Senator, then, he admits that his citation of proof is not conclusive; that if a common carrier shall receive in his wagon or rail-car or stage-coach a white man and a black man, that fact does not prove conclusively that they are socially equal.

How is it with the other proofs cited? Congress has provided for the enlistment of both white and black men as soldiers. Both classes may legally carry muskets in their country's defense. I inquire if he seriously believes that this even tends to establish social equality between the two races? The laws of Congress on this subject provide that the colored men shall serve in separate regiments from white men; but they may fight for their country like white men in distinct organizations. Is the Senator serious in alleging that this even tends to establish the social equality of the two classes?

But he alleges that they are to receive the same pay for the same kind of work. It does occur to me that when he comes to think of this subject more coolly, he will agree with me that that does not affect the social standing of either. The pay ought to have reference to the capacity of the man that labors. He ought to receive a just equivalent for the amount of service he performs, whether he stands high or low in society, socially. It is not his social position that you contract for. You contract for his labor. You contract for his physical strength to wield the sledge, or to handle the spade, or, if in the Army, to drive teams, or to handle commissary stores, or, if he be armed, to handle his musket. It is his ability to perform the service required that you contract for, and not his social standing or his social qualities. I cannot perceive that any of the proofs the Senator presents even tend to establish his conclusions.

The bill now pending provides that the testimony of colored people may be heard in the United States courts. That is another proof in the opinion of the Senator of the purpose of Congress to establish social equality between white and colored people. I appeal to the good sense of the Senator, if he will allow me to be so familiar with him, to say to the Senate if in his opinion all men who are permitted to testify before a tribunal of justice must necessarily be regarded as socially equal. Does an examination as a witness in court affect the social position of the witness himself, or that of others, whether white or black? I think the Senator has not brought to bear on this subject his usual good sense. I suppose a man's social position depends on other considerations than riding on the same public conveyance with another, receiving the same wages for the same kind of service, either civil or military, or testifying in the courts. I suppose black men can tell the truth. Courts, I believe, resort to every means to elicit the truth bearing on cases that are litigated, both civil and criminal.

I am reminded by my colleague that it may be to the advantage of the white man as much as of the negro, that the latter should be permitted to testify in the courts. He may be the only person in any given case who has knowledge of facts that may be conclusive in settling questions of vast interest pending before civil and criminal tribunals. If he is ignorant and degraded these facts will of course militate against his credibility. That will be a proper question for the court or the jury that tries the case. But the right to introduce a colored witness may be very important to the white man, much more so than to the black man, as his interests are usually much larger than the interests of the negro.

But then the Senator argues that if you permit a colored man to testify you ought to permit him to sit as a jurymen. How so? I believe you allow females to testify before the courts. Does it follow as a logical necessity that women must be authorized to sit as jurymen? You allow minor children to testify before the courts. Does it follow as a logical sequence that every child who is competent to testify as a witness ought to be authorized to sit as a jurymen, and aid in trying cases?

I can perceive no connection between the facts alleged and the conclusion stated. The truth is they depend upon entirely different considerations. The child may at a very early period be capable of telling the truth, any rational human being may be capable of telling the truth, of stating facts that come under his observation, and yet incompetent to adjudicate a question of law or a question of fact. So in relation to the correlative questions, as the right to vote and the right to hold office. A very small proportion, comparatively, of any civil community are permitted to participate in managing its public affairs. A small proportion comparatively are permitted to vote and a very small proportion to hold office. These rights are not natural rights; they are rights that arise under the law by the common consent of the whole; and in adjusting the political rights and franchises of each class the community is supposed to be controlled by a desire to promote the interests of the whole. The right to vote, to hold office, to aid in making the laws, in adjudicating and enforcing them, is derived from the civil society of which the parties are members. They are not natural rights, as is the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Being made a witness is not a natural right. It may be considered a duty, when required by parties to a dispute, to testify; it may be a grievous wrong to the parties litigant not to permit them to introduce the testimony of persons conversant with the facts in controversy. But being required or not required to testify as a witness is not a question of natural right, and in no way affects the social status of any one. The natural rights of all should be protected alike by the laws. In this respect they should be perfectly equal. But when you proceed to bestow civil privileges, you must take into consideration the capacity of those who are to hold the trust.

This bill provides that the disability of colored persons to carry the mails and to testify in the courts of the United States shall be removed. Whether the bill shall become a law or not, will not affect the social equality of the two races a hair's breadth. It raises no question of equality, but it does raise a question of expediency. The mails are carried by contractors. The right to carry them is given to the lowest responsible bidder who can give the required security for a faithful performance of his contract. Now, if a colored man should put in a bid at a lower rate than all others for carrying the United States mails, and give the requisite security, what harm could result in permitting him to execute the contract? Not the least to any mortal on earth. And if the United States mails should be robbed, or any other offense committed against the persons or property of others, in the presence of colored people, what evil could possibly result from their examination in the courts? Not the least on earth. They are now permitted to testify in nearly all the loyal States of the Union. Its propriety may therefore be considered a settled question. But if it is proper to examine them as witnesses in the State courts, it would be equally proper to permit it in the United States courts.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not wish to trouble the Senate on this question, neither do I wish to bring to the discussion any excitement nor to indulge in any prejudice against this class of people. I was born among them, and they were born on my father's premises. My earliest recollection was when a negro servant attended to my wants; and I recur to those days with a great deal of pleasure and a great deal of kindness of feeling, because in those days, before their passions became excited and false notions were put into their heads, they were a faithful and obedient class of people, well provided for, and well caring for those in whose service they were. I could go, sir, to my own humble home, and there I could find two as faithful and devoted persons of this class as live in the United States or have ever lived, who, since these days of excitement, have refused to be seduced from their homes by the golden visions which have been painted to their imaginations.

I recollect this class of people when they were in their proper state and condition, with no other feeling but that of kindness, and I believe in my heart of hearts to-day that that class of the white people of this country who care most for them, who think better of them, and who labor for their real benefit, are the slaveholders of the land and those who have been brought up amidst that institution. I do not believe, I never have believed, that all this legislation, all this excitement in the northern section of the country arises from any great regard for this class of beings, but from party considerations, because, knowing them as I do, and knowing their incapacity for the positions to which it is sought to elevate them, I believe as firmly as I live that those who are now attempting to inaugurate this modern policy will be adjudged by the faithful record of history to be the worst enemies to this class of people.

I therefore say, sir, that in troubling the Senate for a few moments longer with any remarks on this bill, I do not do it from any prejudice against this class of people, from any desire to deprive them of any right which they have or ought to have; I wish to invoke no prejudice on the part of others against them; but I think I am but discharging a duty which I owe to the whole people of this country, and especially to the white race of this country, to protest against all this kind of legislation.

Sir, under what circumstances does the amendment which is the particular question now before the Senate come before this body? The bill was simply to do away with the disability of color as to persons carrying the mail. The reason assigned by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for this amendment is that if the bill is to pass, it becomes necessary in order to protect the public service to make this class of people who shall be mail carriers witnesses in the Federal courts. Does your amendment confine the reception of their testimony to cases where the public service in reference to the mail is involved? Does it say that in any case where a prosecution may be depending for robbing the mail, or by which the mail service is affected, the testimony of the mail carrier, whether he be white or whether he be black, shall be competent testimony? No, sir; but under the assumption—I will not say pretense, for I mean no discourtesy—that if you make the negro the carrier of your mails, it may become necessary in certain contingencies to have his testimony in a court of justice, you throw open all your Federal courts in reference to any branch of business that may come before them, civil suits in your district courts between A and B, white men, and you admit any and every negro to come in as a witness and testify in favor of one of the parties and against the other. The amendment proposed, therefore, is more extensive than the reason assigned for its enactment. Whether designed or not to accomplish that purpose, it is not only to make the negro a competent witness in reference to questions where the safety of the mail or the guilt of persons injuring to any extent the public interests in that respect is involved, but it is to make him a competent witness in reference to any case that may come before the Federal courts, and that, too, without regard to the fact whether the judgment of the State where he resides is that he shall be competent or not.

Many gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States, among whom there are but very few of this class of persons; and whose acquaintance with them, with their characters, with their dispositions, with their qualities, of course cannot be so great and so accurate as that of those living in other communities, I have no doubt frequently think that objections coming from such quarters as they sometimes hear objections come from in this body and in the other House, are unreasonable, are made for partisan effect. Let me tell you, gentlemen, you yourselves in the future may see that such an idea, if entertained by you, is a delusion, and that consequences of which you never dreamed may result from the action which you here inaugurate.

Why, sir, your Federal courts have jurisdiction of the greatest criminal offenses as well as of civil issues. I admit that the slave, when left to himself, and before the abolition excitement sprung up in this country, and even before the horrid scenes of the present revolution transpired, was, in the main, faithful to his master, and that the relations existing between the faithful slave and even the respectable negro free man with the white race were friendly and kind; but amid the throes of this terrible revolution, with the exciting appeals made to that class of people, with efforts made throughout the entire North by a portion of the people to stir up servile insurrection, and to array the humbler class against the more intelligent and elevated class, you have awakened a feeling, an intense feeling, in the breasts and in the minds of many of this class of people against the white race. I stated to you, sir, nothing that was fanciful the other day, but I stated to you the solemn truth when I said that in the town in which I live, at this time, or only a few days ago, they were marching up and down our streets with horrid oaths, and in several instances snapped their pistols at white men. The military were there, your negroes protected, and your white men at their mercy.

These, sir, are some of the scenes that occur in localities with which you have no personal acquaintance, and I call upon the members of the Senate as gentlemen of intelligence and reflecting men, and I call upon the people of the vast North to wake up ere it is too late to the consequences that may result to the people of a large portion of this country from such legislation as this. Sir, there are madmen possessed of devils just as much as they were in the days of Christ, and whom the devil uses as instruments to carry out his own hellish purposes, who would stir up insurrection in communities where the races are more equal than they are in yours. I do not believe that there are many, there may be some, in this Senate who entertain such a feeling, and therefore if I speak warmly upon this subject, I speak to gentlemen whose hearts I hope are not so steeled against all the kindlier feelings of their nature as to carry on this system of legislation which may eventuate in scenes in the contemplation of which the imagination is appalled.

Sir, suppose you go even to my own State, or the State of Maryland, or the State of Kentucky, or the State of Missouri to-day, all of which are in the Union, and a respectable white man is charged in your Federal courts in cases in which they have jurisdiction of the most horrid and even capital offenses, I say to you from my knowledge of this class of beings, that it would be no difficult matter at all to get a multitude of witnesses of this class to swear away his life; and I am only afraid that there are men in this country who would be pleased at a judicial murder committed by the perjury of the meanest free negro in the land.

Mr. President, I propose not to enter into a discussion and an argument which was not addressed to me, but it has been said by the Senator from Iowa that you employ them around this Capitol, that you employ them in many business relations of life, and therefore why not this? It is true, sir, this class of people, well-behaved and well-disposed, in a slaveholding community where the kindly feelings which result from the relation of master and slave prevail, have never been denied employment where they were faithful and wished it; and they can always have it. But because you employ them in the menial occupations of life or as workmen, and pay them to enable them to support themselves and families, it does not follow therefore that you should pursue a system of legislation which, whatever the Senator from Iowa may think or say, the public judgment of the country, as warranted by your persistent legislation on this subject, will say was designed to evidence to the people of the whole country that in your judgment there should be no distinction whatever.

My friend from Indiana has referred to the fact that you employ them in your Army, and the Senator from Iowa asks, is that any evidence of equality? It makes no difference what you secretly intend or think about it; but what is the effect upon that class of beings, and what is the effect upon the public judgment of the country? It is that the legislation was designed to bring about that state of affairs. You cannot go into any slaveholding State where you are enlisting negroes and you will see evidences every day that they so interpret your legislation. I dislike, in the Senate of the United States, to refer to private incidents; but only the other day in the capital of my own State, where this class of soldiers were being marched through the town and stationed in the town, one of them walked into the store of a respectable white man, and without provocation or insult let him know that he expected in less than three years to have a white wife. But, sir, though it may not be very dignified to detail these little incidents in the Senate of the United States, it is proper to do so in order to call the attention of Senators and of the country to the natural consequence resulting from this species of legislation, that consequence being a belief engendered in the minds of this class of people that you do mean social equality. I am proud to say that the negro did not go off unpunished for his insolence.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Could he find a white wife in Delaware?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am afraid he might in Kansas, where the gentleman has figured so largely upon this social equality, provided he has followers enough to carry out his doctrines.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will say to the honorable Senator, that while in Kansas we are disposed to do justice to all, we are willing, if this class of people desire it, that they shall separate from us, and our people are pretty unanimous in favor of setting apart western Texas for them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That only shows how potential an influence the Senator from Kansas exercises in his State. It is but recently that he introduced that bill or called the attention of the people of the country or the people of Kansas to that question, and in so short a time such has been the powerful influence of the Senator from Kansas in his own State that they have unanimously adopted his views.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. With the consent of the Senator from Delaware, I desire to state to him and to the Senate that the subject of settling the blacks in western Texas has been discussed in the State I represent, by myself and others, for more than a year.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have lived in the State of Delaware all my life, and I have known men much abler who lived there all their lives, such men as Clayton, and I never knew that by the discussion of a question for one year, any of them could get a unanimous verdict of the people of that State in its favor.

But, Mr. President, I have said about all that I intended to say in reference to this subject. I take leave of it, earnestly as I have addressed the Senate in relation to it, with the same feeling with which I commenced, with no feeling of real passion; I have said what I have said only from a sense of public duty.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The question of amalgamation is a mere question of taste. There is not a white lady in Kansas who requires the eloquence of a Senator or a legal enactment to control her choice as to a husband. I have no fears myself that the ladies of Kansas will prefer the colored race. They are intelligent, refined, proud of their blood and race, and will select husbands therefrom. If the Senator from Delaware has such fears for his lady constituents I do not partake of them so far as my lady constituents are concerned. But let me say that this fear of amalgamation has very recently grown up in the party to which the Senator belongs. I remember well, Mr. President, when I was in the Democratic party, that I voted, for the proud position you now hold, as the nominee of that party, for a man who was at the time living with a negro wife, and who raised a large family of children by her; and I remember frequently having said during that campaign to the members of the Democratic party in my speeches, "I appeal to you, gentlemen, to vote for Colonel Richard M. Johnson as the Democratic nominee for Vice President, negro or no negro, amalgamation or no amalgamation." What, sir, the Democratic party condemning it now, when they elevated to the second position in this Government a man who was a practical amalgamationist! Such inconsistency, Mr. President, is shameful.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator took occasion to interrupt me two or three times kindly, and I took it in the kindest spirit; and he will allow me to make a suggestion in regard to what he has just said. That may be evidence that the fact alluded to was not very disagreeable to him, but it proves nothing further.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It proves, sir, that I was in the chains of a party, and that those chains compelled me to do that which was very distasteful to me at the time. I was then and am now opposed to the amalgamation of the two races, believing, as I do, that the product is inferior to either race. It further proves that the Democratic party was at that early day in favor of practical amalgamation, else they would not have nominated and elected Colonel Richard M. Johnson as Vice President.

Mr. POWELL. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after the word "States," in the second line, the words "in all cases for robbing or violating the mails of the United States;" so as to make it read:

That in the courts of the United States, in all cases for robbing or violating the mails of the United States, there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color.

If this amendment shall be adopted, it will leave the amendment proposed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads so as to meet the evil which they say will exist in case the bill as it was originally introduced shall become a law. If their sole object is to allow black mail carriers to be witnesses against those who violate the mail, they will effect their object by adopting the section as I propose to amend it.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say to the Senator from Kentucky that my object in voting for the bill is not the sole object of extending the right to testify to negroes in cases involving violations of the post office laws of the United States. Incidentally that brings the question up here, and brought it up in the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, but I desire to say to that Senator, and to the other Senators who have spoken on that side of the Chamber, that my purpose is to give a vote by which the testimony of colored men shall be received in all the courts of the United States; and I desire, without continuing the discussion, to say to those Senators that the great State of New York, the Empire State of the Union, has grown up and prospered under just such a rule as that for many a year. In the State that I have the honor in part to represent, the rule of excluding the testimony of colored people, and all persons but whites, existed until 1862. Under the rule and tyranny of a party there that too often forgot not only liberality but justice too, the testimony of colored men was excluded from the courts of that State until, over and again, robberies and murders were committed upon the highways with no means of bringing the perpetrators to justice. I desire to be plainly understood that my purpose is to receive testimony and proof from any source that is human.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rather regret that the bill itself, which was referred to the committee, was introduced. The object of the bill was simply to authorize the Postmaster General to employ a colored person to carry the mails, if he thought proper, and it did that by repealing the prohibition in the original law. Practically, I suppose that no colored person will be employed, at any rate for years to come. I think it will be found that the Postmaster General, even if he is governed by political influences, will be very much more likely, if not certain, to employ a white man to carry the mails than a black man.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand the Senator from California to agree with me in that particular. As far, therefore, as the main object of the bill is concerned, it will be practically of no effect; but the committee have introduced the amendment which has given rise to the discussion, and as I understood from the chairman it was introduced because the committee thought that if the mail was to be intrusted to a black man, as the mail might be robbed, and there be no witness of the fact except the mail carrier, he should be made a competent witness. But if I am right in supposing that there will be no black mail carrier, because the Postmaster General will never employ one, or will very rarely if ever employ one, then the whole effect of the bill will be to do away with the incompetency of colored men as witnesses.

Mr. COLLAMER. Carriers of the mails are never employed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, whoever does it.

Mr. COLLAMER. The contractors employ their own carriers.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will allow me one moment, I will mention a hardship under the old legislation of Congress that has actually occurred in Boston. The postmaster has desired to employ a very estimable free colored person as a carrier of letters in the city, but he has found that he could not do it without exposing himself to a severe penalty under the act of Congress which it is now proposed to repeal.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well; there can be very few such cases, Mr. President. If they can get a white man and a respectable white man, (and I suppose respectable white men are just as easily found in Boston as respectable colored men,) the chances are but one in a hundred that they will employ a respectable black man. There may be some of these contractors who are more wedded to that particular race than others, as there are certain politicians who apparently seem more anxious to protect them than to protect others; but they are few. Practically therefore, as I think, the bill if it passes with the amendment suggested by the committee, an amendment in my view perfectly right if the bill was to be operative at all in its first section, will be to change, practically to repeal all the laws of the States in relation to the testimony of persons of color. The honorable member from California has told us that the incompetency of the black man to testify was removed in New York in 1832 or 1836, I think it was 1832, and that it has operated very beneficially. That, I think, is highly probable, and if all the negroes in Maryland were free, and especially if they had been free as long as the negroes in New York had been free, for one I should be in favor of making them competent witnesses.

I partake of the spirit which has governed the courts, not to say the legislation of various countries, that all questions depending upon human testimony should rather be questions of credibility than questions of competency. The jury are fully able, speaking generally, whether a witness, be he black or white, be he alien or citizen, be he of one party, where party spirit runs high, or of another, to decide what credit is to be attached to his testimony; and I did therefore propose, when I had the honor to be a member of our own Legislature, upon two occasions, once when a member of the Senate of the State and recently when a member of the House of Delegates of that State, and carry through each of the branches of which I happened to be a member, a law authorizing the parties to be examined. England has done that, although (for singular as it may seem, the lawyers are generally as a class against all improvements or alleged improvements, all modifications which change in any substantial particular the original law,) the whole bar of England, almost without an exception, and the whole bench of England were opposed to that change. But I happened to be in England in 1854, and to be honored by the privilege of being on the bench with the judges of the Queen's Bench several times when parties were being examined, and I recollect that the then Chief Justice, Lord Campbell, afterwards the Chancellor, and Mr. Justice Coleridge, between whom I sat, told me that they had been very much opposed to that change of the law, but that they had become satisfied that it was a most salutary change. Truth had not only been discovered more effectually than it had been before, but truth had been discovered in cases where it could not have been discovered under the law as it originally stood, and that it had the effect not only of working out justice in trials where there was controversy, but of keeping out of court a vast variety of cases that otherwise would have come into court. When, for example, the defendant knew that the plaintiff would be a witness as against him, or the plaintiff knew that the defendant would be a witness in his own behalf and as against the plaintiff, and either felt that there was something wrong either in his defense or in his demand, he made no defense or no demand, and cases without number were kept out of court.

I should therefore be perfectly willing to do away with all these restrictions, originally more the result of prejudice or of short-sightedness than anything else; more the result of not seeing what a guard there was, as a general thing, against any mischief resulting from leaving all these matters to be passed upon by the jury, in the fact that the jury would have the privilege of passing upon them. But what I object to is—and I submit it to the Senate with all sincerity—that if we make this change at this period, make witnesses in the States where slavery exists, it will be dangerous. Perhaps the members of the Senate who come from States where there is no political difference of opinion may not appreciate this suggestion; but I think it would be exceedingly perilous to change the law at least in respect to my own State. I have no doubt the same consideration applies to other States, Kentucky and Missouri, but I speak now of my own.

It is useless to deny that there has been in Maryland, and to a certain extent there exists now, a very strong sympathy with the South, and such a sympathy as I think would induce those who entertain it to rejoice very much if this war upon the part of the United States to sustain the life of the nation should fail. These people are known for the most part, and a great many perhaps are suspected who do not entertain the sympathy. They are suspected because of their association. They are excellent men, excellent ladies; but they do either entertain that feeling or they are suspected of entertaining it; and almost every day the military are interfering—I do not complain of it, because I have no doubt they are trying to do their duty—interfering upon almost every variety of testimony, and upon the faith of such testimony they are ordering out of Maryland men and women. What I fear is, that if you do away with the prohibition which it is the object of this amendment to do away with, that scene will be very much increased. It is carrying now more or less of ruin into many a household. They are afraid even now, and they may well be afraid, perhaps, of talking except in whispers in their own houses—even now when what they do say cannot be testified to by the servants who may be colored, as for the most part they are. But do away with this restriction, and the condition of things will be infinitely worse.

If I supposed that the existence of such a law as this is could in the slightest degree increase the chances of bringing this war to a termination speedily, and to that termination which we all look upon not only with hope but with certainty, a successful termination, I would not raise my voice against this legislation or any other legislation that might have in my judgment that tendency. I submit to the Senate whether it is proper, whether it is politic, whether, if they permit me to say so, it is humane to pass a law which may cause a great deal more trouble in these States where the general feeling is that of loyalty, when no good, looking to any actual, practical, valuable result, is to be the consequence.

Let them be free, and that they are soon to be. You have made them free in a great measure, and by that I am not to be understood as thinking that because you bring them into the Army they are free. What I have meant in relation to that subject upon former occasions is simply that after you have called upon them to serve you in the military service of your country, to achieve the safety of your nation, they have a right as against you to be free, and that it would be dishonorable if you did not see that that right was acknowledged. But they are about to be free by our own legislation; at least I think so, certainly hope so. Let them be free. Let them come, then, to be as respectable as the respectable colored gentleman to whom the Senator from Massachusetts has referred. I am not one of those who think they cannot become respectable by education; and I am very far from thinking that they are not just as likely to tell the truth as other people in the same condition of mental and moral cultivation, and that consequently when they become educated, morally and intellectually—the one will follow from the other—we shall be able to have them upon the stand, and glad to have them upon the stand, to testify to whatever may have fallen within their observation, to be believed or not as they may undergo the tests to which white men are subjected, the test of cross-examination, the test of their personal appearance, and the test of contradictory evidence.

I ask the Senate at any rate, if they will pass a bill changing the law of evidence in the States where slavery now exists and where these black persons are, they will at least confine the amendment so as to only justify him to be a witness, if a colored man, who is free as well as colored. It is an easy thing for you, gentlemen; yours are all free; and in my opinion what you are, the prosperity you have attained, is in a great measure owing to the fact that there is no slavery in your midst—an opinion which, as I said before, is not formed now for the occasion, certainly not formed with a view to jump from one party into another.

I again submit, in conclusion, that if it is to pass in any form, I think Maryland would be better pleased, the loyal men of Maryland would be better pleased, the peace of the State would be much more likely to be promoted by confining it to free blacks, and leaving the slave blacks to stand under our law as it has been from the beginning.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GRIMES. Before the doors are closed, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

COTTON SPECULATIONS BY OFFICERS.

Mr. POWELL. Before the doors are closed, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a resolution I offered a few days ago asking for certain information from the Secretary of War.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the resolution be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate the report and evidence taken by the military commission, at the head of which was Major General Irwin McDowell, appointed to investigate the conduct of officers of the Army, and others engaged in the military service, in cotton or other speculations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to taking up the resolution?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; I object to taking it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the motion to take up the resolution cannot be entertained.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to ask if the Secretary has transmitted a copy of the resolution I offered some days since, touching orders given to the provost marshals, to the Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can inquire privately of the Secretary, but he cannot propound a question in the Senate to the Secretary of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution of the Senate (No. 19) of thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 261) to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons, residents of certain States, into the regiments of other States.

A joint resolution (No. 13) tendering the thanks of Congress to Admiral Porter; and

A joint resolution (No. 21) relative to the accounts of the petty officers, seamen, and others of the crew of the United States gunboat Cincinnati.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference appointed to take into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, having met, after full and free conference do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives do recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives do recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate do recede from its third amendment, and agree to the bill of the House of Representatives with the following amendments, namely: 1. After the word "ability" in the eleventh line of the first section of said bill strike out the word "and." 2. Strike out the word "shall" in the thirteenth line of said section, and insert the word "may" in lieu thereof. 3. After the word "direction" in the thirteenth line of said section insert the words, "and during the pleasure." 4. Strike out all of the said section after the word "States" in the fifteenth line thereof. And that the House of Representatives do agree to the said amendments.

HENRY WILSON,

H. S. LANE,

REVERDY JOHNSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURN,

A. McALLISTER,

R. E. FENTON,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

The bill as thus amended is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the grade of lieutenant general be, and the same is hereby, revived in the Army of the United States; and the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a lieutenant general, to be selected from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability, who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized, under the direction and during the pleasure of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lieutenant general, appointed as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to the pay, allowances, and staff specified in the fifth section of the act approved May 28, 1793; and also the allowances described in the sixth section of the act approved August 23, 1842, granting additional rations to certain officers: Provided, That nothing in this bill contained shall be construed in any way to affect the rank, pay, or allowances of Winfield Scott, lieutenant general by brevet, now on the retired list of the Army.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (No. 42) authorizing payment of prize money due to Commander Abner Read, United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A joint resolution (No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (No. 43) authorizing the settlement of the accounts of J. N. Carpenter, a paymaster in the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (No. 261) to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons, residents of certain States, into the regiments of other States—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (No. 13) tendering the thanks of Congress to Admiral Porter—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A joint resolution (No. 21) relative to the accounts of the petty officers, seamen, and others of the crew of the United States gunboat Cincinnati—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

WAREHOUSING OF IMPORTED GOODS.

The bill (H. R. No. 230) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes, was read by its title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put that bill on its passage now.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

It provides that all goods, wares, and merchandise now in public stores or bonded warehouses, on which duties are unpaid, and which shall have been in bond more than one year and less than three years at the time of the passage of the act, may be entered for consumption, and the bonds canceled at any time before the 1st of June next on payment of duties and charges according to law. It also provides that the term "license," in the first proviso to the fifteenth section of the act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes, approved July 14, 1862, shall be held to extend to all vessels authorized by law to engage in the coasting trade, whether sailing under registers or enrollments and licenses.

On motion of Mr. WADE, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT OF CAPTAIN J. L. FISK.

Mr. WALLACE asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to furnish this House with a copy of the report of Captain J. L. Fisk relative to his late exploration to the Rocky mountains, the gold fields of Idaho, &c., now on file in the office of the Adjutant General.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to the resolution provided it be modified by inserting "directed" in place of "instructed."

Mr. WALLACE. I accept that modification. The resolution, as modified, was introduced, read, considered, and agreed to.

POST ROUTES IN UTAH AND IDAHO.

Mr. WALLACE, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of Idaho in reference to the establishment of certain post routes in Utah and Idaho; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CADETS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. STROUSE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the number of cadets at the West Point Military Academy; and to report by bill or otherwise.

PAY OF OFFICERS ABSENT ON LEAVE.

Mr. STROUSE, by unanimous consent, also introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of section thirty-one of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, as relates to the pay and allowance of officers absent with leave.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

BRIGADIER GENERAL G. W. MORGAN.

On motion of Mr. COX, the following resolution, laid over from a previous day, was by unanimous consent taken up, read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House copies of a communication from Brigadier General G. W. Morgan to Adjutant General Thomas, dated Mount Vernon, Ohio, June 6, 1863, and the exhibits thereto attached, marked from "A" to "Q" inclusive, the same being in reply to that portion of the official report of Major General Halleck, dated December 2, 1863, relative to the evacuation of Cumberland Gap.

PUBLIC LANDS IN WISCONSIN, ETC.

On motion of Mr. SLOAN, the Committee on Public Lands were discharged from the further consideration of a resolution in relation to the discontinuance of the surveyor general's office, and providing for surveys of land in Wisconsin and Iowa, and the same was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MISSOURI TROOPS.

Mr. BOYD, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the State authorities of the State of Missouri have heretofore enrolled into service all persons liable to military service; and whereas they have been designated as enrolled Missouri militia and provisional militia by said State authorities; and whereas said soldiery have been turned over to and have been acting under orders of the military commandant of the department of Missouri; and whereas the four regiments of such soldiery in the fourth congressional district of said State have been in active service for more than twelve months, and have done good and gallant service; and whereas the State of Missouri has failed to provide for the payment of said soldiery, who, in a great measure, at various times, protected and saved the property of the United States, valued at millions of dollars; and whereas said soldiery have ever acted with a cheerfulness and alacrity in obedience to orders: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of paying said soldiery according to their muster-in rolls the same as volunteers, and that the said soldiery be placed on same footing, as to pay, pension, bounty, &c., as United States soldiers; and report by bill or otherwise.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. STILES. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that he is informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that he proposes to make to-morrow a day for general debate in Committee of the Whole, when no vote shall be taken.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope by unanimous consent we shall meet to-morrow and consider the President's message, with the understanding that nothing shall be done except debate, so that gentlemen who desire may speak. That will save a great deal of time.

By unanimous consent the suggestion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

Mr. STILES. I withdraw my motion.

WESTERN CLAIMS.

Mr. BOYD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the payment of certain claims in the Western department; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the regular order of business.

PUNISHMENT OF TRAITORS.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow me to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from California is obliged to leave the city, and hence I withdraw my call for that purpose.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to exclude traitors and alien enemies from the courts of the United States in civil cases and from the public lands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to allow me to offer from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution extending the time for the payment of bounties.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my call.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not withdraw mine.

Mr. ODELL. This bill is one of importance to the country, and it is important that it should be acted upon now. It is a bill to extend the time for the payment of bounties to veterans who recruit. The time expires on Sunday.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think this matter has not been fully understood.

Mr. FINCK. I object to the gentleman making a statement.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask unanimous consent of the House to set apart the second Thursday and Friday of March for the consideration of territorial business after the morning hour, and that the territorial bills in committee be then made the special order.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to have withdrawn his demand for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand. The gentleman from Kentucky took his seat without replying to the inquiry of the Chair whether he withdrew his objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have made no objection to the unanimous consent asked by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] just now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. HARDING] objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ODELL. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] does not object to the reporting of the joint resolution in relation to bounties.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my demand for the regular order of business so that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] may report the resolution to extend the time for the payment of bounties.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the proposition. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] asks the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution to extend the time for the payment of bounties. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I send up the joint resolution, which is a report from the Military Committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not withdrawn my objection to the reporting of that resolution by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair was misinformed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not withdraw the objection.

Mr. ODELL. I believe I misled the Chair and the House. I made the statement that the gentleman withdrew his objection, as I understood him to say that he would do so if I asked him to do it; hence I made the statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I said I would not object to any request the gentleman from New York himself made of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that he is under the impression that his objection comes too late, as the Chair stated distinctly and audibly, after the remark of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ODELL], that he would again state the proposition; he did so, and no objection was made. The Chair therefore thinks the objection comes too late. The Chair desires to do justice to both sides of the House, but he stated the question distinctly, and thereupon the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN], who had called for the regular order of business, rose and stated that he withdrew his objection, and the Chair heard no other objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not objected to any consent asked by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ODELL]. I objected only to the consent asked by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK].

Mr. ODELL. That was my understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated the matter distinctly, and no objection was made. The joint resolution is before the House.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It provides that the bounties authorized to be paid under existing laws and regulations and orders of the War Department to veterans re-enlisting or persons enlisting in the regular or volunteer service of the United States for three years or during the war shall continue to be paid from the 1st day of March, 1864, to the 1st day of April, anything in any law or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding; said bounties to be paid out of any money already appropriated for such purposes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the joint resolution.

Mr. COFFROTH. I would ask the gentleman to amend the joint resolution by providing that all veterans who re-enlist shall be credited to the different towns and election districts from which they come.

The SPEAKER. That amendment would not be in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the demand for the previous question simply to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that that is already the provision of law, and if it were repeated twenty times in this resolution it would not make it any stronger. The law requires that to be done now.

Mr. COFFROTH. The Provost Marshal General has issued an order in antagonism to what the gentleman states to be the law.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then he must be held to obey the law. That is all I can say.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman whether any provision is made in this resolution for giving bounty to the heirs of those who lost their lives in the service prior to July, 1861.

Mr. SCHENCK. That matter is not relevant at all to this resolution. This resolution merely relates to the payment of bounties upon re-enlistment or enlistment, extending the time from March 1, when the law expires, to the 1st of April, so as to promote enlistments and prevent the necessity of a draft. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK moved the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENLISTMENTS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons, resident in certain States, into the regiments of other States.

Mr. STEVENS. Is that a private bill?

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. It is not.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I must object, as this is private bill day.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. ELIOT called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of committees for reports of a private character, beginning with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONSTANCE READ.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a joint resolution authorizing the payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, of the United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the proper accounting officers to pay to Constance Read, widow of Commander Abner Read, late of the United States Navy, the share of prize money due or to become due to said Abner Read for prizes taken by the United States vessel New London while under his command in 1861.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the joint resolution was engrossed and read the third time.

The question recurred on its passage; and the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMASTER CARPENTER.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a joint resolution for the relief of J. M. Carpenter; and moved the previous question on its third reading.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of J. M. Carpenter, paymaster in the United States Navy, to credit him with the sum of $200, being the value of clothing stolen from the United States sloop Saratoga, after said vessel had been put out of commission, in Philadelphia, in July, 1863.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the joint resolution was engrossed, and read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution; and it was passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CREW OF THE CINCINNATI.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution relative to the accounts of the petty officers, seamen, and others of the crew of the United States gunboat Cincinnati, and moved the previous question on its third reading.

The joint resolution authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of the petty officers, seamen, and others of the crew of the United States gunboat Cincinnati, to allow to each of them all back pay, and a sum not exceeding fifty dollars for the loss of clothing and other property by the sinking of said vessel on the Mississippi river, near Vicksburg, on the 27th of May, 1863.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the joint resolution was engrossed and read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution; and it was passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CREW OF THE MONITOR.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, also reported back the joint resolution to compensate the crew of the United States steamer Monitor for clothing lost in the public service, and asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, inasmuch as provision had already been made for the case by the act of Congress of March, 1863.

It was so ordered.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. It strikes me that the law passed at the last session of Congress, to which the gentleman refers, was defective, inasmuch as it provided no means for paying the men. This resolution was introduced for the purpose of curing that defect. I think if the gentleman will compare the two he will find there is a difference.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The committee has been discharged from the further consideration of the subject, but if the House will allow me I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the resolution of March 3, 1863, authorizes the accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of these men, to credit each of them with the amount of sixty dollars.

PAYMASTER E. C. DORAN.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back Senate bill No. 94, to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Paymaster E. C. Doran, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that all the payments made by William H. Peters, of Virginia, to the mechanics, laborers, and other employees of the Norfolk navy-yard for wages due to them by the United States for services and labor rendered to the 20th of April, 1861, and the rolls and vouchers thereon on file in the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, shall be legalized for the benefit of Paymaster Edward C. Doran, of the United States Navy; and that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall be authorized to credit Paymaster Edward C. Doran, in the settlement of his account, with the sum of $29,381.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMODORE W. D. PORTER.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Commodore W. D. Porter, United States Navy, for bounty, the subject having been already provided for, and that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO ADMIRAL PORTER.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported back House joint resolution (No. 13) extending the thanks of Congress to Admiral Porter, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution provides that the thanks of Congress be tendered to Admiral David D. Porter, commanding the Mississippi squadron, for eminent skill, endurance, and gallantry exhibited by him and his squadron, in cooperation with the Army, in opening the Mississippi river.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs a question.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FINCK. I introduced resolutions some weeks ago tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Walke, United States Navy, and had them referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I would be glad to know what has become of them.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The committee has not yet reached the subject. We will do so the first opportunity and report on it to the House. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO COMMODORE RINGGOLD.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported back Senate joint resolution (No. 19) of thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution provides that the thanks of Congress be tendered to Commodore Ringgold, the officers, petty officers, and men of the United States ship Sabine, for the daring and skill displayed in rescuing the crew of the steam transport Governor, wrecked in a gale on the 1st of November, 1861, having on board a battalion of United States marines under the command of Major John S. Reynolds, and in the search for and rescue of the United States ship Vermont, disabled in a gale on the 26th of February 1862, with her crew and freight; and that the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate the resolution to Commodore Ringgold, and through him to the officers and men under his command.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENLISTMENTS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back House bill No. 261, to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons, residents of certain States, into the regiments of other States, and demanded the previous question.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. COX. If I understand the bill, it allows the recruiting agents of certain States to go into other States where the draft has not obtained.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. That is the purport of it.

Mr. COX. I understand that credit is to be given to the State where the recruiting takes place. I do not know that I will object to it, but I do think notice ought to be given to the different State Executives that a system of recruiting is now going on unjust and unfair to some of the States. I have been informed by my colleague [Mr. FINCK] that two regiments recruited and called Tennessee regiments belong really to the State of Ohio, and I have a letter from an officer of the Army that the same thing is being done near this city.

Mr. DAWES. Is the bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. The evil of which the gentleman complains has nothing to do with the bill before the House. If there is any action necessary to prevent the evil of which he complains, he ought to introduce a bill. I believe the law as it now exists would amply prevent the troops of Ohio from being enlisted into the troops of another State. I believe such is the law or order of the Department at the present time. But this bill names certain States—Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas—as the States in which persons resident there may be enlisted in the regiments of other States; and it provides that those States, or the subdivisions of those States, procuring the enlistments in the States named, may have the men credited to them on the draft.

This action will be beneficial to the Union people of those rebel States, for the reason that it will enable them to support their families. The men there who want to go into our Army have no means of doing so, and if they do go in, they have no means of supporting their families. Under this bill those men can get the local and State bounties as well as those of the General Government, and that will provide a fund out of which their families can be supported, white men as well as black. They will thus cease to be a charge upon the General Government. I conclude, from every point of view, that this provision will enable us to largely increase our armies.

Mr. COX. I refer to this matter because I believe the law, as it stands at present, is sufficient to prevent such enlistments; but the trouble is, the War Department either suffers its officers or is itself engaged in taking troops from other States and putting them into regiments from States where they pay more bounties. I think perhaps it would be well in this bill to insert a provision providing that this law shall apply to no States except those enumerated in the act.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. It cannot apply to any other State.

Mr. COX. There is a sort of swindling operation going on in this business. I want the information, at least, to go to the country that the War Department is not doing right in this matter in certain States. I have a communication in my hands from which I will read:

"Agents from Troy, New York, have induced the eleventh, twelfth, seventeenth, and possibly other regular infantry regiments to reenlist, and to give the credit of their reenlistment to Rensselaer county, New York."

"The bounty offered, including the Government bounty, is $852; local bounty paid down, $300. The men of the eleventh and seventeenth infantry who have reenlisted have been paid. Those of the twelfth infantry are to be paid next week."

"In the regular brigade several hundred men are from Ohio—the greater part of them from the West. The exact number I would not state without examining the regimental rolls."

"Mustering officers inform me that local recruiting agents induce either regulars or volunteers from any State or county to reenlist and accept their local bounties whenever and wherever they can."

Now, no credit is given to the State from which those people come. I do not wish to embarrass the bill of the gentleman, but I desire to have notice given to the War Department that we want fair play, at least toward the States of the West who are thus treated.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I know that is the existing law at the present time, and if the Secretary of War disregards the law there is a way of making him regard it. But I do not believe the insertion of that provision in this bill is necessary. I know of thousands of men in the service in Missouri regiments who were credited to Illinois. All the members from Illinois must be familiar with the facts. At one time we were prepared to raise troops in Missouri, and because Illinois men could not get into the service in their own State they came over to Missouri and enlisted; and they were credited to Illinois.

Mr. FINCK. In connection with this discussion I desire to state to the House that the district I represent is the one to which my colleague [Mr. Cox] has referred. I have been advised by letter from that district that the seventeenth and thirty-first Ohio regiments have reenlisted and been credited to the State of Tennessee, thereby depriving that section of the State of the large number of men comprised within those two regiments.

I placed that letter in the hands of the Provost Marshal General. He promised me that he would refer the letter to the Solicitor of the War Department, and have a decision on the case. The provost marshal of the district, I am informed, does not think he is authorized to credit these men to the quota of the district without an order from the War Department. I think it would be an act of great injustice to Ohio, and especially to that portion of the State in which these men reside, and whose families are entitled to the provisions made by Ohio for the support of the families of volunteers, if they should be credited to the State of Tennessee. I have prepared a resolution on this subject, asking information from the Secretary of War, which I will, at the proper time, introduce; and I hope we shall be able to apply some remedy, if it should turn out that Ohio soldiers are being enlisted by and credited to other States. What we wish, sir, is that citizens of Ohio who are engaged in the military service of the United States shall be credited to that State; and if the present legislation does not fully effectuate that purpose, then I trust we will make suitable provision to carry out what seems to commend itself by its fairness and equality among the several States.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. This matter has no application to the bill now before the House. That matter is already provided for by law; and this bill only permits the several States to recruit in the rebel States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish, with the permission of the gentleman from Missouri, to express my dissent from this bill. I have heretofore, by voice and vote, explained the position I occupy on the subject of negro enlistments. I do not now propose to say anything upon that subject. But this bill embodies a new feature. It authorizes the people of other States to recruit for their quotas in rebel States. Hitherto the legislation of the country has not gone to that extent, and I do not think it ought to go that far. These States owe military service to this Government as much as any other States, as fast as our authority is extended over them. Such of their citizens, and if you choose to include in that their negroes, as enlist in the Army of the United States ought to be credited upon the quotas of the States to which they belong; nor ought we to tolerate this thing of States with money, States engaged in trade and commerce, with Carthaginian souls, going into other States and buying their men, instead of furnishing their own men to fill their own quotas. Those States which have no money to expend in this way must furnish their freemen. The rich man is to buy a rebel negro, to serve with the poor white man—that is the policy. We do not want States when they are called upon to furnish troops to be allowed to go to other States and there furnish their quotas upon Carthaginian principles. I prefer the white man of New England for a soldier to any negro in America; he is a nobler and better guardian of our flag and honor. The way of making war by purchasing the blood and muscle of other lands with money may succeed, but history is against it. A State that depends upon the people of other States to do its fighting in the long run will be a loser by it. States with money that are able to subsidize a people that have soldiers, or to form alliances with States that have soldiers, may triumph in a long war, and it has been done; but, sir, in that struggle for preeminence which is inevitable in an association of commonwealths like this of ours, States that depend upon the people of other States to do their fighting will at last decline and go down, and they ought to go down. If gentlemen are determined to prosecute this policy of bringing a subject race into this contest upon every principle that degrades a people, to bring them into a contest in which they have no interest in the world, on the principles of the very individuals who claim to bring them into it, at all events do not let them go to the extent of saying that the inhabitants recruited in one State shall be credited to the quota of another State.

I am prepared, sir, to give a candid and hearty support to this Government in the prosecution of the war against armed rebellion. I am prepared to see that my State does her whole duty in the contest, but I must now protest, as I have before done, against the whole policy of arming the negro and bringing him into this contest. At all events, let gentlemen be honest and candid. If they will arm the negro they are logically bound to recognize his freedom and equality. They cannot as they now do deny him all claim to recognition in this war, all claims to political recognition and social recognition, and yet call upon him to shed his blood in this war, to exchange one state of slavery for another equally odious, if not far more odious. Who could have any respect for a race of people that would freely give its blood in a contest like this to uphold the integrity and honor of the country when they are to have no part nor lot in the privileges of that country? I have been amazed at the claim set up that a slave owes military service to the Government—a Government that denies him all the rights of a citizen.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman for a discussion of this bill, but I must claim the floor because the gentleman is discussing a policy which has already been decided by the House. There is no new policy in this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I incidentally refer to these questions. I have not risen to discuss them. I am sorry the gentleman interrupts me—at all events in the middle of a sentence. I do not know how disagreeable the views I am presenting may be to the gentleman, when I am deprecating calling upon the African to fight for the honor of our flag and to preserve our national integrity, and yet denying him all the rights and privileges of a citizen. I would scorn to do it. When I want him to come in to help me to preserve the country, I will invite him upon terms of equality. If he is fit to fight with me he is fit to vote and hold office with me, and to enjoy all the rights of citizenship. I hope the people of Kentucky will always be ashamed to hold the negro in slavery, yet call upon him to render the highest and noblest service due to a State, basely skulking from duty themselves. Hence it is that I condemn the whole policy of arming negroes. Hence it is that I advise Kentucky, when she is called on for soldiers, to furnish free men. The people of a State who are willing to do the voting for slaves and negroes must also do the fighting for slaves and negroes, else they are degraded.

But, sir, I rose to protest against this new feature of permitting people with money in one State to go into other States and purchase soldiers instead of furnishing their own soldiers. What guarantee have we of the good behavior of States like that, if they grow rich by war, as the East is doing by this war, and be allowed to purchase soldiers of other States? Will they not grow fond of war? Will they ever want to see the war terminated? If while the war lasts they can declare dividends of ten per cent. in gold each six months on their industrial enterprises and lay by a large improvement and reserve fund, as many are now doing, and then be allowed to purchase the thews and sinews of the people of other States, will they ever want to give up war? And if war shall become a habit, will they not by and by enslave the rest of the States? The bill proposes, sir, to let some of the States keep their labor at home and grow rich and powerful by the war while other States are wasted, depopulated, and impoverished. Let us require each State to furnish its own men, whether they be black or white.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I wish to reply to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky. I do not hold with him that this is a war between certain States and certain other States. It is a war between the Government of the country and men in rebellion against it. I believe that we can as well employ a loyal man from the South in a Massachusetts regiment as to have the regiment entirely filled with Massachusetts men. I know very well from what I have seen myself that there are thousands of men in the southern States anxious and willing to go into the service of the Government; but as yet there has been no provision made by which their families can be taken care of; and if they do join the Army, they leave their families unprotected and unprovided for. These men have no bounties from the General Government, and of course have none from their States. Thousands on thousands of loyal men could be had to enter the service, if there were only bounties provided for them to support their families during their absence. I do not agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that we should not avail ourselves of the courage and vigor of those loyal men of the South to assist in fighting our battles. It is more their battle than it is that of Massachusetts. The loyal men of the South have more interest in upholding the Government than the men of the North have, for they have felt the dire effects of the war more than the people of the northern States. I do not believe that there is war between Massachusetts and South Carolina. I do not concur with the gentleman in any such sentiment, nor in any of the consequences that flow from it. That is the very doctrine that made this war—the States rights doctrine run mad.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for that purpose; but I give notice that I will move the previous question before my hour expires.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I simply desire to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri, whether it would not be better to let the Union men of these rebel States organize themselves there and make a nucleus around which the Union sentiment of those States might rally. Would it not be better to do that than to take away the Union men and attach them to the regiments of other States? It strikes me that the very best way to put down the rebellion is to rally the Union sentiment of the southern States, and make provision to pay bounties to these men as regular soldiers. Let us make a rallying point of the Union sentiment there, and let the people of the northern States furnish their own quotas.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that that can be done now, and that it has been done to some extent in North Carolina. But this is a more efficacious mode to provide for giving them larger bounties, because it adds to the bounty of the United States the local bounties. I am in favor of their getting the largest bounty, because I want their families well provided for. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Certainly. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement to the House in regard to this bill. It refers to a matter of which I have practical knowledge. The only regiment of white men raised in any of the States mentioned in this resolution was raised mainly by officers under my command in the summer of 1862, and raised in three days. As my command was passing from Corinth, Mississippi, to Decatur, Alabama, I learned that in the range of the Sand mountains to the south of us, the caves and fastnesses were filled with Union men, men who had stood out against the rebellion and the conscription agents, and successfully defended themselves against every attack and attempt to force them into the rebel service. I sent Colonel Streight (now out of Libby prison, I hope,) with his command, and in three days he raised nearly four hundred men. A woman who lived in those mountains came to us to ask that these men might enlist. Women brought in husbands, sons, and brothers. One woman brought thirty-five men who immediately enlisted in the service.

I tell you that I have never seen Union men like those in the mountains stretching from the sand hills of Mississippi to Georgia, Tennessee, and Virginia. The hills swarmed with Union men, true and good; and this proposition is that those who cannot receive bounty, for whom there is no organization, where there is no arrangement by which they can receive commissions or raise regiments, that the States which have money to pay for volunteers may come and pay bounties and enlist these men, that the bounty may go to the maintenance of their families. It seems to me that there is no proposition which has yet come before the House which has had more solid sense and wise statesmanship. It provides not only that those men shall be protected and their families taken care of, but that the Union sentiment shall be strengthened and promulgated throughout the rebel States.

To the bill before the House the only objection—except the everlasting black one which comes up always when anything is offered for the good of the country and to suppress the rebellion—was that presented by the gentleman on the other side, that it would be unjust to the poorer States who cannot compete with the richer ones in getting volunteers. It does not wrong me that my neighbor is more prosperous than I. His prosperity does not make me any the less prosperous. If I do nothing for myself I will not oppose his advancement. If Massachusetts is richer than Ohio in proportion to its population I will not rail at that State for getting more Union men of the South into the Army than Ohio does. Such State jealousy is unmanly, and unworthy, a great people engaged in a great cause. I am glad that we have rich States able and willing to pay bounties to the men of Georgia and Alabama, and thus help to swell the ranks of our Army. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I must take the floor.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to move an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I move to add the following:

And provided further, That when enlistments shall be made of any soldier, either in or out of any State, except those enumerated herein, full credit shall be given to the State to which the enlisted soldier belongs.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WADSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John B. Baldwin, Beaman, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Daves, Dawson, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, English, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Highy, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Winfield, and Woodbridge—82.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Robinson, Ross, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, and Chilton A. White—44.

So the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. MORRILL stated that his colleague, Mr. BAXTER, was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege.

CAPTURES MADE BY ARMED VESSELS.

Mr. FENTON. Will the gentleman give way until I can ask the House to refer a bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. DAWES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FENTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in relation to captures made by armed vessels in the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

WAGON ROAD.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill providing for the construction of a wagon road from the Missouri river to Virginia City, in the Territory of Idaho; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

VETERAN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. FINCK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I will hear it.

Mr. FINCK asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House what number of veteran volunteers in the service of the United States have reenlisted in such service, and how many, and from what States such veterans have been reenlisted, and to what particular State or States of which they are non-residents any of such veterans have been credited, and the number thereof.

Mr. DAWES. I am afraid the result of that resolution will be to give more valuable information to the enemy than to us; and I must object, unless it is modified.

Mr. FINCK. I will state the purpose of the resolution. I desire to know the number of veterans in my own State that have reenlisted in other States.

Mr. DAWES. The information is desirable, I admit; but I do not think it proper that it should be made public. The gentleman can get that information at the War Department.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not object, but that the resolution be introduced, and then we can amend it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that the resolution be amended by inserting the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. FINCK. I accept that modification.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to have it amended so as to inquire under what authority and by what law this thing is done.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that it be also modified so as to substitute the President of the United States in place of the Secretary of War; and that "requested" be substituted for "directed."

Mr. FINCK. I have no objection to that.

The resolution as modified was introduced, read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the contested-election case of Lewis McKenzie vs. R. M. Kitchen, from the seventh congressional district of Virginia. I ask that the resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Lewis McKenzie is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the seventh congressional district in Virginia.

Resolved, That R. M. Kitchen is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the seventh congressional district in Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose that under the rules, this being a report from a committee, it will be necessary, unless by unanimous consent of the House, to consider these two resolutions together. But as the two cases stand upon a different state of facts, and upon different principles, I ask the consent of the House to consider the resolutions separately, and that the House first take up the resolution in reference to Lewis McKenzie.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask a separate vote upon each resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that, but I do not desire to discuss the two resolutions together, and I do not see that any harm or prejudice can result to either party if we leave the resolution in reference to Mr. Kitchen until the one in reference to Mr. McKenzie shall be disposed of.

No objection being made, the House agreed to consider the resolutions separately.

Mr. DAWES. The resolution before the House is, that Lewis McKenzie is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the seventh congressional district in Virginia.

There are two questions involved; first, is anybody entitled to a seat from the seventh congressional district? and secondly, which of these two gentlemen, if either, is entitled to such seat?

I think, however, we can dispose of this case without settling the question whether anybody is entitled to a seat from that district. Whether Mr. McKenzie is entitled to it, if anybody, depends upon whether he has a plurality of the votes cast; and whether he has a plurality of the votes cast depends upon one of two questions; first, was the county of Berkeley in the State of Virginia or in the State of West Virginia at the time the election was held? and secondly, if we are certain that the votes which were cast in the county of Berkeley were cast according to law, or so in non-conformity with law that they must be rejected?

It is claimed by Mr. McKenzie in asserting and prosecuting his right to this seat that the county of Berkeley belonged to the State of West Virginia at the time this election was held; and if it did, he claims further that the votes cast in the county of Berkeley should be rejected here because of certain informalities connected with them. The committee were of opinion that the county of Berkeley was part of the State of Virginia and of this congressional district at the time this election was held. Whether it was or was not, depends upon certain legislation of West Virginia and of Congress.

This election is claimed to have been held in the seventh congressional district of the State of Virginia upon the last Thursday of May, 1863, the time appointed by the law of the State of Virginia for holding an election for Representatives in Congress. The State was districted according to the number of Representatives she was entitled to by the present apportionment. By an act of the Legislature of Virginia dated January 30, 1863, the counties of Alexandria, Berkeley, Frederick, Shenandoah, Jefferson, Clark, Warren, Loudoun, Fauquier, Fairfax, and Prince William, constituted the seventh congressional district of Virginia.

When a constitution was adopted by what now constitutes the State of West Virginia, there was incorporated into that constitution a clause providing for the admission into that State of three counties in addition to the forty-eight counties that now constitute the State, namely, the counties of Berkeley, Frederick, and Jefferson, provided these three counties should, by a popular vote, so decide. But when the State was admitted into the Union by an act of Congress dated December 31, 1862, the boundary lines as fixed by that act did not include either of these three counties, and neither of them, excepting the county of Berkeley, had ever signified its assent to or desire to become a part of the State of West Virginia.

Subsequently to the passage of the act of Congress constituting the State of West Virginia, the State of Virginia enacted a law providing that the county of Berkeley alone, if it should so decide by a popular vote, might become a part of the State of West Virginia, if the State of West Virginia, after the county had so voted, should determine to receive it. The same statute provided that the county of Berkeley should, upon the last Thursday of May, 1863, by a popular vote, determine that question. This was the very day for the election of a Representative in Congress in that district. The people, therefore, of the seventh congressional district, including the county of Berkeley, were voting for a member of Congress on that day, and the county of Berkeley was voting upon the question whether it would become a part of West Virginia.

The result at the close of the polls was that the county of Berkeley had decided unanimously, or substantially so, to become a part of West Virginia, but the statute of the State of Virginia, transferring the county of Berkeley in this contingency to the State of West Virginia, embraced also one other condition precedent, namely, that the county should be so transferred to the State of West Virginia when the State of West Virginia should, by an act of its Legislature, determine to receive it as a part of that State.

The State of West Virginia did not determine to receive it as a part that State until the August subsequent to this election; so that if these two States had the power to transfer a county from the one to the other, it did not become a complete act of transfer until August, whereas this election for Representative in Congress occurred in May.

But there is another objection. It has been established by the Supreme Court of the United States, and always acted on without question—

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman if at the time this county is supposed to have been transferred from the one State to the other by the consent of the Legislatures of the two States, the consent of the Congress of the United States had been given for such transfer?

Mr. DAWES. If my friend will be patient, he will hear me on that point. I was just about saying, when I was reminded to say it by my learned friend from Ohio, that it had been the established law of the country as pronounced by the Supreme Court that no two States could change their boundary lines without the consent of Congress, and hence it required the consent of the State of West Virginia, of the State of Virginia, and of Congress to change the boundary line between those States. Congress has admitted West Virginia into the Union with a fixed boundary line. That does not include the county of Berkeley; and Congress has never consented that the county of Berkeley should be a part of West Virginia, or that the boundary line between West Virginia and old Virginia should be so changed as to include that county. This is, in the opinion of the committee, absolutely necessary; so that whatever may be the legislation of the two States on the subject, the county of Berkeley, without the consent of Congress, could never become a part of West Virginia. It is perfectly apparent that that is a necessity of the case; for if old Virginia could transfer the county of Berkeley to West Virginia it could transfer all the other counties, or could transfer itself to West Virginia and cease to exist by its own action—which is one way of committing suicide that I commend to the attention of my colleague, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] The Supreme Court has said so, and that has been always the rule acted upon. It was so in the case of the boundary line between Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and also in the case of the late change of boundary between New York and Massachusetts. All the practice has been that without the consent of Congress there can be no change in the boundary lines of States.

Therefore, sir, it cannot be questioned but that the county of Berkeley was, not only when this election was held, but is still, a part of the seventh congressional district of Virginia. The question then comes up whether there is any such informality in the votes cast in the county of Berkeley as requires that they should be rejected by the House. If not, Mr. McKenzie is in a minority of the votes. If the vote of Berkeley county be rejected, then Mr. McKenzie is in a plurality.

The objection which Mr. McKenzie raises to the vote of Berkeley county is this: By the law of Virginia it is required in a congressional election that the commissioners at the several polls in each county shall return the results of the election at their polls to the clerk of the county, who shall record the results in a book, and send certified copies thereof to the clerk of the county first named in the act constituting the district. It was requisite that the commissioners of the polls in Berkeley county should return the votes for their several precincts to the county clerk of Berkeley county, and that he should send certified copies to the county clerk of Alexandria county; but the rebellion had extinguished the county clerk of Berkeley county, and there being no county clerk there, it was an impossibility that the law could be technically complied with. The commissioners therefore certified their return directly to the county clerk of Alexandria county, and gave this certificate:

MAY 30, 1863.

The undersigned, commissioners, named in the foregoing certificate, hereby state that there is no clerk of the county court of Berkeley county, the county officers, including said clerk, elected last year having failed to qualify; that the records of the office have been removed; that the office and court-house are occupied by the United States military, and that it is impossible, therefore, to certify to the "clerk" of the said county court of Berkeley the result of the election, and consequently the law cannot be literally complied with, which requires said "clerk" to record said return in a book in his office, and to transmit a "certified" copy of such result to the clerk of "the county first named in the law."

GEORGE SHARER,
ELIAS M. PITZER,
JOHN W. FITZER.

It was not disputed before the committee that the return to the county clerk of Alexandria county, instead of to the county clerk of Berkeley county, contained the true state of the vote; or that there was actually polled in Berkeley county that number of votes; and the Committee of Elections, following all precedents governing the case, sought to find the facts—how many votes were actually cast. While the law might well impose the duty on officers, after the vote was cast, to return it in a perfect form so as to secure accuracy and to prevent fraud, it was supposed to be the duty of the committee, if there was any defect of form, to go back to the ballot-box, or to the county, and ascertain the exact number of votes cast; and, if they were honestly cast, to give them their force and effect. The result, therefore, is that Mr. Kitchen had 962 votes and Mr. McKenzie 716 votes—Mr. Kitchen having received a plurality of 246 votes. Therefore, Mr. McKenzie is not, under any circumstances, entitled to the seat. Hence the committee report this resolution that Mr. McKenzie is under no circumstances entitled to the seat.

That is all that I desire to submit. I understand that the contestant [Mr. McKenzie] desires to address the House.

Mr. McKENZIE, (contestant.) Mr. Speaker, I seem rather to be placed in the position of being between the devil and the deep sea. [Laughter.] The Committee of Elections have reported against my case, and I stand here alone. It is not the first time that I have stood alone. What I deem right I do, regardless of how many or how few are on my side.

I came here, sir, to-day to make a few remarks in advocacy of my claim as the Representative of the seventh congressional district of Virginia more from a sense of self-respect to myself and what is due to the representative branch of the Government than from any other motive. I suppose that nothing I will say will change the result to which this House will come. I do not choose, however, to let this report go before the House without in some way setting forth the reasons which induced me to contest this election.

Sir, I commenced this canvass presuming from the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, that it was intended that Virginia should have some Representatives in this Congress. Had I been aware that the honorable chairman of the committee was going to insist with such pertinacity that the principle adopted by him in the Thirty-Seventh Congress was to be the principle of this Congress, or at least of the committee, I might as well have saved myself the time, annoyance, and expense of the last canvass and attended to my own affairs. He seems to adhere to his principle of last Congress with as much pertinacity as ever. But the same reasons which would induce him and the House to throw out the seventh congressional district of Virginia would also induce them to throw out every district in Maryland, if the troops of the United States were not there, and every district of Pennsylvania for the same reason. If I had known that the chairman would have held with such pertinacity to the principle that no county should be considered unless with a full number of votes I might have saved myself and the House some trouble. But so it is. That portion of the seventh district within the Federal lines it seems is not to have a Representative, but is to have all the benefits of taxation without representation on this floor, while in the other branch of Congress the State can have two Senators. So far as our people are concerned, up to this time it would seem that it would have been better to have endured the evils of a military government altogether and to have let the reorganized State government of Virginia go by the board.

Let me state for the information of the House what the people of a few counties of Virginia are now enduring. They have to pay three years taxes to the State, all in a lump, and all of which go to sustain a State government, the same as if we were at peace and had entire control to the Tennessee border. Then they have to pay the internal revenue taxes to the General Government, and insurrectionary taxes. We also have living in our midst a Governor acknowledged by the Government, a loyal court, a loyal city government; and in addition to all this we have a military governor to watch over our interests, who without regard whatever to the civil authority has a provost court running, and which imposes just such fines as it chooses; so that between them all the Lord have mercy upon our poor people.

Shall that people then bear all these burdens of taxation and be denied representation upon this floor? I hope not.

Mr. Speaker, my memorial to Congress set forth the grounds as far as I understood them at the time upon which I based my claim to the seat: that Berkeley county on the day she voted for a member of Congress voted herself out of Virginia into West Virginia, and that her voting for a member at all was only an alternative vote, dependent upon that event and that alone. It is not for me to take issue with the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. Dawes] upon the question whether further legislation is necessary on the part of Congress or not, or whether there will ever be any further legislation. The fact stands out fully before the world that West Virginia does not think further legislation necessary, and has acted according to that opinion and admitted Berkeley county without conditions, and has not only done so but transferred her to the various judicial, senatorial, and congressional districts; and if during last October when the elections were held for Congress in West Virginia matters had not been so troublesome with the confederates she would have voted again for Congress.

But that is not all. The Tribune Almanac sets it down in the district of my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. Brown.]

The honorable chairman stated that I contested Berkeley county also on account of an alleged informality in conducting the election, and that the irregularity consisted in the fact that the commissioners of elections certified the result directly to the clerk of Alexandria county, instead of to the clerk of Berkeley county, as required by law. When I prepared my memorial to Congress before Congress met, I had not been to Berkeley county, and did not know of the state of things existing there. The law of Congress provides that members of Congress shall be elected according to the laws of the State respectively. And the difficulty is that the laws of Virginia have not been complied with. But I found I was compelled to proceed according to the act of Congress of 1851, regulating the mode in which contestants should proceed; and I found that that was nothing but a stumbling-block to me all the time.

When I called the attention of the committee to the fact that the county of Jefferson was returned as having cast thirty odd votes, the honorable chairman said he had no power to call for the returns. Being anxious to have the returns, I applied to the secretary of the Commonwealth of Virginia, at Alexandria, and asked him if he would allow me to take those returns and bring them before the committee. I got them and carried them before the committee, but they were not signed and not sworn to, and there was nothing to show that the voters were qualified at all. There was nothing but a certificate, signed by two or three individuals, stating that thirty votes were cast. I have here the certificate in blank.

I went before the committee, but I did not want a seat in Congress if I was not entitled to it. I am not in the habit of going where I am not wanted; neither am I in the habit of troubling people about my affairs generally. I believe this is the first time I have been in this Hall since the first or second day of the session, and I have not spoken to a solitary member of this House, outside of the Committee of Elections, upon the subject of my right to a seat here. I am not a man to buttonhole members of Congress. They have enough to attend to. Let the facts come out here, and then if gentlemen can vote for me let them do so; and if they cannot in their judgment do so, let them vote against me. That is the principle upon which I have always acted, and I want others to do the same thing.

As regards this matter of Berkeley county, the gentleman says I did not pretend there was anything irregular about it. Now I did not go to Berkeley county until a few days after Congress met. And why? The law regulating elections required me to give the party claiming the seat thirty days' notice of contest. This election was held on the 23d day of May, and I was obliged to give him notice within thirty days thereafter. I did give that notice. But in the mean time the Legislature of West Virginia, sitting at Wheeling, took action in favor of Berkeley county being admitted into that State at once, and I presumed, of course, she would be turned over to one of the congressional districts of West Virginia, and I did not suppose that any gentleman would ask that West Virginia should have more than three Representatives upon this floor. I did not suppose it would be contended that Berkeley county was not in West Virginia. Berkeley county voted herself out of Virginia on the very day of this election, and it only remained for the Legislature of West Virginia to accept Berkeley county, which they did on the 7th of August, as a part of that State. They transferred her from the seventh congressional district. I have here the act of the Legislature in regard to that county. It is as follows:

"Whereas by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, entitled 'An act giving the consent of the State of Virginia to the county of Berkeley being admitted into, and becoming part of, the State of West Virginia,' passed January 31, 1863, it was, among other things, enacted that polls should be opened and held on the 4th Thursday of May then next, at the several places for holding elections in the said county, for the purpose of taking the sense of the qualified voters thereof on the question of including the said county in the State of West Virginia; and if the Governor of the State of Virginia was of opinion that the said vote had been opened and held, and the result ascertained and certified pursuant to law, he should certify the result of the same under the seal of the said State of Virginia to the Governor of this State; and if a majority of the votes given at the said polls should be in favor of the said county becoming part of this State, the same should become part of this State when admitted, with the consent of the Legislature thereof. And whereas Francis H. Pierpont, Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, did, on the 23d day of July, in the present year, after reciting that polls were opened in the said county on Thursday, the 28th day of May, 1863, for the purpose indicated in the above-entitled act, certify under his hand and the less seal of the said Commonwealth that, from the returns on file in the executive department thereof, a very large majority of the votes cast at the said election were in favor of the said county of Berkeley becoming part of the State of West Virginia: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Legislature of West Virginia: 1. The county of Berkeley, lately constituting part of the Commonwealth of Virginia, is hereby admitted into and made part of this State, and shall constitute part of the tenth senatorial district, and of the tenth judicial circuit, and shall at the election herein provided for, and at every annual State election thereafter, choose two members of the House of Delegates."

Here is another act restricting the State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States, which, among other things, provides that—

"1. The number of members to which this State is entitled in the House of Representatives of the United States shall be apportioned among the several counties of the State arranged in three districts, numbered as follows; that is to say:—
"The counties of Taylor, Marion, Monongalia, Preston, Tucker, Barbour, Upshur Webster, Pocahontas, Randolph, Pendleton, Hardy, Hampshire, Berkeley, and Morgan, shall form the second congressional district."

Now, sir, as regards the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections, supposing that he relied here upon the provisions of the act of Congress regulating election cases, I expected to have had the benefit of all the provisions of that law, and supposed that I was entitled to it. But, sir, it seemed to be a law for my discomfort; it seemed to be a law that was nothing but trouble, so far as I was concerned; I got no advantage of it.

Sir, in order to show the Committee of Elections what are the requirements of the laws of Virginia in each respect, I furnished the committee with law-books on the subject, and I believe no law-books have been furnished to the committee but by me.

I expected that when I wanted to procure testimony, the gentleman whose seat I was contesting would have favored me with all facilities for arriving at a correct conclusion. I went up to the county of Berkeley, but I found that such was the feeling existing against me there among his partisans that I could procure no means of obtaining testimony; but finally I found a gentleman, who is a member of the court there, who agreed to sign subpoenas that were necessary for me to obtain testimony. There was, however, no printing office in the town of Martinsburg, and I was consequently obliged to return home in order to get the subpoenas printed. I inclosed them to a gentleman in Martinsburg, with the request that he would get them signed by the magistrate and served upon the parties. But forty-eight hours afterward I received a telegraph dispatch from Martinsburg informing me that such was the feeling of the people against me about the matter, that he could neither get a magistrate to sign the papers, nor, if he could, could he find anybody to serve the process. Well, I thought that was a pretty state of affairs under a free Government, or under a kind of free Government. The people there had got the idea that I was a "Copperhead," and I was told I had better not interfere in the matter. Having no recourse left, and the law authorizing any two magistrates in the district to act, I at once took two Alexandria magistrates and proceeded to Martinsburg, issued some few subpoenas, and succeeded in obtaining the testimony of three or four parties there, and among them was a gentleman of the name of Sommerville.

Now, I understand the chairman of the Committee of Elections to say that there was no clerk of the court in the county of Berkeley. Well, I suppose, sir, that, being president of the county court of Alexandria, I am certainly qualified to know whether a deputy clerk is a county clerk. Here is the testimony of R. A. Sommerville:

"First interrogatory. Please state your name and residence."

"Answer. R. A. Sommerville. Residence, Martinsburg, Berkeley county, Virginia."

"Second interrogatory. By whom and when were you appointed deputy clerk of Berkeley county court?"

"Answer. I am one of the deputy clerks of Berkeley county court, appointed by the court at the May term, 1861, and so recorded in the journals of the court."

"Fourth interrogatory. Were you deputy clerk of the county court sitting in the May term, 1863, beginning on the second Monday of the month? If so, did the court at that session appoint commissioners to hold an election for a member of Congress and State officers?"

"Answer. I was. I cannot remember whether the commissioners of elections were appointed at the April or May term, 1863, but at one or the other."

"Fifth interrogatory. Have you been continuously, uninterruptedly, and solely deputy clerk of the county court of Berkeley county, in the State of Virginia, from March 1, 1862, up to August, 1863?"

"Answer. I was."

"Sixth interrogatory. Has Martinsburg, the county seat and court-house of the county of Berkeley, in the State of Virginia, been your permanent and well-known place of residence during the whole time that you have been clerk of the county court of the said county?"

"Answer. It is."

"Seventh interrogatory. Was it notorious and well known throughout the said county of Berkeley that you held the office of deputy clerk of the said county during the period referred to?"

"Answer. I presume that the public performance of my official duties as deputy clerk of the court made my official character as such well known throughout the county."

The deputy clerk, who is actually authorized by the laws of Virginia to act as clerk, states that he was clerk at the time of the election, and that he was clerk a month before, when the commissioners of election were appointed. Sir, there are several gentlemen upon this floor who know whether a deputy clerk is a clerk.

Now, sir, the law of Virginia, as modified by the Legislature of Wheeling, provides that the commissioners of election of each county shall make a return to the clerk of the county, whereupon the facts of said return shall be certified to the clerk of the first-named county in the district, and thirty days thereafter the election shall be declared. Instead of fulfilling the requirements of the law these commissioners in Berkeley county, taking it for granted that there was no clerk there, sent their return down to the clerk of Alexandria county, who, instead of sending it back to be duly certified by the county clerk of Berkeley county, as the law requires, thirty days thereafter declared the election. I am sorry to say that I have had to make this fight against several little county clerks, persons who are strangers to me to a great extent. I have had the clerks of the courts against me. I am sorry for it, but I have no favors to ask.

Now, sir, let me say further, that supposing I had evidence enough to obtain the seat if Virginia was entitled to Representatives, I did not examine into the character of the 700 votes cast for Mr. Kitchen in Berkeley county. How many illegal votes were polled in that county I do not know; but that there were many I do not doubt. I made no examination to any extent.

Mr. Speaker, just before this House met I saw an article in the New York Times, from a correspondent in this city, that satisfied me that I was to have difficulty. What reason the writer had for making this statement about me God only knows. The Lord have mercy upon him! I have no complaint to make about him. He has a right to make his statements, but when he does he should make true statements. I will read the correspondence:

"Of Virginia—L. H. Chandler, like Anderson of Kentucky, is for the Administration 'up to the hump.' He is a sound northern man, though the 'rib taken from his side' by marriage is of Maryland. Joseph Segar is understood to have had his support of the Administration strained to that point of tension where patriotism almost breaks; but he has been heard to say that he would vote for Caisey for Clerk. I regard him as sure to vote for the nominees of the Administration caucus. B. M. Kitchen stands squarely for emancipation. That's enough. He will go into caucus, too. So well is this known that the conspiracy against the country which seeks to replace Etheridge as Clerk, and to make an anti-war Democrat Speaker, has set up a man named McKenzie to contest Kitchen's seat, in order to exclude his vote from the organization of the House."

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman whether he thinks it proper to allude to the New York Times in its present impaled position. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope the House will allow me to get through with my remarks.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am going to vote for the gentleman. But I understood him to be alluding to the New York Times, and I wanted to ask whether he thought it exactly right to say anything about it [holding up an illustrated paper] in its present impaled condition. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. This is trifling with a serious subject. [Laughter.] I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, when I was a boy I had a cousin who lived in North Carolina. He was a preacher. It was before the days of railroads. He used to start from below Newbern and come up to Alexandria to preach the gospel. He was a Scotchman, named Colin Melvor, and he never was in a hurry. He was clerk of the synod of North Carolina. The President of the United States was nothing to the clerk of the synod of North Carolina. On his way up to Raleigh, where the synod was in session, he got bothered with the cross-roads and lost his way. He got into the woods and hallooed, "Lost! lost! lost!" An old negro coming along heard him, ran to his master, and cried out, "Massa, there's a man out in the woods who says he is lost." I feel precisely in that position. I feel that I am lost here.

Mr. Speaker, I would not have alluded to the New York Times in this connection if I did not believe that the person who made that attack upon me was simply a partisan of somebody else. A quiet, unobtrusive citizen, I was not much of a politician. He did not know me, but was willing perhaps to injure without knowing me. But let that pass.

Mr. Speaker, I am, and have been all the time, a friend of the Government. I did all I could to prevent this unfortunate rebellion against a Government that had always been kind and paternal, particularly so to the people of the South, and under whose broad banner the South had so greatly prospered, until in an evil hour the fire-eating politicians brought on this war by firing on the flag at Sumter, and thus inaugurated civil war and its fearful consequences. Born within seven miles of this Capitol, I have not been an uninterested spectator of what has been going on here for over twenty-five years past. I have watched the progress of affairs closely. I well recollect when the collector of the port of Alexandria wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, and asked why he could not issue American protections to colored seamen, when these very protections were issued from Norfolk previous to 1800. No answer came, nor has any come yet. I well recollect that from October to April of each year, before the days of railroads, one or two vessels a month sailed from Alexandria for New Orleans with cargoes of negroes for that market; and I remember the scenes I have witnessed caused by this disgusting traffic, and the effect it had upon the public sensibility. I well recollect the poor colored seamen incarcerated in jail in Alexandria because they had no free papers, and finally sold out for jail fees, and perhaps many a one gone South into hopeless slavery. For many a one, Mr. Speaker, have I paid his jail fees and let him depart. I well recollect when Maryland passed an act providing that when free negroes were convicted of a petty offense they should, instead of being sent to the jail or penitentiary, be sold for one, two, three, or five years, and to be kept in the State; and yet there was an organized band of men in Baltimore ready at the jail door to buy them and to give the necessary bond, and then spirit them out of the State to the South, to be sold, of course, for life.

In passing through Alexandria that one morning, on going to my counting-room, I learned that some negroes had been brought through from Baltimore and confined in "Bruin's jail," now called the "slave-pen," and in putting them on the cars of the Orange road for Lynchburg, one or two of the negroes who were handcuffed had stated that they were free men and had been sold for a term of years in Maryland, but that the traders had bought them and were now carrying them South to be sold as slaves. Notwithstanding there were respectable citizens standing by, that ought to have insisted upon an investigation, for fear of doing right or of being called abolitionists they permitted them to be forced into the cars and to be whipped also. Immediately I prepared a message to the mayor of Memphis and got the mayor of the city to telegraph it at once to stop these negroes until an examination could be had. I at once wrote to Governor Hicks, of Maryland, the state of the case and the alarming increase of this traffic, and he at once took action, sent to Tennessee and had some of the negroes returned, and put a stop to some extent to these outrages.

For the colored people, Mr. Speaker, I have always had great regard. I have been their friend for many, many years. I feel for them now. In this present gigantic struggle they are bound to suffer. Whether it is wise or judicious or prudent to set them all free at once is hard to say. But I will say this: I see no remedy now, except that which has been adopted by the President to end the rebellion. The course of the slave aristocracy of the South has been such, in attempting to pull down the great temple of liberty, and to build up a "great slave monarchy," that I do not see any chance for freedom for the poor men of the South, or those who hold moderate views among the great middle class, except by getting rid of the institution altogether. There are many of the slaveholders, however, who hold the same views that I do on this subject. For the men of moderate views, who have been waiting and hoping and praying for some means of deliverance from this tyranny of slavery, who are kind to the colored people, I trust there will be more kindness and charity than seems now to prevail. Slavery is not all the evil in the world; nor are all the evils confined to the South. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have done with this subject, and all the favor I ask of the House is that the ayes and noes may be taken on the report in my case. With the result I shall be content.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the contestant complains that he has not been treated exactly fair by the Committee of Elections, and I wish simply to correct that statement. The gentleman is laboring under a mistake. He said he intended to conform himself to the law of 1861, and to hold everybody else up to it. If he had himself been held strictly up to it, he would have had no place to come here and contest the seat at all. By the law of 1861 a contestant must serve his notice on the contestee within thirty days of the time that the sitting member is declared to be elected by the officer authorized so to declare. Now, Mr. Kitchen was declared by the proper officer duly elected on the 27th day of June. Notice of contest should have been served on him by the 27th of July. The evidence of the service of the notice is as follows:

Testimony of J. F. Staub.

"First interrogatory. Please state your name and residence."

"Answer. J. F. Staub; residence Martinsburg, Berkeley county, West Virginia."

"Second interrogatory. Please state whether you presented to Joseph Hoffman, Esq., a justice of the peace for Berkeley county, certain subpoenas, to be served on various citizens of Berkeley county, at the instance and request of Lewis McKenzie, of Alexandria, Virginia, as witnesses in the matter of a contest for a seat as Representative in the Congress of the United States for the seventh congressional district of Virginia, between him, the said McKenzie, and B. M. Kitchen, Esq.; and whether or not the said J. Hoffman refused to sign the same, so that they might be served; and if so, the reason of his declining."

"Answer. I received from Lewis McKenzie, through the mail for Martinsburg, two packages containing subpoenas, on Friday, the 27th November, which I presented to Mr. Hoffman on the morning of the 28th November, to sign, which he positively refused to do, on the grounds that he did not wish to compromise himself in the matter; that he did not wish to get his friends in Berkeley county down on him for it."

"Sixth interrogatory. When did you serve the notice sent you by Lewis McKenzie, dated 23d July, 1863, declaring said McKenzie's intention of contesting the right of B. M. Kitchen to a seat as a Representative of the seventh congressional district of Virginia in the Congress of the United States?"

"Answer. Ten days or two weeks afterwards; I received this the first mail that came through."

He served the notice ten days or two weeks after he received it, which must have been in August. The gentleman will therefore do the committee the justice to say that the committee did not impose upon him any arbitrary or unreasonable rule; but, on the other hand, although his own evidence showed that the notice of contest was not served within the thirty days fixed by the statute, the committee permitted him to submit his case.

Mr. McKENZIE. That matter came up before the committee. I supposed that the chairman wanted to call my attention to the fact that it was settled by the committee, and that I had only to comply with the law. The committee agreed, I think, that I had done everything I could to have notice of contest served. I had it published in the Alexandria papers. There was no chance for me I knew if I did not show that I had acted under the law. I would have been thrust out of the committee-room. The committee agreed that I had done everything to comply with the law and to serve the notice. I supposed, therefore, when I had complied with the law that I was entitled to the advantage from it.

I thank the House for its attention. I have nothing further to say.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

B. M. KITCHEN.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the second resolution.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That B. M. Kitchen is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the seventh congressional district in Virginia.

Mr. SMITH. I move to strike that resolution out, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

Resolved, That B. M. Kitchen is entitled to a seat in the Thirty-Eighth Congress as a Representative from the seventh congressional district of Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, it appeared to the Committee of Elections, and has just been decided by the House, that Mr. McKenzie was not entitled to a seat upon this floor for the reason that Mr. Kitchen had more votes than he had; still the committee came to the conclusion that Mr. Kitchen was not entitled to a seat in this House, for the reasons that I will proceed to mention.

The State was divided into districts for the election of Representatives in Congress, in conformity to the act of Congress upon that subject, by the Legislature of Virginia, on the 30th day of January, 1863, and by that act this district was composed of the counties of Alexandria, Berkeley, Frederick, Shenandoah, Jefferson, Clark, Warren, Loudoun, Fauquier, Fairfax, and Prince William. It is the district on the other side of the river, and the House cannot be ignorant of the condition of things there. The events that have transpired in that district have been of such note that they have attracted the attention of the whole country. There is, then, no dispute in reference to the condition of affairs in that district.

The question, then, is whether any district situated as this is, occupied as it has been and is now by the army of the Union and the army of the rebellion, swaying backward and forward as they have been, as was said in the other House, like a pendulum, from one end of the district to the other, the theater of conflicts and the battleground of this rebellion, soaked with the blood, in almost every part, of Union soldiers and rebel soldiers, with no portion so quiet and so free from rebels as not to rely upon the military force for its security and defense—the question is whether there can be any pretense in any mind that in such a district anybody could exercise the right of an elector, or that there could be such an election as we should consider.

In this district, and on the day the election was said to be held, four counties voted in form. In one other county two precincts voted, and in another only one precinct. In five of the counties there was no pretense of an election. In the counties where there was a partial election, the precincts not opened were closed by the armed occupation of the enemy. If we ascertain the relative strength of that portion of the district where the forms of an election were gone through with, and that where it was impossible to hold an election, we will find that there was a larger part of the territory of the district at that time, and is now, in the armed occupation of the rebels. Those counties held by the rebels and portions of others where there was a partial election constitute the largest portion of the district. If you divide the district by aggregate population, taking the counties where an election was held and where it was not held, the latter preponderate. In point of fact, there were several places where the people were restrained from voting, not by the actual presence of the enemy on the day of election, but from fear of persecution and the destruction of their property.

Dividing this district by the aggregate population, and counting all the population in those counties where an election was held on the one side, and in those counties which were in the armed occupation of the enemy, you find that while 70,341, according to the census of 1860, were in counties where elections were held, there were 77,292 in counties actually held by the armed forces of the rebels. If you ascertain a division of the entire free population, leaving out the slaves, you find that while there were 55,530 in that portion of the district where an election was held, there were 55,561 in the portion where no election was held. If you take the free white males only, you find that there were in the portion where an election was held 25,568, and in that where there was no election 26,161. This shows, sir, if you adopt this as a rule, that the district was very nearly equally divided between the enemy and the Republic, between those who were fighting for the destruction of the Government and those who were defending it; and whether you take it by territory, by aggregate population, by free white population, or by free white male population, the preponderance in each of these divisions is slightly upon the side of the enemy.

There was, however, in that part of the district held by our troops—and it is fair that it should be taken into consideration—such a constraint, as I have already stated, upon many of the voters that personal safety required of them that they should abstain from the exercise of the elective franchise. Raids were constantly being made, even up to Fairfax Court-House and within a few miles of Alexandria; and while the committee were hearing this case, a raid was made into the county of Berkeley, and the claimant, Mr. Kitchen himself, had his house surrounded, escaping in the darkness, and was driven out from his county, finding peace and safety only in this District. The question, therefore, is fairly presented to the House to decide whether they can count as an election forms gone through with in the manner I have indicated in this district.

The committee have all along shown, I think, and I believe they feel, a desire to give representation to each one of these districts at the earliest possible moment that they can say there has been a free and fair election in the district. I do not assume to speak for any other member of the committee than myself. I have, however, seen no indication on the part of any member of the committee that does not justify me in this remark.

But, sir, it is an important question for the House to say whether they can treat as an election in this whole district, as the choice of the Union voters in all parts of this district, that which transpired, to begin with, in less than one half of the district, and under such circumstances as I have related, and when no man can say that fairly and freely, and without fear or restraint, the people even in that part of the district have gone to the polls and expressed their choice. Sir, how can we say it when a majority of the voters of the district are on the other side of our lines, and are under the armed occupation of the enemy?

Suppose Mr. Kitchen had received all the votes on this side, how can we say that those other voters who are under duress, fettered, would, if they had been permitted to vote, have acquiesced in the selection of Mr. Kitchen as their Representative? Are we to fasten upon them a Representative whom we cannot say fairly and honestly is the choice of those voters? I do not believe that there is any member of this House who does not desire that every district in this great country, from one end of it to the other, shall be represented upon this floor by the free choice of all its voters. But anxious as we may all be to welcome a Representative here from this district of Virginia, and from all other districts, to fill these vacant chairs, how can we say that this man is the choice of the people whom he claims to represent?

Just a few words more, Mr. Speaker. This gentleman received 730 of the whole 962 votes which he received in the district in the county of Berkeley. He had but 232 votes out of that county. Now, sir, both the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia and the people of the county of Berkeley themselves, so far as it can be done, have decided that that county is and shall be in another State. As I said a little while ago, they have not carried out the legal effect of that attempt; they have not succeeded in transferring the county to West Virginia, but they have done all that it was in their power to do to attain that object. They have signified that they do not desire to be a part of that district. And outside of Berkeley county this gentleman has no support at all. Although that fact cannot affect the legal question, yet it may aid us in coming to a conclusion. Three or four men whose names figure here would be the choice, before Mr. Kitchen, of the people of the district, outside of Berkeley county. I only bring that matter before the House to aid it in throwing some little light on the question of who would be the choice of the voters on the other side of the line.

But these considerations do not govern us here. We are to say whether, from all the votes legally cast here, it is evident to the House that we have before us a man who is the choice of the legal voters of the district. Although anxious to come to a different result, I for one have been unable to come to the conclusion that this man is entitled to a seat in the House. In that conclusion I believe all the members of the committee concur, with the exception of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] who desires to be heard.

Mr. SMITH addressed the House in support of the claimant.

Before he had concluded,

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky to give way for a moment to let the committee of conference on the lieutenant general bill make their report. It is a matter in which I know my friend feels a great deal of interest.

Mr. SMITH. What effect will it have upon the question now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The consideration of the subject now before the House will be resumed as soon as the report of the committee of conference shall have been disposed of. It will not interfere with the time of the gentleman from Kentucky. He will be entitled to his full hour.

Mr. SMITH. Will it take the gentleman from Illinois an hour to make his report?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no; I do not propose to make a speech.

Mr. SMITH. I yield upon condition that nothing but the report shall be made, without any speech or comment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that a conference committee can interrupt a gentleman for the purpose of making their report. It is regarded by the rules as a report of the highest privilege, so much so that it can interrupt even a call of the House, and in the closing hours of a session it is necessary that it should have that privilege. Like a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table after the expiration of the morning hour, it can take a gentleman off the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose it could not take the gentleman off the floor?

The SPEAKER. He will be on the floor as soon as the report is disposed of.

GRADE OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now submit the report of the committee of conference, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference appointed to take into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, having met, after full and free conference do recommend to the respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives do recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives do recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate do recede from its third amendment, and do agree to the bill of the House of Representatives, with the following amendments: 1. After the word "ability," in the eleventh line of the first section of said bill, strike out the word "and." 2. Strike out the word "shall" in the thirteenth line of said section, and insert the word "may" in lieu thereof. 3. After the word "direction," in the thirteenth line of said section, insert the words "and during the pleasure." 4. Strike out all of said section after the word "States" in the fifteenth line thereof. And that the House of Representatives do agree to the said several amendments.

HENRY WILSON,

H. S. LANE,

REVERDY JOHNSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURN,

A. McALISTER,

R. E. FENTON,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this is the unanimous report of the committee of conference.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman answer me one question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will.

Mr. COX. Does the report of the committee of conference leave out the name of General Grant?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It does.

Mr. COX. Then I move to lay it upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. Well, I will make that motion when it is in order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to state to the House the precise shape in which the bill now stands in connection with the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to lay the report upon the table, which would kill the bill. [Several MEMBERS. "Let the bill be read."] Well, I will send it to the Clerk's desk and let it be read first as it stood originally.

The Clerk read the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Clerk will now report the bill as it will stand if the report of the committee of conference shall be agreed to.

The bill, as agreed to by the conference committee, was read. It revives the grade of lieutenant general in the Army of the United States, and authorizes the President, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a lieutenant general, to be selected from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability, who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized, under the direction and during the pleasure of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

The second section enacts that the lieutenant general appointed, as provided, shall be entitled to the pay, allowances, and staff specified in the fifth section of the act of May 28, 1798, and to all the allowances described in the sixth section of the act approved August 23, 1842, giving additional rations to certain officers, provided that nothing in this bill shall be construed to affect in any way the rank, pay, or allowances of Winfield Scott, lieutenant general by brevet, now on the retired list of the Army.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk has read the original bill, and the bill as it will be provided the report of the committee of conference be agreed to. The first amendment of the Senate was striking out the words "commander of the armies," and inserting the words "lieutenant general." The second amendment was striking out the words "during war." The third amendment was merely verbal, striking out the word "and" in the phrase "and who, being commissioned as lieutenant general," &c. The next amendment was striking out the words "and that we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General Ulysses S. Grant, of Illinois, to the position of lieutenant general."

The Senate struck out all of that, and what I have stated in regard to the command of the Army "during war." The committee of conference agreed to concur in the amendments striking out the words "commander of the armies" and inserting "lieutenant general," and also striking out the words "during war." But the committee would not agree to the other amendment of the Senate without an amendment. Finally it was agreed to in this shape: that a lieutenant general shall be appointed from among the officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability, who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized, under the direction and during the pleasure of the President, to command the armies of the United States. So that portion of the bill is substantially as it was when it went from the House. The Senate receded to that extent, so that the House gets substantially what it provided for in the original bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the bill, in point of fact, do anything more than create a lieutenant general, with salary, rations, &c., at $13,000 a year?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It creates a lieutenant general, who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized by the President of the United States to command the armies of the United States.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to ask my colleague whether this bill confers any additional power on the lieutenant general which General Halleck, or General Grant, or any other general does not possess to-day, so far as the command of the Army is concerned?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This bill revives the grade of lieutenant general, and puts General Grant at the head of the armies of the United States, provided he shall be appointed.

Mr. COX. I understood that that was struck out.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir; the gentleman has misunderstood.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Illinois say that this bill provides for the appointment of General Grant?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir; I did not say so.

Mr. COX. It was so understood here.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The bill originally had a recommendation that General Grant should be appointed.

Mr. COX. And the gentleman agreed to strike that out, I believe.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman will permit me to explain the bill. The Senate has stricken out that portion of the House bill which contained this recommendation, on the ground that it was intrenching on their privileges—the right to confirm or reject whoever should be appointed. The committee of conference on the part of the House have unanimously agreed to the report for the reason that everything has been obtained which the original bill provided for. While they insisted that this should remain as an expression of the opinion of the House, they were willing that it should be taken out on the information that if the bill should pass, General Grant would receive the appointment of lieutenant general without delay.

Mr. COX. I call the gentleman to order. It is not in order to state what occurred in committee; nor is it in order to bring the authority of the President here to control our action. I understand the gentleman to say that the committee of conference are informed by the President that he would appoint such a man.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I did not make any such statement.

The SPEAKER. The deliberations of the committee cannot be stated in the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The simple question is whether the report of the committee of conference shall be agreed to by the House, and General Grant shall be made the commander of the Army to close the rebellion.

Mr. COX. The gentleman himself stated that the bill does not appoint General Grant. The gentleman is not authorized to say that the President will appoint General Grant. I will not trust the President's word on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that any gentleman should object to this in the light of recent intelligence. We hear to-day that Grant has driven Longstreet out of Tennessee. Another portion of his army he has advanced upon Dalton and taken it. Sherman has moved into Alabama and Mississippi. They are all parts of the grand programme of General Grant. Yet after this report has been agreed to unanimously by the members of the committee of the House and Senate, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] moves that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will allow me a word?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. COX. The gentleman himself has deserted General Grant, and come here with his fusian—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. The gentleman from Illinois refuses to yield to him.

Mr. COX. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I decline to yield. I have yielded to the gentleman several times already. I have explained the provisions of the bill as it will stand if this report be adopted; and now, in compliance with my promise to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Smith] who was kind enough to yield to let this report come in, I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I move that the report be laid upon the table.

A MEMBER. Let us try and refuse to sustain the previous question first.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my motion.

On sustaining the call for the previous question, there were, on a division—ayes 52, noes 49.

Mr. COX demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and Cox, were appointed.

The previous question was seconded; the tellers having reported—ayes 54, noes 48.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. COX moved that the report of the committee of conference be laid upon the table.

The motion was disagreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 36, noes 59.

The question recurred on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays on striking out General Grant's name.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We know where the gentleman stands in reference to General Grant.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I ask for a division of the question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. It is not divisible. The vote must be taken on the report as a whole.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 73, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Beaman, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Dawes, Downing, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Gorch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pike, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scherck, Seefeld, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, William G. Brown, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Dawson, Dennison, Donnelly, Edson, Eldridge, Fluck, Garfield, Grider, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Holtman, John H. Hubbard, Kalbfleisch, King, Luzzar, Mallory, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Ross, Scott, Shannon, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Wadsworth, Ward, Chilton A. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—47.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. STEELE, of New York, stated that his colleagues Messrs. CHANLER and POMEROY had paired off.

Mr. HOLMAN announced that his colleagues Mr. CRAVENS and Mr. ORTH had been compelled to visit their homes in Indiana, and were paired on all questions upon which they might differ in opinion.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Smith] is now entitled to the floor upon the Virginia contested-election case, and has forty minutes of his hour still remaining.

Mr. STILES. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. STILES. I move an adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the motion to adjourn, the Chair will state that on to-morrow, in consequence of the unanimous order of the House, he will not entertain any motions of any character except to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, and when the committee rises that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will a motion for a call of the House be in order?

THE SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall go on and finish up the Virginia election case this afternoon. Unless the gentleman from Kentucky is exhausted or desires an adjournment, I shall demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. He would prefer to conclude his remarks on Monday.

Mr. MALLORY. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that my colleague does desire an adjournment.

Mr. DAWES. Then I have nothing further to say.

The question was taken on Mr. STILES's motion, and it was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 27, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) the business in order being the consideration of the President's annual message, upon which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Chairman, when the House was last in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally, I obtained the floor for the benefit of my colleague from the Hartford district, [Mr. DEMING,] who was then temporarily absent from the committee, but who desired at an early day to submit his views upon the President's message, and upon the general policy, as I understood, of the restoration of the insurgent States. As my colleague is not at this moment prepared to go on, and as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] is, I resign the floor unconditionally in favor of the gentleman from Kentucky.

RESTORATION OF THE UNION.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Chairman, at an early day of the present session I submitted to the House this resolution:

"Resolved, That the Union has not been dissolved; and that whenever the rebellion, in any one of the seceded States, shall be put down and subdued, either by force of the Federal arms or by the voluntary submission of the people of such State to the authority of the Constitution, then such State will thereby be restored to all its rights and privileges as a State of the Union under the constitution of such State and the Constitution of the United States, including the right to regulate, order, and control its own domestic institutions according to the constitution and laws of such State, free from all congressional or executive control or dictation."

I was anxious a vote should be taken upon this resolution at the time it was presented; but the ruling majority in this House would not allow it. They seemed unwilling to take ground before the country on this important question. They would neither vote for the resolution nor take the responsibility of voting against it; and we have not been able to bring the House to a vote upon it up to the present time.

This resolution is in direct antagonism to the President's plan of "reconstruction" announced in his message and proclamation of the 8th of December, 1863. And whether the resolution takes the true ground in regard to the condition of the southern States after the rebellion shall have been subdued, depends entirely upon the correctness of its first proposition, which declares "the Union has not been dissolved." The whole controversy turns on this question. I hold that all the ordinances of secession in the southern States were absolutely null and void, and being so, did not, could not work any change in the constitutional relations of those States. The President, in his inaugural address, uses this language:

"I hold that, in contemplation of universal law and of the Constitution, the Union of these States is perpetual."
* * * * * "Continue to execute all the express provisions of our national Constitution, and the Union will endure forever; it being impossible to destroy it except by some action not provided for in the instrument itself."

* * * * * "But if destruction of the Union by one, or by a part only, of the States, be lawfully possible, the Union is less perfect than before the Constitution, having lost the vital element of perpetuity. It follows, from these views, that no State upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void; and that acts of violence, within any State or States, against the authority of the United States, are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances. I therefore consider that, in view of the Constitution and the laws, the Union is unbroken."

This view of the question taken by the President seems to me entirely sound. But whether his practice now is not at open war with his own theory remains to be considered. It is certain that his view of the subject was everywhere indorsed by the Republican party. It was also indorsed everywhere by Democrats and conservatives, who still stand by and maintain it as the true ground. It follows, therefore, if the Union has been dissolved, it must have been effected, not by secession, but by a successful revolution in the South. But whoever contends for this acknowledges the independence of the South, and, to be consistent, should abandon the war. But we know the revolution is not yet a success.

The Union, then, "has not been dissolved," and these southern States, in view of constitutional law, are as clearly members of the Union to-day as at any former period. Sir, it is because these States are in the Union that their citizens owe allegiance to the Federal Government, and submission and obedience to its Constitution and laws. Citizens of these States who resist the authority of the Constitution and laws are rebels, because the States themselves are in the Union. And it is because these States are in the Union that war can be constitutionally and justifiably prosecuted against the insurgents, to compel their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the Union. Mr. Chairman, if a State is in the Union, it follows as a necessary consequence that whenever the rebellion in such State is subdued, and the insurgents brought back to their allegiance, either by force of the Federal arms or by their own voluntary submission to the authority of the Constitution, then the State is at once restored to all its rights and privileges as a State of the Union—may represent itself in Congress, and do all other acts which any sister State may lawfully do under the Constitution of the United States. This is a clear constitutional right which can be wrested from the State only by the hand of violence and usurpation. There can be no such thing as reconstruction, or the rebuilding of a Union which was never broken or dissolved.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution knows no difference between States in the Union. It guarantees to every State in this Union a republican form of government. The same rights and powers "are reserved to the States respectively." The Constitution alike protects and guards from Federal encroachment the local institutions, laws, and constitutions of every State in the Union. It imposes the same restraints on executive power in every State. The President can no more lay his hand on the Constitution, laws, and local institutions of Louisiana than on those of Massachusetts. To do either would be a palpable violation of the Constitution and a daring act of usurpation. And, sir, is there a man here from the North who will consent to the exercise over his own State of the power claimed by the President, and then hold up his head and claim to be a free citizen of a free State?

But yet, sir, though the President and his party, as we have seen, were openly pledged before the whole country to the doctrine that "the Union was not dissolved, but was perpetual," we now find him, in his late message and proclamation, at open war with his own published theory. Now we hear only of State governments "subverted" or destroyed, of the "re-establishment" of State governments, and of "framing new State governments" in the South. What room is there "to frame and set up new State governments" if the old ones are still standing? Sir, it is manifest that the President's plan of "reconstruction" involves and goes beyond the odious doctrine of State suicide. Assuming that the State governments are subverted and destroyed, and the Union dissolved, he proceeds with his plan for "the reconstruction of the Union" by framing and setting up new State governments "in the mode prescribed" by himself. That is, by his imperial edict, he strikes down States and State governments, abrogates their constitutions and laws, makes no distinction between the loyal and disloyal, treats all as rebels, and disfranchises and strips the whole southern population of every civil and political right.

But then, as a mere act of grace and mercy, his Excellency proclaims that if one tenth of the voters in any one of the disfranchised States shall take an oath to "faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the union of the States thereunder," and also swear that they "will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President, made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves," "and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate," then, that one tenth of the voters of the State shall be restored, not to the right of free suffrage, but to the glorious privilege of voting as he directs, and by that means "frame and set up a new State government," not one of their own choice, but a State government framed and fashioned in all things according to the pattern mapped out by the master-builder with a pencil dipped in blood.

Sir, the loyal man of the South, who has struggled hard against the rebellion, who has ever been true to his allegiance, and done nothing to forfeit any of his rights, is required to confess himself a rebel, swear to give up all claim to his slaves, and swear to support all proclamations issued, now or hereafter; in other words, he is to swear allegiance to the President. And then he is to receive amnesty or pardon for sins he never committed, and as a reward to his loyalty have conferred upon him the exalted privilege of voting as the President directs.

But, sir, there is still another difficulty in the "prescribed oath." The man who supports the Constitution of the United States must maintain the old Union formed by that Constitution; and must, of course, support and maintain the old States which compose that Union. But the man who supports the proclamation must sanction the overthrow of the State constitutions and laws of the southern States, and aid in framing and setting up new State governments—must aid in breaking up the old Union, and in building on its ruins a new and different Union, wholly unknown to the Constitution. In this, and in all other important particulars, the proclamation and the Constitution stand directly opposed to each other. So that a man can support the one only by disregarding and opposing the other. But he must swear to support both. Therefore the man who takes the "prescribed oath" is necessarily required to commit perjury, in the very act of taking it. This would have been considered a serious matter, in times past, when "oaths registered in Heaven" were revered and observed on earth—but now, doubtless many will regard the southern man who sticks about the oath he takes as not yet fit for adoption into the abolition family.

Here, then, we have the President's plan of setting up new State governments. No man is allowed a voice, whatever else he may swear, except he also swears to support the President's policy. Loyalty with an oath to support the Constitution avails nothing. The President will test the materials "so as to build only from the sound," and in his judgment it is safe to accept as sound whoever will swear to support his proclamations, "excluding all others."

Sir, let us pause for a moment and examine this test. Ten citizens in the State of Tennessee present themselves. Nine of these men are venerable for their age. They are the sons of patriots who fought the battles of the Revolution. In early childhood they imbibed and have cherished through life the deepest devotion to that old flag under which Washington and their fathers fought. They have opposed and struggled hard against the present rebellion. They fought under our flag in the war of 1812, and, at a later period, in Mexico, and bear upon their venerable persons numerous scars received in those wars; and now at the sight of that old flag they weep tears of joy. But they must be tested. They are more than willing to swear to support the Constitution and the old Union; but they cannot do violence to their conscience by swearing to support the proclamations. That is the test, and they are rejected as unsound.

The tenth man is then examined; and though not advanced in years, he was among the first to volunteer under the flag of Jeff. Davis; he is now fresh from the confederate camps, and the loyal blood he has shed is still upon his garments; he does not hesitate at an oath, but swears to support all proclamations that have been or ever may be issued, and is therefore "accepted as sound;" and immediately the nine war-worn and scarred veterans, with their families and property, are all transferred to him to be ruled and governed by his sovereign will. They are disfranchised, silenced, and dare not utter a complaint, for the military power is at hand to arrest and imprison. Sir, this is, indeed, "putting down the President's foot;" but it is the iron tread of despotism, crushing out the last vestige of constitutional liberty where it moves, and leaving nothing but desolation in its path.

Mr. Chairman, the daring boldness with which the President announces his despotic scheme of government should arouse and alarm every friend of his country. He points out the exact character of the State governments to be set up, points out the exact number of voters, and fixes and settles the exact qualifications of these voters, one of which is, as we have seen, that they shall commit perjury in advance by swearing to support both the Constitution and the proclamations. But even then, after this high proof of loyalty to the President, he will not trust them, for he allows them to set up a State government only "in the mode prescribed by himself." Sir, it is all his work, and the voters are his menials to perform it for him. But when such a government is set up by one tenth of the voters, how shall it be maintained and enforced by so small a number over all the rest? The President has thought of and provided for this, for he says in his message and proclamation, when "a State government shall be, in the mode prescribed, set up, such government shall be recognized and guaranteed by the United States," and under it the State shall be protected against invasion and domestic violence. Yes, sir, military power is to be invoked. The free white laborers from the loyal States are to be conscripted, taken from their homes to the South, and there kept year after year to enforce by sword and bayonet the despotic rule of one tenth over all the rest, reducing them to the lowest condition of serfs and vassals, stripped of all the rights of self-government, and crushed to the earth. And this, sir, is the President's idea of "the home of freedom disenthralled, regenerated, enlarged, and perpetuated." But, sir, it is my idea of an odious abolition oligarchy of the most cruel and savage character. And can it be "perpetuated?" Yes, when the spirit of liberty is gone, when, by long years of oppression and cruelty, these people have lost all tradition of their descent from revolutionary sires, then it may be perpetuated. Sir, the very idea that a single man in this country should attempt this monstrous scheme of despotism is enough to fire with indignation the breast of every man in whose veins there is one drop of revolutionary blood.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me none but the willfully blind can fail to see that this scheme, in all its features, is in direct opposition to the Constitution. Even the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] not long since, in a speech in this House, declared that the President's plan of reconstruction "was wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution." That is true, and he might have added with equal truth that it is an open and flagrant violation of the Constitution. Indeed that necessarily follows from what he did say; for it is clear that the President has no power outside of and unknown to the Constitution, but derives all his power from it, and the exercise of power not granted by the Constitution is forbidden and prohibited by it. But yet the President says in his message, "On examination of this proclamation it will appear, as is believed, that nothing is attempted beyond what is amply justified by the Constitution." And how does he attempt to sustain that bold assumption? By telling us the Constitution authorizes him "to grant pardon at his own absolute discretion, and this includes the power to grant on terms." Yes, unless the terms violate the Constitution, as they plainly do in this case. For what power has the President to confer upon a pardoned rebel the important right of voting? Can he make laws to control the rights of suffrage? It is true the President and the rebel may enter into a contract, provided it does not infringe the rights of others.

But what is the contract in this case? Plainly this: the rebel, on his part, agrees to swear allegiance to the President, support all his proclamations, and stand by him in all the elections. In consideration of which, the President, on his part, agrees to pardon the rebel and clothe him with the power of ten men at the polls and in the rule and government of the country, for he gives the rebel a voice at the polls and disfranchises and silences the voices of nine other men. And the President has the best of the bargain. He will get one vote from the rebel certain, and close the mouths of nine other men who would be just as certain to vote against him. He will therefore lose nothing in the coming election. Sir, it is strange the President should make even the remotest allusion to the Constitution in connection with this monstrous scheme of despotism.

Mr. Chairman, it is clear that the device resorted to heretofore to conceal from the public mind the enormity of other usurpations, and called "the President's war power," can give no support to this scheme. For, sir, the very moment the rebellion in any one of these States is put down and ended, that moment the President's war power, whatever it may be, is also at an end. The war must cease with the rebellion, its cause and only justification. And if the President, for abolition purposes, protracts the war after the rebellion ceases, he then wars on a people yielding obedience to the Constitution, changes places with the rebels, and becomes a revolutionist and rebel himself.

Mr. Chairman, the emancipation proclamation of January 1, 1863, was professedly issued by Mr. Lincoln on his supposed war power alone, and, as Commander-in-Chief, "upon military necessity." But when the war is over, what then? If Mr. Lincoln as Commander-in-Chief could, with the sword, strike down State governments and destroy the Union, under what power can Mr. Lincoln as President set up new State governments and build up a new Union? The war power was a discovery. It had never been supposed the President as Commander-in-Chief had any greater power than any other commander-in-chief would have. But the argument was that the power of Mr. Lincoln as Commander-in-Chief was greatly enlarged by virtue of his union with Mr. Lincoln as President, so that he could overthrow State institutions and governments, and do many acts which no mere commander-in-chief could do. But to serve the present purpose the argument must be extended. It must now be urged that the civil power of Mr. Lincoln as President has been greatly enlarged by virtue of his union with Mr. Lincoln as Commander-in-Chief, so that he can now build up new State governments and a new Union on the ruins of the old one, and do many acts which no mere President could otherwise do; and the last argument would be just as sound as the first; it does no violence to the general principle, but only extends it. True, there would seem to be danger that by this mutual impartation of powers, first, by the President, to the Commander-in-Chief to destroy, and then by the Commander-in-Chief to the President to build up, the two officials in the one, Mr. Lincoln might swallow up all power, executive, legislative, and judicial, and so put an end to the Government of our fathers. Yes, sir, and that is really what is being rapidly consummated by the Jacobins in the North, under subterfuges, like these, of the most disgraceful and shameful character.

Sir, if these States are still in the Union, the power claimed by the President over them is so monstrous and gross a violation of the plain provisions of the Constitution that leading abolitionists in this House and in the Senate are becoming ashamed to say a word in its defense. And to avoid the difficulty, and give some show of plausibility to their support of the President's scheme the key-note has been sounded in both Houses of Congress that the Union is dissolved; and the abolition cohorts are rapidly advancing to and all of them may be expected soon to occupy that ground.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] in a speech not long since took the ground that all the seceded States had ceased to exist as States of the Union. What road they traveled, or how they got out of the Union, he did not seem to know, or at least did not explain; but that they were out he seemed to have no doubt. And on that subject he advanced as good secession doctrine as any man in South Carolina could desire. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has more than once declared in his place in this House that the seceded States are out of the Union, and constitute a foreign country; that the Constitution and laws and all compacts between the North and the South have been abrogated and set aside. We are thus told, after nearly three years of terrible war to save the Union, that we have no Union; it has been destroyed and has passed away. Nor have we a Constitution, for it, too, has been abrogated. Sir, if that be true, then that old flag is no longer a truthful symbol. No, let it be rent and torn, eleven of those stars blotted out, and the rest separated and left wandering and alone under clouds and darkness, and let that other symbol over your head be broken and draped in mourning.

Mr. Chairman, possibly it may serve to quiet the scruples of conscientious men, who cannot feel quite prepared to sustain these measures, in violation of the Constitution they have sworn to support, to tell them the Constitution has been abrogated, and that we have none. But how can these gentlemen forget that they themselves have no power, except that delegated by the Constitution; and that by it all powers not delegated to the United States "are reserved to the States or to the people;" and that the usurpation by Congress or any other department of the Federal Government of any of these powers, not delegated but reserved to the States, is a direct and plain violation of the oath taken to support the Constitution? And who can fail to see that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] bases his support of the President's scheme on the ground that "it is wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution," he places it on the ground of usurped power, forbidden by the Constitution—on ground where no man can touch it or lend it the least support but by a plain violation of his oath to support the Constitution?

And what, sir, does this doctrine of State suicide, of the abrogation of all compacts between the North and the South, mean? Sir, it means that secession has accomplished all its guilty authors ever claimed for it; that by secession the Union has been dissolved; that the great experiment of man's capacity for self-government is a failure; that the Government purchased with the blood of our fathers, with all its hallowed memories and bright hopes, has passed away and gone forever. Sir, it means that not a rebel in the South can ever be convicted of treason; nay, that there are no rebels there; they are all citizens of an independent foreign country and owe no allegiance to the Government of the United States; that, receiving protection under that government, they owe allegiance to it, and to yield to the claims of the United States would be an act of treason on their part; and that to resist the authority of the United States is one of the highest acts of duty and patriotism on their part, for in that way only can they escape the guilt of treason, and prove their loyalty to their own independent government.

And, sir, if this doctrine be true, then what sort of a war is this on our part? A war in which multiplied thousands of precious lives have been sacrificed; a war that has literally drenched the land in kindred blood, and filled the whole country with weeping widows and stricken orphans; a war that has swept over this country like a wild tornado, carrying waste, desolation, and wide-spread ruin in its path; a war that has accumulated a crushing public debt, under which the nation at this moment reels and staggers like a drunken man. And all for what? To break up and utterly destroy a foreign country, to rob and plunder a whole community of people; confiscate all their property and effects, seize and take possession of their lands, strip them of everything, leaving them neither clothes to wear, bread to eat, nor a roof to shelter them; and to arm and give temporary freedom to their slaves to aid you in exterminating or driving from home and country a whole race of kindred people. This done, and then the rich cotton lands are to be parceled out among northern adventurers, the negroes under the name of hirelings reenslaved and transferred to Yankee taskmasters whose avarice, as insatiable as death itself, is to be the measure of the black-man's slavery and suffering. All this, sir, is but too fully and plainly indicated by the proclamation and the various kindred measures now maturing in this House.

And upon the grounds assumed by abolition disunionists there is not in all history a more cruel and bloody page than your present war programme with its kindred measures presents. It is utterly unjustifiable, savage, and barbarous, a burning shame and disgrace to any Christian or civilized nation. Sir, notwithstanding all the earnest efforts, entreaties, and warnings of patriots and conservative men, the party in power, moved by avarice and the fell spirit of fanaticism and sectional hate, has plunged this nation headlong into all these fearful and bloody horrors. And it is all the joint work of abolitionists and secessionists, those twin monsters in guilt and crime. Sir, amid all this wide-spread ruin, desolation, and sorrow and suffering and death; not a single pang of body or mind has been felt, not a tear has fallen, nor drop of blood been shed, nor grave made, but by the joint work of abolitionists and secessionists. They have crucified and murdered the peace and happiness and constitutional liberty of a great nation. Ocean's waters can never cleanse their blood-stained hands. Their crime has no parallel; it rises up mountain-high, covered all over and smoking with human blood.

STATE RENOVATION.

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Chairman, I was induced to seek the floor when the House was last in committee upon the present subject, because the two speeches to which I had listened upon the President's message paid but a passing glance to what is to me its most important and most memorable feature: I mean its plan of State renovation. As it is the first distinct intimation from an authoritative source that the war is not to be everlasting, and that States may yet be restored, and that the rebuilding of our dilapidated temple may yet be commenced, it deserves to be received with fuller ceremonies and with ampler honors. It is at least refreshing to those who have feared that between State secession on the one hand and State annihilation on the other, the Federal system would be ground to atoms, and not even territorial unity saved from the general wreck.

In surveying the insurgent States we see at a glance that the elements which may create and inspire a new national life, and those which may corrupt and destroy it, are now both floundering together in the great vortex of civil war, and that, unless this "tumult and confusion all embroiled" is to last forever, these elements must be summoned to separate and recombine according to their respective natures, and assert their appropriate functions, and work out energetically their inhering affinities of life unto life and death unto death. If the neutralizing of the elements of order was the only evil of this unnatural combination, it would most pathetically appeal to all that can be done by executive interposition for its correction. But when we consider that by a stern implication of law, according to its authoritative expounders, all distinction between guilt and innocence in the insurgent States is also confounded, and that the loyal within the limits of this civil war are subjected to the same pains, penalties, and forfeitures with the disloyal, a case so pitiable is stated that it should appeal to heaven and earth for relief.

It is to this precise anomaly that the President's plan addresses itself. It seeks to liberate order from this inert and paralyzing combination, to exempt innocence from being confounded with guilt, to separate loyalty from that unwholesome contact which attaches to it the contagion, and subjects it, in the eye of the law, to the punishments of crime.

The task essayed is one of infinite difficulties and embarrassments, and no plan of restoration devised by finite wisdom could approximate toward completeness at the outset, because the facts upon which it should be based are to a great extent prospective, and because it must constantly modify and change itself according to new developments as it advances into the future. The President, therefore, has wisely abstained from proposing anything but a transitional plan, adapted to the exigencies of the hour, and merely bridging the chasm between State anarchy and State restoration. It professes on its face to be temporary only, and not final or unchangeable; contenting itself with commencing the great deliverance, and by the necessities of the case restricting itself to such initiatory modes and such tentative processes for renovating the insurgent States as our present imperfect knowledge of their condition and limited control over them permits him to employ.

In attempting to solve this most perplexing of political problems at the present stage of its evolution, no statesman who relies upon merely human observation and forethought could have adopted any different method. If you demand just now and here a thorough and perfect code and science of reconstruction, you must go to those who enjoy special revelations and inspired prevision of the future. Mere men must grope their way when dealing with what is beyond the limits of their knowledge, and it is by experimental processes alone that the race has succeeded in reaching the certainties of science and in triumphing over the obstacles and mysteries which have beset it from infancy.

While, therefore, in my judgment, the President's plan is not beyond cavil, it is as complete and comprehensive as the intricacies of the subject and its present development will permit, and it possesses also the rare merit of being just to the Government, just to the insurgent States, and just to the slave; and it is to these three characteristics that I propose to restrict my remarks at present.

1. It is just to the Government.

It surrenders no power or jurisdiction which the Government has ever claimed; it maintains every law which Congress has passed during the civil war; it abandons no executive measure which the exigencies of that war has evoked; it yields to armed enemies none of their insolent demands, and to cold friends none of their temporizing expedients. If the insurgent States return upon this plan, they will return acknowledging all the claims of the Government which they made the pretext of revolt, and abjuring the claims which they propounded as their ultimatum of peace. They will return not only repudiating the glosses which, for more than thirty years, they have attempted to foist upon the Constitution, but also their darling policy of extending and propagating slavery, to which, for a longer period, they have attempted to make it subservient. They will return swearing allegiance to an organic law which has clarified itself by blood of all taint and stench of secession, and which has demonstrated its self-existence by nearly devouring one half of its assumed creators. They will find that the fire which has swept over this District has not only burnt off slavery, but exterminated the root and seed of it in the soil itself, and that since their hegira from this Hall, the question upon which their Pryors, their Keits, their Cobbs and Barksdales have so often convulsed it has been definitely settled, and that freedom is now securely seated upon our immeasurable Territories for the illimitable future, and that the influence of despised New England has planted the seed of free republics as near the setting sun as she is herself to his rising beams, so that when her choral hymn of rejoicing liberty sweeps over the Father of Waters, it can be caught up by younger voices and pealed in one continuous and unbroken strain until it is lost in the deep-toned anthem of the vast, peaceful sea. They will find that their old feudal Bastile, strong and impregnable though it once seemed, has been undermined by our armies, and blown up and scattered into fragments by those of their own kin who preferred the destruction of slavery to the death of the nation. They will find that military necessities, which they themselves created, have placed Springfield rifles into the hands of slaves, from which the same necessities had previously struck off the fetters, and that a hundred thousand of these once groveling bondsmen, marshaled into the armies of the Union and trained in military skill and discipline, now defiantly hold the acres over which they were once tracked by blood-hounds, and domineer the plantations where they once toiled under the lash of the overseer. They will return finally with wonderfully increased respect for Uncle Sam, bowing obsequiously to him, as a respectable living thing, self-sustained, and not sustained by their sufferance, with a power and will of his own, and breath in his nostrils not breathed into it by them, with a right hand strong enough to bruise and break, and with a face that will hereafter be a terror to all his enemies.

2. The President's plan is just to the insurgent States.

And first: are those excluded from amnesty and pardon justly and rightfully excluded? This question deserves no nicety of discussion, for upon it there can be but little honest difference of opinion. The main conditions which the President imposes upon those he restores to pardon are contained in an oath, and the virtue of an oath lies in its obligatory and binding force upon the conscience. He therefore justly excludes from pardon all who have demonstrated by manifest perjury their contempt of its obligations. The forsworn judges who have surrendered honor on our decorous bench for infamy on a judgment seat reared by civil war, the forsworn officers, military and naval, who have prostituted to the rebellion the skill in arms which they acquired as wards and beneficiaries of the Government, are justly and righteously debarred from amnesty because they have not conscience or honor enough left to be grappled by an oath.

Crimes differ in degree, and the experience of mankind establishes that while some can be safely pardoned without detriment to the common weal, there are others which cannot go unpunished without its constant peril or its certain destruction. The high civil and diplomatic magnates of this most unprovoked rebellion, the military Molochs whose rank entitles them to guilty preëminence, are left to lie unshrived, unanointed, in the pit they have dug for themselves, because among the crimes pronounced inexpiable by the consenting voice of all the ages, is that of those arch-rebels and arch-traitors who instigate and lead a civil war—the sum and expressed essence of every crime. The society which tolerates such parricides cannot exist a moment in safety. Rome could enjoy no repose while Catiline lived. France was drenched in blood until Robespierre was guillotined. Davis will convulse secession as soon as he is not allowed to reign, and if its bonds had been worth stealing, Floyd would have robbed it before he did.

The miscreants who have violated the laws of war, and ostracized themselves from human sympathy by murdering and torturing disarmed and helpless prisoners of war are justly left to work out their own damnation; and why? Because to forgive a thug who maims and murders in the name of chivalry would be an outrage upon civilization.

Secondly. Are the terms imposed upon those included in the amnesty just and right?

What are these terms? There are five of them:

1. An oath to sustain the Constitution.
2. An oath to sustain the anti-slavery legislation.
3. An oath to sustain the President's proclamation.
4. Slave property is withheld in general restitution.
5. Property, where the rights of third parties have intervened, is also withheld.

The committee will observe that the first three of these conditions are in the form of an oath. Now, I agree mainly with my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. YEAMAN,] who has spoken upon this question, when he says that great quarrels are settled by the fortunes of war and by the domination of great ideas and principles, rather than by the formality of taking oaths and recording them; and that restoration is attained when the ideas and the forces of the nation have prevailed over the ideas and the forces of secession and national disintegration. It appears to me, however, that this is an explanation of the method by which social laws and influences rather than political agencies may reunite a divided society. The ideas and forces of which he speaks are embodied in human beings who at the present stage of our advance must continue to be governed and directed by political administration and its appropriate machinery. Sociology must wait for many decades before its sublime speculations can be applied to practical affairs. In political parlance, the elements which he represents as struggling for preponderance are loyalty and disloyalty. An oath of allegiance may not be an infallible mode of discriminating between those who will faithfully and sincerely support a Government and those who will desert and betray it; but who can at present propound a better test? I can conceive of a stage in our future culmination when all the masked disguises and hypocrisies of mankind will be stripped off, and their most interior motions and impulses stand revealed. I can imagine that the inhabitants of earth may yet become as perfect as the inhabitants of the higher spheres, who, according to clairvoyant philosophers, are incapable of deceit and cannot speak at all without speaking the truth. But in the nineteenth century, and with our present imperfect means of penetrating men's real purposes, we must rely upon the old-fashioned oath of allegiance as the best criterion of their rectitude or want of it. It is the test which has been used in Government since the morning stars sang together; it was used in the construction of our present system, and must be used in the reconstruction if we are to commence the work of renovation by separating the true from the false, the loyal from the disloyal, the wheat from the tares.

It is objected to this plan that it pardons the rebel on condition of his doing a certain thing, and requires the loyal man to do the same thing before he can participate in a State government. The Supreme Court of the United States has unanimously decided that from the 13th day of July, 1861, the date of the approval of the non-intercourse act, there has been between the Government and the confederate States a civil territorial war; and it is laid down as a principle in the same momentous decision that "the laws of war, whether the war be civil or inter gentes, convert every citizen of a hostile State into a public enemy and treat him accordingly." From the outbreak of this rebellion to the present hour, on the non-intercourse act, on the confiscation act, on the conscription act, on every vigorous and earnest measure of legislation the gentlemen on the other side of the House have importunately invoked the Constitution and the laws, and here they have them, in full measure and running over; law certain, but law inexorable, as it was in Shylock's case; law not according to the Solicitor of the War Department, but law according to the supreme arbiter of mooted constitutional questions. Since the adoption of the Constitution the court has devoted itself almost exclusively to the study and interpretation of its peace side, and out of it they have extracted power and authority enough for all the emergencies of peace and for all the operations and enterprises of a tranquil society. When the judges shall have given to its war side one tithe of the attention and study which they have given to its peace side, they will discover power enough for all the emergencies of war; power enough for self-defense, whether the Government it organizes is attacked in the guise of secession or of revolution; power enough to inflict full and exemplary punishment upon all who assail it, whether they are seceders, rebels, traitors, or public enemies. The decision in the prize cases is the first fruit of these new studies, covering by its vast sweep all the war legislation that has been so severely criticised and so savagely rebuked. Before the 13th of July it might or might not have been, according to the judges, a personal war. Before that time it might or might not have been that the only enemy the Government could recognize was the person engaged in the rebellion, as the opponents of the Administration have clamorously asserted, and that all others were peaceful citizens, entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizenship under the Constitution. But since the non-intercourse act no such claim can be made, for the point is authoritatively settled by the agreement of all the judges that from that time the personal war became a civil territorial war, giving to the United States full belligerent rights against all the inhabitants of the rebellious districts, and converting them all, in the eye of the law, into public enemies.

It does not by any means follow that because the rebels have forfeited all constitutional rights and constitutional guarantees, they have thereby absolved themselves from constitutional obligation. They are "none the less enemies because they are traitors," says Judge Grier, and he might have said that they have not ceased to be traitors because they are enemies. In other words, the President may elect to pursue them either as enemies or traitors, by the Constitution or by the laws of war. If he elects to pursue them as traitors, he must pursue them in accordance with the constitutional definition of treason and by the mode and with the limitations it clearly indicates in the section devoted to that crime. If he elects to pursue them as enemies, there is no limit and restraint upon his discretion but the laws of war.

The Duke of Cumberland, when in 1745 he subdued the Scotch rebels, could have tried them all at a drum-head court-martial, or handed them over to the civil tribunals to be tried according to the laws of England defining treason.

Here, then, you have it. It is "so nominated in the bond," that within that boundary "marked by a line of bayonets," every citizen, whatever his conduct, whether Union or rebel, loyal or disloyal, is a public enemy and liable to be treated as such. Now, is it not rather too late in the day to declare that all within that line do not need pardon before they can be restored to the rights of citizenship which they have forfeited as public enemies? It is not, as has been stated by some, a "superfluous boon," which the President tenders to the loyal man, nor has he adroitly blended together the conditions of pardon with qualifications for citizenship. It was with a full knowledge and understanding of the effect and operation of this decision in the prize cases, and from his conviction that a man who had never swerved from his allegiance might be caught in the meshes of this legal implication that induced the President to disregard the broad moral distinction between the two classes, and to extend his clemency to all who in legal contemplation were public enemies. In the very opening sentence of his proclamation he offers it to all who have "directly or by implication" participated in the rebellion.

Let me now for a moment examine more in detail the terms of the President's plan. In the first place he requires that all who accept his clemency shall swear "to henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the Union thereunder." That this is a just and righteous demand from all who have "directly or by implication" participated in the rebellion, the most scrupulous and tender-hearted apologist for our "wayward sisters" will hardly venture to deny.

In the second place he requires from them an oath to abide by and support all the anti-slavery legislation of Congress during the existing rebellion, so long and so far as it is not abrogated by the national Legislature nor declared void by a decision of the Supreme Court. Now, inasmuch as by the Constitution itself the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance of it are declared to be the supreme law of the land, there is no great hardship in requiring both from the loyal and disloyal inhabitants of the insurgent States an oath to support the supreme law of the land, so long as it continues to be valid and unrevoked.

In the third place the President requires from the recipient of executive clemency an oath to sustain the proclamation emancipating slaves, so long and so far as it is not invalidated by supreme judicial decision. Whether the proclamations were constitutional or not is not here the question, for this is waived by the essential qualification of the oath, and left where it must eventually go, to our supreme judicial tribunal. If the proclamation is pronounced by the judges unconstitutional the oath is void; if constitutional, it merely binds the conscience of the affirmant to sustain the Executive of the United States, in a time of grievous national peril, in the exercise of his legitimate powers.

In the fourth place the President's plan withholds slaves in the general restitution.

And it is upon this point that in my judgment the most serious differences of opinion will arise to those who hold that rebels who adjure the Constitution and wage war for its destruction are entitled to all the rights which it guarantees, and can only be pursued by constitutional penalties; both the emancipation of slaves and the refusal to restore them will seem the greatest of enormities. To those who hold that the inhabitants of the insurgent States have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution, and are public enemies in a state of war, with no rights but such as the law of nations accords to belligerents, the condition now under consideration will be regarded only as the infliction of just and merited punishment.

Round these conflicting theories, from the firing upon Sumter to the present hour, proposition and reply, assertion and rejoinder, have raged and stormed as when—

"From peak to peak, the rattling crags among, Leaps the live thunder."

It seems to me, however, as I have already stated, that the Supreme Court of the United States has closed the high debate and pronounced judgment to which we are all bound deferentially to bow. The judges have unanimously agreed in affirming that a civil war between the Government and the confederate States has existed for two years and a half, and that a civil war carries with it all the legal consequences of war. Now, what are these legal consequences? They are gathered together from Vattel, Phillimore, and Wheaton, and compendiously summed up in the opinion of Justice Nelson, in the prize cases, 2 Black, 687:

"The legal consequences resulting from a state of war between two countries at this day are well understood, and will be found described in every approved work on the subject of international law. The people of the two countries become immediately the enemies of each other—all intercourse, commercial or otherwise, between them unlawful—all contracts existing at the commencement of the war suspended, and all made during its existence utterly void. The insurance of enemies' property, the drawing of bills of exchange or purchase on the enemies' country, the remission of bills or money to it are illegal and void. Existing partnerships between citizens or subjects of the two countries are dissolved, and, in fine, interdiction of trade and intercourse, direct or indirect, is absolute and complete by the mere force and effect of war itself. All the property of the people of the two countries on land or sea are subject to capture and confiscation by the adverse party as enemies' property, with certain qualifications as to respects property on land. (Brown vs. United States, 8 (ranch), 110.) All treaties between the belligerent parties are annulled. The ports of the respective countries may be blockaded, and letters of marque and reprisal granted as rights of war, and the law of prizes as defined by the law of nations comes into full and complete operation, resulting from maritime captures, jure belli. War also effects a change in the mutual relations of all States or countries, not directly, as in the case of the belligerents, but immediately and indirectly, though they take no part in the contest, but remain neutral."

"This great and pervading change in the existing condition of a country, and in the relations of all her citizens or subjects, external and internal, from a state of peace, is the immediate effect and result of a state of war."

If this be so, if, in the language of the court, "all the property of the people of the two countries, on land and sea, are subject to confiscation and capture by the adverse party, as enemy's property," I do not see how the conclusion can be evaded that the slave property of the insurgent States was lawful spoil and prey of war, and that the President, as Commander-in-Chief and sole judge of military necessities, was authorized in taking the services of the slaves from their masters, in the only efficacious way it could be done, by an edict of emancipation. He found back of the heavy legions of armed rebels, back of the bayonets and artillery which, at Corinth, at Murfreesboro', at Richmond, were aimed at the nation's life, back of Lee and Jackson and Beauregard and Bragg and the whole multitudinous host, four million men pressed into the hated and loathsome business of feeding, clothing, and sustaining their enemies and ours. He found in the slave the bone and sinew and muscle of the social state that was hurling upon us death and destruction, the body of the grim Colossus that was clutching the nation's throat, the forage, the subsistence, the transportation, the labor, the architect, the operative, the intrenching-tool of the foe. To the slave it was due that a remorseless conscription could skin the land of white men, and drive all, from the "whining school-boy" to the "lean and slipped pantaloons," into the fighting ranks of the rebellion. And must the Commander-in-Chief of the Federal Army withhold his hand from this immense arsenal of strength and power and victory? What! not break the bone, not sever the sinew, not rend the muscle, not seize the subsistence, the wealth, the material, not tear out the heart of the rebellion, when they were all at his mercy by the laws of war? What folly, what imbecility, what treachery to the people, what perfidy to the Government, would such a refusal imply! Military necessity! Why, at the time of the proclamation we were reeling and staggering under well-delivered and repeated blows. The elections were against us. The public sentiment of the world was cold and menacing. England stood ready to avenge the defeats and jealousies of a century by pouncing upon us in our weakness, and an alliance with the confederacy was a part of Napoleon's plan of transatlantic aggrandizement. Name the nation that was ever more severely pressed at home and abroad; name the instance in the tide of time where such a necessity was more paramount, when a measure was more unavoidable to save a realm from everlasting overthrow, on the one hand, and upon the other to secure for it a glory unsurpassed, a progress without end, a triumph of humanity such as was never seen before.

Fortunately for the country, fortunately for the world, the President was equal to the emergency; he did not refuse: he manumitted the slaves; and in doing this but followed the example of those master States who make the laws of war and give them their authority. England has by three of her military commanders turned this formidable engine against us as an unquestioned martial right. France has freely distributed rescripts not only of emancipation but of enfranchisement, and Spain has added the weight of her authority to the same rule. When in the South American republics hostile factions have dashed together, they have had no scruple in liberating slaves as a legitimate mode of crippling an antagonist; and it will be hard to find a modern war carried on in territories of slavery in which emancipation has not been used as a legitimate belligerent right, and used without protest. As property, it was the duty of the President to confiscate them by the only effectual mode; as persons in duress, unwillingly contributing to the strength and resources of the enemy, it was his duty to break up the duress by the only effectual mode; as loyal subjects panting to rush to the defense of their imperiled country, it was his duty to remove all restraint from the free exercise of their volition by the only effectual mode; as disloyal subjects rendering voluntary service to their masters, it was his duty to take that service by the only effectual mode.

3. Just to the slave.

Shall these once slaves but now freemen be remanded back to bondage? No: "personal property once forfeited is always forfeited." No: slaves once legally free are always free. No, no; thrice no, by the ashes of our fathers, by the altar of our God! The "chosen curses" and the "hidden thunder in the stores of heaven" will forbid the rendition: a crime to them, a malediction to their masters, a shame to us, and a disgrace to the age. If these children of wrong and oppression are the lawful spoil of our victorious arms, give up to the enemy your proudest national memorials—the sword of Washington, the staff of Franklin, that time-worn but immortal parchment which first authoritatively published your independence to the world—give up to him the blood-stained flags and trophies which, upon the bristling crest of battle, our heroic defenders have wrested from his desperate grasp; give up to him this Capitol itself, and throw at his feet the President's head, before you give up the most abject of these bondsmen disinherited; for in surrendering them you will squander one of those priceless moments, big with the future, worth more than a whole generation of either bond or free, the rare and pregnant occasion placed in your hand by the fortune of war of wiping forever African slavery from the American continent.

If this deliverance is ever vouchsafed, then shall we be purged forever of the sole source of our weakness and dissension in the past; then will pass away forever the sole cloud that threatens the glory of our future; then will the American Union be transfigured into a more erect and shining presence, and tread with firm footsteps a loftier plane, and cherish nobler theories, and carry its head nearer the stars; then will it be no profanation to wed its redeemed and unpolluted name to that of immortal Liberty; then Liberty and Union will go on, hand in hand, and, under a holier inspiration and with more benign and blessed auspices, will revive their grand mission of peacefully acquiring and peacefully incorporating contiguous territories, and peacefully assimilating their inhabitants; then from the Orient to the Occident, from the flowery shores of the great southern Gulf to the frozen barriers of the great northern Bay, will they unite in spreading a civilization, not intertwined with slavery, but purged of its contamination, a civilization which means universal emancipation, universal enfranchisement, universal brotherhood; then shall we have done for the United States what Richelieu is said to have done for France:

"He fought France rent a-sunder,"

"Brawls fighting to rebellion, and weak laws
Rotting away with rust in antique sheaths
He rescued France; and trod the ashes
Of the old feudal and decrepit carcass,
Civilization, on her luminous wings,
Soared, Phoenix-like, to Jove."

Despair not, then, soldiers, statesmen, citizens, women, who are fighting energetically for a nation's life. The cloud which now shuts down before your vision will yet disclose its silver lining. Peace shall be born from war, and out of chaos order shall yet emerge. We shall dwell together in harmony, and but one nation shall inhabit our sea-girt borders. We seem sailing along the land, hearing the ripple that breaks upon the shore, where our recreated and regenerated Republic, after it has passed through this fiery furnace of war, these gates of death, shall be permanently installed. We shall yet tread its meadows and pastures green, trade in its marts, live in its palaces, worship in its temples, and legislate in its Capitol. The Providence of God moves through great cycles of time. If we could only attain a point in the future that commands a sufficiently comprehensive retrospect, all the mysteries of our historic evolution would unfold their meaning. We should learn why our journey to this "more perfect Union" was so long and wearisome; why the morn was so long in breaking; why diverse races were at the outset planted on this continent; why we struggled through Indian, Spanish, French, and English wars to political independence; why just as the new-born nation was "hardening into the bone of manhood" it was suffered to divide itself into hostile armies, that have crossed each other's track, and intersected and rushed and crashed together, as the planets would, if the forces which hold them in their orbits were once suspended; why religion and knowledge and law were too feeble to bind together repellant societies; why bigotry and intolerance were but half-crucified in our best men; why slavery was ever generated; why it did not die in the womb, and why it so long impeded the march of the American people to national unity and domestic tranquility.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, addressed the committee for an hour. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, in his message at the opening of this Congress, employed the following language:

"I again submit to your consideration the expediency of establishing a system for the encouragement of immigration. Although this source of national wealth is again dowling in with greater freedom than for several years before the insurrection occurred, there is still a great deficiency of laborers in every field of industry, and especially in agriculture, and in our mines, as well of iron and coal as of precious metals. While the demand for labor is thus increased here, tens of thousands of persons, destitute of remunerative occupation, are thronging on our foreign consuls and offering to emigrate to the United States, if essential but very cheap assistance can be offered them. It is easy to see that under the sharp discipline of civil war the nation is beginning a new life. This noble effort demands the aid, and ought to receive the attention and support, of the Government."

So important did this House consider the subject just referred to, that it created, by resolution, a select committee, to whom all bills and resolutions concerning immigration were to be referred.

No subject, Mr. Chairman, can more properly occupy the attention of Congress at this time than the question of foreign immigration, whether we regard the past importance of that interest to the growth and greatness of the nation, or confine our attention simply to that pressing and direct need for laborers to which the President alludes; a need so great that already, in different quarters, private enterprise has sought to remedy it, and societies have been established, in Boston and elsewhere, with a view to facilitating and encouraging immigration. And surely, if this subject possesses such importance to the nation at large, it can with the utmost propriety be urged by the representatives of the West and Northwest, regions of country which may be said to owe the greater part of their present population, wealth, and consequence to the influx of foreign immigration.

More than one half the territorial area of the United States yet remains undisposed of and in the hands of the Government—the total area in acres being 1,879,146,240; while the portion undisposed of is 964,901,625 acres, or, in round numbers, one billion acres. Hence, if we consider the mere transfer to individuals of the title to the public lands, the work of settlement is not yet half completed; but if we recollect also the extremely sparse character of the population in extensive regions where the Government has parted with the title to its lands, we shall find that we have as yet but entered upon the threshold of a vast and almost illimitable field of development. It is estimated that the State of Massachusetts possesses 158 inhabitants to the square mile; while the northwestern States—including Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and Kansas—have but 10.92 inhabitants to the square mile. The difference, then, between 10.92 and 158, represents the margin of expansion yet open even in the comparatively settled portions of the country. We have now a total population of 31,445,080. Should we attain a rate of density equal to that of Europe, our total population would be 218,186,000, or seven times our present numbers!

It is therefore apparent, Mr. Chairman, while one half our territorial area yet remains undisposed of, and while our present population is capable of a seven-fold increase before reaching European density, that every means should be taken by the Government to add to the natural and ordinary growth of our population.

It is not to be forgotten, that the magnitude of our nation has alone saved us from foreign intervention in the war in which we are now engaged. Had the present terrible ordeal fallen upon us when possessed of but one tenth our present population, there can be no question that the intense hostility with which we are regarded by the ruling classes in the nations of western Europe would have dictated armed intervention and our probable overthrow. If the magnitude of our resources and the numbers of our armies appalled our enemies, it must be remembered that these were but results made possible by our vast population. Our foes shrink from a life-and-death contest with a nation which even in its torn and distracted condition was still wealthy and mighty, able to pour its armies into the field by the million, and to empty forth at the feet of the Government an incalculable store of riches; a nation which, to use the striking illustration of Mr. Ruggles, of New York, could literally, and not figuratively, gird the world with the products of one crop of its western fields alone.

Nor should it be forgotten, that in the conduct of the war itself, the possession of our vast northern population has been of the first and utmost consequence.

The war upon our part has been necessarily one of occupation as well as conquest; we have had both to take and to hold; nay, more, we have been compelled to fight around the margin of a vast circle against a foe concentrated in the midst of it, and, while subduing him in the field, shut him out from all commerce with the surrounding world. If, with all our vast preponderance of numbers, we have found the task so tedious and so difficult, it will be perceived at once that with a population no greater than that of the South it would have been a sheer impossibility. Instead of literally overrunning the South and crushing it beneath the mere weight of numbers, we should have found ourselves engaged in a war ruinously protracted, to end in all probability in the utter destruction of our Government and our institutions.

If, then, all that is dear to us as a people has depended upon this question of numbers, it becomes us to inquire how we have obtained our present vast population.

In the year 1790 we had but 3,929,000 people; in 1860 we possessed a population of 31,445,080; the difference, 27,516,080, being the sum of our growth in seventy years.

How far is this growth due to the natural increase of the population in the country in 1790? To ascertain this, it will be necessary to institute some comparison with the rates of growth of other nations.

England and Wales possessed, in 1570, a population of nearly 3,000,000; in 1861 a population of 29,227,746. In other words, the growth of England and Wales was 30 per cent. less in three hundred years than that of the United States in seventy years! But, as it may be argued that the rate of growth of all nations has increased in modern times, we will confine our comparison within a shorter period.

In 1861 the population of England and Wales was 9,156,171; in 1861 it was 29,227,746, being an increase of 121 per cent. in sixty years. Its true that England had, during that time, sent out a considerable emigration to different parts of the world, which, from the best data attainable, I estimate at 852,011, between 1825 and 1850; but on the other hand, the census of 1851 shows that England in that year contained 519,959 natives of Ireland and 130,087 natives of Scotland, making a total of 650,046. The difference therefore between the emigration and the immigration is not great enough to materially affect the question of the rate of growth.

If we apply that ratio to our own country we find that we should to-day possess a population of 11,728,120; about one third our present population.

It must not be forgotten that England is, in point of enterprise and prosperity, second only to our own country; that her commerce radiates over the entire globe, and that the sun never sets upon her possessions. It cannot, therefore, be said that I have selected as a comparison a country unfitted for the development of population.

Let us then take another instance.

France represents a stationary population, gaining nothing by immigration, losing little by emigration, growing by the mere preponderance of the births over the deaths; and at the same time possessing since her great revolution a steadily increasing measure of prosperity, evidenced by her commercial developments, the large quantities of waste land annually brought under cultivation, and the rapid increase in her manufactures. Her growth may therefore be very fairly taken as a standard for the growth of all prosperous but isolated nations. In 1801 her population was 27,349,003; in 1861 it was 37,472,132—an increase of 37 per cent. in sixty years.

If we apply this ratio of growth to our own population, we would have at the present day, instead of 31,445,080, but 7,270,590, considerably less than the population of the western States alone, which in 1860 was 9,091,979.

Whence then comes this prodigious difference in the rate of growth, in the one case amounting to a difference of 24,174,410, in the other to a difference of 19,716,880? I answer, in a very great degree from foreign immigration. What has that foreign immigration been? Divided by decades it was as follows:

Arrived prior to.....	1820.....	126,862
" between 1820 and 1830.....		244,490
" " 1830 " 1840.....		552,000
" " 1840 " 1850.....		1,538,300
" " 1850 " 1860.....		2,707,624
Total.....		5,189,276

Thus we find that since the foundation of the Government the immigrants arriving in the United States were 1,259,449 more than the total population with which we commenced our career as a nation!

This, then, Mr. Chairman, is the explanation of the almost fabulous rate of growth we have enjoyed. This is the source of the incalculable resources we have been enabled to pour forth in the face of an astonished world. This is the womb from which have gone forth those countless hordes of armed men beneath whose tread the earth seems to tremble, and before whose faces all the foulnesses of oppression are rolling away like the mist before the coming of the morning.

Let us enlarge our hearts to a liberal conception of the great work performed by this continuous flood of immigration. Independently of the wealth brought by the immigrants into the country, in itself no inconsiderable sum, they have applied their hands to all the tasks that have been spread out before them, and have everywhere turned opportunity into realization, and crude material into wealth. If seventy-five years—the period of a human life—includes the lapse of time between the foundation of the first settlement west of Pennsylvania and to-day, when the great West numbers nearly ten million inhabitants, nearly one third the entire population of the nation, let us remember that we are to ascribe a very large part of this astounding and unparalleled result to the flood of foreign immigration which has poured steadily and continuously upon our shores since the foundation of the Government. For, Mr. Chairman, it is one of the distinguishing characteristics of that immigration, that, however much the judgment of some individuals may have been clouded, after their arrival upon our shores, as to the true path to their own interests and the interests of the nation, they have all, as if guided by some overruling instinct, sought out for themselves homes in the free States of the North.

This fact was early recognized by the leading minds of the South, and formed the basis of a large part of their opposition to the homestead law and other kindred measures for the encouragement of immigration. Indeed, this great fact was urged by many of them as a principal reason for the reestablishment of the African slave trade. Mr. J. D. B. DeBow, the leading statistical writer of the South, in a letter to William L. Yancey, dated June 3, 1859, said:

"It is plain, and time and events have demonstrated the fact, that it is not European labor that we want, since that labor during so long a time has not taken foothold in our limits, evidencing thus an incapacity to adapt itself to our condition. Time and events have made it equally clear that such labor is beyond our reach altogether."

In a speech made by Mr. A. H. Stephens at Augusta, Georgia, in 1859, the following language was employed:

"It is as plain as anything, that unless the number of African stock be increased we have not the population, and might as well abandon the race with our brethren of the North. We cannot make States without people; rivers and mountains do not make them; and slave States cannot be made without Africans."

This tendency of the free laborers of Europe to the free States of the North is understood abroad. The London Star of December 24, 1863, in an able editorial, speaks as follows:

"They [the South] boast also of the liveliness of their contraband commerce with our ports. How is it, then, that we hear of no emigration to such comparatively unobstructed ports as Wilmington or Brownsville? The former seems to defy attempts to seal it up, and the latter was till lately easy of access by way of Matamoras. But we hear of no contraband cargoes of Irishmen or Germans. And for just the same reason that we never heard much of European emigration to the South. The slave power has never wanted any emigrants but the colored and compulsory—whom it now finds wanting in 'every essential quality of the soldier,' especially in the quality of obedience and fidelity. It has jealously monopolized the vast and fertile but degenerate soil of the South. It has accumulated landed property in the hands of an aristocracy of wealth and race. It has put every obstacle in the way of free laborers settling upon its open territories, knowing well that their vote and influence would soon kill the institution which counts the laborers as capital and pays no wages but in coarse food and hard stripes."

The annual report of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York for 1860—61, (page 296,) shows that during 1860, out of 108,682 immigrants arriving at that port, the enormous proportion of 97,717 were destined for the free States, and but 5,362 for the slave States, and that of these latter less than one thousand were destined for the Gulf States—those States in which slavery presented her most repulsive features. Let me call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to this disproportion: less than a thousand emigrants for the distinctively slave-labor States, and 97,717 for the distinctively free-labor States; the remainder, 4,362, for those States in which slavery and free labor were contending for supremacy.

But let us pass from a consideration of the advantages already derived from this source of national greatness, to those that rest in the immediate future.

If our age, Mr. Chairman, possesses any peculiar and distinctive significance, any distinguishing trait which marks it as a new era in the development of the human race, it is to be found in its breaking down of old prejudices and illiberality; in its opening to all men of all races and colors equal opportunities for advancement; in its scattering over new and virgin lands the pent-up and oppressed populations of the elder nations; and, in a word, in its softening the asperities and broadening the generousities of mankind. Permit me to remark, Mr. Chairman, that that party which shall aspire to continuously rule the destinies of our nation must take this lesson deeply to heart, or it will find itself unworthy its high mission. The focal-point of the age, "the half-brother of the world," as an English poet has called our country, those who would lead us must rise to the sublime height of justice to the entire human family; not only to that portion, whatever may be their color, born on our own soil, but to those vast populations of the Old World, joint heritors with ourselves of the billion acres of land still unclaimed and uninhabited.

Let it be our duty then to widen the ample throat of that fountain from which already such floods of blessings have been poured out upon our land. Let us stimulate, facilitate, and direct that stream of immigration which, with increased volume, now crowds the seaports of England and burdens down every immigrant ship sailing for America.

In the great Northwest we have ample room and verge enough for all these coming multitudes. In Minnesota alone we possess 53,500,000 acres of land, of which only 500,000 are under cultivation. We need hands to till those remaining 53,000,000 uncultivated acres; we need a house on every "quarter section," a garden by every house, a church and a school-house in every settlement. We care not how multifarious may be the languages spoken, nor from what remote regions of the world's surface that population may be gathered together. Let them but enjoy the school-house, the church, the newspaper, and free institutions, and one generation will fuse the heterogeneous mass into a population intelligent, enterprising, patriotic, ready to spend their hearts' best blood in defense of the institutions transmitted to them by their emigrant fathers, and which have so incalculably blessed and benefited them.

Mr. Chairman, we are entering upon a new era in the history of our nation. A revolution has been developing itself before our very eyes almost unobserved by the nation.

I have called attention to the fact that but three-score years and fifteen have elapsed since the commencement of settlement west of Pennsylvania. Far up in the Northwest, on the borders of the most remote of the great lakes, there is a State, little known in Europe, not yet placed on many European maps, possessed of no world-wide fame—the State of Wisconsin. Let us extract a few facts from the statistics of that State.

In 1840 the entire wheat crop of Wisconsin was 212,000 bushels. In 1861, twenty-one years later, it was 27,316,000 bushels—three million bushels more than the entire wheat crop of Ohio, New York, and all the New England States put together!

Surely, Mr. Chairman, these figures seem to pass beyond human belief; we appear to be entering upon the region of the supernatural.

In the day of Rome's greatness it was esteemed a prodigy that Alexandria, draining "the granary of the world," should send to Rome 20,000,000 bushels of wheat annually; yet from this, I might almost call it obscure State, twenty-five years since the abode of wild beasts, its name yet a strange word in the mouth of the world, there is annually sent forth seven million bushels more than the great city of antiquity was able to furnish to the swollen population of eternal Rome.

Or, passing to the neighboring State of Illinois and to the city of Chicago, let me call attention to another fact. The entire shipments of wheat, corn, oats, and barley from Chicago in 1838 were 78 bushels; in 1862 they were 55,720,000 bushels.

Or, returning to Wisconsin, the value of the produce trade of Milwaukee in 1841 was $2,500; in 1862 it was $20,000,000!

Mr. Chairman, we cannot but draw deeper breaths and take in wider conceptions of the future of our land in the presence of such majestic facts. We cannot but exult that a just and merciful God has laid bare in the center of a continent these illimitable fields, and is tempting to them by the beacon of an inestimable liberty the unfortunate and oppressed of the world.

"Mankind is one,
And hath but one great heart." 'Tis thus we feel,
With a gigantic throbbing across the seas,
Each other's rights and wrongs."

Nor is the revolution to which I have alluded simply in the growth of population or of wealth. A writer in the London Quarterly Review (July, 1863) says:

"The nations of the west [of Europe] have gradually become less capable of supplying themselves with food. While thousands of mouths are added daily to the number to be fed, agriculture, with all its marvelous improvements and scientific appliances, is unable to keep pace with the progress of population." * * * "A few years ago England was able to feed her own people from the produce of her own shores. She now buys grain to the annual value of $60,000,000. It is probable that in a few years England and France will need annually $200,000,000 of grain."

A paper has lately been read, before the London Farmers' Club, recommending English farmers to abandon altogether the raising of grain and confine themselves to the raising of stock, on the ground that the English climate is not adapted to the cereals, which require the hot, dry climate of the inter-continental plains.

When it is recollected that one of the leading grain houses of England (see address of Thomas Whitney, Esq., before the Chamber of Commerce, Milwaukee, page 22) estimates the amount of wheat necessary for the support of the wheat-consuming population of Europe at one billion bushels annually, it is easy to estimate the effect which this steady diminution of the amount of wheat raised in Europe must have upon those regions of our own country especially adapted for the growth of that cereal.

It cannot be lost sight of that considerations of climate, soil, and geographical location, override all the efforts of human energy and industry. New England, by the census returns of 1860, raises wheat enough to feed her own people three weeks, and New York sufficient for six months; while Pennsylvania, after feeding her own population, possesses no surplus, and Ohio but three million bushels. In ten years the wheat crop of these States has decreased 6,500,000 bushels. (See Report of Chicago Ship Canal Convention, page 86.)

Steadily the seat of empire of this wonderful cereal is being transferred northward. Gradually, imperceptibly, and by the force of powerful natural laws, new regions of country are rising into the first consequence as the bread-producing regions of the world. During the ten years in which the eastern States diminished their wheat crop 6,500,000 bushels, the Northwest increased its wheat crop 55,000,000 bushels!

In no other locality is this startling growth more strikingly displayed than in the State which I have the honor in part to represent—Minnesota. In 1858 that State was an importer, to a large extent, of flour, beef, pork, &c., to supply the wants of her own people. In 1860 her entire crop of grain and potatoes was 14,693,517 bushels; her entire crop of wheat 5,101,432 bushels, nearly five times greater than the wheat crop of all the New England States, possessing six times her population! There has never been in the history of the human family, so stupendous a rate of growth as this. In one year, from 1859 to 1860, the breadth of wheat sown in the State increased 85 per cent., and the amount of crop 114 per cent.!

Can we be blind to the great lessons taught by these facts? Can we shut our eyes to the fact that the advance of civilization and the crowding together of population turn the labor of man from agriculture to manufactures and commerce, and that these non-producers of food are steadily increasing in number both in our own country and in Europe, and that with their growth there is a corresponding increase in the number of the whole human family? Who shall feed these increasing millions? Where shall the food which is to sustain them be raised? The statistics I have given answer this question, so far as our own land is concerned.

What are the requirements for the growth of wheat? An English writer has answered the question:

"The possession of extensive fertile plains, a favorable climate, a moderate but not dense population, a convenient access to the sea, or facilities of transport by great rivers."

All these we have in the Northwest; joined to a dryness and coolness of the atmosphere, which bring to the highest physical development every form of life subjected to its operation.

There is one significant fact which stands out with great distinctness; it is this, that immigration, following its instincts, is pointing its column steadily toward the great Northwest. The ratio of increase of the whole nation from 1850 to 1860 was but 35½ per cent.; that of the West 68.25 per cent.; that of Wisconsin 150 per cent.; that of Minnesota 2,761 per cent.!

Here, then, we have the elements of this great question:

1. An increase in Europe and in our own country of the non-producers of food.
2. A decrease of the cereal crop in the now settled regions of the earth.
3. The possession in our inter-continental prairies of the greatest grain-producing region on the globe, lacking only hands to bring its incalculable riches to the light.
4. The existence in Europe of vast multitudes, enterprising, intelligent, industrious; eager to cross the Atlantic, and press forward in the footsteps of their brethren to the West and Northwest.

Shall we not lend the sanction of this Government to their migration? Shall not this Government, so greatly to be benefited by their coming, extend to them a helping hand, watch over them in their transit, care for them on their arrival, and facilitate their movements to the new lands of the West? All the evidences go to show that the immigration during the next decade will be greater than ever before known. It is not to be forgotten that the immigration between 1850 and 1860 was more than one half the total immigration since 1790.

With the blessing of Almighty God the result of this war cannot but be universal liberty and unending peace and prosperity throughout the land; and when those ends are attained the laborious populations of Europe will literally swarm to our shores.

Nor is this question without considerations which appeal directly to our selfish instincts. Hon. Robert J. Walker, in an article in the Continental Monthly, has shown that if we compute the annual immigration for the next ten years at the same rate as during the decade from 1850 to 1860, that is to say at 260,000 per annum, and estimate the value of the labor of each immigrant at thirty-three cents per day, it would give us a grand total in ten years of $1,430,000,000.

Throw wide the doors to immigration, encourage it, facilitate it, and in twenty years the results of the labors of the immigrants and their children will add to the wealth of the country a sum sufficient to pay the entire debt created by this war.

The bill I have introduced provides for the creation of a Bureau of Immigration for three things:

1. To faithfully execute the laws heretofore enacted by Congress for the protection of immigrants crossing the ocean.
2. To facilitate their movement to their destinations after landing by furnishing them necessary information and protecting them from fraud and imposition.
3. To superintend the disbursement of any sum appropriated by Congress or by any State Legislature to encourage immigration.

The bureau when established will be able to collect information and suggest measures which may guide subsequent legislation. I have hesitated to ask that Congress should advance any large sum of money to aid immigration, although such would seem to be the view of the President. I have therefore provided that States might place in the hands of the Commissioner funds to be used for that purpose, the immigration thereby obtained to go to such State. I am quite convinced that some of our western States will take advantage of the machinery of the bureau to increase their own population, while the money advanced might be in the nature of loans to the immigrants, secured in such way as would insure its return in the majority of cases. There are in England, and I suppose in other European States, emigrant societies, in which a sufficient fund is raised by small weekly contributions to pay the passage of the members. As the funds accumulate a member is selected by election, the most industrious and honest being chosen, who is expected to return his passage-money out of his first earnings after his arrival in this country. The fund thus returned is added to the additional accumulations, and the next time pays the passage of two members, and in this manner the process is carried on until all the members are enabled to escape from the house of poverty to the land of liberty and prosperity.

It might be in the power of the Commissioner to use the machinery of these societies in such way as to obtain by small loans the most deserving immigrants with little risk of loss—a comparatively small sum thus going through many hands and assisting many hundreds of persons. All this is, however, rather in the nature of suggestions to the Commissioner when appointed than of arguments in favor of the bill itself.

The bureau should be established. An interest which adds two millions and three quarters of a million to our population in ten years deserves to have some recognized head at the seat of this Government. An interest which can in twenty years pay off the national debt by the wealth added to the nation through the work of its own hands, deserves to be fostered, tenderly cared for, stimulated, and protected by every true friend of the country.

The southern revolution withdrew from the people of the North an incubus which had controlled and repressed them for fifty years. They are now rising for the first time to the dignity of a people whose greatness rests on the basis of free labor.

Appreciating the fact that the agriculture of the country is its first great interest, they have established a Bureau of Agriculture. Let them go one step further, and, conscious of the obligations due by a nation of immigrants, or the children of immigrants, to European immigration in the past, and mindful also of its enormous importance to the nation in the future, let them establish a Bureau of Immigration. With nearly one billion of unsettled lands on one side of the Atlantic, and with many millions of poor and oppressed people on the other, let them organize the exodus which needs must come, and build, if necessary, a bridge of gold across the chasm which divides them, that the chosen races of mankind may occupy the chosen lands of the world.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, I propose to state some of the reasons why I dissent from the views of the President, as expressed in his recent message, and especially some reasons why I dissent from his plan for the reconstruction of the Union embraced in his proclamation of amnesty. After the very able and full discussion of the questions arising out of those remarkable documents, it would be presumptuous in me to attempt to do more than restate, perhaps in a different form, some of the arguments which have already been adduced in opposition to the positions assumed by the Executive. For three years the people of the United States have been engaged in a war which, for magnitude of the armies in the field, and lavishness in the expenditure of money, has no parallel in modern history. The avowed object in inaugurating hostilities on the part of our Government was the suppression of "certain combinations formed to oppose the execution of the laws too powerful to be overcome by the ordinary course of judicial proceeding." In theory, the sole object in bringing a military force to bear upon these combinations was to overthrow and disarm them, to the end that the laws might be enforced. The Constitution of the United States empowers Congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Another clause of the Constitution enjoins upon the President to "see that the laws are faithfully executed." The General Government under these grants of power is in duty bound to suppress insurrection. The respective spheres of legislative and executive action in relation thereto are clearly laid down and defined by the Constitution. Congress must pass all necessary laws for raising, arming, and governing the forces to be employed against the insurgents. The President must see that the laws passed in this behalf are faithfully executed; and in cases of controverted constitutional questions arising out of the laws themselves, or the manner of their enforcement, the judicial department of the Government must settle the rights of the parties affected; of the Executive as well as the citizen. Keeping these plain and simple propositions in view, we can readily determine the duties of the President of the United States in conducting our military affairs. By the same rules we can also ascertain whether or not the military orders, proclamations, or executive "plans of reconstruction" are legitimate measures for the overthrow of combinations formed to obstruct the operation of the laws.

Before speaking more directly of this "plan," let us look a little at the previous acts and conduct of the Administration in reference to the rebellion, that we may with the more accuracy determine the effects likely to follow the means proposed. I admit that when our political institutions are in peril, as they now are, it is a matter of the very first importance that the entire country should have the fullest confidence in the chief executive officer of the Government, provided he is worthy of that confidence. But I have yet to learn that in a republican Government the imbecility or corruption of the President must be palliated before the people whose servant he is and to whom he is accountable for all his acts. President Lincoln in his inaugural address said:

"I have no purpose directly or indirectly to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so."

In his proclamation of April 15, 1861, calling out seventy-five thousand militia, which was the first call for troops made by him, the President used the language which I now read:

"I deem it proper to say that the first service assigned to the forces hereby called forth will probably be to repossess the forts, places, and property which have been seized from the Union; and in every event the utmost care will be observed, consistently with the objects aforesaid, to avoid any devastation of or interference with property or any disturbance of peaceful citizens in any part of the country."

Again, on the 22d day of July, 1861, immediately following the first disastrous battle of Bull Run, Congress, by an almost unanimous vote, passed what is known as the Crittenden resolution, declaring—

"That this war is not waged in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

The extracts which I have read from the inaugural address, the first proclamation calling out troops, and the Crittenden resolution, may, with great propriety, be denominated the first war platform of this Administration. During the first six or eight months after the commencement of hostilities we had no intimation from official sources that the war was to be diverted from its proper course in aid of the enforcement of the laws into a crusade to free the negroes, or to interfere with and overthrow the rights and established institutions of any of the States. High officials, with the oath to protect and defend the Constitution fresh on their lips, had not yet learned that there was some sort of an indefinite and undefinable "war power" to be found somewhere within the limits of a latitudinous construction of the Constitution that could release them from the obligations of that oath; that under this "war power" they might do that which they had "no lawful right to do;" that while the people are bound to obey all the laws and all the edicts and proclamations of the President, constitutional and unconstitutional, the chief Executive of the United States, rising above the ordinary level of erring mortals, had been imbued with authority from above or beneath to override and nullify constitutions and laws at his sovereign will and pleasure.

Mr. Chairman, the great mass of the people of the United States are distinguished for their love of country; are firmly attached to that form of Government instituted by the men who, fresh from the sanguinary fields of the Revolution, could yet guard the sacred cause of civil and religious liberty. To maintain the rightful authority of that Government and to preserve their liberties, having their only sure guarantee in the written Constitution under which that authority can alone be exercised, they have always been ready to make every sacrifice required of them by the dictates of the highest patriotism. Actuated by these sentiments, when this Administration demanded the purse and the sword in the sacred name of Union, they were given without stint or reservation. In return for their treasure and the blood of their sons, the people only required of their public servants that the Constitution of the United States should remain inviolate and the union of the States unbroken. With the highest professions of patriotism on the part of the President and his friends the pledge was given in the beginning of our civil war that these objects of solicitude should be carefully protected and maintained. In response to the assurance thus given, each call for troops to fill the broken and bleeding ranks of the Army was met by the swelling tide of freemen, swarming to the field of carnage and of death, their hearts being fired with a holy zeal, under the belief that the sacred cause of the Union invoked the sacrifice. Even the demands of the tax-gatherer, grasping for a portion of the frugal meal of the children of toil, have been submitted to without a murmur because these contributions to the public Treasury were to be consecrated to the sacred purpose of saving the Union. When the withering hand of arbitrary power was first stretched over the peaceful citizens of the northern States, and they were dragged from their homes the victims of personal or political malice, the fears of the people were aroused by the dark shadow of a hateful despotism whose figure was seen in the dim distance marching on with cautious but unerring step, trampling down in its course every safeguard of personal liberty. The apprehensions of the people were however quieted by the assurance that these things were done for the sake of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, has this Administration faithfully executed the high trust reposed in it by the country? If it has it ought to and will receive the reward due to the faithful public servant; its errors will be forgiven and forgotten, its virtues cherished and remembered. If it has proven false to its professions, and deceived and betrayed a too confiding people, it will and should receive their condemnation. This message unfolds more fully the purposes of the executive branch of the Government than anything that has preceded it. In order that we may form a correct judgment, let us examine this document in the light of reason and of candor.

The first impression formed on reading the President's proclamation of amnesty is that the progress of putting down the rebellion has not kept pace with the too ardent expectations of the people. The very modest pretensions of the President as to the success of the means employed by him for the overthrow of the rebel power do not seem to be justified by the facts given us. True, he runs a parallel, showing the present condition of affairs, as compared with the situation eleven months prior to the date of this message, with the evident design of showing a great improvement in the prospects of the Union. When we come to examine the premises upon which he bases his favorable conclusions, we cannot but be struck with the evident satisfaction with which he refers to the success of his party as one indication of the advancement of the Union cause. Whether this success shall turn out to be an element of strength or of weakness in the pending struggle, depends on the Administration and its friends. If they continue in future the course they have followed in the past, the result of the elections in their favor will not perceptibly weaken the cause of the rebellion. Again, the success of the proclamation of emancipation, in giving practical freedom to a large number of slaves, with the ultimate prospect that the whole negro population in the States where insurrection prevails will soon be in the enjoyment of the same inestimable blessing, is cited as a notable instance of progress in suppressing the rebellion. Then, too, in the border States the people are growing restless in the cause of emancipation. Hence, the rebellion is rapidly disappearing. To a person not wholly satisfied that the President is "honest," the assignment of these causes of improvement in our condition would be apt to create at least the suspicion that he looked upon these facts more in the light of a partisan than of a patriot. They all have a direct bearing upon the future success of the Republican party. But let us go back in the history of this rebellion two years and a half, and see if, according to the President's own showing, we are not much further from reunion now than we were then. At the opening of the extra session of Congress in July, 1861, the President informed the country in his message that—

"It may well be questioned whether there is to-day a majority of the legally qualified voters of any State, except perhaps South Carolina, in favor of disunion. There is much reason to believe that the Union men are the majority in many if not in every other one of the so-called seceded States. The contrary has not been demonstrated in any one of them. It is ventured to affirm this even of Virginia and Tennessee; for the result of an election held in military camps, where the bayonets are all on one side of the question voted upon, can scarcely be considered as demonstrating popular sentiment."

This statement of the President was received by the country as true. And when we remember that until the voice of reason had been hushed by the clash of arms a large majority of the people in most of those States had, upon every opportunity, expressed themselves satisfied with the Union, we must acknowledge that the President had substantial grounds for the statement he made. Since then we have had over two years and a half of bloody war. The battles of Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Vicksburg, Malvern Hill, the first and second battles of Bull Run, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Chattanooga, and many others of less note, have been fought. The blood of the young men of the country has been poured out in reckless profusion. Many thousands of homes, the abodes of happiness, with the family circle hitherto unbroken, have been made desolate by the cruel hand of war. The weeds of widowhood and the misery and want of orphanage meet the eye on every hand. The tax-gatherer crowds the highways of the country and the streets of the cities. His footfalls are heard in the hovels of the poor and on the marble steps of the rich. His exactions fall upon the luxurious repasts and gorgeous equipage of the millionaire and upon the frugal meal and plain dress of the humble. Even the widow's mite is required to replenish the depleted Treasury. A debt of $2,000,000,000 has been contracted by the Government, and the foundation laid to swell that debt to double its present proportions; thus laying a burden upon future generations that will in all time to come grind the labor of this country in the dust. By looking at the condition of the tax-ridden people of Europe, we behold the picture of what our own country is soon to be.

Taxation and tyranny are synonymous terms. The sum paid by each person into the coffers of the Government is the amount charged to him for the protection he receives of the Government. When the laws of the country are honestly and fairly administered, the burdens upon the citizen will be light, and he is more than compensated by the benefits he receives. But when the Government is administered for the advantage of the few; when the people are taxed for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of the pampered partisans of an Administration, such taxation becomes wrong and oppressive. And whenever the burden thus cast upon the people is so great that some portion of the money that ought to be applied to the support of the family must go into the public Treasury, a storm of indignation will arise that will sweep from power the men who would take the bread from famishing children. No Government has a right to pursue a policy that will fix permanently upon the country a system of taxation which impoverishes labor, and introduces want and misery into the household of the honest man who by the sweat of his face earns his bread. When an extraordinary emergency arises, requiring a large expenditure of money by the Government, if the crisis be controlled by honest statesmanship, only temporary sacrifices will be required of the people, and these will be met by them cheerfully for the sake of the permanent tranquillity and happiness which are to follow. But if, in order to subdue the inflammation of the body-politic, the patient is to be reduced to a skeleton by blistering and bleeding, and the Constitution is to be shattered and destroyed by copious doses of poisonous drugs, such vicious remedies will be found to be worse than the original disease. It would be far preferable to allow the political system to fall in pieces, leaving the fragments pure and sound, than thus to corrupt and eventually destroy the whole.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is a brief outline of what we have done and suffered, giving but a glimpse of the consequences that are to follow the innovations which have been made upon our political institutions, since the President made the announcement at the threshold of the war, that there was "much reason to believe that the Union men are [were] the majority in many, if not in every other one, of the so-called seceded States." What have we gained by all these sacrifices of blood and of treasure? If the Union cause has been advanced by the means employed in any degree commensurate with these sacrifices, then indeed the country may bear with patience the more trying scenes through which we are yet to pass. In drawing my conclusions upon the subject, I shall rely wholly upon the testimony of the President himself. We have already seen, by the President's message of July, 1861, that at that time more than one half of the people in each of the rebellious States, except South Carolina, were ready to render a willing obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States whenever the force of rebel arms to which they were subjected should be removed. Was not this a hopeful view? If proper means had been employed from that time forth, could not the rebellion have been easily and speedily suppressed? We had upon one side the regular Government, with twenty million people in the States not in insurrection. Having complete command of the ocean, the markets of the world were open to us for the purchase of everything needed in prosecuting the war. Our supremacy at sea also enabled us greatly to cripple our enemies in procuring supplies from foreign countries, and in preventing them from receiving such supplies. The principal wealth of the nation was to be found in the northern States. The credit of the Government being good, that wealth was at its perfect command. The hearts of the people of the States adhering to the old Union being true to the Government under which their prosperity had been so great and their liberties and happiness so secure, every man was ready to peril all to save that Government. On the other side were six million people, with a government not yet fully inaugurated, without money, without credit, without ships, scantily provided with the munitions of war, their ports closed by a blockade maintained by a sufficient force to command the respect of the civilized world; and, worse yet for them, with more than one half their own people, held in subjection by the strong arm of power, ready at any moment when that power should be broken to join hands with the armies of the Union and complete the overthrow of the rebel power by reestablishing State governments under the Federal Constitution, and thus maintaining the Union in all its original proportions.

Mr. Chairman, the rebel power being so weak as we have seen in July, 1861, ought it not ere this to have been overthrown? We had twenty-three million people on the side of the Government, three millions of whom were scattered throughout the States in revolt. Only three millions of the entire population of the country were willing adherents of the cause of the rebellion; and each one of these had a neighbor whose prayer was for the salvation of the Union, and whose eye would brighten with joy at sight of the stars and stripes waving again beneath a southern sun. How easy would it have been for our overwhelming numbers, seconded by one half the population of the insurrectionary districts, marching on in the spirit of the President's inaugural address and of the proclamation of April 15, 1861, careful "to avoid any devastation, any destruction of or interference with property, or any disturbance of peaceful citizens in any part of the country," and carrying out the policy of the Crittenden resolution, to have swept before them every vestige of armed opposition, leaving in their rear State governments upheld by Union citizens, with a majority in each to maintain such governments. Unfortunately for this country such has not been the policy pursued.

Upon the meeting of Congress in December, 1861, commenced the struggle of the radicals to force their measures upon the country. The constitutional doctrine of the inaugural address relative to slavery was spurned. Instead of the conciliatory policy of the proclamation of April 15, 1861, guaranteeing the protection of property and of peaceful citizens by our armies, a confiscation act was placed on the statute-book which, if carried out, would not only virtually destroy the institution of slavery, but beggar almost every family in the South and render their country a desolate waste. The Crittenden resolution which had received the solemn sanction of the same men at the extra session in July, 1861, was violated with impunity; and a determination was manifested by them that the local institutions of the States should not be respected, and that the war should never cease until the laws and institutions of the southern States were made to conform to the opinions of the abolitionists. The slavery question, upon which the southern people had always been more jealous of Federal interference than on any other, was brought more prominently before Congress than ever before. The partisan schemes of the Republican party, some of which were regarded as unconstitutional and ruinous to the country by nearly one half of the northern people, were pressed upon Congress and the country with intemperate zeal and a manner most offensive. Such of their schemes as they could not carry out by legislation they besought the President, under the "war power," to enforce upon the people at the point of the sword. Though sometimes repelled, by bringing "pressure" to bear upon the weak nerves of the Executive they always triumphed in the end.

Mr. Chairman, if the change of policy from conservative to radical has improved the condition of the country, the President, being responsible for the change, will make its benefits appear in as strong a light as possible. He shall speak for himself. In his message delivered to Congress at the opening of the present session, the President says:

"The rebel borders are pressed still further back, and by the complete opening of the Mississippi the country dominated by the rebellion is divided into distinct parts, with no practical connection between them. Tennessee and Arkansas have been substantially cleared of insurgent control, and influential citizens of each, owners of slaves and advocates of slavery at the beginning of the rebellion, now declare openly for emancipation in the respective States. Of those States not included in the emancipation proclamation, Maryland and Missouri, neither of which three years ago would tolerate any restraint upon the extension of slavery into new Territories, only dispute now as to the best mode of removing it within their own limits. Of those who were slaves at the beginning of the rebellion, full one hundred thousand are now in the United States military service, about one half of which number actually bear arms in the ranks, thus giving the double advantage of taking so much labor from the insurgent cause and supplying the places which otherwise must be filled with so many white men. So far as tested, it is difficult to say they are not as good soldiers as any."

Here are the substantial fruits of all the expenditure of blood and treasure since the announcement was made by the President that in all the insurrectionary States except South Carolina a majority of the people were favorable to the Union. To him whose heart's only desire in this contest is to see the Union restored under the Constitution, with the reestablishment of the former peace, happiness, and prosperity of this country, what has been the gain of these long months of toil and suffering? True, Tennessee and Arkansas have been substantially cleared of insurgent control, and some of their citizens who were formerly furious advocates of slavery extension have doubtless been conquered by this Administration, whether by weapons manufactured by Secretary Chase or by heavier metal it is not my province to inquire. But what has become of the majority of the citizens of each of these States who in July, 1861, stood ready when the rebel power should be removed to rally around the old flag, and to again place the governments of their States in harmony with the Constitution of the United States? I think that the loss of these men, who were honestly for the Union two years ago, is not well supplied by all the negroes now in the service of the Government, with whatever aid may be received from the few white men who will swear to support all of the President's proclamations.

The coöperation of a majority of the citizens of these States in the attempt now being made to reorganize State governments would fix Tennessee and Arkansas so firmly in the Union as to place them beyond the possibility of rebel control.

The relative merit of conservatism and radicalism in their effects in restoring the Union may be easily summed up from the President's messages. In July, 1861, when the horrible phantom of this fratricidal war had barely made itself visible to the people, more than one half of the voters in each of the insurrectionary States, save one, were firmly attached to the Union. In December, 1863, after two years and a half of war, most of the time under a radical policy, the President thinks that perhaps one tenth of the population, in some of the rebel States, may be almost ready to range themselves on the side of the Union. Should the Union cause continue to recede for two years to come as it has during the two years last past, the President will be compelled to draw on his African friends for loyal men to fill the offices.

Mr. Chairman, the proclamation of amnesty accompanying the President's recent annual message is totally at variance with the Constitution of the United States. If, as all conservative men claim, the seceded States are in the Union, their ordinances of secession being null and void because repugnant to the Constitution, then clearly Mr. Lincoln has no right to prescribe terms upon which State governments shall be allowed to exist. If, on the other hand, as claimed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens,] the seceded States are out of the Union, and the territory within the confederate States is foreign territory, the President has no right to reorganize State governments over that territory upon any terms, because the Constitution expressly provides that "Congress may admit new States into the Union," and when States are carved out of this foreign territory they are new States. This executive plan of reconstruction, like all the outrages perpetrated by this Administration, is promulgated in the name of the Union.

The people have submitted to so many infringements of their chartered rights, because each separate act of usurpation was alleged to be necessary to the success of the Union cause, that the men in power have become bold and reckless in their assaults upon the Constitution. We have had many instances of wanton oppression of individuals by the President and others acting under his authority. The freedom of the press has been stricken down. Citizens, arrested without warrant of law, have been denied the privilege of "a speedy public trial by an impartial jury" of the country. Others have been banished from their homes for freely canvassing the conduct of men in public office. Freemen have been driven from the polls by military forces acting under the orders of the Administration, whereby men have been elected to seats on this floor in opposition to the known will of their constituents. And finally, to cap the climax of usurpation and tyranny, the President, seeking of his party a nomination for reelection, attempts to subject to his absolute control ten States, by excluding all citizens from a participation in the elections except those who have sworn base subserviency to his will.

This proposition coming on the eve of a presidential election, made by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, who is also a candidate for President, is the most alarming and dangerous attempt that has ever been made in this country to override the will of the people. An election held under such circumstances would be worse than a mockery. Where the necessity of going through the empty forms of an election when no man is allowed to approach the polls unless he is bound by the solemnities of an oath to support the policy of one of the candidates? He cannot vote against that policy without disqualifying himself as a voter, for he is not only required to take the oath, but, if he fails to comply with it, in doing which he must support the President's policy, he is no longer a voter. Call you that an election, when each voter gives expression not to his own will but the will of the President? If the President has the right, under the power given him in the Constitution of the United States "to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses committed against the United States," to require an oath of the criminal that he will support the measures of a certain political party, may he not also exact an oath from him to support a particular candidate to carry out that policy? If the latter condition may be affixed and applied to all the citizens of ten States without reference to the guilt or innocence of the parties, why not dispense with the elections entirely, and as a condition of pardon for some real or supposed offense require the people of those States to take an oath to support and maintain the President in office for life or for another term of four years without any election at all? And if the President may require an oath from all the citizens of ten States to support his partisan policy, as a condition precedent to the exercise of the elective franchise, may he not require a similar oath of all the citizens of all the States? Your answer to this is, that they have not been guilty of treason, hence do not require executive clemency to restore them to forfeited rights. The proclamation of amnesty requires Union men who have never withdrawn their allegiance from the Government to take a felon's oath before they are permitted to exercise the privileges of American citizens. I read from the proclamation:

"Whereas it is now desired by some persons heretofore engaged in said rebellion to resume their allegiance to the United States, and to reinaugurate loyal State governments within and for their respective States: Therefore,

"I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have, directly or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except, as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and in property cases where rights of third parties shall have intervened, and upon the condition that every such person shall take and subscribe an oath, and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate; and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear, in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repealed, modified, or held void by Congress, or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves, so long and so far as not modified and declared void by decision of the Supreme Court. So help me God!

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid, and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in nowise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.'"

By reference to this proclamation it will be seen that no persons are invited "to reinaugurate loyal State governments in the States named except persons heretofore engaged in said rebellion." Hence the citizen who has always been true to the Union under the Constitution is not permitted to take part in the elections for the reorganization of State governments until he shall have acknowledged himself guilty of treason to the Government and bound himself by oath to support the partisan policy of the Administration. As this plan of reconstruction, as it is called by Mr. Lincoln, is only a scheme to force upon the country his reelection to the Presidency, the exclusion of men from the ballot-box who have not the taint of treason upon their garments, while the traitor, his hand still red with the blood of our dead soldiers, is invited, upon binding himself by oath to support the policy of the President, to deposit his vote, is significant of the position of the true Union men of the South. They are opposed to the wicked and ruinous course of the Administration. They know that the Union cannot be preserved under its radical policy. If Mr. Lincoln was the man of their choice for President they would not be crowded from the polls by men whose recent and sudden conversion from the service of Jeff. Davis to the cause of abolitionism creates a suspicion that their motives may not be pure.

With his usual propensity for joking, the President facetiously says that "when a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid, and not having since violated it, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in nowise contravening said oath," the protection of the General Government is to be extended to such State government, and it is to be shielded from domestic violence. No person except Mr. Lincoln, who is in the habit of jesting about matters of the gravest importance, would pretend to call a government republican that excluded nine tenths of the people from all participation in its affairs, and permitted the other tenth to act only in obedience to the rules prescribed by one man. I always understood a republican government to be one in which the voice of a majority of the people was necessary to the election of their law-makers. I take it for granted that the General Government will have no light duty to perform in protecting such State governments as the President proposes to organize in the seceded States from domestic violence. The nine tenths whose rights of person and of property are to be at the absolute mercy of the one tenth will not rest quietly under the dominance of their mercenary and cowardly masters. The people of the loyal States will be taxed to the full extent of human endurance to enable the President's proconsuls to rule over their countrymen in the seceded States. A system of rotten-borough representation will be ingrafted upon our Constitution that will fill both Houses of Congress with political mendicants whose subservience to their master, the President, will only be equalled by their treachery to our republican institutions. The debauched minions who will come up here under this policy, the odor of treason still rank upon their garments, false to the Union and the Constitution in their hour of greatest peril, false to the cause of rebellion only when its power began to wane, purged of their crimes against the country by pledging themselves to be equally false to constitutional liberty, will pollute with their corruptions every department of the Government. Base sycophants, basking in the sunshine of executive favor, will "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" under the guardianship of usurped authority; "that thrift may follow fawning."

Why should such a premium be offered to men to rebel against the Government? According to this plan of reconstruction one man in South Carolina, Georgia, or Mississippi will exert as much political influence in the Government as twenty men in Illinois. The ratio of representation is based on population where all are free. In the States named more than one half the population are negroes, to be free according to this plan of reconstruction, and hence enumerated in making up the ratio of representation in Congress and the electoral college. One tenth of the voters under the election laws of the State existing at the time of secession, representing less than one twentieth of the inhabitants enumerated as a basis of congressional apportionment, elect the members of Congress and electors for President and Vice President, while in Illinois the voters represent the whole population, except a few blacks and persons convicted of certain crimes. Hence the vote of the pardoned traitor of Mississippi, who is bound by oath to support this Administration, counts as much as the united votes of twenty freemen of Illinois who are fighting the battles of their country and paying their taxes for the support of the Government. Great and loud complaints were made in times past by the party friends of the gentlemen on the other side of the House because of the three-fifths rule, as it was called, by which the non-voters of the South had a partial representation on this floor. This Republican Administration now proposes a system under which the negro population of the South will have an equal representation with the white population of the North, and, under its rules, excluding nine tenths of the voters, each person casting the negro vote of the South will be equal to ten white voters in the North!

Is this the entertainment to which the loyal people of this country were invited? Is this the Union for which so much blood and treasure have been expended? Is this the "Union as it ought to be" which has been promised, in comparison with which the "Union as it was" is a hateful thing, fit only for traitors, who refuse to hate the sworn henchmen of Lincoln, and the "peace men," who desire the reestablishment of the Union formed by Washington and Madison and their compeers?

Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that, in addition to the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, persons who have been engaged in the rebellion, desiring to avail themselves of executive clemency, must also take an oath that they "will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion, having reference to slaves?" The President says that this test is required in order "to separate the opposing elements, so as to build only from the sound." In other words, the man who thinks the "Pope's bull against the comet" is not calculated to repel its threatened approach, and prevent the reappearance of any more of its kind, is not capable of self-government; therefore, "I, Abraham Lincoln, do declare and make known that no man within my dominions, so wanting in credulity, shall be permitted, at the next election, to vote for my competitor for President. True, I will not coerce any person to take the required oath. The election shall be perfectly free. Every man who has taken an oath to support me and my policy can vote without molestation. If, in the exercise of your free will in the premises, you refuse to follow my dictation, you may perhaps be plundered by my friends; for the opposing elements have been separated, and you are of the Gentiles, you are not sound;" the reelection of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency by such means as these would be as great an outrage upon the rights of the people of this country as was the first election of Louis Napoleon upon the rights of the people of France.

The President says that "on examination of this proclamation it will appear, as is believed, that nothing is attempted beyond what is amply justified by the Constitution." Justified by the Constitution! How? Where? Will some one point out the clause in that instrument which authorizes the President to fix the qualification of voters, to strike down the laws and institutions of the States, to impoverish the people of one third of the Union without regard to guilt or innocence, age, sex, or condition? I challenge the champions of the Administration in this House to show by the most liberal rules of construction any warrant whatever in the Constitution for what is contemplated by this proclamation. Sir, the framers of the Constitution, instead of authorizing the President to disfranchise the people of the States for opposing emancipation, actually protected slavery by requiring the return of the fugitive from labor in case of his escape from one State to another. There is a law now upon your statute-book to carry this provision of the Constitution into effect; and the President, who is requiring the citizens of ten States to take an oath to aid him in forcing emancipation upon the people, is himself bound by oath to see that the fugitive slave law is faithfully executed. This institution is recognized by the Constitution of the United States as existing in certain States "under the laws thereof;" and the President would compel the citizens of such States to disregard those laws, when the Constitution, which he is sworn to support, requires him to respect, and in a certain contingency to support and enforce, those laws.

Mr. Chairman, the President seems to think because the power is given him to "grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States," that therefore he may attach such conditions to a pardon as will not only bind the criminal to a certain course of political action, but that he has the further right to require the citizens of the State not guilty of crime to comply with the same conditions or be disfranchised. Did the framers of the Constitution ever dream that such a construction would be given to this grant of power? Was it intended that this act of executive clemency should be used as an engine to advance the personal or political ends of the President? I will not stop to inquire whether or not a conditional pardon may be granted. Nor do I question the propriety of requiring those who have actually been engaged in the rebellion to take an oath to support the Constitution before receiving pardon. I understand the reason for investing the Executive with this power is that the rules of law are necessarily inflexible, giving judgment upon the acts and motives of men and yielding nothing to circumstances of mitigation surrounding particular individuals. To afford relief in cases of peculiar hardship, the President, whose duty it is to see that the laws are executed, is permitted to temper their harsh sentences with mercy, by interposing a pardon. Such is the theory upon which this power rests. The Executive may grant the pardon, but must not attach conditions in derogation of the rights of others.

For instance, if the President pardon John Doe, who has been sentenced for the crime of treason, it would not be proper to put a condition in the pardon requiring the recipient of executive clemency to take his neighbors' property, or to trespass upon their lands, or to confederate with others and exclude them from the polls. In short, persons guilty of crime who have been relieved from its consequences by an act of clemency cannot, in accordance with our institutions or those of any other civilized nation, be set apart as the exclusive governing power of the State or nation. In some countries there is a nobility established on the basis of great service to the State, either by themselves or their ancestors; but I know of no country, in ancient or modern times, that has made crime the only passport to office and honor. Yet the President, under the pretext of pardoning all the people of ten States, many being guilty, but not one of whom stands convicted of crime against the United States, and a large portion of whom are as innocent as any gentleman on this floor, undertakes to nullify the constitutions and laws of those States; to revolutionize their social systems, and finally to disfranchise nine tenths of their people, and to bring the whole power of the Federal Government to bear to enable the one tenth to rule over the remainder. To state the proposition is sufficient to stamp it with infamy. As a specimen of cool impudence, I will read the proclamation of Major General Banks ordering an election for State officers in Louisiana:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
NEW ORLEANS, January 11, 1864.

To the People of Louisiana:

I. In pursuance of authority vested in me by the President of the United States, and upon consultation with many representative men of different interests, being fully assured that more than a tenth of the population desire the earliest possible restoration of Louisiana to the Union, I invite the loyal citizens of the State qualified to vote in public affairs, as hereinafter prescribed, to assemble in the election precincts designated by law, or at such places as may hereafter be established, on the 22d day of February, 1864, to cast their votes for the election of State officers herein named, namely: 1. Governor. 2. Lieutenant Governor. 3. Secretary of State. 4. Treasurer. 5. Attorney General. 6. Superintendent of Public Instruction. 7. Auditor of Public Accounts; who shall when elected, for the time being, and until others are appointed by competent authority, constitute the civil government of the State, under the constitution and laws of Louisiana, except so much of the said constitution and laws as recognize, regulate, or relate to slavery, which being inconsistent with the present condition of public affairs, and plainly inapplicable to any class of persons now existing within its limits, must be suspended, and they are therefore and hereby declared to be inoperative and void. This proceeding is not intended to ignore the right of property existing prior to the rebellion, nor to preclude the claim for compensation of loyal citizens for losses sustained by enlistments or other authorized acts of the Government.

II. The oath of allegiance prescribed by the President's proclamation, with the condition affixed to the elective franchise by the constitution of Louisiana, will constitute the qualification of voters in this election. Officers elected by them will be duly installed in their offices on the 4th day of March, 1864.

III. The registration of voters, effected under the direction of the military governor and the several Union associations, not inconsistent with the proclamation or other orders of the President, are confirmed and approved.

IV. In order that the organic law of the State may be made to conform to the will of the people, and harmonize with the spirit of the age, as well as to maintain and preserve the ancient landmarks of civil and religious liberty, an election of delegates to a convention for the revision of the constitution will be held on the first Monday of April, 1864. The basis of representation, the number of delegates, and the details of election, will be announced in subsequent orders.

V. Arrangements will be made for the early election of members of Congress for the State.

VI. The fundamental law of the State is martial law. It is competent and just for the Government to surrender to the people, at the earliest possible moment, so much of military power as may be consistent with the success of military operation; to prepare the way, by prompt and wise measures, for the full restoration of the State to the Union and its power to the people; to restore their ancient and unsurpassed prosperity; to enlarge the scope of agricultural and commercial industry, and to extend and confirm the dominion of rational liberty.

It is not within human power to accomplish these results without some sacrifice of individual prejudices and interests. Problems of state, too complicated for the human mind, have been solved by the national cannon. In great civil convulsions, the agony of strife enters the souls of the innocent as well as the guilty.

The Government is subject to the law of necessity, and must consult the condition of things rather than the preferences of men, and if so be that its purposes are just and its measures wise it has the right to demand that questions of personal interest and opinion shall be subordinate to the public good. When the national existence is at stake, and the liberties of the people in peril, faction is treason.

The methods herein proposed submit the whole question of government directly to the people—first, by the election of executive officers faithful to the Union, to be followed by a loyal representation in both Houses of Congress; and then by a convention which will confirm the action of the people, and recognize the principles of freedom in the organic law. This is the wish of the President.

The anniversary of Washington's birth is a fit day for the commencement of so grand a work. The immortal Father of his Country was never guided by a more just and benignant spirit than that of his successor in office, the President of the United States. In the hour of our trial let us heed his admonitions!

Louisiana in the opening of her history sealed the integrity of the Union by conferring upon its Government the valley of the Mississippi. In the war for independence upon the sea, she crowned a glorious struggle against the first maritime Power of the world by a victory unsurpassed in the annals of war.

Let her people now announce to the world the coming restoration of the Union, in which the ages that follow us have a deeper interest than our own, by the organization of a free government, and her name will be immortal!

N. P. BANKS,

Major General Commanding.

"In pursuance of authority vested in him by the President," this Major General proceeds to call an election for State officers of Louisiana at a time and in a manner different from those prescribed by law. He also fixes the qualifications of voters, and causes a registry to be made in opposition to the fundamental law of the State. Then with one stroke of his pen he declares that certain provisions of the constitution of Louisiana are inoperative and void. Finally, he graciously informs the people that "the immortal Father of his Country was never guided by a more just and benignant spirit than that of his successor in office, the President of the United States." This latter statement is important in several particulars, but chiefly because it contains information that has always heretofore been carefully concealed from the people. It will doubtless be of invaluable service to the loyal people of that State in pointing out their duty in making a nomination for President, as well as in voting for the nominee! An intimation coming from such high authority will not probably be lost upon the intensely loyal patriots who will participate in organizing a State government under this proclamation.

Instructions have been sent to General Steele, in Arkansas, to pursue the same course in that State that has been adopted in Louisiana. Sir, when I see the very pillars of our Republic thus tottering to their fall under the blows of one to whom the people confided the sacred trust of guarding and protecting their rights and liberties, my mind is filled with gloom, and the future of this country, to my vision, is shrouded in mystery and darkness.

Mr. Chairman, I am a friend of the Union; my love for it is so strong that I am not willing to give up a single State. When I see a hand raised to strike down and blot out a single star from the flag of my country, whether the blow be directed by the traitor in arms or by a more insidious enemy seeking to effect the same end by undermining and subverting the Constitution, I will interpose my feeble efforts to ward off the blow. I would save the Union, because the Union is necessary to secure the prosperity, the liberties, and the happiness of the people. I do not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that "he who now wishes to reestablish the Union as it was," and to retain "the Constitution as it is," is guilty "of attempting to enslave his fellow-men." Neither do I agree with him in that other sentiment, that "the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is is an atrocious idea; it is man-stealing." I will not take the responsibility of charging Washington and Madison and Hamilton and their compatriots with forming a Constitution with the design of enslaving their fellow-men; nor will I charge them with harboring "an atrocious idea," or with "man-stealing." In order to establish this Union they left each State to regulate for itself the status of the negro within its limits. Believing, as I do, that they acted wisely, I am willing to hasten the day of peace and reunion by following their example. If I had believed that a rigid adherence to the Constitution as it is would have entailed upon me the crime of man-stealing, or of enslaving my fellow-men, I would not have been guilty of the "atrocious" act of taking the oath as a member of this body to support that Constitution.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House say that they too are for the Union, and some of them are so exclusive in their Unionism that they are not disposed to accept the labors of gentlemen on this side in its behalf. They are for such an unconditional Union that they would not only force ten southern States out of the Union, but would also treat with scorn and contempt a million and a half of voters in the northern States! The Union was established in a spirit of conciliation and compromise. The wise men who formed our Government were quick to discern that in order to maintain republican institutions, founded on the consent of the people, the interests and prejudices of all sections of the country must be consulted, so far as might be consistent with the general purposes for which the Government was formed. The men now in power, discarding the teachings of a sound philosophy, as well as the example of the founders of the Government, undertake to restore union and harmony to a divided and distracted country by the most intolerant proscription of all who differ with them in opinion, and by demanding fealty to their own most fatal, ruinous, and extreme doctrines, as the only true standard of loyalty. Can the Union ever be restored in that way? Do not this House and the country know that persistence in such a course leads to bankruptcy, anarchy, and ultimate despotism?

If you are not for the Union as it was, what sort of Union are you for? Is it the Union as it ought to be for which you are fighting? Pray tell the country, ye pure and unconditional Unionists, who can't endure the Union as our fathers formed it, what sort of Union you will form. Is it to be a Union without States, without habeas corpus, without trial by jury, without free speech or free press, without a free ballot? And if you do not all quite agree among yourselves as to what the Union ought to be, who will decide between you? Remember that "a house divided against itself cannot stand." I have no doubt but you can agree among yourselves about the irrepressible negro; but questions will force themselves upon you at some time affecting the interests of white men, and perhaps you may differ upon such questions. For instance, the President, in speaking of his plan of reconstruction, says, "On examination of this proclamation it will appear, as is believed, that nothing is attempted beyond what is amply justified by the Constitution." The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in speaking of the same plan, says:

"In details we do not quite agree, but his plan of reconstruction assumes the same general grounds. It proposes to treat the rebel territory as a conqueror alone would treat it. His plan is wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution."

Here we find the "opposing elements" are separated, and who is to decide which is "the sound?" The President assumes that his plan is "amply justified by the Constitution." The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says this same plan "is wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution." In one thing the plan proposed by the President and the one proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means are in perfect harmony: they are both in open and flagrant violation of the Constitution.

The great difficulty with the Republican party in their pretended efforts to put down the rebellion consists in a failure on their part to comprehend what constitutes the rebellion. The negro is not the cause of the rebellion; neither is slavery. Questions arising out of slavery have been used by designing men to inflame the passions of the people with a view to precipitating them into revolution. But the doctrine promulgated a few years ago, of which I believe our present distinguished Secretary of State may claim the paternity, that there is a higher law than the Constitution, which ought to control the political conduct of the people, is the corner-stone upon which the rebellion was built. Secession is the "higher law" carried into effect upon a large scale—a most odious, ruinous, and inexcusable application of this fatal heresy. Mr. Lincoln, when he announced in his Springfield speech in 1858 "that the Union could not endure permanently part slave and part free," was educating the public mind in the rudiments of the "higher law," because the Constitution is based upon the principle that a part of the States may be slave and a part free. Old John Brown, in his attempt to excite insurrection in Virginia, was carrying out in practice the theories of the men who urged upon the country the "higher law" as a rule of conduct for the citizen. Garrison, when he enunciated the "atrocious" sentiment that the "Constitution is a league with hell and a covenant with death," was "firing the northern heart," to the end that the people might array themselves under the banner of the higher law, and in opposition to the rightful authority of the Government. The underground railroads all over the land were incorporated under the higher law. Unfortunately for the country, at a moment of excitement in the South, growing out of the election to the Presidency of an exponent of the "higher law" as taught in the North, the people of the South, many of whom had received lessons in the same pernicious school, were precipitated into revolution. The result is that the land is drenched in fraternal blood. To stay the tide of revolution now sweeping over the entire country this subtle poison must be extracted from our political system, or its effects must be neutralized and destroyed.

Mr. Chairman, no test of loyalty should be prescribed other than "obedience to the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof." If every man in the Government were true to this test, there would be no rebellion in this country. The odious and unconstitutional conscription law might be repealed. Instead of taxing their ingenuity in devising the means whereby the largest amount of money, in the shape of taxes, can be extorted from the labor and industry of the country, members of Congress might devote their time and talents to such legislation as would add to the happiness and prosperity of the people.

"The Constitution as it is" furnishes all the safeguards necessary to the security of life, liberty, and property. "The Union as it was" gave us a character and standing among the nations of the earth sufficient to shield us from insult and injury by foreign Governments. For over seventy years the people of the United States lived and prospered within the Union, as organized under the Constitution, as no people ever prospered before. The rights of the States and the rights of the citizen were preserved in all their constitutional vigor. The legitimate authority of the General Government met with no serious opposition, either from States or individuals, because within the limited scope of that authority there was no rein given to oppression or tyranny. When the tempter came, like the serpent in the garden, and whispered into the ears of the people that the fruit forbidden by the fathers of the Government to be touched was "pleasant to the taste," and that its use would add wisdom to the understanding, like our mother Eve too many of them gave heed to the voice of the slimy reptile. Though we have not, in consequence of that disobedience, fallen from so great an estate as did our first parents, yet the result is this deplorable civil war and the probable loss of constitutional liberty. And still the expounders of the "higher law" continue to press forward in their destructive and criminal career. The man who raises his voice in behalf of the Constitution of his country does so at the risk of imprisonment or banishment at the hands of this Administration; and if he escapes the vindictive persecution of the chief Executive the entire corps of thieves and plunderers, who are fattening off the miseries of the country, through their organized and trained bands, open their batteries of slander and detraction upon him, in order to weaken or destroy his influence with the people.

Not content with all the abuse that the pensioned press and feed attorneys of the Administration are continually pouring out upon that great constitutional party founded by Jefferson, the Republican party has imported a rebel general, his hands reeking with the blood of our soldiers and his soul steeped in foul treason, to aid them in their work of slander and detraction.

This "war power" which is invoked by the Administration and its friends to justify their infringements upon the rights and liberties of the people is akin to the "higher law." The "military necessities" of the President and his subordinates, which have formed the pretexts for the various proclamations of emancipation, and for subverting the constitutions and laws of the States and tampering with their elections, spring from the same impure and corrupt fountain. All the powers of this Government are to be found in the Constitution. Military necessity is applicable only to the movements of armies in the field, and does not reach beyond their lines.

The Administration and its adherents seem to be wedded to the peculiar policy they have adopted, and the only way to effect a change is through the agency of the ballot-box. Claiming to be unconditional Union men, the party in power would not accept the Union to-day upon the simple terms of the Constitution, leaving all questions affecting the rights of person and property in the confederate States to be settled by the adjudications of the courts and the future legislation of the country. A fanatical zeal for the freedom of the black man, intensified by a stubborn resistance to every effort to make him free by those whose social and financial ruin would thereby ensue, is turned into a desperate purpose to degrade and enslave the white race whose misfortune it is to be placed among the sable objects of abolition idolatry. These men, who arrogate to themselves all the patriotism and all the religion of the country, would not stop this effusion of blood and arrest the onward course of relentless, cruel war which is now laying waste the fairest portions of our country if every rebel in the land were to lay down his arms and humbly sue for peace. The fiat has gone forth, and as long as a single slave remains in bondage this harvest of death must go on. Regardless of all the lessons of history, in violation of the faith of the nation as pledged by the heroes and statesmen of the past, in open contempt of the solemn promises made to the people in party platforms, presidential messages, and congressional resolves, four million slaves, an inferior and degraded race, whose education and habits wholly unfit them for self-control, are to be thrown upon society to roam at will throughout the land. Yes, and the sword of the nation is to be placed in the hands of this servile race, thus opening their way to the ballot-box and to social equality with the whites. Had such a proposition been made to the American people ere the hearts of so many had become hardened by the severities of this war, no sane man would for a moment have hearkened to it. But, lest some good-meaning people may think that I do my political opponents injustice in what I have said, I will quote from the last annual message of the President. He says:

"I may add, at this point, that, while I remain in my present position, I shall not attempt to retract or modify the emancipation proclamation."

In speaking upon the same subject a few sentences preceding what I have read, the President says:

"To now abandon them would be not only to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and astounding breach of faith."

There are no compunctions of conscience about breaking faith with white men! I charge the President of the United States with breaking faith with the people of this country by disregarding not only his pledges made in the inaugural address, in the proclamation of April 15, 1861, and in the Crittenden resolution, but also by trampling under his feet every provision of the Federal Constitution made for the protection of the liberty of the citizen. All the pledges to the negro are to be faithfully kept. In future the "free Americans of African descent" will doubtless crowd the President's levees, even in greater numbers than they did on New Year's day, not only relieving the monotony occasioned by the uniformity of color, but also giving a foreign odor to the gorgeous splendor of American royalty.

Our "freedmen" are the most fortunate people on earth. Even this Administration will keep faith with them. In the amnesty proclamation "our colored fellow-citizens" are treated with the usual affection and tenderness shown them by the President. "All who have engaged in any way in treating colored persons, or white persons in charge of such, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war, and which persons may have been found in the United States service as soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacity," are excluded from the benefits of the proclamation of amnesty. The repentant rebel, who may have murdered in cold blood the white soldier thrown into his hands by the fortunes of war, upon taking the prescribed oath is pardoned and taken into the bosom of the Republican party. But the planter within the rebel lines, who has in nowise voluntarily raised his hand against the Government, who attempts to recapture his slave which has been stolen from him and put into the Federal Army, is beyond the reach of executive clemency. He has committed the unpardonable sin. He has laid his profane hands upon what is regarded by this Administration as sacred, and must expiate his crime with his life! The mother who has given up her only son to the defense of the country has the consoling assurance that though the murderer of her boy will be restored to all his rights upon taking the prescribed oath, except the right to own the labor of his servant, yet he who has refused to extend the usages of civilized warfare to the negro shall receive no pardon.

Sir, the liberties of the people, the preservation of the State governments, and the maintenance of the Union under the Federal Constitution, are all involved in the well-defined issues of the approaching presidential election. While there are differences of opinion among Democrats and conservative men upon minor points, some believing that the evils which now afflict the country may be remedied by a vigorous prosecution of the war under the Constitution, and others favoring peace and conciliation as the only means of reuniting the broken fragments of the Union, they all are agreed in a determination to uphold the Federal Constitution and the Union of the States in accordance therewith. Not one would favor negotiations for peace on any other basis than that of a restored Union, with the rights of the States and the liberties of the people guarded and protected by all the limitations of the Constitution upon the powers of the General Government.

The only issue, then, between the parties relative to the war is whether it shall be prosecuted under the present policy for the overthrow of the States, and to compel the entire population of the South to surrender all rights of person and property into the hands of the abolitionists, or whether, under Democratic rule, in case the southern people shall refuse to make peace and return to the Union upon fair and equitable terms under the Constitution, the war shall be waged only against those in hostility to the Government. The policy of the dominant party includes confiscation, emancipation, endless war, despotism. The policy of the Democracy embraces conciliation and compromise, along with whatever force may be necessary to the due execution of the laws, and a firm, unfaltering devotion to constitutional liberty, and a determination as immovable as the everlasting hills to maintain it.

Sir, the bloody hand of war has left its mark upon almost every house in the country. The bright sunshine of heaven beams down upon the glistening bayonets of a million men confronting each other all along the fields made desolate by terrible conflict, where but yesterday the foe crossed steel in the wager of battle. Along the banks of the great Father of Waters and those of its tributaries lie the bones of two hundred thousand of the sons of the great Northwest, who have fallen in this deplorable war. On the prairies and amid the forests of that great valley there are tens of thousands of helpless children, each of whose young lives has been made sad by the loss of a father slain upon the bloody field. And now, while the aged mother sits in restless anxiety, afraid to hear the next news from the field of carnage lest it bring the unwelcome tidings that her son has been slain, as her dim eye rests upon the one left at home to support her in her old age a new pang penetrates her heart, for he too will be taken when the remorseless wheel of fortune begins to turn for the additional five hundred thousand.

Should this Administration be continued in power for another term, the war will go on until the financial schemes of Secretary Chase shall crumble into ruin, when it will of necessity cease, leaving in its desolating course a divided country and a ruined people. On the other hand, should the Democracy succeed in the next presidential election, the Union will be restored under the Constitution in less than six months after its accession to power, as I believe without the necessity of shedding a single drop of blood. When the mass of the people of the South, suffering as they are not only from the cruel fortunes of war but also from the oppressions of their rulers, are offered peace upon the simple terms of allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the offer has the solemn sanction of a great majority of the northern people, the leaders of the rebellion will be abandoned to their fate. We will reach forth our hands and lift up those Union men of whom the President spoke in his message at the extra session in 1861; and when they shall be enabled to stand and speak their honest sentiments without fear of rebel arms or abolition proclamations, there will be a majority of original Union men in all the States, except one, who will again organize their State governments and thus restore the Union.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STILES, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Dawes reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the President's annual message, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. STILES, (at forty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.), the House adjourned till Monday next at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 29, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of Henry Newman and others, praying for the establishment of a daily mail route from Lawrence via Ossawatimie to Fort Scott, Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an amendment to the enrollment act requiring the enrollment board to meet on certain days at the county town of each county for the purpose of hearing claims for exemption; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented fifteen petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying for the organization of an ambulance and sanitary corps for the armies of the United States and the enlistment of men for service therein; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of members of the bar of the District of Columbia, praying that the salaries of the clerks of the courts of the District of Columbia may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of a grant of lands to that State for the benefit of schools, agreeably to the provisions of an act approved September 4, 1841; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Scott; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN presented five petitions of citizens of California, praying for the repeal of an act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Socol Ranch, in the State of California, approved March 3, 1863; which were ordered to lie on the table, the subject having been acted upon by the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of C. Mollohan, of Gallipolis, Ohio, praying that additional time may be given for the location of land warrants of soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a letter of J. M. Edmunds, Commissioner of the General Land Office, recommending legislation directing the proper Department to cause selections of the public lands on the Pacific slope containing the timber most suitable for public uses to be reserved for the use of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Nancy M. Gunsally, formerly widow of Lyman M. Richmond, praying for a renewal of pension or half pay, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Cook, of Decatur county, Indiana, praying for arrears of pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying that a pension may be granted to Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Coshocot county, Ohio, who was killed while assisting the provost marshal in arresting deserters, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 139) for the relief of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Coshocot county, Ohio. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties, reported it without any recommendation.

Mr. SUMNER, from the select committee on slavery and freedmen, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 99) to secure equality before the law in the courts of the United States, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. SUMNER. The select committee on slavery and the treatment of freedmen, to whom were referred sundry petitions praying for the repeal of all laws requiring the rendition of fugitive slaves, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report a bill accompanied by a report, which they ask to have printed.

The bill (S. No. 141) to repeal all laws for the rendition of fugitives from service or labor was read a first time by its title; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. The minority of the committee propose to present their views. It is well known that by strict parliamentary law there is no such thing known as a minority report, and yet it has been according to the usage of the Senate to allow a minority to present their views to the Senate, particularly on a question of importance. The minority of the committee, as I understand, desire to present their views, and I have no doubt the Senate will receive them. I deemed it proper in committee to say to the minority that there would be no question on that point.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand extra copies of the report of the select committee on slavery and freedmen accompanying the bill to repeal all laws for the rendition of slaves be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 140) to provide for the protection of overland immigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

WEA TRUST MONEY.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate the amount of money received by the Government for the sale of the Wea trust loans in Kansas, and the manner in which said money was invested; if in State bonds, what States; and whether the interest of said State bonds has been paid, and if any of said bonds were stolen, what ones, and what provision has been made for the bonds so stolen.

J. C. G. KENNEDY.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, praying indemnification for damages to buildings while they were in the use of the Government, be discharged from further consideration thereof, and that said petition and claim be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

GUARDIANS AND COMMITTEES OF LUNATICS.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I move to postpone all prior orders, and take up House bill No. 42.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 42) to enable guardians and committees of lunatics appointed in the several States and other countries to act within the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize any person appointed the committee of a lunatic or the guardian of a minor or lunatic by the proper authority in any State or Territory of the United States, or in any foreign country, to institute and prosecute to final judgment any suit or action in the courts of the District of Columbia as he might have done if his authority as such guardian or committee had been derived from the proper tribunals of the District; and such committee or guardian may in the same manner collect and receive any sum of money due to a lunatic or minor, and may by deed duly executed release and convey to any party entitled to the same, whether by purchase or otherwise, any lands or estates situated in the District of Columbia the property of such lunatic or minor, or to or upon which such lunatic or minor may have a claim or mortgage, in the same manner as he might have done if his authority had been derived from the tribunals of said District; but the committee or guardian before making any conveyance of real estate or release of claim or mortgage thereon, is to file in the orphans' court of the District the official certificate of the judge of the court from which he derived his appointment, that he has given a sufficient bond to account to the minor or lunatic for all sums of money received by virtue of the authority conferred by this act. All payments heretofore made within the District of Columbia to the committee or guardian of lunatic, or the guardian of a minor duly appointed at the domicile of the lunatic or minor out of the District of Columbia, whether in the United States or a foreign country, are to be good and sufficient; but the guardian or committee is to file in the orphans' court of the District the official certificate of the judge of the court from which he derived his appointment that he has given sufficient bond to account to the minor or lunatic for all payments so made.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I move to amend the bill by striking out in the sixth line of the first section the words "or in any foreign country." The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill without amendment, but it is thought best to strike out this provision, so as to confine the authority to persons appointed in the several States and Territories of the United States, and not extend it to those appointed in foreign countries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I move the same amendment in the second section by striking out in the fifth and sixth lines the words "whether in the United States or a foreign country."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed; and its title amended by striking out the words "and other countries."

PORT OF DELIVERY AT PARKERSBURG.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 69, to make Parkersburg, in West Virginia, a port of delivery.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 69) to constitute Parkersburg, in the State of West Virginia, a port of delivery was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to constitute Parkersburg, in the State of West Virginia, a port of delivery, within the collection district of New Orleans; and directs that there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs to reside there, who shall, in addition to his own duties, perform the duties and receive the salary and emoluments prescribed by the act of Congress, approved March 2, 1831, for importing merchandise into Pittsburg, Wheeling, and other places.

Mr. FOSTER. As this bill proposes to create new offices, and will, of course, be a further tax on the public Treasury, I should like to hear a little explanation of it from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce before voting for it.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the citizens both of West Virginia and Ohio. The Senators from West Virginia perhaps can explain the necessity of it more fully than I can. The citizens there desired it to be made a port of entry; but the Secretary of the Treasury requested that it should be made a port of delivery, and not a port of entry. It will add but little to the expense of the Treasury, and will be a great benefit to the citizens of West Virginia.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask whether, from the examination before the committee, the chairman is prepared to say that it is necessary to pass the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it ought to pass, from the examination I have given it.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This bill, as I understand it, is in accordance with similar provisions in reference to Wheeling and Pittsburg. It does not propose to make Parkersburg a port of entry, but a port of delivery simply. The act which is referred to in the bill provides that there shall be a surveyor, and that his salary shall be $350 and fees, but that no salary shall be paid until the law actually goes into operation and goods are imported from some foreign port to Parkersburg. It would of course be idle to say that at this time, when the commerce of the Mississippi river is interrupted, and in the present state of the Gulf and Atlantic coast, this bill is immediately necessary; but the growing commerce of Parkersburg demands it as much perhaps as any other town on that river.

Parkersburg occupies a very commanding commercial position, and has been for many years, and even during this war, very rapidly increasing in population and in business. Stores are going up there all the time. During the last season seventy or eighty dwelling-houses were erected there, and some seven or eight brick stores were receiving the finishing touches when I left. Contracts have been made for additional ones to go up during the present season. Parkersburg is the export port for the petroleum oil that is produced in West Virginia. That creates a large business there. It is the terminus on the Ohio river of one branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, over which the greater portion of the river transportation is carried. It is a place where a great number of steamboats are built, and where it is probable a much greater number will be built hereafter. The Little Kanawha river, which empties into the Ohio at Parkersburg, furnishes the best lumber and timber to be found in the whole Ohio region.

As it is not probable, perhaps, that the appointment will be made immediately or until the country is more quiet, or even if it was made that there would be any salary to be paid until the full resumption of business, I hope that Senators will not object to the passage of the bill. It is necessary to the increased business which we have every reason to expect at that point when the country shall become quiet. The population of Parkersburg has grown since I went there twenty-nine years ago, from four hundred to upward of four thousand including its suburbs. It is rapidly increasing not only in population but in business, and is the port of import and export for a very large section of country.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABNER READ.

Mr. WILLEY. I am authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred House joint resolution No. 42, authorizing the payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the joint resolution for present consideration. It will not take any time.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Constance Read, widow of Commander Abner Read, late of the United States Navy, the share of prize money due or to become due to him for prizes taken by the United States vessel New London, while under his command, in 1861.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading; it was read the third time, and passed.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone all prior orders with a view to take up Senate bill No. 125. I think we can pass it in the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 125) to encourage immigration was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides for the appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of an officer to be styled the Commissioner of Immigration, who shall have an office in the Department of State, and shall be under the direction of the Secretary of State, to hold his office during four years, unless sooner removed, and to receive as an annual compensation $2,500. To assist the Commissioner in the discharge of the duties imposed on him, the Secretary of State may, as they become necessary, assign to that officer one clerk of the first class and one clerk of the third class. To encourage, facilitate, and protect foreign immigration to and within the United States, the Commissioner is to collect from public documents and other authentic sources full and accurate information in regard to the soil, climate, mineral resources, and agricultural products, rates of wages and prices of labor in different portions of the United States, and also the means of communication, and the wants of agricultural, manufacturing, and other industrial interests of the United States, and to disseminate such information throughout Europe in a concise and popular form, from time to time, in such manner as will best conduce to the accomplishment of the objects contemplated. The information thus collected is to be printed in different languages, and, as far as practicable, by the Public Printer; but the cost of the printing authorized by the act is not, during one fiscal year, to exceed the sum of $20,000. The Commissioner is to correspond with the various consuls at European ports, and the consuls are to aid the Commissioner in disseminating the information; and where, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, it is practicable, the consuls are to transmit a full manifest of the emigrants on board of vessels bound from the ports to which they are accredited to any port of the United States. The Commissioner, for the purpose of disseminating the information, may employ such newspapers, publishers, agencies, or transportation companies as he may deem advisable, the aggregate annual expense of which shall not exceed $10,000.

There is also to be established at the port of New York an office to be known as the United States Emigrant Office, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a superintendent of immigration is to be appointed at an annual salary of $2,000, who may employ a clerk of the first class. The superintendent, under the direction of the Commissioner of Immigration, is to make contracts with the different railroad and transportation companies of the United States for transportation tickets to be furnished to the immigrants, and to be paid for by them, and under rules prescribed by the Commissioner to protect the immigrants from imposition and fraud, and to furnish them such information and facilities as will enable them to proceed in the cheapest and most expeditious manner to the place of their destination, or, where this is undetermined by the immigrant, to the place where his labor will be most profitable. The superintendent of immigration is to perform such other duties as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Immigration; but the duties imposed on him are not to be held to affect the powers and duties of the commissioners of emigration of the State of New York. The superintendent is to see that the provisions of the act, commonly known as the passenger act, are strictly complied with, and all breaches thereof punished according to law.

No person is to be qualified to fill any office under this act who shall be directly or indirectly interested in any corporation having lands for sale to immigrants, or in the carrying or transportation of immigrants either from foreign countries to the United States and its Territories, or to any part thereof, or who shall receive any fee or reward, or the promise thereof, for any service performed or any benefit rendered to any person or persons in the line of his duty. If any officer provided for by the act shall receive from any person or company any fee or reward, or promise thereof, for any services performed or any benefit rendered to any person or persons in the line of his duty, he is, upon conviction, to be fined $1,000, or be imprisoned not to exceed three years, at the discretion of the court of competent jurisdiction, and forever after to be ineligible to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit in the United States.

The President of the United States, when in his judgment the public service requires it, may appoint a superintendent of immigration at the port of New Orleans, with the same powers, duties, and compensation as prescribed for the superintendent of immigration at the port of New York.

The Commissioner of Immigration at the commencement of each annual meeting of Congress is to submit a detailed report of the foreign immigration during the preceding year, and a detailed account of all expenditures under the act. For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the act the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This bill is one that I hear of to-day for the first time, and I presume that is the case with the great majority of the Senate. It has not met my eye before, and it is too important to be slipped through in the morning hour without any examination of it. It establishes a new bureau, and I do not know to what expenses it may lead. I should like to have it lie over until I can have a chance to look at it and consider it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Maine desires that it lie over, I shall not oppose that motion. I called up this bill the other day for the purpose of explaining it, but other business intervened, and I will state now while I am up that this bill has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Agriculture, and the subject has been maturely examined. We had a great variety of projects before us. We deemed the object a very important one, and after full consideration we came to the conclusion that this was all the Government could do, and that this would be important to aid immigration and protect immigrants from fraud. Nearly all of the western States have appointed agents to encourage immigration. The controversies growing out of the clashing interests of different States are creating trouble and embarrassment in the city of New York, and this is increased by the competition of runners on board of vessels, and by the transportation companies.

The expenses of the proposed arrangement will be but trifling. The bill does not establish a new bureau as the Senator supposes. It establishes two new officers: one a superintendent of immigration in the city of New York, to see to the enforcement of the laws of the United States; the other a Commissioner of Immigration, whose office will be in Washington. The chief duty of the Commissioner will be to collect and disseminate information in different languages. It is found that many persons who desire to come to this country cannot rely upon information which is furnished to them by interested parties, and that some of the most intelligent among them are often deceived and misled. If an official document prepared from official sources could be furnished them, giving them accurate information as to the needs of labor in this country, there is no doubt it would encourage a great deal of immigration. In the western States labor is absolutely demanded; common laborers are receiving a very high price; and if it should be clearly shown to any intelligent person in Europe that it was his interest to come to America, because the prices as compared with each other are decidedly in favor of the laborer in this country, there would be a great increase in the number of immigrants.

I think while this would involve very little expense—the sum cannot exceed $50,000 a year under the limitations of the act—it might increase the immigration into this country within a year probably to the extent of one hundred thousand able-bodied persons, and within a short time might still more increase immigration. That is the testimony of our consuls, and of intelligent persons from different countries. I have no objection, however, to the bill lying over, but I shall call it up at an early day, and I hope the Senate will then understand it, and be ready to act upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. WILSON. I reported a few moments ago a joint resolution from the House of Representatives in regard to the continuation of the bounties. I think it is very important to take it up and dispose of it one way or the other, or to refer it to some committee if the Senate is not prepared to act upon it. I move to take it up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the bounties authorized to be paid under existing laws, and by regulations and orders of the War Department, to veterans reënlisting or persons enlisting in the regular or volunteer service of the United States for three years or during the war, shall continue to be paid from the 1st of March to the 1st of April, 1864, anything in any law or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs when he made the report, that the joint resolution was reported without any recommendation by the committee. I would inquire of the chairman where the resolution came from originally, and whether it is here by recommendation of the Secretary of War or on his request, or whether any communication has been had with the Secretary of the Treasury, or in fact whether any information has been had officially from the Departments in relation to the matter. Assuredly the Senate ought to have some information to act upon when a bill is reported without any recommendation, which is substantially saying that the committee do not know anything about it. I should like to know whether they do or not.

Mr. WILSON. The joint resolution comes from the House of Representatives. It was introduced in the House as a report from the Committee on Military Affairs of that body, and passed the House by a very large majority; indeed I do not know whether there was a division upon it. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate instructed me to report it back to the Senate without any recommendation. I think the committee were very much divided as to its policy; a portion of the committee believing it best to pass it; another portion being opposed to continuing the bounties so long as we had the enrollment act upon the statute-book. So far as any official opinions from the Secretaries are concerned, the committee had none before them. A member of the committee, I believe, had some conversation with the Secretary of War, and he is of opinion that the Secretary desires its passage. I have had no communication with him. I went there for that purpose to-day, but he was at the President's. This is the last day that the present bounty law can be enforced.

The question is a simple one, and it is this, whether it is best to continue for another month the bounties that we are now paying. I suppose there are differences of opinion in the Senate in regard to it. I had very much the opinion that this matter, as it concerns the money, might as well go to the Committee on Finance for them to consider, for that is the only difficulty about it. There can be no doubt, I think, that we are enlisting men and shall enlist men by the 1st of April more rapidly than we can draft them during the twenty days of the month of March. We are enlisting now more than two thousand men a day in the country and mustering them into the service. I suppose we shall have after to-day to make a draft to fill up a portion of the quota under the call for five hundred thousand men; but we are enlisting men very rapidly, and some of the Governors of the States have urged very strongly that this law shall be continued. I have in my possession a very earnest letter from General Hancock expressing the opinion that the quota will be filled up by the 1st of April if the bounties be continued. I have a telegraphic dispatch from General Burnside, from Augusta, Maine, in which he says that after consulting with the authorities and with persons interested in New York and in the eastern States, he is satisfied that the continuance of the bounty system for a month longer will fill up the quota called for. It is a matter that concerns simply the question whether we can afford to pay these bounties. I suppose that we have, since the 17th October, paid and agreed to pay for these bounties from ninety to one hundred million dollars. It must be over ninety million, for we have paid bounties, I think, to very near three hundred thousand men.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, one thing is very obvious to me; and that is that when a proposition comes here of this description, involving two considerations, one the number of men needed and how to get them, and the other our ability to get them in a given mode, the proper course is that what is wanted, and the ability to accomplish what we want, should be ascertained by the proper executive officers in the first place, and ascertained on consultation with each other. It is not a single question; that is, alone, simply whether we desire to obtain men, and whether one particular mode is more correct and desirable than another; but it goes beyond that, and is a question of ability to accomplish the purpose in a given way; and, as I remarked, these questions should be settled to a reasonable certainty before the recommendation is made to Congress, and there should be an official recommendation with the proper information in relation to it.

I object entirely to having a bill of this importance come in here predicated upon mere telegrams from officers who are in different sections of the country, and who look only to the local intelligence which they gain, and of course know nothing of the condition of things here. If we legislate upon such grounds—and I am sorry to say we too often do—we must inevitably get ourselves into difficulty. Look at this for a moment. Here is a proposition to continue for a month the payment of these large bounties. We have already, as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs tells us, committed ourselves to the amount of about a hundred million dollars in that direction. If it is absolutely necessary to continue that, we must do it at all events; but I want to know the facts in relation to the matter. I want to know how we stand; Congress is entitled to know; and yet here comes in a bill of this description from the Committee on Military Affairs, with my distinguished friend from Massachusetts at the head of it, reported to the Senate without a word of recommendation or a fact upon which to ground it coming from the Departments themselves in any official or reliable form; and we are invited to act upon that idea. Now I ask him as chairman of that committee whether he thinks that is proper, and whether it is a sufficient basis of action.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, sir. Because we really know nothing about it we are required to act in the dark in relation to the whole affair. We are required in point of fact to act upon our fears, upon the fear lest we may omit to do something that ought to be done; and nobody among those who ought to take the responsibility of giving us the facts and giving us the recommendations chooses to say a word to us upon the subject.

For my own part I cannot help saying to the Senate that I think this course of action is altogether unwise. We should have a recommendation from the proper quarter; we should have the facts upon which that recommendation is founded; we should have an exposition of our ability to do these things, and not a hap-hazard style of legislation in relation to such very important matters as these.

Now, sir, I think the proper motion would be under the circumstances that this joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, to recommend to us what action is proper to be taken. It is their business to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Howe in the chair.) The hour of one o'clock has arrived, and it is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of the last sitting of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the regular order be suspended temporarily until this matter be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the regular order will be laid aside.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not wish to move that the resolution be sent back to the committee with instructions; but I have already indicated in the remarks I have made what I think is proper to be done; that the committee—because a committee is the proper organ in the Senate in such cases—should obtain the information necessary if they have it not, inquire what the necessities of the case are, and inquire immediately; inquire too as to whether this matter has had the proper consultation and examination; and having found what is desirable, they then can recommend action to the Senate. But if they are unable to get at the facts that it may be necessary for us to know in regard to the pecuniary branch of the question which is involved, (which of course they will not be if they inquire,) I shall have no objection that the committee to which I belong shall inquire into that matter. It would save time to have it done in the first instance. I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel a little sensitive about this matter of the extension of the draft. I am one of those who occupy the unpopular position of being in favor of enforcing the draft strictly, and of thinking that our authorities were at fault in issuing the proclamation of October last. When the subject was first up I ventured the assertion that this change of policy would involve the expenditure of $105,000,000. The chairman of the Military Committee now tells us that three hundred thousand men have been induced to enter the service by the offer of these bounties, and consequently the amount of the bounties pledged to them is about the sum I stated—$100,000,000.

It turns out, then, that I was right in regard to that point. But the matter was referred to the Secretary of War, and he made an estimate showing that about one hundred thousand men would be enlisted under his proclamation; that he had about nine or ten million dollars accumulated from the old draft; and that the whole amount that would be required, if the payment of the bounties was continued to the 1st of March, would be about twenty million dollars. He made that estimate and sent it to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury upon that estimate, assuming it to be true, wrote a letter to the chairman of the Finance Committee, stating that he could raise the necessary money to provide for that additional demand upon him. That letter was sent to the Finance Committee, together with the bill; and upon that estimate, which I knew to be erroneous—I knew it as well then as I know it now—we were compelled to accede to the demand of the Department, and we extended the time for paying the bounties. I am sorry that we did so. I believe it would have been better for us then to compel the enforcement of the draft. It would have brought money into the Treasury, and I believe it would have given us the same number of men.

Now it is proposed to extend this system further. If the Secretary of War will say to us that he advises it and wishes it, and will send a written communication to that effect, I shall assent to extending the draft now for thirty days or any other time that is necessary; but until that is done, I will not take the responsibility of voting to postpone the draft.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Extend the bounties, you mean.

Mr. SHERMAN. That postpones the draft. They talk about extending the time for bounties; but it means a postponement of the draft; and if this joint resolution be passed, the draft will not take place until after the time for the bounties expires, which will be in April, and it will then probably be too late to have a draft at all.

I am perfectly willing to assume the responsibilities of my position, but I think the Departments ought to assume theirs. If the Secretary of War desires the postponement of the draft and will take the responsibility of asking us formally by a written communication to postpone it, I will yield to his desire; but certainly I will not vote for a proposition of this kind unless the executive authorities will take the responsibility of recommending it.

As for the money, there is no doubt that the proclamation of October last has done very much to embarrass the operations of the Treasury. It has compelled a resort to that species of security which I hoped would never be used; that is, the legal tender interest-bearing notes. But for the postponement of the draft and the payment of these large bounties, I believe the ordinary loans made through the old channel would have been sufficient to carry on the operations of the Government, and to prevent any further inflation of our paper money. But since the draft has been postponed, since this large bounty system has been entered into, I am willing to extend it if the authorities will say that an extension is demanded by the public interest, though in my own judgment it would have been much wiser long ago to enforce the draft. I am willing to share the responsibility with them if they will first take the responsibility and say they want it; but until then I am not willing to assume the responsibility. I know that the chairman of the Military Committee, if I understand him correctly, stated that a member of the committee went to the Secretary of War, and that in a private conversation with him the Secretary desired the passage of this resolution.

MR. WILSON. I said that I understood a member of the committee had some consultation with the Secretary of War, and he came away with the impression that the Secretary believed this was the best policy. That member is now present, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.]

MR. SHERMAN. That is still more vague. The committee got the impression that the Secretary desired it from a conversation between the Senator from Indiana and the Secretary of War. I should like to know what is the opinion of the Secretary of War on the subject.

MR. LANE, of Indiana. I have no authority for the statement that the Secretary of War wishes the extension asked for satisfactory to myself. Although I did gather some such impression from a casual conversation with him, there was no authoritative recommendation.

If the Senator will pardon me one moment further, I will only say that I shall vote against this postponement of the draft. I believe that under the enrollment or conscription act, striking out the $300 commutation clause, we can get soldiers enough without impoverishing the Treasury.

MR. SHERMAN. Then it is manifest that the Secretary of War has not even committed himself by a direct request to any member of the committee, and we ought not to pass this resolution.

Now, I will state, as briefly as I can, three or four leading objections to this mode of getting soldiers by the payment of money. It is unequal as between the States, giving the wealthy States the great advantage. That is one difficulty to commence with. It is unequal between different communities of the different States. Take my own State, for instance, where there are very loyal communities and communities that are not very loyal. Under the operations of the bounty system the whole burden of this war is thrown on the loyal communities, who come forward and with the large bounties given by the Government and the large bounties they raise among themselves, they raise the full quota demanded of our State. The consequence is, that in communities that are not very loyal—and we have some such in Ohio—they do not raise any troops at all, and thus avoid all the burdens, all the expense, and all the responsibilities of this war. That is unjust to the State and to the communities in the State.

There is another and still more radical objection. This system of bounties throws the whole burden of the war on the Treasury of the United States. In my judgment, the individual citizens ought to bear the burden. It would be much wiser to make me pay $1,000 for a substitute, or $5,000, if I am able to do it, than to make the Government pay $500, because the Government in time of war is the poorest of all. It makes no difference to the community if an individual is compelled to pay a large amount to pay a substitute; but it does make a very great difference if the community itself has got to go into the market and hire these substitutes. Our system of bounties has thrown on the Treasury $100,000,000 which would have been raised, by the enforcement of the conscription act, by the collection of only $300 from each citizen who would not go into the Army.

These are radical objections against this system of bounties paid by the Government. I will not vote to extend them unless those who are responsible for the conduct of the war come to us in an official communication and ask it of us. Then I am willing to yield to them the responsibility, and acquiesce in any measures they may demand and say are necessary for the public safety.

MR. NESMITH. There is apparently some foundation for the censure of the chairman of the Committee on Finance on the Military Committee in relation to the consideration they gave this subject, and I regard it as my duty to simply state the circumstances under which it was considered. It was taken up at a late hour in the morning and very hurriedly, understanding this to be the last day that enlistments could be made under the existing law. I know that two members of the committee expressed themselves very emphatically against the proposition, and stated that they would vote against it in committee and would vote against it in the Senate. I was one of those members. I do not feel at liberty to allude to the other Senator. No Senator expressed himself as very decidedly in favor of the proposition; but inasmuch as this is the last day that bounties can be paid under the existing laws, we consented that the resolution might be reported to the Senate for their action, knowing that there was a very great division of opinion among Senators themselves in relation to the propriety of adopting any such measure.

I imagine if the resolution had been retained in the committee and undergone discussion, it might have occupied several days; and while in a full committee there might have been a majority report in favor of the proposition, I am satisfied there would have been a minority report against it. In order to save time and prevent the delay that would arise from a prolonged discussion of the question in committee and to save the writing of these reports, as I stated before, we consented that the resolution might be reported back without recommendation.

So far as my own position in connection with this subject is concerned, I am free to say that while we did not give the subject the usual consideration that questions referred to that committee receive, my own individual impressions were entirely against the resolution. I have been opposed to the payment of these extravagant bounties. In my opinion we had better rely on the conscription law which was passed by Congress and is in full operation, with all its expensive machinery for carrying it on, to obtain troops. There has been no settled policy in relation to this matter. Prior to the meeting of Congress the Department assumed the right to offer bounties, and paid the most extravagant bounties without the sanction of law. Subsequently, a resolution was passed by Congress legalizing, so far as it was in their power, the proceedings that the Department had taken in relation to bounties. We afterwards passed a law extending the time for the payment of bounties to the 1st of March; and now there is a proposition to extend it to the 1st day of April; and if we pass it, before the 1st day of April there will be a proposition to extend it to the 1st day of June, and there will be a continued extension. I am in favor of cutting the matter short here, and am opposed to the payment of all those extravagant bounties. I prefer to rely upon that system of raising soldiers which I contend is the only fair and the only prompt mode of doing it.

MR. WILSON. I think this resolution had better go to the Committee on Finance, and let the Secretaries consult in regard to it. I agree with the Senator from Maine that a proposition so important as this should have come to Congress with the views at any rate of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury. But the Committee on Military Affairs found it on their table this morning, having come from the House of Representatives without any information whatever except what they could gather from the proceedings of the House. We have nothing of an official character from the War Department nor anything from the Treasury Department. I suppose it will certainly increase the liabilities of the Government between twenty and twenty-five million dollars, not all this year, because the Government distributes these bounties over the three years. That has been the case with the liabilities already incurred for the payment of bounties. That is the reason we are not called upon for more money, perhaps, as I think we probably shall be.

We know what men we have enlisted; and I say here to-day that under the call of the 17th of October last, and the additional call making five hundred thousand men, we have incurred an expense, I think, from ninety to one hundred million dollars. A portion of it must be paid down. The remainder is scattered over the period of three years. I suppose if the payment of these bounties is extended, and we go on raising men at the rate we are now raising them, that we shall raise during the coming month somewhere from sixty to eighty thousand men, paying a portion of them $400 and another portion $300.

It is a question that Senators must consider whether we can afford to pay these bounties. I think the resolution had better go to the Committee on Finance. I would prefer that it should take that course; but I shall not shrink from any labor that may be imposed on me to ascertain what the views of the Department are.

MR. FESSENDEN, (to Mr. Wilson.) We will take it after you get through with it and give us an explanation of your part of it.

MR. CLARK. It is evidently proper that this resolution should go in the first instance to the Committee on Military Affairs, because the first question presenting itself is a military one—whether this is the proper method of raising soldiers; whether we need them to be raised in this way. If these men are not required to be raised by bounties, then it is not a question for the Finance Committee at all; but if the Military Committee or the War Department say that the best way to raise these men is by bounties, then the question comes up, and not before, can the Treasury bear it? Therefore it is a question for the Military Committee to determine, and it is peculiarly for them to determine, whether it is better to raise these men by bounties rather than by a draft.

MR. FESSENDEN. The War Department in the first instance.

MR. CLARK. The War Department is the first Department to be consulted about it. They are the Department having charge of this subject. They should consult among themselves, and they should say to the committee, if the committee choose to ask them, what is proper to be done. I am free to say, standing here before the Senate, at this time, if the Treasury was overflowing, I would not vote these large bounties without some information from the War Department as to whether this was the best method of obtaining troops.

MR. JOHNSON. Do they ask for it?

MR. CLARK. They have not asked for it. They have not even stated to any member of the committee whether they desire it. It is suggested that such a recommendation should come from the Cabinet. I have said it should come from the Department having charge of the military affairs of the country, and then if that Department should ask for advice of the other Departments it is perfectly proper that they should do so, because the Treasury should be consulted in this matter; but I think I spoke correctly enough, and that I shall be understood. We want the recommendation of the War Department as to whether, as a military necessity, this thing is advisable. I desire that the resolution should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, as the proper organ to determine the military necessity, and to inform us whether it is proper and right to vote these large bounties to those men or not.

MR. GRIMES. I am not particular as to what committee this resolution is referred, although I think it ought not to be referred to any. I think it ought to be suffered to remain on our table until we have some action of the Administration or some views from the Administration as a unit as to what they desire. It is all a mistake to suppose that there are only two Departments that are specially interested in the passage of this joint resolution. Let me tell Senators and let me warn them that within the next three months you will not have your ships-of-war manned, for the reason that under the operation of your enrollment laws and the bounties that now exist if you are going to suspend the enrollment laws, you will not be able to recuperate the energies of the Navy. Your men are all going out of the Navy now, not because they have abolished the whisky ration, not because under ordinary circumstances they might not get sufficient pay; but, first, because in the commercial marine the lowest amount that is now being paid is thirty dollars per month while we pay only eighteen dollars, and from that deduct all the expenses of the seaman, his clothing, and his small-stores; and, secondly, because all the appliances of the Administration in the shape of bounties, in the shape of conscription and enrollments, are used to fill up the Army to the utter exclusion of filling up the Navy.

Mr. President, a measure of this kind ought to come from the Administration proper. It ought to be recommended by the President of the United States after thorough and mature consideration with all the members of his Cabinet, and not upon the mere recommendation of the Secretary of War, or, even added to that, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. The whole Cabinet, the whole country is interested in the measure.

Mr. WILSON. I entirely agree with the Senator in what he has said in regard to the subject; but this joint resolution passed the House of Representatives; it came to the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, and the committee were in the same condition that the Senate now is.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not censuring the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I am very glad to understand that that is the case. The committee felt with this information, or rather this want of information before them, that they could not recommend the passage of this resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the committee did the very thing they ought to have done. Instead of censuring the committee I commend them for the course they have taken.

Mr. WILSON. And they felt in another respect that they might be reproached by the country if they held it back beyond the time at which the payment of bounties would expire. It was therefore thought best to bring it before the Senate for their consideration. If Senators desire that it shall go back to the committee, I am willing to perform my duty in the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on recommitting the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. POWELL. Some two weeks ago I submitted to the Senate a resolution, which was passed, directing the Secretary of War to transmit to the Senate the orders and instructions, if any, that he had given provost marshals in the States of Kentucky, Delaware, Missouri, and Maryland on the subject of elections. No report has been made by the Secretary of War. I think it probable his attention has not been specially called to the resolution. The bill on that subject has been made the special order for Thursday next. I therefore move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit to the Secretary of War a copy of that resolution, in order to call his attention to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

DISQUALIFICATION OF COLOR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day, being the unfinished business of Friday, is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 62) to remove all disqualification of color in carrying the mails, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. POWELL to the amendment reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, after the words "States" to insert the words "in all cases for robbing or violating the mails of the United States;" so that the amendment of the committee will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in the courts of the United States, in all cases for robbing or violating the mails of the United States, there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color.

Mr. CONNESS. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads [Mr. COLLAMER] is not in his seat; I hope, therefore, that this bill will lie over until he is present.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree with my friend from California. The bill was originally introduced by myself, but it has been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and as the chairman of that committee is now absent I think on the whole its further consideration had better be postponed until he is in his seat. I have had an impression that he proposed to make some observations upon it.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the fact, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up another joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the joint resolution equalizing the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no sort of objection myself to taking up that joint resolution; on the contrary, I am inclined to favor action upon it at once; but I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the pending question on that joint resolution is on an amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] which he deems of importance, and upon which he may have something to say. As he is not in his seat—I presume on account of illness—I suggest whether it would not be advisable to postpone it for the present.

Mr. FOOT. The question on the joint resolution proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Massachusetts is on an amendment moved by my colleague. That amendment is deemed important by him, and I believe by the Senate generally. He is not in his seat this morning—I presume from physical indisposition.

Mr. WILSON. On that suggestion I will withdraw the motion, although I am very anxious to have a vote on that proposition. It seems to me we are delaying action quite too long upon it. I withdraw that motion, and will move to take up the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WILKINSON,] extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The question on the bill now before the Senate—

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no bill now before the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Well, the first question on the joint resolution to equalize the pay of soldiers of the United States Army is on an amendment proposed by myself to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] I have some papers here from the War Department that I desire to use when that amendment to the amendment comes up, and I ask that they be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

BOUNTY TO VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. WILSON. I renew my motion to take up Senate joint resolution No. 20.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861. It proposes to extend the benefits of the act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting the public property, approved July 22, 1861, so as to be applicable to and operate for the benefit of all volunteers who were mustered into the service of the United States prior to the date of the President's proclamation of May 3, 1861, provided such volunteers shall have served the time prescribed in that act under such enlistment necessary to entitle them to the bounty therein provided for. It also proposes to extend the provisions of section six of the act of July 22, 1861, to the widows and heirs of such as have been or may be killed or die in the service.

Mr. DAVIS. I move an amendment in the form of an additional section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in every case where heretofore any person has agreed to join and has in fact joined, or hereafter may join, the military service of the United States, and has been received into the said service by any military officer thereof, the person so joining and received into such service shall, for all purposes whatever, be deemed to have been regularly mustered into the said service in the position of officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, in which he may have served, notwithstanding he may not have been mustered in according to law and the regulations of the War Department.

I explained this proposition to the Senate at the last session, and I will just say a word now in regard to it.

In my own State there were troops that attached themselves to certain regiments. They were received into the service by the commandants of the regiments, and one regiment in particular was marched to two battle-fields and engaged in both battles before they were regularly mustered in according to the regulations of the Department. In each of those battles some of the men were killed, some were disabled, and some were slightly wounded. One of the soldiers was in my office a few days before I left home. He had lost his right arm. The sole object of my amendment is to provide for this state of case, that where a corps in fact is mustered into the military service and is in fact accepted by a colonel commanding or other commander, and does in fact serve, it shall be considered to all purposes whatever to have been regularly mustered in, and shall receive the same pay, bounty, &c., that it would have received if the men had been regularly mustered in according to the regulations of the Department.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not know that I should have any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky as a separate measure; but I ask him not to incur this resolution by his amendment, but to bring it up as a separate proposition. I offered this joint resolution in consequence of a decision of the paymaster's department. Since the resolution was offered I have received a letter from the Solicitor of the War Department in which he informs me that the decision he had made, and upon which decision the pay department acted, was not intended to cover such a case as this resolution was drawn to meet.

The facts are that a Minnesota regiment—and I understand there are one or two other regiments in precisely the same situation—entered the service prior to the President's proclamation calling out three years' troops. The regiment from Minnesota, for instance, was mustered in on the 29th day of April, 1861. The call for three years' men was in the beginning of May. The Secretary of War would not order them to Washington unless they would agree to go in as three years' men. They accepted that proposition and all went in as three years' men, but their muster-roll stood as they were first mustered in, dated 29th day of April. In the "memorandum index" of the pay department they refer to this decision of the Solicitor:

"A volunteer soldier enlisted prior to date of President's proclamation May 3, 1861, and of General Order No. 15, May 4, 1861, is not entitled to bounty of $100 under the act of July 22, 1861."—Decision of Solicitor of War Department, June 15, 1863.

I understand since the little discussion that arose on the resolution when it was first introduced, that the pay department did not correctly interpret the full decision of the Solicitor of the War Department; that it only was intended to apply to the three months' men and not to men who actually enlisted for three years, although their muster-roll dated back to a period when there were no three years' men called out. This resolution only applies to three years' men or those who have served two years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if now, under the explanation which has been given to that decision, it is necessary to pass this resolution at all?

Mr. WILKINSON. I was going to say that I do not know whether the pay department is now governed by that decision. This memorandum index, which is issued by the pay department for the government of all paymasters in the service, seems to exclude these soldiers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the resolution had better go over, because it is very general in its terms, and we do not know how far it reaches. The Senator says the Solicitor has made a new decision since this resolution was introduced, which I understand covers the case; perhaps, therefore, he does not care about its being urged now.

Mr. WILKINSON. It may go over.

Mr. WILSON. Under these circumstances, I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution, and I will now renew the motion to take up the joint resolution equalizing the pay of soldiers. The Senator from Vermont is now present.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

The consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WILSON to the amendment of Mr. COLLAMER. The amendment of Mr. WILSON was to insert the word "free" before the word "persons;" so as to make the amendment of Mr. COLLAMER read as follows:

All free persons enlisted and mustered into service as volunteers under the call dated October 17, 1863, for three hundred thousand volunteers, who were at the time of enlistment actually and for six months previous had been resident inhabitants of the State in which they volunteered, shall receive from the United States the same amount of bounty, without regard to color: Provided, however, That the foregoing provision shall not extend to any State which the President by proclamation has declared in a state of insurrection.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont how that word "free" will affect the colored soldiers recruited by me? They had been in the State of Kansas over six months, but many of them had before been slaves. They had escaped from Missouri and from Arkansas; and before being mustered into the service most of them had been in the State of Kansas six months. If the word "free" is to cut them out, I am opposed to its insertion, and I trust the Senate will reject it. I have laid upon the table an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time, to extend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to those enlisted since July 1, 1862, so as to cover those whom I recruited in Kansas during that year. The authority to recruit which was given to me by the War Department authorized me to raise a brigade of infantry without reference to color.

Mr. COLLAMER. What was the date of that?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. July 22, 1862. Under that authority in forty days, aided by my gallant constituents, I raised three regiments and six companies of white infantry and one regiment of colored infantry. What I desire to accomplish is to get a provision inserted in the bill that will give to the colored infantry raised under the same authority, for the same term and arm of the service, the same bounty that the white infantry have received. Some of them were and always had been freemen; but the larger portion of them were escaped slaves from Missouri and Arkansas, who had resided in the State of Kansas six months previous to their being mustered into the service of the United States. The letter of the Secretary of War authorized me "to proceed forthwith to raise and organize one or more brigades of volunteer infantry, to be mustered into the service of the United States for three years or during the war." Under that authority I mustered in three regiments and six companies of white and one regiment of colored troops.

Mr. COLLAMER. When I offered my amendment, I endeavored to explain to the Senate the purpose and object of it. It was thought that it might include according to its terms more than the object which I stated and which I desired to effect. It is possible that that may be so; but the pending amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] to insert the word "free," arises, in his view, from the last section inserted in the enrollment bill lately passed, which provides for paying for slaves; and he fears that unless the word "free" be inserted in this amendment of mine, provision will be twice made for the case of slaves.

All seem to agree in the justice of the object sought to be accomplished by my amendment; I have heard no objection to it; and yet it seems that the subject is treated very much like the Irish farrier's bill, "curing your honor's horse till he died." [Laughter.] That is the way the whole subject is treated, curing it to its death. Every man who has an ax to grind comes in, and then others who have speeches to make explaining their objections to another bill that was passed some days ago, and which they do not like, take this occasion to express their views, and so this amendment of mine becomes the stalking-horse to bear the burden of the grievances of everybody, though in no way related to the subject which I moved. I am desirous of trying once more to effect my purpose, which I take it is laudable, for I have not heard it objected to, by endeavoring to put my amendment in a briefer compass, and perhaps by that means avoid the amendments proposed to it.

Mr. President, I stated before and will very briefly repeat that in the State where I live, and in many other States, the colored people were enrolled with the white people according to law, were subject to draft, and some of them were drafted last summer. When that draft resulted as it did, falling short of the expectations which many had formed of its results, the President issued a proclamation inviting people to volunteer instead of being drafted; for having on hand a considerable quantity of commutation money he offered a bounty of $300 to those who would enlist instead of waiting for other drafts. Could anybody suppose that that proclamation did not extend to all people who were subject to the draft? It was saying in effect, "Come in and volunteer so as to avoid another draft." The people did volunteer instead of standing off for a draft; but, as I said before, when the officers came to muster in the volunteers, they paid the bounty to the white men and did not pay it to the black men, though those men were enrolled at home and subject to draft. What I desire is to correct that, and I have not yet heard any man say that it ought not to be corrected.

I propose now, upon more reflection, instead of using the words I originally employed in the amendment, to change them so as to say simply that the bounty shall be paid to all volunteers, under the call of October 17, 1863, who were actually enrolled and subject to draft, and leave it just there. That will cover the case which I desire to meet. Inasmuch, however, as one amendment has been added on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I do not know that I am at liberty to amend the amendment, and I suppose that without common consent I am not; but to avoid the proposed amendment now moved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to insert the word "free," I take it it will be safe enough if it is put in the shape I now propose, and that is to pay the bounty only to those who volunteered, and who if they had not volunteered would have remained liable to draft, having been actually enrolled. Those slaves for which he says provision has been made in the last section of the enrollment act lately passed will not be reached by this because they were not enrolled and subject to draft, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not competent for the Senator from Vermont now to modify his amendment except by unanimous consent, the Senate having amended the amendment of the Senator subsequent to its introduction.

Mr. COLLAMER. I so understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will, however, be competent for the Senator to move to amend the whole clause by striking it all out and inserting precisely what he now proposes.

Mr. COLLAMER. Very well; but that is out of order now, I believe. I must wait my day, I suppose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to say a few words in relation to this matter, rather with a view that my own position in regard to it may be understood than for any other reason, inasmuch as I feel called upon to vote sometimes against what might seem to be just in itself, taken by itself. In order that I may make myself understood, I will with the permission of the Senate say a few words with reference to the position of the bill, and I call the attention of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the subject, in order that if I in any degree misstate him he may correct me.

Some two years ago when we passed the original bill for the enlistment and employment of persons of African descent into the Army, we provided a definite, fixed sum per month for their payment. At that time, as is well known—the honorable Senator from Massachusetts knows it as well as anybody—there was a difference of opinion upon the subject. That bill, if I remember rightly, was passed at quite a late period of the session of 1862. It was my opinion at that time, whether expressed publicly or not I do not know, but certainly expressed in conversation to him and to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] who, I think, did speak his sentiments as well as my own on the subject, that the black troops thus raised ought to be put upon an equality in all respects with the white; not that we were of opinion that in all cases they would earn the same pay and would deserve it, for in some cases I was of opinion then that they would not, for the simple reason that taking the slaves on the Mississippi they could live much cheaper than white soldiers, and for the further reason that the Government was doing a great deal more for their wives and children. Nevertheless I was of opinion at that time that they ought to be put upon the same level in order that there should be no ground for any distinction by the enemy between colored troops and white troops, that it should not lie in their mouths to say that we ourselves had made a distinction, and that therefore they were at liberty to consider them upon any other footing than the regular soldiers of the United States.

My friend the chairman of the Military Committee was not of that opinion at that time, as he will remember. He thought that the amount fixed in that bill was ample; and he thought, moreover, which undoubtedly was the controlling reason in his mind, that there would be danger in making an amendment providing for giving the colored troops the same pay, as we might by so doing possibly lose the bill itself through the lapse of time. That being the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs, we did not make any strenuous objection to the bill as it stood, and it was passed; I remaining, however, of the same opinion then as I am now.

Under that bill a very large number of men have been employed; a large number of those who were formerly slaves have been employed, and have been employed with their free consent; and in some of the free States colored men have been employed with the perfect knowledge and understanding of what the provisions of the bill were, that they were to receive ten dollars a month and no bounty. Opinions differ as to the number, but perhaps fifty or sixty thousand of them have been enlisted; most of them, the large mass, understanding perfectly the amount they were to receive, content with it, making no objection to it, for the reason undoubtedly that they understood as well as we that the differences had existed which I have stated.

It seems, however, that notwithstanding our law, under permission given by the Secretary of War to the Governor of Massachusetts, two regiments were raised in Massachusetts, and raised under enlistment papers specifying that they were to receive the same pay, &c., as other volunteers. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] undertook to show that that was done legally and properly, whether permission was given or not. I think he failed to show it to the satisfaction of the Senate, and I think he was mistaken in the view he took of the law. The Governor of Massachusetts, however, gave the authority, and two regiments were thus enlisted and mustered into the service. Two other regiments were enlisted in South Carolina, called the first and second South Carolina, I think, the colonel of one of them and perhaps the other officers being from Massachusetts, and the other commanded by Colonel Montgomery. I have been furnished in a letter written to me by one of those officers with the original authority from the War Department under which as it is said those two regiments were enlisted, and I will read it to the Senate. It was addressed to General Saxton:

"You are also authorized to arm, uniform, equip, and receive into the service of the United States such number of volunteers of African descent as you may deem expedient, not exceeding five thousand, and may detail officers to instruct them in military drill, discipline, and duty, and command them.

"The persons so received into service and their officers to be entitled to and receive the same pay and rations as are allowed by law to volunteers in the service.

"EDWIN M. STANTON,
"Secretary of War."

Now, in regard to these cases, allow me to say as to the two regiments from Massachusetts, that I do not understand that under any authority given by the Secretary of War the Governor of Massachusetts was authorized to promise them any more than ten dollars a month. Nevertheless he did so, that is to say, the papers were drawn up in that form, and it was so understood. It seems to them, and justly, very hard that they cannot receive the thirteen dollars a month like other soldiers. I understand with regard to the South Carolina regiments, that for a time they were paid the thirteen dollars a month, and finally it was cut down to ten dollars a month, and that now there is some apprehension that the over payment, as it is called, of the three dollars before is to be taken from their pay which may be received after this time.

In the last case it would be more manifestly unjust that they should not be paid from the beginning the thirteen dollars a month; and as has been contended by the Senator from Vermont, if the two Massachusetts regiments were thus enlisted as it is said, and mustered into the service under that enlistment, and no objection whatever was made to the contract thus made by them, as between them and us it is manifestly just and proper that they should be paid the thirteen dollars a month. I do not undertake to dispute that, and have not from the beginning; but they are individual cases. There may be one or two other regiments in the same category. I will say to my honorable friend from Kansas that under the circumstances of which he has spoken the Kansas regiment having been enlisted, as I understand, and mustered into service before the law of 1862 was passed, and having performed the service, are manifestly, without any law, entitled to be paid the same as other soldiers. He has no need of any amendment in regard to them, if the time of their enlistment was, as I understand it to have been, before the passage of the law of which I have been speaking.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will ask the Senator from Maine what remedy these men have except by an appeal to Congress. The War Department has decided not to pay them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not speaking of what the War Department has decided. They, of course, cannot go and put their hands into the Treasury; but I say they are entitled to be paid, in my judgment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Then I hope the Senator will not be afraid to say so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will hear me through, he will find probably what I do intend to say about it. There are the two Massachusetts regiments, the two South Carolina regiments, and the Kansas regiment, entitled to claim the thirteen dollars for the whole time of their service, and there may be one or two others in the same position. Take them altogether, however, they are a very small number compared with the great mass of colored men who have been enlisted.

But now what is the remedy of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] and it is this to which I wish to call his attention. He brought in a bill here providing in the first part of it that the colored soldiers hereafter enlisted into the service of the United States should be put upon the same ground in all particulars with the white soldiers. To that I expressed my immediate assent. It carried out my original idea. To be sure they made a contract, and notwithstanding they had made a contract I was perfectly willing, and so expressed myself, that they should be placed upon the same level with the white troops, because the original reason held good, and that was that I feared the effect upon them that might be produced if we made a distinction between them and our other troops. What I objected to was the other clause, which was, my friend will remember, in general terms, and embraced not only the two Massachusetts regiments and the South Carolina regiments, but embraced all the colored troops, the whole sixty thousand, whether they wanted the increase or not, whether there was any mistake about it in regard to them or not. I inquired at that time whether it was so or not, and the honorable chairman of the Military Committee said yes, it was. I called his attention and the attention of the Senate to it. I felt bound to do so, not only from my general duty as a Senator, but from the position that has been assigned me here to keep a careful watch on bills making appropriations of the public money, because I am understood to look a little at the matter of money.

My friend's remedy was a bad one. He did not choose to take up the case of his two Massachusetts regiments and the two South Carolina regiments and put them in a bill by themselves, and include with them any others who might be in the same category; but he brought in a sweeping clause to put all the colored men, the slaves on the Mississippi river, and all that large number who had been enlisted anywhere, and to go back to the date of their original enlistment, and to pay them all from the beginning thirteen dollars a month. That showed itself to the Senate to be manifestly improper. The honorable Senator's colleague [Mr. Sumner] expressed at the time of that debate his willingness to assent to the distinction to be made. He did not claim, and he said he did not claim, that all should be paid on that category; but he was willing that it should be confined to those who were placed in those peculiar circumstances under a contract to receive a larger amount. Everybody else assented to the propriety of the suggestion. The honorable Senator himself assented to it.

The objection that I made then and that I make now is to a general clause covering such immense ground, and introduced merely with a view to provide for the few regiments that stood before us in the peculiar attitude occupied by those which I have named. Is it not so, sir? Is not that what was in the honorable Senator's mind and in the mind of his colleague? They wished to provide for individual cases. They were told in the Senate Chamber by gentlemen around me in ordinary conversation, "Bring in your bill to provide for your special cases and we will consider and pass it, but we cannot put a clause upon this bill which will cover a million or a million and a half or two million dollars, and be applicable to some forty or fifty thousand men who perfectly understood at the time of their enlistment what they were to receive, and who have never complained of it and never asked for any more." That is substantially the position in which it stood and the objection that I made, and to the correctness and propriety of which they acceded at the time.

Again the question comes up. I have received some letters, very proper letters, from officers of the South Carolina regiments explaining the position in which they stood. If that enlistment was such as is claimed under the authority given which I have read, (although there was no power to give it if it was after our law was passed,) the contract ought to be kept. It is like other cases of misapprehension, and if they enlisted under those circumstances they should receive the thirteen dollars a month. If the regiments which were enlisted in Massachusetts have been received into the service and mustered in, as they undoubtedly have been, and rendered most gallant and noble service too, although there was no original authority to promise them the thirteen dollars, it was a misapprehension in my judgment; yet having been received they should be paid according to their contract. I do not dispute that; but we have properly established the principle here that in these general bills intended to cover general grounds and provide for masses, we will not have, if it is possible to prevent it, amendments providing for individual cases. Why? Because in making those amendments we were apt to carry them a great deal further than we intended. Now let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts what would have been the effect if the Senate had acted on his bill without attention being called to it? Did he intend to pay the forty or fifty thousand men on the Mississippi, if there are as many as that, who enlisted understandingly for ten dollars a month? Yet that would have been the effect of it.

When the Senate had pretty much come to a conclusion on the subject, my honorable friend from Vermont comes up with another case. The case is a strong one. I told him at the time that I considered it so, that it ought to be provided for; but I suggested to him that even he probably did not understand how far his own amendment would extend, and this morning he comes in admitting the fact that it extended the Lord knows where, all over all the States except the rebel States, and introduced freemen and slaves and all others who came within the description in his amendment, and upon that there have been one or two more amendments placed, and the Senator from Kansas has still another. It shows the impropriety of such legislation, and that is what I object to. We never shall know where we are, we never can tell in what condition the Treasury is unless we have each of these cases examined by itself and placed upon its own footing, and not stuck on to these general bills and passed in a hurry on the explanations given by individual members, who think they have a very clear idea of it, but cannot have ideas for other people.

Now, sir, what I ask is, that this bill which provides for placing all our troops on an equality shall be passed by itself; and I am even content to go back to the 1st day of January, and place the colored troops on the same level in all particulars, if you will, as the white troops from that time, except in regard to bounty; and even as to that I am willing to pay the bounty if it is thought best by the Senate, for I do not like to have any distinctions made; and I shall not be particular on that point. Pass the bill and settle the principle as it ought to be settled; place the colored troops on the same level with the white troops in all cases; let them receive the same pay and rations and everything else. I have been in favor of it from the beginning; and I preceded the honorable Senators from Massachusetts upon that point; and I adhere to my original position in relation to it.

What I object to is, that after you have made a contract understandingly with men, and a contract beneficial to them, with which they are contented, you shall, merely upon an idea, put your hands into the Treasury, go back to their original enlistment, and pay them money which they do not ask for, and which they ought not to receive if they have been well paid, as they have been substantially. I am opposed to it because we are in no condition to do it. We cannot afford to deal in that way with subjects relating to money. Neither is it just unless you extend it further.

I ask whether we should have had such an uproar throughout the country if this amendment had been in regard to three or four or more white regiments, to go back and pay them an additional sum from the time of their enlistment, and the principle had been objected to. It would not have excited in my judgment any remark or any feeling; and neither would this if it had not been entirely misrepresented and misunderstood from the beginning. We all know that the white troops are not all upon the same level. They have received different amounts of bounty. If I remember rightly, the pay of those who first entered the service was only eleven dollars a month. It was afterwards raised to thirteen dollars; but we have never had a proposition to go back and pay those original soldiers their thirteen dollars from the beginning. The bounties our first troops received were the merest trifle in the world; and the most of them have nearly served out their period of three years; and there has been no proposition to put them on an equality with those to whom we pay four or five hundred dollars, and to whom the towns are paying as much more. If this outcry that has been made for justice to the colored man is to prevail to the extent proposed, let us have the same kind of justice for the white man, and go back and equalize everybody from the beginning. If that were proposed generally you would perceive very soon where your Treasury would be under such circumstances.

Although I am in favor of the proposition of my honorable friend from Vermont, I hope he will withdraw his amendment and take a separate bill upon which these special cases can be put, because he has already seen that he has had proposition after proposition put upon it, and he will have, in whatever shape he chooses to place it.

Mr. COLLAMER. If it is offered as a private bill, the same amendments may be proposed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A private bill can gather in the cases, and then they can be understood, and if it is sent to a committee they can put in that bill all the cases which need correction, and they will not be examined merely in the Senate loosely and carelessly. I wish to see this bill carry out its original idea, do that which should have been done at first, place all the soldiers of the Republic on an equality, and leave the questions which have since arisen, leave the hard cases to be taken care of on their own merits as they will be.

Sir, there is no sort of backwardness in the Senate or in the House of Representatives to do justice to our soldiers, whether colored or otherwise. There never has been the slightest hesitation in any quarter. We have not only been disposed to be just, but to be generous to them. There has been no delay that should be complained of. To be sure, letters which we receive say this thing is put off and delayed, and men are suffering. They come from men who do not understand the business of Congress. We cannot do all things in a day. They have not yet found out at the other end of the avenue that things cannot be done in five minutes here, because it very frequently happens that matters which are under consideration there for a month, and put off until the last moment before they are sent to Congress, are sent with a request that they shall be passed through immediately, for there is great haste. It must be understood that deliberative bodies necessarily require time, and that with the amount of business that is before us we cannot even do justice instantly to any set of men. Time is necessarily required for the consideration of the measures presented to us.

I rose to make these explanations in order that the people may understand precisely the attitude of the question, and precisely the feeling that has existed in regard to it from the beginning.

Mr. SUMNER. If I can have the indulgence of the Senate for one moment, I will make a brief reply to the Senator from Maine. There is much that he has said to-day which has my concurrence; but there are some things that he has said in which I cannot concur. I do not know that the Senator remembers what fell from me in this discussion on a former occasion; but I think the Senate will bear witness that the very first words I uttered were to this effect: that there was a difference between cases under the bill; in short, that there were two classes of cases, one where the enlistments were made obviously for the pay of ten dollars a month, and another class where the enlistments were obviously made, whether rightfully or wrongfully I did not undertake to say, for the pay of thirteen dollars a month.

I called particular attention to those two classes of cases. I objected to any undertaking in a general bill to provide for the first class. I saw with the Senator what a draft it would be upon the Treasury, and I think I alluded particularly to the enlistments on a large scale made in Tennessee and generally at the Southwest; but I added that there were other enlistments in Massachusetts, there are some perhaps in Pennsylvania, certainly some in South Carolina, and I have understood since that there were at least two regiments in Louisiana, constituting a class by themselves, where the soldiers were led to believe, whether rightfully or wrongfully, that they entered into the service of the United States under the statute of 1861 for the pay of thirteen dollars a month.

I did then, sir, venture to submit that it was not becoming in the Government of the United States to keep those soldiers thus enlisted with that understanding and under that expectation, waiting for their pay. I did not think it looked well. I did not think it was just, therefore I insisted earnestly that it was the duty of the Senate to take the first occasion to remove that injustice; and therefore I was naturally grateful to my colleague that on this general bill he had endeavored to meet at least this class of cases, which it was unpardonable to neglect.

But in order to relieve the bill of all question, to put aside the difficulties alluded to by the Senator from Maine, I brought forward an amendment to the effect that all soldiers who at the time of their enlistment were led to suppose that they were enlisted under the statute of 1861 should receive the pay of thirteen dollars a month. This proposition was discussed at some length, I think during two different days, and finally, on a division, it was lost. I then renewed the proposition in still a different form, to the effect that when the enlistment papers showed that the soldiers came into the service under the statute of 1861 they should be paid what was promised them by that statute. This, again, was lost, and I believe both of those propositions were opposed by the Senator from Maine. Though different slightly in form, they were alike in substance, and were intended to provide for the same class of cases. The Secretary of War was to be satisfied that these soldiers were "led to suppose" that they were enlisted under the statute of 1861. Even if this language seemed general, it found its limitation in the reference to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Now, sir, I do not wish to go into any old discussion, to fight old battles over again; but the Senator from Maine, merely by allusion, or parenthetically, if I may so say, has revived that discussion. He has referred to what I said on that occasion. I did say, and I have repeated it since, that, in my opinion, the United States were legally bound to pay the full sum of thirteen dollars to the soldiers referred to in those two different amendments. I went into an examination of the statutes. I listened also to the reply of the Senator on that occasion. What he said, though apt, like all that he says in any discussion into which he enters, did not seem to me to answer the argument. I have now the statute before me, and I shall refer to it once more, simply because the Senator has to-day introduced it into the discussion.

The soldiers to whom reference was made entered into the service under an order from the War Department dated January 26, 1863, which I shall read in part:

"Ordered, That Governor Andrew of Massachusetts is authorized, until further orders, to raise such numbers of volunteer companies of artillery for duty in the forts of Massachusetts and elsewhere, and such corps of infantry for the volunteer military service, as he may find convenient, such volunteers to be enlisted for three years or until sooner discharged, and may include persons of African descent organized into separate corps."

These are the words under which these enlistments were made. The soldiers were to be "volunteer companies," "enlisted for three years or until sooner discharged;" and then it is added, "including persons of African descent organized into separate corps." Where do you find any distinction between the order to raise the volunteer corps and to raise the persons of African descent organized into separate corps? The authority is in the same order; it is in the same sentence. The two are treated together. They go side by side in the order of the Secretary. You have to step outside of the order of the Secretary in order to find anything to sustain the conclusion of the Senator. He does step outside of the order of the Secretary, and in a certain section of the statute of July 17, 1862, he thinks that he finds a limitation of their pay to ten dollars a month. If in the order of the Secretary there had been any allusion to that statute, if the pay of ten dollars a month had been specified, then the Senator from Maine would clearly be right; but there was no allusion to this statute, nor was there any specification of ten dollars a month. You are therefore left free under the general statutes of the country and the law of the land to see what pay these enlisted men are justly entitled to when enlisted as volunteers in the service of the United States under an order calling for enlistments in the volunteer service and containing no single word of limitation or exclusion, and nothing by which one portion of the order can be referred to one statute and another portion to another statute.

Now, if we go to the general statutes of the country regulating military service, we shall find that they recognize no distinction of color; that there is nothing about black or white in any statute that concerns the Army or the Navy or the volunteer service. If you wish to find that distinction, you must go to the statutes regulating the militia; but in those concerning the military, naval, and volunteer service it cannot be found. Therefore there was nothing in any previous legislation rendering the organization of colored volunteers in connection with white volunteers, and on the same footing, in any respect illegal. If there had been anything in the entire statutes rendering such an organization in any respect illegal, then again the Senator from Maine might be right in his stern conclusion; but in the absence of any such prohibition in any former legislation, I submit that he is wrong. There can be no doubt of it.

But this is not all. The very statute to which the Senator from Maine refers, and on which, as I understand, he founds his conclusion, expressly says in section twelve as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive into the service of the United States, for the purpose of constructing intrenchments, or performing camp service, or any other labor, or any military or naval service for which they may be found competent, persons of African descent; and such persons shall be enrolled and organized under such regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws, as the President may prescribe."

Mark those words, if you please: "Such persons shall be enrolled and organized under such regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws, as the President may prescribe." I have already shown that there is nothing in any law of the land inconsistent with the organization of colored persons as volunteers in the Army of the United States; and this brings me again to the order of the Secretary under which the organization was made. By that order in express terms they were "enrolled and organized" as volunteers in the volunteer service of the United States. The very words of the statute already quoted by the Senator from Maine were then and there executed by the President. He undertook to say how these soldiers of African descent should be "enrolled and organized;" and he ordered that they should be "enrolled and organized," in connection with volunteer companies of artillery and corps of infantry, for the volunteer military service, as volunteers. Thus by the very terms of the order of the Department of War were these soldiers of African descent enrolled and organized as volunteers in the military service of the United States, to receive the pay of thirteen dollars per month; or, in other words, on an equal footing with their white associates in the same order.

But now, sir, it is objected that the case should be treated by itself; that we should not undertake to provide for it on this general bill. I cannot assent to any such suggestion. I am too familiar with the legislation of the country and with the course of business both in the Senate and in the other House not to know that it is the daily practice to ingraft measures which very often are not even germane upon some pending proposition, and especially to ingraft measures of special remedy when they are clearly germane to the original proposition. This is of every-day occurrence. The remedy which we propose upon this bill is germane to the original proposition. It is intrinsically just. It is wrong that it should be any longer postponed. Now is the opportunity of providing for it. Here is a bill relating to the general subject. It only remains that we should take care while providing for the general subject that this special grievance is relieved also. Failing in this, our duty will be but half done.

I fear, sir, that the objection that this is out of place may find some favor with certain persons who will find this proposition always out of place. For myself, such is its intrinsic justice that I can hardly imagine any bill on which according to the usage of the Senate it could be out of place. I hope therefore that my colleague will persevere in keeping it in its place on the original bill, and thus secure a tardy justice to those soldiers who, as it seems to me, have such painful occasion to complain of the treatment they have received.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has a fashion of deciding rather ex cathedra, it strikes me, upon what is just and what is unjust, and rather a fashion to leave us to infer that he thinks everybody who differs from him in opinion is disposed to do injustice. I will not quarrel with him about his style in reference to that matter. Every man has his own fashion of presenting his own ideas, but I address myself simply to his question of law, on which I wish to say a very few words.

The Senator is a very well read lawyer, as I have had occasion to know, and he must be aware that there is a simple rule of construction applicable to all statutes; and that is, that the last one which is passed necessarily repeals all preceding legislation that is inconsistent with it to the extent of that inconsistency. There might have been a dozen statutes before we passed the statute of July, 1862, on this subject; and yet, if there was a specific provision in that defining what should be done in a given case, whether it said anything about what preceded it or not, it repealed that which preceded it which was inconsistent with it. The Senator, I apprehend, will accede to the correctness of this proposition.

In 1862 we passed a law providing substantially and in so many words, that persons of African descent might be enrolled into regiments by themselves and mustered into the service of the United States, and that such persons should receive the pay of ten dollars a month, specifically. I say that repealed everything preceding which was inconsistent with it, so far as referred to that particular class which was thus designated. No other construction consistent with the general rules of construction on such subjects can be made.

Now, the Senator says that under the order issued by the Secretary of War to Governor Andrew he made no distinction. Sir, he was bound to make none. He says you may enlist volunteer regiments of infantry and artillery, and you may enlist colored regiments of volunteers if you please. Must he not have presumed that Governor Andrew, the chief magistrate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and an eminent legal gentleman, too, must know the law, and know that if he enlisted white men they would receive the pay provided for white men, and that if he enlisted colored regiments they would receive the pay provided for colored regiments? Was he bound to sit down and write to Governor Andrew, "You will be pleased to note that you must enlist these men according to the laws of the land?" Yet the Senator would have us infer that because he did not specifically instruct Governor Andrew as to what the law was, therefore Governor Andrew was at liberty to disregard it, and thus enlist these regiments differently from what was provided by the law.

Is that a correct rule to be applied even to the construction of orders from the War Department or any other Department? And that is my answer to all the Senator's argument on that subject. The Secretary of War was not called upon to make a distinction, because the law made the distinction, and therefore he might infer that the person to whom he gave the authority would understand the distinction and make it.

This is all unnecessary. I am not contending that these men should not be paid. I have already stated that in my judgment of the facts stated they should be paid; and I am willing to pay them if the facts are made out; I think it no more than just; but I repeat what I before said, that it is not necessary or proper when a bill is pending providing for another specific object, an important one, one that we all desire, establishing the principle, to avail yourself of that particular place not only to bring in this individual case but to cover very much more which ought not, by the consent of everybody, to come into the bill at all.

That is the position that I assumed in regard to it, and I contend that it is a correct position, and I stand to it now. I do not say that there is any rule that is opposed to the introduction of the amendment like that which was proposed by the honorable Senator, but there is danger in such legislation, which is introduced without investigation by a committee and an understanding of what it is, and put upon a general bill which has been introduced by a committee. We have all experienced the difficulties that arise from it. A committee which has thoroughly investigated the subject brings in a general bill. The committee are ready to give us the facts, to state all that we want to know; but a gentleman rises in his place and moves to put on a specific case which has been examined by no committee, of which we know nothing and can know nothing in the proper way, and under the pressure of that case we are called upon to put it on or else to be denounced as doing a gross injustice. Sir, I plant myself where I always have in reference to such questions: let every case which calls for an appropriation of money out of the Treasury to a large amount go to a committee and be investigated.

When I inquired of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Military Committee, if he knew the extent to which the original bill would go in reference to that point, I found that he did not. When I inquired of my honorable friend from Vermont—who, as a general rule, knows all about what he proposes, and of whom I might well say that what he does not know upon almost every subject is hardly worth knowing—whether he could tell the extent to which his amendment would go, he admitted that he could not, and he did not know it. It illustrates the difficulty of which I have been speaking, and the danger of making such amendments to bills designed to accomplish a general purpose, and which have been considered with that view; but we are called upon to act on individual statements with regard to which we only know that the gentleman who makes them believes them to be true. It was under that idea, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] well knows, that when he proposed his amendment the other day allowing everybody to come in who had been induced to believe or led to suppose that he was to receive thirteen dollars a month, it received no vote but his own. The proposition was so manifestly a strange one, covering nobody could tell whom, one that it was impossible to reduce to a certainty, throwing everything open for extraneous evidence such as could not be admitted, that it received no support in the Senate.

When he made his other proposition gentlemen who voted against it told him "this is an improper place for it"—not publicly, but aside, as we are in the habit of doing—"we will vote for your proposition as a separate bill, but we cannot vote for it as an amendment on this bill." It is the ground on which friends all about me put it, I among others. I am ready to vote for his proposition the moment he will place it in a proper position, and show me, (and it requires very little further showing, because I am pretty well satisfied about it under the position assumed by my honorable friend from Vermont,) that it ought to be adopted, and the money paid; but you see the difficulty. First comes on one idea that is a favorite one with Massachusetts; then comes another that is a favorite of Minnesota; then another that is a favorite with Kansas; then another that is a favorite with Vermont; and so we have to take them on the representation of different gentlemen with reference to their own specific cases, and embarrass our bill.

This important proposition, and it is important, I admit, of placing the colored troops on the same footing with white troops, which I have always been ready to vote for, has been kept off for weeks and embarrassed, and embarrassed, and mixed up simply because gentlemen wanted to get their individual propositions on in regard to particular cases. It illustrates the difficulty and danger that always arise from such kind of legislation. That is the position in which it is put, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] should have said when he was explaining it that he was aware at the time that gentlemen who voted against his amendment to this bill voted against it because they did not like it as an amendment, but were ready to vote for the proposition itself in its proper place, and not leave the contrary to be inferred.

I deem this explanation proper, simply that the position of the whole matter, both with regard to the original bill and the amendment, may be definitely understood.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine began his remarks with a personal allusion to myself. It was in the nature of a criticism upon what I had said and upon the way in which I had said it. This is not the first time that Senator has made such allusions, sometimes to myself and sometimes to others on this floor; but I shall not follow him in this respect. I prefer to imitate him so far as I can in that which is much more worthy of imitation.

After satisfying himself in personal allusion, the Senator then passed again to the proper discussion. He began by assuming that the statute relating to African soldiers operated in the way of a repeal of the previous legislation bearing on that subject. Sir, I deny the conclusion in point of law. From that assumption the Senator then proceeded to say that the order of the Secretary of War to Governor Andrew was to be considered as made with reference to the latter law, according to which, as he imperatively insisted, the old law was repealed. But, sir, does not the Senator see that this argument brings us round again to the question of law? This was whether, under the existing statutes of the United States, old and new, a colored person could be enlisted at thirteen dollars a month. Governor Andrew said he could. In my opinion he could; and permit me to say that nothing that fell from the Senator has touched that conclusion, neither what he has just said nor what he has said on former occasions. I stand, therefore, on the original conclusion, that under the statutes of the land and the order of the Secretary of War, Governor Andrew was justified in enrolling volunteers of African descent at the pay of thirteen dollars a month. I do not see how Senators who consider the question carefully can escape that conclusion.

Mr. HOWE. I would like to get at the facts. I want to know if these troops were not enrolled and mustered into the service of the United States after the act of 1862 was passed?

Mr. SUMNER. They were.

Mr. HOWE. And is it the conclusion of the Senator from Massachusetts, may I inquire, that in violation of that statute, which only authorizes the payment of ten dollars, the Governor of Massachusetts was authorized in the name of the Government of the United States to promise thirteen dollars?

Mr. SUMNER. Not "in violation of that statute."

Mr. FESSENDEN. In spite of that statute.

Mr. SUMNER. Nor in spite of it, as the Senator from Maine says. The question is, whether the enlistments were made under that statute or not. I insist that they were not made under that statute, but under the prior statute, and all the facts testify to this conclusion. This is the answer to the Senator. He can accept it or not; but it is made in good faith. It is my conviction, in fact and law, that the enlistments were made under the prior statute, and that Governor Andrew at the time regarded himself as fully authorized to make them under that prior statute. Any other conclusion seems like a stultification of all concerned: of the Secretary of War whose order includes them with white volunteers; of Governor Andrew, who openly announced that they were on the same footing with white volunteers; of the colored soldiers, whose enlistment papers expressly declare that they were enlisted under the statute of 1861; and finally of the original statutes governing the military, naval, and volunteer service, which make no discrimination of color.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator presume that the Government assumed the obligation of paying thirteen dollars a month to these African troops before they had assumed any obligation to render any service whatever? They were mustered into the service, the Senator says, after the act of 1862 was passed. The Senator says notwithstanding that that they were enlisted before. I understood he means by that that the contract between them and the Government was made before.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all. They were enlisted and mustered into service after the passage of the act to which the Senator refers; but they were not enlisted or mustered into the service under that act, but under prior acts allowing thirteen dollars a month as their pay. That is my answer to the Senator. I do not wish to be misunderstood. These troops came into the service under the original statute of 1861 and not under the statute to which the Senator now refers, though they were enlisted in point of time subsequent to that statute.

But from the question of law I pass to that other question which occupied the attention of the Senator from Maine, as to when and where we should meet this obligation. He says, bring in a separate bill. That was said the other day. I say, meet it whenever it presents itself. It is in itself a case of such absolute and overwhelming justice that the Senate ought not to postpone it for a single day; especially it ought not to postpone it when it has before it a bill so entirely germane as that now under discussion. If it were a bill concerning the Pacific railroad, or concerning the sale of gold, it might be questionable whether this proposition should be ingrafted upon it; but as it is a bill which proposes to put the colored troops on an equality in the national service, I say that the pending proposition is perfectly germane, and, being in itself of commanding justice, it ought not to be postponed. It is a common device of the enemies of a measure to object to it on a particular bill. For myself, I desire to have it understood that I am for this proposition on any bill and at any time.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The subject to which I have called the attention of the Senate has been agitated in my State for a year and more. I feel that I am discharging a duty to my constituents as well as to a gallant regiment while I persevere in asking for legislation upon the subject. The regiment raised, one of the best drilled in the Army, has done as severe and gallant service as any one. At the battle of Honey Springs, under the command of the gallant Blunt and the dashing Colonel Williams, it stood up like a wall of fire at point-blank distance against a Texas regiment and demolished that regiment, capturing those whom they did not kill. That the Senate may fully understand the question, I send this paper to the Secretary's desk that it may be read at length. It is the authority under which the regiment was raised.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
February 20, 1864.

SIR: I am directed by the Secretary of War to inclose you herewith a copy of your appointment as commissioner for recruiting in the department of Kansas.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS M. VINCENT, A. A. G.

HON. J. H. LANE.
WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, July 22, 1862.
SIR: You are hereby notified that you have been appointed by the Secretary of War commissioner for recruiting in the department of Kansas.

You are requested to proceed forthwith to raise and organize one or more brigades of volunteer infantry to be mustered into the service of the United States for three years or during the war.

For this purpose, full authority is hereby conferred upon you to establish camps and provide for the maintenance of discipline and the supply of the troops with the munitions of war. On your requisition the commanding general of the department will issue supplies of arms and accoutrements, clothing, camp equipage, and subsistence. Transportation for recruits and recruiting officers will be furnished on your requisition, or refunded on vouchers in the usual form accompanied by your order directing the movement.

It is recommended that the provisions of General Order No. 75, current series, be followed as far as possible in organizing companies, to the end that muster-rolls may be uniform and authentic. This is necessary in order to secure justice to the soldier and prevent confusion in accounts and loss to the Government.

In performing these duties you are authorized to visit such places within the department of Kansas as may be necessary, for which purpose transportation will be furnished you by the commanding general on your requisition, or the cost of the same will be reimbursed by the Secretary of War from the Army contingent fund.

You will be expected to report frequently to this Department the progress and prospects of the work, and to make any suggestions that may occur to you from time to time as useful in facilitating its accomplishment.

This appointment may be revoked at the pleasure of the Secretary of War.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. P. BUCKINGHAM,
Brigadier General and A. J. G.

Official:

THOMAS M. VINCENT,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Hon. JAMES H. LANE, Kansas.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. At the time that authority was issued the Government was as severely pressed for troops as it has ever been since that time. Under it, commencing in July, 1862, I raised about thirty-six hundred white troops and eight hundred black ones in forty days, at less than six dollars recruiting expenses to the Government. By noticing the time it will be seen that they were raised under the act of 1861. It will also be noticed that it was before the enrollment or draft. A large proportion of the men of the first colored regiment were liable to enrollment and subject to draft, but it was, I repeat, before the enrollment was authorized and before the draft was ordered. The officers of the white regiments, as well as those of the black regiment, were appointed and commissioned by the War Department on my recommendation. Recruiting officers of the colored regiment were appointed in the same way as the recruiting officers of the white regiments; they were uniformed in the same uniform, armed with the same arms, drilled by the same kind of officers, having the same kind of camp equipage, and were, in all but one respect, treated alike. On account of the prejudice of the public against the colored regiment, I was compelled to keep the first regiment out of sight, and drilled it in a retired place. With that exception they were treated alike, and were to have the same pay and bounty. The white troops were paid $100 bounty; the black troops have received nothing in the way of bounty up to this time; indeed they did not receive their monthly pay for five months. They were mustered into the service for the same length of time, and the object that I desire to accomplish is to have the bounty that was paid to the white troops at the same time for the same service paid to the black troops. Policy and common justice demand this at your hands. Having called the attention of the Senate to the subject, I have performed my duty; it is for you to perform yours.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to recommit this joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make the motion for the purpose and in the hope that the committee will at an early day, to-morrow, if possible, report it back as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, in such a shape as to put all troops of African descent in regard to pay and emoluments from the 1st day of January last on a footing of uniformity with the white soldiers. It is evident to my mind that we are doing a great injustice by the manner in which this joint resolution is being dealt with here, not only to the most of the men of that nationality who have been recruited into our service, but to those very individual cases that are alluded to by the Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Massachusetts, and other Senators, by withholding from them that justice which we ought to give to them, and which we would give to them if the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs were adopted.

We are not going to get this measure through Congress this session if it continues to be dealt with as it has been; for every Senator who has a pet project of his own or a private bill of his own, or a measure in regard to some particular colored regiment in his own State, attempts to adopt or to cause to be adopted some legislation peculiarly adapted to that regiment on this general proposition.

I am in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts; I intend to vote for it when it comes here and stands on its merits; I am in favor of paying the South Carolina regiments all that anybody claims should be paid to them; but for the reasons that have been suggested by the Senator from Maine, and which have been adopted generally by the Senate hitherto, I am unwilling to incorporate these provisions upon a general bill of this description. I therefore trust it will be referred to the committee, and will be reported back at an early day simple and pure, and that we shall then adopt it at once.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the proposition of the Senator from Iowa will be adopted, and when the bill is before the Committee on Military Affairs I hope that the question will be considered in its double aspects, first those that are general and which are particularly embodied in the bill now before the Senate, and secondly in its special aspects; I refer to those which have entered so much into the debate, and in regard to which there has been a difference of opinion; and I hope when the committee makes its report, if it finds that it is not proper to treat the subject under both aspects in one bill, that it will give us at the same time two bills, that we may know upon what we are to act, and that we may have a certain assurance that in those cases which have excited so much sympathy justice at last will be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the recommitment of the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I shall not oppose the recommitment of the joint resolution, for the reason that while I have as much hope as most men, I am getting a little discouraged about its passage. It has been before us a long time. It has attracted a great deal of attention among the friends of the persons whom we propose to benefit. We have fixed the general pay day that is to commence in the bill at the beginning of the year. I think that is a great point, for the bill may not get through Congress for fifty or sixty days to come.

As to the amendment that has been moved by the Senator from Vermont, as he proposes to amend it to-day, it seems to me to be a very plain case and a just one. As proposed the other day it included fifteen or twenty thousand persons who have been enlisted as slaves, and who are provided for by the bill we have already passed.

As to the amendment proposed by my colleague and adopted by the Senate, it cannot reach beyond ten or twelve regiments at most. I think something ought speedily to be done in the cases of those special regiments, and I have sent word to some of those regiments that they had better make out their cases at once and send them here that we may know what their claims really are.

The Senator from Maine to-day has read us an extract from the authority given to raise troops in South Carolina from the Secretary of War. Nobody can question that those South Carolina regiments commanded by Colonel Higginson and Colonel Montgomery ought to be paid thirteen dollars a month from the beginning; and that they will be paid so I entertain not the shadow of a doubt. It may be some time before we can act on their cases, but it will come.

The Senator from Maine has referred to the time when we passed the bill authorizing the President to employ colored troops, and what his opinions were then. I have no doubt the Senator from Maine is right to-day, and has stated his correct position then. But it is well known that at that time there was a very strong opposition in the Army and out of the Army, and a very strong opposition in both Houses of Congress, to arming and employing colored troops. Those two sections were moved in the Senate. They were not reported here by the Committee on Military Affairs, but were moved by the Senator from New York, (Mr. King,) and pressed upon the Senate for several days with all the energy and petti-nacity that distinguished that inflexible Senator. The sum was fixed at ten dollars, because it was thought to be an inducement to employ this class of troops; and some of us who were at an early day in favor of employing them wanted to use every proper instrumentality possible to authorize the President to employ them. It was thought that the ten dollars a month would apply mostly to persons who had been slaves in the rebel States, and that it would be a very fair compensation. Some of those gentlemen who went down to New Orleans who were engaged in raising colored troops there came up as late as February, 1863, seven months after this bill had passed, and proposed that we should pay about seven dollars a month to those troops down there, and should give them a bounty in land when the war should be over.

There has been a great deal said in the papers in regard to our action in the Senate on this subject. I suppose Senators here, at any rate those in favor of employing colored troops at all, are disposed to do justice. The only question is how we are to incorporate their desires into the legislation of the country. When I offered the joint resolution in a shape making it retrospective and applying to colored troops in the past, I supposed on the information I then had (and it was a very limited information) that we had perhaps forty or fifty thousand of these men enlisted. I believe to-day that we have over one hundred regiments raised and being raised, and more than eighty thousand colored troops in the service of the United States; and as a matter of justice and to fulfill what I believe to be our obligations, there are fifteen or twenty regiments that ought to have their pay at thirteen dollars a month from the time of their enlistment. I do not think that without violating our faith we can do less than go back and pay them. It is a simple question whether we had better go back and pay all these regiments. It would cost some money; but if that principle had been acquiesced in, it would at any rate have stopped a great deal of this debate. Senators, however, thought we could not afford to do that, and whatever their dispositions were in regard to doing justice to these troops, they did not wish to be prodigal in the use of the public money.

The Senator from Maine refers to letters that have been received, and to the tone of a portion of the public press of the country. The Senator knows very well that there is often a great deal of injustice done to the motives of men and their action here, and he and I and all the rest of us must bear the comments of the public press of the country, and must bear the criticisms of friends who choose to write to us frequently on imperfect telegraphic dispatches of what is said here. It is impossible for the telegraph to carry out to the country all the statements made on the floor of the Senate, and all the qualifications accompanying statements which are made here, or to carry to the people of the country an exact impression of how affairs are going on here, and often men of zeal and earnestness catch up these reports and rush into the newspapers or send their letters here censuring or criticising our action that they do not understand anything about. We cannot help this. We have got to bear it, and bear it as best we may. The Senator from Maine knows and we all know that we are not to stand or fall by any of these representations, but upon our general course of life and character. On that we shall be judged, and for one I am not at all disposed here to cower to the censure of the press or to over-value its praises.

Now, sir, I do not object to this joint resolution going back to the committee. I think perhaps we can put it in a better shape after having heard the views of Senators, and knowing something of the sentiments of the Senate, and we can bring it back again to the Senate in a form in which it can receive speedily the support of this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A joint resolution (S. No. 19) of thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 42) authorizing payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read;

A bill (S. No. 94) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Paymaster E. C. Doran;

A bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 230) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make a privileged report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes. I send it to the Secretary, and ask to have it read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

JOHN SHERMAN,
DANIEL CLARK,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
E. B. WASHBURN,
JOHN A. KASSON,
JOHN L. DAWSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the following resolution as a part of the report:

Resolved, That the Senate further insist on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, and ask another conference; and the conferees on the part of the Senate are instructed to agree to proper amendments to the amendments of the Senate disagreed to by the House, providing for a tax of twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand.

A short explanation is necessary to show the true position of this question. The House of Representatives agreed to some of the amendments of the Senate and disagreed to others. If the Senate should adopt the proposition of the House, it would leave the bill in an incongruous and most ridiculous attitude; and yet the conferees on the part of the Senate could not agree with the House unless we were willing to yield to a tax of twenty cents upon spirits on hand. A majority of the conferees on the part of the Senate felt themselves precluded from agreeing to such an amendment on the ground that the Senate had struck out the tax on spirits on hand and the House had agreed to that amendment, thus leaving before them no tax on spirits on hand and no amendment which a majority of the conferees supposed could be amended so as to provide for taxing spirits on hand.

Under these circumstances, finding this disagreement radical, it being impossible to reconcile the dispute between the two Houses, we have reported the disagreement, with the understanding, however, that we would ask in both Houses a definite vote and instructions upon the question of whether or not we should have a tax of twenty cents on the spirits on hand. If the Senate instructs its conferees (as it undoubtedly can—I have looked at the question, and although it is very rare there is no difficulty in the way; the Senate may instruct its conferees on any point or any of its committees) to agree to a tax of twenty cents on spirits on hand, the parliamentary difficulty would be removed, and we could very easily, by proper amendments, carry out the sense of the Senate and the House of Representatives. If, however, Senators have made up their minds that they will agree to no tax upon spirits on hand, it is as well to take the vote, take the sense of the Senate definitely upon instructions to the next conferees; otherwise there will be a disagreement, and the bill will be lost.

I make this explanation simply to present the question to the Senate; and I hope, therefore, that either now or else to-morrow—it is important that prompt action should be had upon it—the Senate may definitely vote upon the question of instruction, and thus take its position one way or another.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate is very thin now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think, myself, it ought to be called up before to-morrow, although it is very important to have the bill acted on.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the bill go over, then, until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it be made the special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, February 29, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CALL OF STATES FOR BILLS.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the business in order, to call the States for bills on leave to be referred to committees, and not to be brought back by motions to reconsider.

ARMY CHAPLAINS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, introduced a bill to promote the efficiency of chaplains in the Army, and to define their rank, pay, and emoluments; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PATENT EXTENSION.

Mr. NELSON introduced a joint resolution, accompanied by a memorial, authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to examine, and if on such examination it shall appear just, then to extend the patent granted to Francis N. Smith for a corn-sheller, for an additional term of seven years, for the benefit of the widow and heir of Francis N. Smith, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

CARSON CITY BRANCH MINT.

Mr. BOUTWELL introduced a joint resolution to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City, in the Territory of Nevada, for the purpose of a branch mint located in said place; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JULIA A. AMES.

Mr. BOUTWELL also introduced a bill for the relief of Julia A. Ames; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ELIZABETH P. MEANS.

Mr. BOUTWELL also introduced a bill for the relief of Elizabeth P. Means; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LIMITATION OF INDICTMENTS.

Mr. BOUTWELL also introduced a bill in relation to the computation of time within which an indictment may be found against persons charged with crime against the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES JUDGES.

Mr. MOORHEAD introduced a bill to fix the salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court and certain of the judges of the district courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. JULIAN introduced a bill to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

STEAMER LADY WALTON.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamer Lady Walton; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SURPLUS GOLD.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill to prevent an accumulation of surplus gold in the Treasury of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SUSPENSION OF AN ACT.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill to continue the suspension of a part of the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PAY TO SOLDIERS FOR EXTRA DUTY.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill to allow non-commissioned officers and soldiers pay for extra duty; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, introduced a bill extending the superintendency of the Governor of Dakota to the Winnebago and the Sisseton and the Wahpaton bands of the Sioux or Dakota Indians; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

WAGON ROAD IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. COLE, of California, introduced a bill granting lands to construct a wagon road in California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

OFFICIAL COURT REPORTERS.

Mr. COLE, of California, also introduced a bill authorizing the United States courts in California to appoint reporters; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

B. C. WHITING.

Mr. COLE, of California, also introduced a joint resolution relating to the account of B. C. Whiting; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRANTS OF LANDS TO KANSAS.

Mr. WILDER presented concurrent resolutions of the Kansas Legislature, asking Congress for a grant of lands to build a railroad from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Scott, in the State of Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILDER also presented concurrent resolutions of the Kansas Legislature, requesting Congress to pass joint resolutions granting to the State of Kansas certain lands for the purposes specified in the constitution of the State of Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF PAY.

Mr. ROSS submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That in consequence of the increased expense of living and the depreciation of the value of the national currency, it is the opinion of this House that the compensation paid to the officers and soldiers of the Army and Navy of the United States be increased about thirty-three per cent., and that the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to this House at an early day a bill for the purpose of carrying out the views of the House as expressed by this resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and to modify the resolution so as to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill.

Mr. ROSS. I must decline, as I want to test the question.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table until I see whether the demand for the previous question is sustained.

The previous question was not seconded; there being, on a division—yeas 40, noes 60.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to debate the resolution, and to expose this demagogism.

The SPEAKER. The resolution then goes over.

SLAVERY.

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That slavery legally exists in some of the States of the Union by virtue of the constitution and laws of such States, and that neither the Government of the United States, nor the people thereof, as such, are responsible therefor, nor have they any legal duty to perform in relation thereto except such as is enjoined by section two, article four, of the Federal Constitution, in these words: "No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

The previous question was not seconded; there being, on a division—yeas 41, noes 69.

Mr. ARNOLD rose to debate the resolution, and it went over.

WESTERN NAVY-YARD.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of Commodore Foote's report on the necessity of establishing a navy-yard and depot for naval purposes on the western waters, and the point where the same should be established, which report was addressed to Hon. John W. Noell, of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and dated February 5, 1863.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, leave was granted to withdraw from the Committee on Military Affairs the papers relating to the claims of the members of the first regiment of cavalry of Illinois volunteers for horses lost at the battle of Lexington, Missouri; and also those in the case of Colonel Joseph Paddock for services as such and as commandant of the fifth regiment of Indiana volunteers in the war with the Indians in 1810-11, and in the war of 1812 with Great Britain.

ILLINOIS MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, submitted a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to inquire into the propriety of establishing a mail route from the city of Rock Island, Illinois, through Camden Mills, Pleasant Ridge, &c., to the city of Fort Madison, Iowa.

EMPLOYMENT OF REBEL PRISONERS.

Mr. ARNOLD asked unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be requested to inquire into the expediency of employing the rebel prisoners on such public works as may be required, to the end that they may earn an honest livelihood while in our hands.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, objected.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army; and an act (H. R. No. 230) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

EVACUATION OF WINCHESTER.

Mr. JULIAN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to furnish to this House a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry convened under special order No. 346 of the War Department on the 7th of August, 1863, to inquire into the facts and circumstances relative to the evacuation of Winchester by the command of Major General Milroy, together with all the testimony taken before said court, its rulings on points of evidence, the notes of testimony offered and rejected, the summary of the case by the Judge Advocate General, and the decision of the President thereon.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the resolution passed by the House on the 13th of February, 1864, which directed the Clerk of the House to pay the late librarian of the House a sum not exceeding two dollars per copy for the copyright of a work entitled A Dictionary of the United States Congress, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL called for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and STILES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 57, noes 52.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Smith, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Winfield—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Marvin, McBride, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—64.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DRIGGS stated that his colleague, Mr. LONGYEAR, was confined to his room by indisposition.

Mr. ROBINSON stated that he was paired off with Mr. GOOCH.

Mr. SWEAT. I rise to a question of order for the purpose of understanding where we stand in this matter. The resolution which this proposes to repeal was adopted some weeks ago, and I supposed that final action was had upon it, as a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair is endeavoring to understand what question of order the gentleman from Maine is raising.

Mr. SWEAT. It is impossible for me to present my question of order without making a preliminary statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot, during the roll-call, present any point of order except very briefly.

Mr. SWEAT. I wish to inquire of the Chair what vote it takes to repeal a resolution already adopted.

The SPEAKER. By all the usages with which the Chair is familiar, a majority can repeal a resolution which a majority has passed.

Mr. SWEAT. The point of order which I wished to raise was this: after the resolution had been adopted and a motion to reconsider laid on the table, making the action of the House final, and when it is well known that many members on this side of the House are absent, is it in order to introduce a resolution of this nature?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. SWEAT. And again I wish to inquire—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not stating a point of order. He is debating the merits of the proposition.

Mr. SWEAT. I wish to know whether approved parliamentary rules will not interfere for the purpose of maintaining good faith and common fair dealing on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is debate, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. COX. I rise preliminarily to a point of order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. During a roll-call nothing can be preliminary to a point of order.

Mr. COX. I wish to inquire whether a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was not made, and laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. COX. Then does not a resolution to repeal it require a two thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. SWEAT. That was the very question I was proposing to ask.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman was debating before he reached that point.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. DAWSON called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SWEAT. I wish to appeal to the mover of the resolution, and to ask him to delay action upon it until we have a full representation on this side of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. I object.

Mr. SWEAT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 6, nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Chandler, Dennison, and Stiles—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grinnell, Hale, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Loan, Long, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—110.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BRANDEGEE stated that he had been requested by his colleague, Mr. ENGLISH, to state that he had been called home suddenly on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. HOLMAN stated that Mr. MIDDLETON had been called home by the death of an old friend.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be now put, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] had demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—70.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Radford, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Smith, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Wadsworth, Whaley, Chilton A. White, and Winfield—52.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. STILES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fulton, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—71.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herlick, Hutchins, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, William H. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Wadsworth, Whaley, Chilton A. White, and Winfield—61.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. BRANDEGEE stated that Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. STILES demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

VIRGINIA ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to a question of privilege. The question of the right of Mr. Kitchen to a seat upon this floor from the seventh congressional district of Virginia was postponed to this day. I am so indisposed that I am scarcely able to speak, and I move that it be further postponed until Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT REGULATIONS, ETC.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire into and report upon the practical operation and result of the several acts of Congress touching commercial intercourse with the States declared to be in insurrection against the authority of the Government, and of the operations of the Treasury Department, established by the Secretary and approved by the President on the 31st day of March and the 11th day of September, 1863; and of the military orders which have been made from time to time touching such commercial intercourse by generals commanding departments or other officers; also to ascertain and report in what manner said acts, regulations, and orders have been executed, and especially whether any frauds have been committed, or favoritism to individuals or localities shown by the officers or agents of the Government employed under the said acts, regulations, or orders; and to inquire into all other matters touching any of the points which affect the public interest or the character of any public servant.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I object.

Mr. STEVENS moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to move to insert a special committee with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] as chairman, instead of the committee on the conduct of the war?

The SPEAKER. If the rules are suspended and the previous question is not called it will be in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Lovejoy, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—74.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Charles M. Harris, Herlick, Holman, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Tracy, Wadsworth, and Winfield—47.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means bill of the House No. 265, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. COX. I would ask the gentleman if he has authority to report this bill now under the rules of the House?

Mr. STEVENS. I propose to report it from the Committee of Ways and Means, under what I suppose to be their authority.

Mr. HOLMAN. It can only be reported, I suppose, under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. Not being a general appropriation bill, it can only be reported at this time under a suspension of the rules, if objection be made.

Mr. COX. So I supposed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio object to the reporting of the bill?

Mr. COX. I do, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move a suspension of the rules, so that the bill may be reported back and considered in the House now.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROOKS. If the House will allow me, I desire to say a word.

No objection was made.

Mr. BROOKS. I think the only apprehension on this side of the House is that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will force this bill to an immediate vote under the previous question, without affording an opportunity for the offering of amendments. He will observe that in the last section there is no limitation on the amount of bonds to be issued.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee now report an amendment limiting the amount to $11,000,000.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman proposes to give the House proper time to consider the bill, I think there will be no objection to its being reported now.

Mr. STEVENS. I will not call the previous question until gentlemen have had an opportunity to propose amendments.

Mr. BROOKS. With that understanding, I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANCONA] insist on his objection and his demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. ANCONA. I do; I prefer that the bill shall not be reported now.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, then reported back the bill with two amendments.

The bill was read. The first section provides that in lieu of so much of the loan authorized by the act of March 3, 1863, to which this is supplementary, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, not exceeding $200,000,000 during the current fiscal year, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after any period not less than five years, and payable at any period not more than forty years from date, and of such denominations as may be found expedient, not less than fifty dollars, bearing interest not exceeding six per cent. a year, payable on bonds not over $100, annually, and on all other bonds semi-annually, in coin; and he may dispose of such bonds at any time, on such terms as he may deem most advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or, at his discretion, for Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, issued under any act of Congress; and all bonds issued under this act shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority. And that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the necessary expenses of the preparation, issue, and disposal of such bonds out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, but the amount so paid shall not exceed one half of one per cent. of the amount of the bonds so issued and disposed of.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to persons who subscribed on or before the 21st of January, 1864, for bonds redeemable after five years and payable twenty years from date, and have paid into the Treasury the amount of their subscriptions, the bonds by them respectively subscribed for, notwithstanding that such subscriptions may be in excess of $500,000,000; and the bonds so issued shall have the same force and effect as if issued under the provisions of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for other purposes, approved February 26, 1862.

The Committee of Ways and Means reported an amendment to insert after the words "United States" in line nine, the words "bearing date March 1, 1864, or any subsequent period."

Mr. STEVENS. I will explain the necessity for that amendment. The Department now has a plate which, without being altered, could be used for these bonds if they were authorized to date them on the 1st of March. If that alteration is not made—and it is probable the bill will not become a law before that time—then they will have to prepare new plates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Committee of Ways and Means reported a further amendment: in line seven of page 2, after the word "for," to insert "not exceeding $11,000,000."

Mr. STEVENS. As the bill was originally reported it authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue five-twenty bonds for all which had been subscribed for previous to the expiration of the time fixed and which had been paid in, and for which the money is in the Treasury. That was thought by some gentlemen here, and very properly I believe, to be rather too indefinite, authorizing the issuing of an indefinite sum. We have ascertained that the amount is about $10,000,000, and cannot exceed $11,000,000, and the committee have thought it right to restrict the issuing to the amount actually on hand, not exceeding $11,000,000.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the section as it now stands contains one other objection, to which I wish the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. As the section now stands it creates an additional loan of $11,000,000, while the purport of the act is only to transfer $200,000,000 from the $600,000,000 of the act of March 3, 1863. This is not a proper time nor a proper way in which to make a new loan; and whenever the subject of a loan comes up, there are some of us who have some remarks to make which we do not wish to make upon a bill of this character, because it might embarrass it. I hope that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will consent to this amendment, after the one just reported:

Provided, That this $11,000,000 shall be deducted from the $200,000,000, as authorized in the first section of this act.

The act as it now stands creates an additional loan of $11,000,000. It is that to which I object, not to the transfer of the $200,000,000 from the $600,000,000, for that makes no additional loan.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman move that as an amendment?

Mr. BROOKS. I do.

Mr. STEVENS. I have simply to say that that does not meet the views of the Committee of Ways and Means. The act of 1862 authorizes the loan to run for forty years. The bill under which this $11,000,000 is proposed to be issued authorizes the loan to run for twenty years. This does not authorize the issuing of a single bond except where the money has been actually lodged in the Treasury. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. The second section of this act authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, to persons who subscribed on or before the 21st of July, 1864, for bonds redeemable after five years and payable twenty years from date, and have paid into the Treasury the amount of their subscriptions, the bonds by them respectively subscribed for, not to exceed $11,000,000, notwithstanding such subscription may be in excess of $500,000,000, and it provides that the bonds so issued shall have the same force and effect as if they had been issued under the provisions of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for other purposes, approved February 26, 1862. In other words, the section clothes the Secretary of the Treasury with all the powers which he had under the five-twenty act. I do not propose to change this, but only to provide that the additional $11,000,000 shall be subtracted from the $200,000,000 transferred. I think that if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will give his attention to the second section of the act he will find that all the powers which he claims are given.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot think the amendment judicious. Does the gentleman from New York desire to offer any other amendment?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was first taken on Mr. Brooks's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. STEVENS. I have been requested to offer the following resolution, and I ask unanimous consent to do so:

Resolved, That the Hall of the House of Representatives be appropriated for the use of delegates and friends of the several Indian tribes, to present their condition by a statement of facts before the public, on Wednesday evening, March 9, 1864.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules.

The rules were suspended, more than two thirds voting therefor, and the resolution was introduced, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IRON-CLAD ATTACK ON CHARLESTON.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House the following information: all his instructions relative to the attack upon Charleston, and all his correspondence with Rear Admiral Du Pont relative to that attack previous to the 7th of April, 1863, and subsequent thereto, and all other information possessed by the Department or its bureaus growing out of that memorable contest, and all the reports of officers and others relative to iron-clad vessels and their adaptability for naval warfare. Any order of the Navy Department relative to withdrawing the iron-clads to the Mississippi or elsewhere. Also, the telegraphic order of the President, dated 13th April, 1863, directing Rear Admiral Du Pont to remain inside of the bar at Charleston and prevent the enemy from erecting batteries on Morris Island, and whether this order was acknowledged and obeyed. Also, the telegraphic order of the President, dated the 14th April, 1863, directing Rear Admiral Du Pont and General Hunter to take the batteries on Morris and Sullivan Islands, and whether said order was obeyed, or attempted to be obeyed. Also, the order of the Secretary of the Navy, dated 6th June, 1863, directing Rear Admiral Du Pont to cooperate with General Gilmore, and whether said order was obeyed, and whether General Gilmore complained of a want of cooperation on the part of Rear Admiral Du Pont. Also, who devised the plan of attack attempted upon Fort Sumter by Rear Admiral Du Pont on the 7th April, 1863, and whether such plan was communicated to the Department previous to its being made, and whether Rear Admiral Du Pont asked for more troops previous to the 7th April, 1863, or protested to the Department against making said attack; and whether any order, previous to that date, was given to him to attack Fort Sumter, or in any manner act against his judgment in the operations before Charleston; or whether any suggestions or plans of that officer or requisitions for more ships were refused or declined by the Navy Department previous to his attack upon the defenses of Charleston; and whether the port of Charleston is absolutely closed to blockade running since the monitors went inside of the bar.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw that objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot withdraw my objection. I do not believe these investigations of the conduct of officers at this time will do any good. This is not the time.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I will state that a resolution has been passed by this House which only partially brings out the history of these transactions, and which does great injustice to the Navy Department. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not desire to do injustice to the Department by such a one-sided publication of facts.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not know that any such resolution had been passed.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. It has. The gentleman from Maryland the other day said he desired all the facts connected with this matter to come out.

Mr. STEVENS. I was sorry to hear what the gentleman from Maryland said. I think this squabbling over the conduct of particular officers is productive only of harm. I would have objected to the other resolution if I had known it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman from Missouri whether this resolution calls for all orders relative to Admiral Du Pont?

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. It does.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. And then specifies certain particular orders?

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I understand it.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot see that this resolution will do any good.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. A portion of the correspondence on the subject only has been brought out by the resolution which the House adopted. The gentleman from Maryland said the other day that he was anxious to have the whole of this correspondence. That portion of it which has been brought out by itself does great injustice to the Navy Department. The Navy Department desire to stand upon the whole record, and I hope there will be no objection to this resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not know of the other resolution or I would have objected to it, and I would rather rescind that now than to pass this. I of course desire to do no injustice to the Department, and if injustice has been done by the resolution we have already passed, it may be that the passage of this one is proper.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Justice to the Department requires that both sides shall be published, as we have already called out one side.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I will not object to this resolution; but I hope it will be the last of this character.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I think it would be much better to rescind the other resolution.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I suppose there is hardly a disposition anywhere to do great injustice to the Department.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, there is a time for all things, and I do not think this is the time for the introduction of such resolutions. However, I will not object to the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. DUMONT submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee to whom was referred the subject of standing rules of the House be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by a standing rule for an additional standing committee, to be designated "a Committee on the National Bank," and of providing that said committee shall have charge of all proper matters growing out of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," and of all proper matters relating to the banks organized and to be organized in pursuance of said act, and that they report by rule or otherwise.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following:

And that the committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the 31st rule of this House by adding thereto the following:

And if any member, present within the bar of the House when a vote by yeas and nays is taken, shall neglect or refuse to answer to his name when called, he not having been previously excused by the House, and that fact shall be brought to the notice of the Speaker by any member immediately after the reading of the vote by the Clerk, the Speaker shall then direct the name of the member not voting to be called again by the Clerk, and if said member still declines to answer, the Speaker shall thereupon submit to the House for its consideration and action as a question of privilege what order shall be taken in the case of such recalcitrant member, and no other motion or business shall be entertained until the case is disposed of.

And that the committee report at as early a day as practicable by rule or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether the amendment is germane to the original resolution. Although both propositions relate to the rules of the House, they relate to different subjects, and on the same principle that one bill cannot be offered as an amendment to another bill on a different subject, the Chair thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. COX. I raise that question of order.

Mr. DUMONT. I demand the previous question on my resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DUMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIRCULATION OF COUNTERFEIT MONEY.

Mr. DUMONT introduced a bill to prevent the selling and circulation of counterfeit coin, of counterfeit and altered Treasury notes, and of postage currency bills; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE LANDS.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced a bill to authorize the State of Indiana to apply certain lands granted by Congress to the education of orphan-children of soldiers who died during the war; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have this bill put on its passage, unless objection be made.

The bill was read. It grants to the State of Indiana permission to apply the lands to which that State may be entitled under the act of July 2, 1862, donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, and the proceeds thereof, to the education of the orphan children of soldiers and seamen who may have died or shall hereafter die in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the present war, under such limitations and restrictions and in such manner as the Legislature of that State may prescribe. Also extending the time for the acceptance of the benefits of said act one year from the date of the approval of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say that inasmuch as this bill affects Indiana only, I presume unless some gentleman from that State objects to it, it would not be inappropriate to put it on its passage without delay. If, however, my colleague, [Mr. JULIAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, wishes to have the bill referred to his committee, I will not object to that disposition of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether his State has given any indication that it desires these lands to be disposed of in that manner, or in any different manner from what they have already been appropriated under the law?

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been only a partial session of the Legislature of Indiana since the passage of the act of 1862, and there has therefore been no authoritative expression of opinion on the subject. The bill I have introduced gives the State the right to apply the proceeds of the lands in question, being three hundred and ninety thousand acres, to the education of those who shall be made orphans by their fathers falling in the service of the Union during the present war.

Mr. STEVENS. Does this bill donate any new lands?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it merely provides for the disposition so far as Indiana is concerned of the lands donated by the act of July 2, 1862.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not press this bill to its passage now. There is evidently some additional legislation necessary for the location of these agricultural lands by the several States. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will refer to the proper committee some general bill that shall provide for the location of these lands, and such as shall apply to all the States. I have no opposition to the gentleman's scheme so far as his State is concerned, but I think we ought to have some general legislation on the subject, and I think it had better be considered at the same time.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that reference.

The motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit a resolution which I think is privileged in its character. I ask to have it read; and if there be objection, and the Chair decides that it is not privileged, I will move to suspend the rules.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of War was, on the 6th day of January, 1864, directed by resolution to inform this House what amount of payment had been made, if any, to the Illinois Central Railroad Company and certain other railroad companies for the transportation of "property and troops" of the United States, and the amount still claimed by such companies from the United States for such transportation; and whereas the information so required has not been furnished: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House why the information required by said resolution has not been furnished to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to introduce the resolution under the call of States.

Mr. STEVENS. That resolution calls for information from one of the Departments, and should lie over for one day.

The SPEAKER. It refers to a previous call for information, and does not, in the opinion of the Chair, come under the rule referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. It calls for information from a Department.

The SPEAKER. It, however, calls for no information not included in the resolution to which it refers. The Chair decides that an objection would not carry it over one day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I merely desire to say that this information was called for some two months ago. It is of a character which certainly could have been furnished in a shorter time than has already elapsed. I will state further that my object in calling for the information was to have legislative action upon it when obtained from the Secretary of War.

Mr. STEVENS. I dare say the Secretary, as soon as he is able, in the multiplicity of his business, will communicate this information. I hope the gentleman will wait a little longer. If he does not withdraw it I move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. Rather than that disposition shall be made of the resolution I withdraw it, giving notice that I will offer it again.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 42) authorizing payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read; when the Speaker signed the same.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. DUMONT introduced a bill to extend the time for the acceptance of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and to amend said act; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

TREASURY REGULATIONS, ETC.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire into and report upon the practical operation and result of the several acts of Congress touching commercial intercourse with the States declared to be in insurrection against the authority of the Government, and of the regulations of the Treasury Department, established by the Secretary and approved by the President on the 31st day of March and the 11th day of September, 1863, and of the military orders which have been made from time to time touching such commercial intercourse by generals commanding departments or other officers; also, to ascertain and report in what manner said acts, regulations, and orders have been executed, and especially whether any frauds have been committed or favoritism to individuals or localities shown by the officers or agents of the Government employed under the said acts, regulations, or orders; and to inquire into all other matters touching any of the points which affect the public interest or the character of any public servant.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. How does that resolution again get in here?

The SPEAKER. It comes in under the regular call of the States for resolutions.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I demand the yeas and nays. I want to see how many there are in this House who wish to whitewash Mr. Chase.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Lovejoy, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—75.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Cox, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Herriek, Hutchins, Keran, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Voorhees, Wadsworth, and Winfield—43.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PEACE.

Mr. LONG submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas history teaches that there never has been a civil war that was not settled in the end by compromise, and inasmuch as no possible harm can result either to the character or dignity of the United States from an honest effort to stop the effusion of fraternal blood, and restore the Union by the return of the States in rebellion to their allegiance under the Constitution; and whereas the President, with a full knowledge of the lessons taught by history in relation to all civil wars, in his inaugural address said, "Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you;" and whereas we now have an armistice, decreed by the Almighty, and executed for the past two months by the snows and ice of winter, thereby affording time and opportunity for reflection upon the past three years of horrible, relentless, and destructive civil war with all its calamities, and a prospective view of increased horrors in the approaching conflicts; and whereas a preamble and resolutions were, on the 7th of February, instant, introduced in the house of representatives of the confederate congress at Richmond denying the statement of the President of the United States "that no propositions for peace had been made to the United States by the confederate States," and affirming that such propositions were prevented from being made by the President of the United States, in that he had refused to hear, or even to receive, two commissioners appointed to treat expressly for peace: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby most earnestly but respectfully, requested to appoint Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire, Millard Fillmore of New York, Thomas Ewing of Ohio, and such other persons as the President may see proper to select, as commissioners on behalf of the United States who shall be empowered to meet a commission of like number when appointed for the same object on behalf of the confederate States, at such time and place as may be agreed upon, for the purpose of ascertaining before the renewal of hostilities shall have again commenced whether the war shall not now cease, and the Union be restored by the return of all the States to their allegiance and their rights under the Constitution.

Mr. DAWES. Is it in order to move to insert Vallandigham instead of Fillmore?

Mr. ASHLEY. Or to add the name of James Buchanan?

The SPEAKER. Not while the previous question is pending.

Mr. LOVEJOY demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Brooks, Cofroth, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Knapp, Long, McDowell, William H. Miller, Morrison, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Stiles, Strouse, Voorhees, and Chilton A. White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Loan, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—96.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. GRINNELL. Many members have refused when called to answer to their names. I want the rule read and enforced by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read, but there is no way by which it can be enforced. That is a matter for the House.

Mr. GRINNELL. Then I do not want it read.

SUPPRESSION OF THE REBELLION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have a resolution which I intended to offer as a substitute for the one just rejected. I offer it now as an independent proposition, and call for the previous question.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That the present war which this Government is carrying on against armed insurrectionists and others, banded together under the name of "southern confederacy," was brought on by a wicked and wholly unjustifiable rebellion, and all those engaged in or aiding or encouraging it are public enemies, and should be treated as such.

Resolved, That this rebellion shall be effectually put down; and that, to prevent the recurrence of such rebellions in future, the causes which led to this one must be permanently removed.

Resolved, That in this struggle which is going on for the saving of our country and free Government, there is no middle ground on which any good citizen or true patriot can stand; neutrality, or indifference, or anything short of a hearty support of the Government, being a crime where the question is between loyalty and treason.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division of the resolutions.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The first resolution was agreed to.

The second resolution was then read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division of the second resolution. The first clause of it is a separate and distinct proposition.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is susceptible of division. The Clerk will report the first clause.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That this rebellion shall be effectually put down.

The first clause of the resolution was agreed to. The Clerk then read the second clause, as follows:

And that, to prevent the recurrence of such rebellions in future, the causes which led to this one must be permanently removed.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to that clause of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to insert after the words "this one" the words "abolitionism and secessionism?" [Laughter.]

Mr. KERNAN. Oh, that means the same thing.

Mr. COX. Then I will vote for the resolution with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. No amendment or debate is in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Francis P. Blair, Jr., Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Loan, Long, Lovejoy, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—125.

NAYS—0.

So the second clause of the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ELDRIDGE announced that his colleague, Mr. WHEELER, was detained in his room by sickness, and had been for the last two days when the House was in session.

Mr. MALLORY stated that he had paired off with Mr. WEBSTER, otherwise, looking upon abolitionism and secession as the causes of this rebellion, he should have voted "ay."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon agreeing to the third resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays, and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported forty-six in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harrington, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Loan, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—109.

NAYS—0.

So the third resolution was unanimously agreed to.

THE REBELLION ABOLISHED.

Mr. COX offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the rebellion be, and the same is hereby, abolished. [Laughter.]

NAVY-YARD FOR THE LAKES.

Mr. SPALDING offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing a navy-yard and naval depot for the northwestern lakes at some suitable point on the southern shore of Lake Erie, and to report by bill or otherwise.

CLEMENT L. VALLANDIGHAM.

Mr. PENDLETON offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, (as the sense of this House,) That the military arrest, without civil warrant, and trial by military commission, without jury, of Clement L. Vallandigham, a citizen of Ohio, not in the land or naval forces of the United States, or the militia in active service, by order of Major General Burnside, and his subsequent banishment by order of the President, executed by military force, were acts of mere arbitrary power, in palpable violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The question being on seconding the previous question, the Speaker announced that the previous question was not seconded; there being, on division—yeas 37, nays 55.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker—Mr. ANCONA. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] rising to debate the resolution, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not rise to debate the resolution. I call for tellers on seconding the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANCONA] is in order.

Mr. GRINNELL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will it be in order for me to ask gentlemen to vote down the motion to lay on the table, in order that we may vote on the question direct, as the State of Ohio did?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Arnold, Baily, Baxter, Francis P. Blair, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Hale, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Orlando Kellogg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Nelson, Perham, Shannon, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Grinnell, Harding, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Loan, Long, Mallory, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Williams, Wilder, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—84.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I now call for tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DUMONT, and O'NEILL of Ohio, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—aye seventy-two.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Long, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Winfield—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Francis P. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—76.

So the resolution was rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MALLORY said: Mr. Speaker, if I did not consider myself paired with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WEBSTER] I should vote "ay."

DEBATE ON PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, moved that next Saturday be set apart for general debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message, no other business to be done.

The motion was agreed to.

CAUSES OF REBELLION.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Whereas on the 29th day of February, 1864, the American Congress without one dissenting vote agreed upon one of the most important questions of the age, to wit, the necessity of the entire removal of the causes of the unhappy struggle now desolating our land: Therefore, in memory of this auspicious event,

Resolved, That this House do now adjourn.

Objection was made.

Mr. FENTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 1, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of the German Political Club of Cleveland, Ohio, praying that the conquered States engaged in the rebellion may be treated as Territories until they shall of their own accord abolish slavery, and that the provisions of the confiscation act may be strictly enforced; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented six petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, praying for the sale of the mineral lands of the Rocky mountain country; and that liberal aid may be granted in the construction of the Northern and Central Pacific railroads; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Westford, Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery, and that the Constitution may be so amended as forever to prohibit its existence; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of citizens of Ohio, in which they say that slavery is the sum of all villainies. They pray Congress to repeal all laws requiring the rendition of slaves, and that measures may be taken by Congress so to amend the Constitution that it cannot be construed to favor slavery. As both these subjects are now before the Senate, I ask that the petition lie on the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the trustees of the Roosevelt hospital in the city of New York, praying that the duty or tax imposed by the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, upon legacies and upon deeds and other instruments, may be remitted so far as relates to said hospital; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William W. Woodworth, praying for a renewal and extension of the patent known as the "Woodworth planing machine;" which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the memorial of Horace H. Day, remonstrating against the extension of the patent of Charles Goodyear for the manufacture of India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

E. F. AND SAMUEL A. WOOD.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 105 for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have got some reports to make.

Mr. ANTHONY. This will lead to no debate. If the Senate will take it up, I will then give way to reports.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make a report if the Senate will allow me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not. Senators all around me desire to make reports.

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw the motion.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a petition of criers and bailiffs attached to the different courts of the District of Columbia, praying for additional compensation, and also the petition of members of the bar of the District of Columbia in favor of the same, to report them back and ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, provision having already been made by an act which has passed both Houses of Congress on the subject.

The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass:

A bill (S. No. 126) to amend "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington," passed May 15, 1820;

A bill (S. No. 129) to amend "An act to authorize the corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to lay and collect a water tax, and for other purposes," approved May 21, 1862; and

A bill (S. No. 130) for a charter of Masonic Hall Association in Washington city, District of Columbia.

Mr. HARDING, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 116) in relation to university lands in Washington Territory, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 120) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Wyandott to connect with a railroad from the city of Leavenworth via Leavenworth and Ohio City, crossing the Osage river in the direction of Galveston bay, in Texas; and also resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of land for the construction of a railroad from the eastern line of that State via Paola and Emporia, to intersect the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe railroad, have instructed me to report them back, and ask to be discharged from their further consideration, not deeming it advisable to legislate on the subject at the present time.

The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States transmitting correspondence in relation to the presentation of a watch by the British Privy Council of Trade to the master of the American schooner Highlander, reported a joint resolution (S. No. 29) giving the assent of Congress to the acceptance of a watch from the British Privy Council of Trade by the master of the American schooner Highlander; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Mills, widow of John Mills, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Ellen M. Abert, widow of Colonel J. J. Abert, late chief of the corps of topographical engineers, United States Army, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POWELL. I now move to take up the resolution I introduced a few days ago directing the Secretary of War to transmit to the Senate the evidence taken by the military commission, at the head of which was General McDowell, appointed to investigate the subject of cotton speculations by officers of the Army.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must object to that until we get through with reports. I have several reports that I desire to make. When resolutions are called for the Senator can move to take up that one.

Mr. POWELL. I withdraw it for the present. The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports from committees are still in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement showing the balances to the credit of that Department on the 1st of July, 1862, the amounts appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1863, the amounts drawn from the said appropriations or carried to the surplus fund, and the balances remaining in the Treasury at the last-named date, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, that it lie on the table, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 134) to repeal all acts or parts of acts granting allowances or bounties on the tonnage of vessels engaged in the Bank or other cod fisheries, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of James A. Farrell, commissary general of ordnance of the State of New York, praying for the refunding of certain moneys paid for duties on arms purchased by the State of New York during the year 1863, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

On motion of Mr. NESMITH, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War of the 25th of February, communicating a copy of the proceedings of the court-martial for the trial of Assistant Surgeon Webster, and a report of the General-in-Chief of the Army on the management of general hospitals, and copies of general orders containing instructions in relation to hospitals and the medical department, be printed.

REPEAL OF FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask leave of the Senate to present a report from the minority of the committee on slavery and the treatment of freedmen on the subject of the repeal of the fugitive slave laws.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will receive it by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask that it be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that order is made, I desire to make one observation, if I can have the attention of the Senate, and it is merely with reference to the usage of the Senate. I stated yesterday that as I understood that usage there was no such thing known as a minority report; that strictly it should be entitled "views of the minority." Practically it is the same thing; but as usage has established the latter form, I think it had better be preserved on the present occasion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I observe by reference to the Globe that the term "minority report" has been used. However, I care nothing about the word.

Mr. SUMNER. As a matter of practice I should like to refer that question to the Chair. I know that on a former occasion, when, in connection with Mr. Seward while he was a member of this body, it became my duty to make a minority report, after considerable debate it was by the direction of the Senate at the time entitled "views of the minority."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The general practice of the Senate in the recollection of the Chair is that a minority of a committee present their views and they are received by the consent of the Senate and printed. That has not, however, according to the recollection of the Chair, been uniform. There have been cases where the Senate has allowed a minority to submit a report as a report from the minority. The practice has usually been as the Chair has first suggested.

Mr. POWELL. I will move that the report be printed, and that ten thousand extra copies of the report be printed in connection with the majority report.

Mr. SUMNER. That will naturally go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. POWELL. Only the motion to print extra copies goes to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to print the extra copies will go to the Committee on Printing. The usual number will be ordered to be printed.

EMIGRANTS TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. NESMITH. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 140) to provide for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific, have directed me to report the same back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass; and I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates, for the protection of emigrants by the overland route to the States and Territories of the Pacific, the sum of $40,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, but $10,000 of the appropriation are to be applied to the protection of emigrants on the route from Fort Abercrombie by Fort Benton, and the sum of $10,000 to the protection of emigrants on the route from Niobrara, on the Missouri river, by the valley of the Niobrara and Gallatin, in Idaho.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO REENLISTED SOLDIERS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) of thanks of Congress to the volunteer soldiers who have reenlisted in the Army, to report it back without amendment, and with the recommendation that it pass; and as I think it will take but a moment to pass it, I ask that it be put on its passage now.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It presents the thanks of Congress to those noble and brave men who, having already so gallantly endured the hardships and perils of war, for more than two years, in support of their country's flag, present the sublime spectacle of again voluntarily enrolling themselves in the Army of the Union for another three years' campaign, or so long as the war shall continue. The Secretary of War is directed to cause these resolutions to be read to each of the veteran regiments who have reenlisted or who shall reenlist in both the volunteer and regular forces of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether the railroad companies mentioned in the seventh and ninth sections of the act of July 1, 1862, incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, have filed their assent to, or their acceptance of, the conditions of said act; and to transmit to the Senate copies of any documents in his Department purporting to be such acceptance.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the Senate copies of any reports made to him by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or by any of the railroad companies mentioned in the twentieth section of the act incorporating the said Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether he has, as authorized by the eighth section of the act incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, fixed the point of commencement of said road on the one hundredth degree of west longitude; and if so, to set forth a description of said point; and to furnish like information touching the point of commencement on the western boundary of Iowa, of the branch road from that point to said one hundredth degree of longitude, authorized by the fourteenth section of said act.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed on the 29th of February a bill (S. No. 86) to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution for closing the present session of Congress by an adjournment of the two Houses on Tuesday the 31st day of May next, at twelve o'clock meridian; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) of thanks of Congress to the volunteer soldiers who have reenlisted in the Army; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of F. W. Lander be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PUBLIC LOANS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, to report it back without amendment; and as the time is very pressing about it, and it can be easily understood—it is merely a slight change of the law as it at present exists with reference to the issue of bonds—I will ask that it be considered at the present time.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine if that bill authorizes the issue of any more five-twenty bonds?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. If the Senator will hear it read, he will see what it does authorize.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of so much of the loan authorized by the act of March 3, 1863, to which this is supplementary, to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, not exceeding $200,000,000 during the current fiscal year, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States, bearing date March 1, 1864, or any subsequent period, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after any period not less than five years, and payable at any period not more than forty years from date, and of such denominations as may be found expedient, not less than fifty dollars, bearing interest not exceeding six per cent. a year, payable, on bonds not over $100, annually, and on all other bonds semi-annually, in coin; and he may dispose of such bonds at any time, on such terms as he may deem most advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or, at his discretion, for Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit issued under any act of Congress; and all bonds issued under this act are to be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority. The Secretary of the Treasury is to pay the necessary expenses of the preparation, issue, and disposal of such bonds, but the amount so paid is not to exceed one half of one per cent. of the amount of the bonds so issued and disposed of.

It proposes also to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, to persons who subscribed on or before the 21st of January, 1864, for bonds redeemable after five years and payable twenty years from date, and have paid into the Treasury the amount of their subscriptions, the bonds by them respectively subscribed for, not exceeding $11,000,000, notwithstanding that such subscriptions may be in excess of $500,000,000; and the bonds so issued are to have the same force and effect as if issued under the provisions of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for other purposes, approved February 26, 1862.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I answered the question put by the Senator from Kentucky a moment ago rather hastily. The last section does specifically authorize the issue of five-twenties to the amount of about eleven million dollars, in consequence of there being subscriptions over the amount authorized by the law and the money having been paid in upon them to that amount. It will be observed also that under the bill as it stands the Secretary might have power to issue five-twenty bonds. It says that the bonds to be issued shall be payable in not less than five and not over forty years. It varies from the original act which we passed at the last session, authorizing a large amount of what might be called ten-forties to be issued, by reducing the minimum to five years. It is not the intention, however, as I understand, of the Secretary to issue five-twenties, but a paper of different denomination, to run for not less than five but for a longer time than twenty years.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if this bill makes any other alteration whatever in the law, except reducing the lowest period in which the $200,000,000 may be redeemed from ten to five years?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see that there is any other.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought there seemed to be a little difference from the reading of the bill. It is not stated in this bill that the ultimate redemption is to be in coin. That is stated in the original bill authorizing the loan of $900,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is in lieu of an amount authorized by the original bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the omission of those words will not affect the payment of the principal in coin?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The attention of the committee was not called to that. I ask the Secretary to read that portion of the bill again. It is the first part of the bill.

The Secretary read, as follows:

That, in lieu of so much of the loan authorized by the act of March 3, 1863, to which this is supplementary, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, not exceeding $200,000,000 during the current fiscal year, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States, bearing date March 1, 1864, or any subsequent period, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after any period not less than five years, and payable at any period not more than forty years from date, and of such denominations as may be found expedient, not less than fifty dollars, bearing interest not exceeding six per cent. a year, payable, on bonds not over $100, annually, and on all other bonds semi-annually, in coin; and he may dispose of such bonds at any time, on such terms as he may deem most advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or, at his discretion, for Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit issued under any act of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is sufficient. It is payable in coin.

Mr. POWELL. I move to strike out the second section of the bill. The second section is in these words:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, to persons who subscribed on or before the 21st day of January, 1864, for bonds redeemable after five years and payable twenty years from date, and have paid into the Treasury the amount of their subscriptions, the bonds by them respectively subscribed for, not exceeding $11,000,000, notwithstanding that such subscriptions may be in excess of $500,000,000; and the bonds so issued shall have the same force and effect as if issued under the provisions of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for other purposes, approved February 26, 1862."

By the quotations in the newspapers I see that these five-twenty bonds are selling at a premium of about seven per cent.; that is, they are worth seven per cent. more than the paper money commonly called "greenbacks." If you authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to these persons $11,000,000 of these bonds which they subscribed for after the $500,000,000 authorized to be issued had been subscribed for, you will give to those persons about seven hundred thousand dollars; because the bonds are worth more by that amount of money than the money they have given for them. I do not think that any such law ought to pass. It will be virtually giving to those persons about seven hundred thousand dollars, or over that amount. It is manifestly unjust to the Government that it should be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The fact is simply as has been stated, that in the subscription for these bonds they run over the amount of $500,000,000. The persons who made the subscriptions have paid their money to some extent—I do not know exactly what the arrangement was with reference to that—and this bill simply authorizes the performance of that contract on the part of the Government with those persons. To be sure those bonds have risen in value somewhat; but the Senate will judge whether justice does not require that the persons who thus subscribed, the amount being so comparatively small, should receive their bonds. They make nothing out of the Government by it at all. The Government have no more to sell, and therefore the Government loses nothing by it.

Mr. POWELL. The law authorized the issue of $500,000,000 of five-twenty bonds, but it seems the subscriptions went some eleven millions over that amount, and this bill proposes to issue bonds to those persons who subscribed the eleven millions over the amount authorized. When those persons subscribed they knew the limitation in the law on the issue of those five-twenty bonds. The Government was not bound in any way whatever, in faith or otherwise, to issue more. Indeed, it could not issue more under the law as it then and now exists than the $500,000,000. Now, those persons who subscribed to the amount over and above the $500,000,000 come here and demand, or at least it is proposed to pass a law authorizing the issue of five-twenty bonds for those $11,000,000. The Government had better pay them back their money, because these bonds to-day are worth $700,000 more than the money they paid. If they have subscribed for bonds that cannot be issued, the Government can but give them back their money, and in that there is no breach of faith. I look upon this section as giving absolutely away, of the Government funds, $700,000 to those persons.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am informed the mode adopted was, that those who subscribed paid in their money absolutely. The Government have had the use of it. Now, what does the Senator propose to do? Pay back the money with interest, or pay it back without interest? Who is to perform the contract? I do not see that any harm is done, and I think justice requires that these bonds should be issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question has been put to me by a Senator as to how this subscription occurred. It occurred in this way: through the agency adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury fully two thousand five hundred persons, banks, corporations, bankers, &c., all over this country from California to Maine, were employed to negotiate the five-twenty loan. When the loan was about to be exhausted there was an eager demand for it, and I believe on the last day that the subscription books were open, from six to seven millions were subscribed and the money was paid in. It was impossible to tell precisely when the $500,000,000 were exhausted, on account of the extent of the country and the magnitude of the operations. It seems that the loan was really exhausted a day or two before it was known at the Treasury Department, because these subscriptions did not come in in the ordinary course of operations for a day or two, and sometimes three or four days. In this way an excess somewhere between nine and eleven millions was subscribed over the amount authorized by law. The money was sent from all parts of the country and went into the Treasury of the United States, and has been expended. But when they came to issue these bonds it was found that the amount subscribed for was in excess of the amount authorized by law. The only question occurs, whether the money with interest shall be paid back to those persons who subscribed for the stock, or whether the additional amount shall be authorized by law.

From this statement of the proposition, I think it is manifest the Government is bound to issue to these parties these bonds. They subscribed for them in good faith, ignorant of the fact that the $500,000,000 were exhausted. The Government could not tell exactly when to suspend the operation of this agency system scattered throughout the United States; and it is manifestly proper that the Government should furnish the bonds subscribed and paid for.

The Senator from Kentucky says it is a loss to the Government of $700,000. He is mistaken in that. The loss is about four hundred thousand dollars; that is, the bonds could be thrown on the market to-day and sold for about four hundred thousand dollars more than the Government realized from them; because from the 1st of November interest has been going on, and that must be deducted from the seven per cent. premium. But that is not a loss to us, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests to me. We received the money in December and November and expended the money, and surely we ought to furnish these parties with their securities.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether I understood him correctly as saying that the Treasury Department had a great number of agencies over the country for the sale of these bonds; whether there was a direct agency on the part of any bank in connection with the Treasury Department, except one particular bank; and if so, how many?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the Senator is perfectly familiar with the mode in which this loan was negotiated. The Secretary of the Treasury employed one agent, and, if time were not wasted in doing so, I might explain the mode in which this agency was conducted. I am prepared to do so fully at some proper time. This agent, Jay Cooke & Co., employed all the banks and bankers and associations throughout the United States to aid them in distributing and spreading this loan over the country; and I will venture the assertion now generally, without going into particulars as I am prepared to do on a proper occasion, that this loan was negotiated for less than any similar loan was ever negotiated by any Government. The operation of spreading this loan, popularizing it throughout the United States, has been more successful than any loan that I am aware of by any Government. The plan adopted was only adopted after mature consideration and after other plans had been tried and had failed. The only agent employed by the Government was the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., bankers of Philadelphia. They employed all these other persons, about twenty-five hundred in number, scattered throughout the United States, and took all the responsibility and expense of the loan.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The answer of the Senator covers the point I wished to make. I now wish to ask him whether the money has been paid into the banks or into the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. Into the Treasury. I will say that in all cases before the subscription is perfect the money is to be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the Senator answers the question I asked. We received $11,000,000 of an excess of subscriptions which the chairman of the committee says was paid in; I wish to know whether it was paid to the banks and is now in the vaults of the banks or whether it is in the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in the Treasury, every dollar of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not seen anything from the Department on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the subscription is perfect the money must be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course it was paid in when the bonds were delivered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh no, the bonds were not delivered for six weeks afterwards. The subscription is always paid in first at one of the fixed depositories of the Government; but the bonds are not issued sometimes until six weeks afterwards. All these five-twenty bonds under that $500,000,000 loan are not yet issued. I believe at one time the Department was back six or eight weeks, perhaps more, in issuing these bonds; but the subscription dated from the time the money was paid into the Treasury. The Government had that money and disbursed it.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the faith of the Government is in any manner pledged to the parties who subscribed that $11,000,000, it is very clear that the United States Government itself ought to redeem it. I understand the Senator from Ohio and the chairman of the Committee on Finance to say that the whole amount paid in on the subscription of these five-twenty bonds has actually been appropriated by the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; it has been appropriated by the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. As it is very desirable that these Departments should be kept strictly within the limits of their authority, I wanted to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury appropriated these $11,000,000 knowing at the time that that sum was in excess of the amount for which he was authorized to issue the five-twenty bonds. I do not know the amount of the loan; it is very large. What is the amount, I will ask the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. Five hundred millions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Five hundred millions were authorized. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to receive subscriptions amounting to the sum of $500,000,000 and no more, because he had only bonds to that amount to issue to the parties that might subscribe; but instead of receiving $500,000,000 in money he has received $511,000,000; so that he knew, or ought to have known when he found in the Treasury $511,000,000 subscribed in that way, that $11,000,000 were in excess. What I suggest is—I do not make the suggestion with a view of voting against this bill—that in all these cases it is the interest of the Government and it is the duty of these Departments that they should keep themselves studiously within the law. They are involving us—this is not the first case—in responsibilities that we did not mean to incur. That was done in the case of the excess of bounties which we have been obliged to provide for; and now we are asked to authorize the issuing of bonds to the extent of $11,000,000 on the ground that the Secretary of the Treasury has received $11,000,000 when he ought to have known, and would have known if his attention had been called to it, that it was impossible for him to issue bonds to that amount.

The honorable member from Ohio and the chairman of the Committee on Finance say that if the money is to be returned it is to be returned with interest. That I admit. What is the difference between what will be the interest on the $11,000,000 and the amount of premium which these bonds now command in the market? The member from Kentucky says that they are some seven or eight per cent. above par. Whatever premium these bonds command in the market which is more than the interest we should have to pay, that amount the Government loses. That is very clear. If we are obliged to pay some eleven million two or three hundred thousand dollars because two or three hundred thousand dollars is the amount of the interest on the $11,000,000 from the time we received it up to the present time and the bonds are worth six or seven hundred thousand dollars, we lose either three or four hundred thousand dollars, and we lose it because the Treasury has not watched as it might have done the amount of these subscriptions. If we could have been involved, and if we are involved—and I am not prepared to say that we are not, as the case now stands—if we are properly involved to this amount of $11,000,000, he might easily have involved us to the amount of one or two hundred millions more.

The difficulty suggested by the Senator from Ohio is one that applies, as I understand, exclusively to the subscriber and not to the Treasury Department. The Secretary of the Treasury employs an individual agency. Whether that employment was well advised or not I am not now prepared to say. I hope it may turn out, from the explanation which the Senator from Ohio says he is prepared at the proper time to give, that it was well advised, and that the interests of the United States were very much subserved by it; but that is not the opinion of a great many. But in consequence of employing that individual agency for the purpose of circulating the information that such an investment might be made all over the United States, it was deemed impossible for the different sub-agents who were receiving subscriptions to know whether the United States had or had not bonds equivalent to the amount of the subscription. The result therefore, so far as they were concerned, was that they could not know in advance; but when the Secretary of the Treasury used $11,000,000 more than the $500,000,000, then he knew or ought to have known that he was about placing on the Government an expenditure they never contemplated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think this is rather an unnecessary comment made by the honorable Senator from Maryland on a very simple transaction. How was it as explained by my honorable friend and colleague on the committee, the Senator from Ohio? Why, that these agencies existed all over the country. They must necessarily exist all over the country. It was an arrangement not only that might turn out well, but it has turned out well. We have sold our bonds and have got the money. We sold them originally at par, and the credit of the Government stands high. Suppose we had sold another $500,000,000 of them. Perhaps they would not be so high in the market; but it would be for the benefit of the Government to have the money. The fact was, as the Senator perceives, and as every Senator must perceive, it was impossible to ascertain with any degree of accuracy the exact point where to stop. From the very nature of the transaction, from the necessity of the case, it was in the hands of a great number of agents, as stated by my friend from Ohio, all over the country; and because the Secretary of the Treasury was not omniscient, because he could not foresee the instant at which this could be stopped and the exact point at which the subscription to the $500,000,000 in all these multitudinous agencies would be full, it resulted that here are a few millions more subscribed than were called for. Under the precautions which were taken, the money subscribed must go into the Treasury, and when it goes into the Treasury it can only be taken out by an appropriation made by law, and not by the Secretary of the Treasury. He cannot put his hand into the Treasury and take it out and pay it back again without a law of Congress. It must remain there.

The Senator talks about its being expended. Perhaps it is not expended to this day. It goes into the general mass. It cannot be distinguished from the $500,000,000 paid in on account of that loan. You cannot pick out the exact amount of money and say, "That is it, and it shall be paid back," but it is thrown into the mass in the Treasury—the Senator must understand that perfectly well—and there it must remain until we pass a law authorizing it to be taken out either to be paid back to those individuals or to be used for some other purpose. Therefore I cannot see that there is the slightest fault in the world to be imputed to the Secretary of the Treasury. He has done nothing illegal. It does not appear that he has used the money as the honorable Senator states. The money is there for aught that appears. We are not without money in our Treasury. If the Senator is keen enough and understands it well enough to lay his hand on the exact sum in the great mass that we have received and say that was the sum that should have been returned of that individual money, the position he has assumed might be a correct one. It does not appear that this money has been used or illegally spent. It does not appear that the Secretary of the Treasury has done anything wrong in relation to this matter, unless you require from him a knowledge that no man could possibly possess, and a power of foreseeing events that no man could possibly possess over so large an extent of country and in dealing in a transaction of this description.

This is the question that arises simply, if I understand it, what shall be done in this case, as these circumstances have happened, I suppose, from the very necessity of the transaction? The Senator says we lose so much money. Why, sir, that does not appear. We have got to put our stock in the market. We have yet to put the $200,000,000 to be authorized by this bill in the market. What effect will that have on the five-twenties? It may strike them down. I am told, in point of fact, that they have fallen somewhat since this bill was introduced. A portion of this premium that was spoken of is the accumulated interest for the half year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will mention to the Senator that the bonds were sold a day or two ago for 107, bearing interest in gold from the 1st of November last.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will be seen, therefore, that there is no loss to the Government. Senators talk about the loss to the Government! Why, sir, in our condition, about to issue a large quantity of paper, I take it we should be very glad to lose a great deal of money in the same way; that is, to get par for our bonds, and let the people make what they can out of them. It is nothing out of our pocket. It becomes, therefore, a mere question of propriety with reference to this comparatively small sum, whether we shall fulfill the obligation, the imperfect obligation, of course, that we are under with reference to it. I see no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I said was in answer to one statement, and I am replied to by a different statement. I understood the Senator from Ohio and the chairman of the Committee on Finance to say that we were under an obligation to issue those bonds, because we had received the money and used it. Did the Senator mean that by using the money all he intended to say was that the money was in the Treasury to be used, or did he mean to say that, being in the Treasury, it had been taken out of the Treasury? I know as well as the Senator from Maine that no money in the Treasury can be taken out without an appropriation; but we have general appropriation bills for which the Treasury wants money, and under which the money in the Treasury properly applicable to the appropriation can be used.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then, according to the honorable Senator's explanation, he is merely shrewdly playing upon a word which he understood from his knowledge of the business of the Treasury meant something different.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not understand any such thing. I know very well that when money once gets into the Treasury it cannot be taken out; but when the chairman of the Committee on Finance said that this money was there and had been used, I used his language.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That remark was made by my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. JOHNSON. You said "appropriated." I do not think that changes it much for the better. When it was stated that the money was "used" or "appropriated"—for one or both expressions were used—I took it for granted that this money had been used to meet some appropriation. I did not mean to charge the Secretary of the Treasury with taking money out of the Treasury without the authority of law. All that I meant to say was that if there were $11,000,000 in the Treasury in excess of the $500,000,000, he ought to have known that that $11,000,000 did not belong to the United States, and should not have been used, if used at all.

Now, I understand the honorable chairman to say that the money has been paid in, and there it is; or, what is the same thing, there is an equal amount in the Treasury; and as it is impossible for us to distinguish the particular money paid in under this subscription from money in the Treasury derived from any other quarter, it by no means follows that this money has been used at all. If that is the fact, if the money is there to be used if he thinks proper to retain it there, then it is a question for the Senate to decide whether it is advisable to issue these bonds. It may be that the bonds will not bring as much in the market now as they did a few days since, and it may be that they will bring a great deal less in the course of a few weeks; but we are to run that risk. One thing is certain: the bonds now are at a premium of some six or seven per cent., including the back interest, and to that extent it would be better for the persons who have paid their money to receive the bonds than to receive their money with interest from the time of payment.

I know very well it was impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury, or the direct agent of the Treasury here, to tell whether the amount subscribed would be in excess of the amount authorized; but what I said was, as the Senator from Ohio said, and no doubt said truly, that all the money subscribed must go into the Treasury before any bonds were issued, then when $511,000,000 got in the Treasury, somebody ought to have known that $11,000,000 of that amount were to be returned unless Congress should authorize the issuing of bonds that it had not then authorized. That is all I meant to say. I did not mean to charge the Secretary of the Treasury with any impropriety in regard to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say a word in reply to the last remark of the Senator, that somebody ought to know: that when the Secretary perceived that $511,000,000 were subscribed for and paid in, he knew there were $11,000,000 in the Treasury more than he was authorized to obtain; but what could he do? The Senator does not pretend to say he was in any fault before. He could not put his hand into the Treasury and take that money out and pay it back. The Senator knows that very well. It would require a law of Congress to do that. What does he then do? He comes to Congress and states the fact, and recommends that we shall issue bonds for it. He used it. He cannot tell, as I said before, what particular, specific money was appropriated. The Senator understands that very well. He must go on using the money in the Treasury, and if there is a balance there, and it always has been there, and he is ready to pay it back if Congress says so, then he has kept it there. You cannot distinguish. That is the whole of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope we shall be allowed to pass this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this bill is to lead to debate, I hope we shall take up the bill which was made the special order, which will not consume much time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us dispose of the bill which is before us. I think we are ready to take a vote upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order will be passed over informally, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none; and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. POWELL. It is very evident to my mind that we ought not to agree to this section of the bill. It is admitted on all hands that these fifty-two bonds are now at about seven per cent. premium. The interest accumulated on them would amount perhaps to about two per cent. That would leave $550,000 that we should save by selling that amount of bonds, and paying this money back. Gentlemen speak of paying it back with or without interest. The Senator from Ohio said a moment ago that over sixty million dollars of this sum were subscribed on the last day, that is, the 1st of January; so that the interest runs for but little over a month. That would not be over $55,000, or about that amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said $6,000,000 were subscribed on the last day.

Mr. POWELL. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he said $60,000,000. It is evident, however, that during the last few days a large amount was subscribed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The last three days.

Mr. POWELL. Then it will be seen that the interest to be paid runs but a little over a month.

Mr. SHERMAN. The interest runs from the 1st of November. The last bonds that were issued are dated the 1st of November, and the interest runs from that time. The value of that interest now in the market is about three and a half per cent. The advance is about three and a half per cent.

Mr. POWELL. Let me ask the Senator, do not the bond-holders get interest from the 1st of November?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; but in addition to the amount of subscription, the subscriber pays the interest in gold from the 1st of November up to the time of subscription. He has already paid that into the Treasury.

Mr. POWELL. The interest that accumulates only amounts to two per cent. in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. Two per cent. in gold, which, reduced to paper money, makes three per cent.

Mr. POWELL. At all events, taking the Senator's own admission, we should save three or four hundred thousand dollars. That, to be sure, in these times of extravagance is a very contemptible sum; but still we might as well save it to the Government and not tax the people for it, as to give it to these gentlemen.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him how we can save it?

Mr. POWELL. We can save it in this way: by paying the money back to the subscribers instead of issuing these bonds. In that way we shall save this amount of money, because the bonds are worth that amount.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I ask the Senator, have we the thing to sell?

Mr. POWELL. You authorize in the first section of this bill $200,000,000 of bonds to be sold.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a different stock.

Mr. POWELL. You can authorize that amount to be sold in the market if you choose. You can authorize $11,000,000 to be sold if you choose, and raise the money in that way. You authorize $200,000,000 to be sold in this bill, and at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury they can be made five-twenties precisely as the others are.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator how he knows how much these stocks will sell for when put into the market?

Mr. POWELL. I do not know; but I know how much the stock is selling for that you propose to give these parties. We know that it is selling for seven per cent. premium. If we pass this bill we give these parties for their money an article that is worth $700,000 more than we get. I know that much. We can authorize if we choose an additional sale of those bonds, and sell them for a premium, and you can command it in the market, in my judgment.

Mr. CONNESS. This seems a very simple proposition to my mind. The Government advertised for a loan of $500,000,000, and they established an agency to which subscriptions should be made and to which application should be made for subscriptions. Five hundred and eleven million dollars have been subscribed; and the question is, whether we shall issue $11,000,000 in addition to the amount authorized by law to meet the excess of subscriptions? I will not enter into a calculation as to who may lose or who may gain, or how much these parties will gain, if we issue these bonds or provide for their issuance. If they do gain, I am not unwilling to say that they deserve some gain for having come forward promptly and offered their money to the Government when the Government needed money; and therefore I see nothing wrong in the proposition. It is a simple, plain one, and one that does no wrong to the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the proposed amendment to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Sanbury, Sumner, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Merrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wright—27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the fifteenth line of the first section I move to strike out the word "six" and to insert "five," so that it will read, "bearing interest not exceeding five per cent. a year." It has been expected in the country that a five per cent. loan would be provided for; and I was surprised when the report came from the Committee on Finance providing for a six per cent. loan. The six per cent. bonds are worth in the market above par, which indicates very clearly that the Government could negotiate a loan at less than that rate of interest. It seems to me that the Government should negotiate its loans at the very lowest rate of interest possible. As compared with the debts of other Governments our debt is being contracted at a very high rate of interest, and it is to impose a very great burden on the people. If we can secure a loan at five per cent. instead of six we ought to do it. It seems to me, if the public credit is maintained as it has been for the last few months, that a loan can be secured at five per cent. With the present depreciation of the currency five per cent. payable in coin, as this bill provides, would be equal to nearly eight per cent. in currency.

My proposition is to issue these bonds at a rate of interest not to exceed five per cent. If the chairman of the Committee on Finance will say that he is satisfied such a loan cannot be negotiated, of course that would influence my judgment very much on this proposition; but until he says so, I am satisfied that such a loan can be negotiated; and if so, it ought to be done. We ought not to continue to increase our debt at the enormous rate of interest we now pay unless it be absolutely necessary. If we can secure a five per cent. loan instead of six per cent. or a higher rate, we should do it. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether, in his judgment, on an examination of the question, in view of the difference between gold and paper, and in view of the desire to make permanent investments, as shown by the anxiety to secure the last loan, we cannot make this loan at five per cent.?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I remember when I was in the minority here, and the Government was indebted something short of one hundred millions, that I made the same objection that has been made now by the honorable Senator from Indiana. Inquired why, with such enormous power as this country possessed, owing nothing or substantially nothing, the Administration should be so very anxious to fix the maximum rate of interest at six per cent.? Why not fix it at five? Why not at four? I made the inquiry; but not being very familiar with financial matters, I had perhaps no very great confidence in my own judgment with reference to it; but it seemed to me then that there might be a reason for it; and I suggested that it would be very difficult, perhaps, if the maximum were fixed, to get a loan at any rate below that; and I suppose the Senator will argue in the same way.

That was a time of peace. That was a time when we owed nothing. That was a time when our resources had not been drawn upon; but I remember very well the answer that was made. It was this: "It is unwise to fix the sum below six per cent., and say nothing more shall be given, because it may be that the Government may not be able to obtain the loan at any less rate than six per cent., and if not, they should have the power to go higher."

If that argument was good as advanced by Mr. Hunter, who was then chairman of the Committee on Finance, under such circumstances, when we were not suffering particularly, and in no immediate pressing want of money, and not carrying on a war, it would seem to be a good answer to be made now to the honorable Senator, that it is hardly worth while to say that the Government shall not borrow beyond a certain rate when we are putting a loan into the market, because it may be that we may not be able to obtain the money—and we want it from day to day, and must have it—at a less rate than the sum we fix.

The Senator will further observe that this is only a part of the loan authorized by the act passed by the last Congress, I think on the 3d March, 1863, authorizing the borrowing of $900,000,000 for two years at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. This is in lieu of that. My opinion is, that in a time of war, situated as we are, compelled to have the money at some rate or other, it is unwise to say to the Secretary of the Treasury that he shall not give the ordinary current rate of interest in the market, which is six per cent. generally, and seven per cent. in New York. I understand in point of fact it is the intention and belief of the Secretary that he can obtain the loan at five per cent. I do not know how that is. I have not conversed particularly with him on the subject; but I am so informed. I hope he may be able to do so. I take it the Senator knows very well that if the Secretary can do so, he will, for nobody has been more particular and more anxious, more overcareful with regard to keeping down the rate of interest on any and all occasions than the Secretary of the Treasury has been from the beginning; and he has been very successful in relation to those matters.

Now, sir, believing and hoping that we may obtain this loan at a less rate of interest, my answer is, that I think it would be unwise in a time of war to vary from the policy established by the friends of the gentleman himself in time of peace.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance has not answered quite as satisfactorily as I hoped he would. His reference to a debate between himself and Mr. Hunter who once occupied the position in this body which he now does is not very illustrative. At the time that the former chairman of the Committee on Finance made the reply which the Senator says was made to him, the current rate of interest in the country was from seven to ten per cent. in ordinary commercial transactions. The currency was not then inflated, and there was but a slight if any difference between the value of the paper and coin currency of the country; but now in almost all commercial transactions, money being so abundant, the rate of interest payable in paper, depreciated as it is, is six per cent. In almost all the cities money can be readily had on an interest of six per cent. per annum payable in paper. As I said before, at the time the answer was made to the Senator by Mr. Hunter, that was not the case; but loans were negotiated at from seven to nine or ten per cent.

Now, sir, the difference between paper and gold is quite thirty-three per cent.; one dollar in gold being worth $1.59 in the paper currency of the country, and the ordinary commercial rate of interest being six per cent. payable in paper. Under these circumstances, I want to know why it is that the Secretary of the Treasury cannot negotiate this loan payable in gold at less than six per cent. If the banks of the country can use their capital at six per cent. and no greater rate of interest payable in paper, which is worth so much less than gold, why is it that the Secretary of the Treasury must pay in gold what is equal to more than nine per cent. in paper?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose the Secretary says that he cannot get the money for less, or cannot negotiate this loan for less than nine per cent., is the Senator prepared to answer that he shall not get it at all; that he will not authorize him to give that amount?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not like to argue here upon supposed cases.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator's argument goes to that, because this bill does not provide that he shall pay that amount, but that he may have the power if necessary to pay it. The Senator is arguing that he shall not have the power. He will not give six per cent. He would rather go without the money.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Secretary of the Treasury were to say to the Senate that he could not negotiate a loan for less than nine per cent., when the ordinary interest of the country is but six per cent., payable in depreciated currency, I would say, the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury was not entitled to the respect of the Senate. That would be my response to that proposition. But I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if the Secretary of the Treasury were to say to us that in view of the present state of the rate of interest in the country he could not probably negotiate for less than nine per cent., whether he would insert in this bill "nine" instead of "six per cent.," contrary to his own convictions.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator permit me one moment right there?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to remind that Senator that during the last days of his party's occupancy of this capital, when the country was in profound peace, and to pay the ordinary peace expenses of the Government, his friends paid one per cent. a month in advance for $3,000,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have not designed to discuss this question as a party man, nor do I intend to be led off into a party discussion. We are now considering a question that goes to the pockets of the tax-payers of the country. If we can negotiate a loan at five per cent. instead of six per cent., it is our duty to do it. Our debt is being contracted at a higher rate of interest than perhaps the debt of any country in the world. I do not intend that it shall be considered a sufficient answer to me that any former Administration was compelled to negotiate a loan at a very high rate of interest. In reply to the Senator from Michigan, I do not recollect the circumstance to which he refers. I will not dispute it; but my reply is, that I have no knowledge of the circumstances to which he refers.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance has called attention again to the fact that this is but a limitation; it fixes the maximum of interest; and the Secretary of the Treasury may possibly negotiate it at a less rate. I will ask the Senator if he knows of any case in which a loan has been negotiated at a less rate of interest than the maximum fixed in the bill allowing the loan?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I do not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator says he does not. Of course he does not. I knew that would be his reply. As soon as it is fixed in the bill, it becomes the opinion of the country, and the rule in the Department, too, that that shall be the rate; and when we say that it shall not exceed six per cent. it is the same as saying that the loan shall be negotiated at six per cent. That becomes both the maximum and the minimum.

There has been a desire to obtain the Government securities within the last few months. We have an illustration of it here in this bill. A six per cent. loan was sought after with such avidity that $11,000,000 were subscribed for beyond the amount allowed by law, and this bill provides for that excess. There was an earnest desire to secure the loan, and that Government security is now worth in the market three or four per cent. above par.

With this prominent, striking fact before us, it seems to me remarkable that the chairman of the Committee on Finance should say to us we cannot negotiate a loan at less than six per cent. This loan is now worth at six per cent. payable in coin, nine per cent. in currency. Money is loaned in the banks and in all commercial transactions at six per cent., but the Government pays what is equivalent to nine per cent. I say we ought not to do it. If we make a loan at five per cent. payable in coin it is equal to seven or eight per cent. in the ordinary currency of the country.

I have made this proposition in good faith, not as a party man. I disclaim party considerations and influences upon a question like this. Our debt is going up to an enormous amount, and we should consider well at every step where we add one hundred or two hundred or three hundred million dollars to our already enormous debt, whether we can secure the loan at a less rate than that heretofore provided for.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The argument of the Senator amounts precisely to this, and nothing more: "I will not allow the Government to borrow any more money, whatever may be its necessities, at a greater rate than five per cent." Now, sir, this bill comes from the Secretary of the Treasury; that is to say, it is in accordance with his opinion, as I understand, of the necessities of the case. It may be inferred, therefore, that he thinks it unwise to limit the Government, and say that whatever may be our necessities he shall give but five per cent. interest. Are gentlemen prepared to say that? That is what the Senator from Indiana is aiming at. In other words, it amounts to this: "I will, notwithstanding the peculiar position of affairs in this country, tie the Government down to five per cent." Why? "Because in my opinion the money ought to be got for that, and can be got for that." That may be his opinion; but men who are quite as conversant with money affairs as he is do not feel quite so certain. They hope it may be so. Let me ask the Senator, does he believe that the Secretary of the Treasury will pay six per cent. if he can get it for five?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me I will answer him just here, and with his permission I will also answer the suggestion he made a few moments since.

He said that my argument amounted to just this: that whatever were the necessities of the country, I would not consent that the Secretary should negotiate a loan above five per cent. His bill is, that whatever be the necessities of the country, he will not allow the Secretary to negotiate a loan above six per cent. I think it can be had at five per cent. I think the condition of the currency in the country, and the avidity with which the late loan was taken, justify me in that opinion.

Now upon the other point, I should like to ask the Senator what was the inquiry he made. It has escaped my memory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was whether the Senator believed the Secretary of the Treasury would give six per cent. if he could get it for five.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am glad the Senator has asked me that question. I believe if we put a six per cent. loan in this bill, the Secretary of the Treasury cannot negotiate it at less than six per cent., because that then becomes the rate in the public opinion, and the men who have money to loan will say to the Secretary, "We will let you have it at the amount of interest which the bill allows, but we will not let you have it at less." If the bill were to say five per cent., I believe the Secretary could secure it at that rate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator believe that the Secretary of the Treasury, if he had a reasonable certainty that he could get this money for five per cent., would not be willing so to get it? The inference is obvious that the Secretary of the Treasury does not feel entirely satisfied that he can negotiate this loan for less than six per cent. But the Senator assumes that he can. He says substantially that he must, or he shall not give any more. That the rate is fixed at six per cent. would seem to prove satisfactorily the conviction of the Secretary that he can get it for six per cent., founded, too, on previous experience where our loans have been negotiated on such terms; or, at any rate, if he could not get it for that he might be able to sell it under par. I do not know that he would be authorized to do so, however, under this bill.

Now, let me say a word with regard to the avidity with which this five-twenty loan was taken. How long was it before it could be negotiated at all? Why, sir, it remained in the market for more than a year with but a few millions sold. It was not till the adjournment of the last session of Congress that this loan took a start, owing probably to many considerations which I will not now enumerate. From the different situation of things in the country and other considerations, the loan took a start and went on and was taken up. But does the Senator know how long that avidity will continue?

The Senator will remark that it finally took its start after lingering for more than a year, in spite of the efforts of the men with whom he acts all over the country to keep it down and to cry it down. They told the people that the Government was not entitled to any credit. I know, and I presume he knows, that the men with whom he acts through this country made a general effort to decry the credit of the Government anywhere and everywhere, and to prevent that loan being sold at all. But in spite of all their efforts, the people at last aroused and it was taken; and now the Senator makes use of that fact to convince the Senate and the country that we should not allow even the ordinary margin which has always been taken within which to procure a loan. Sir, I know that such an argument can have no effect in the Senate, whatever it may have elsewhere.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should not have indulged in another word in this debate, for I have expressed my views on the amendment which I have offered in good faith, were it not for the last suggestion of the Senator from Maine. He has said to the Senate that the last loan was taken and public confidence grew up in respect to it notwithstanding the efforts of the men in the country with whom I act politically to beat down public confidence with regard to that loan. Sir, I have not said anything in this debate to call for any such suggestion from the Senator; and with great respect to him personally, I think that part of his argument is not worthy the position he holds in the Senate. I know of no effort on my own part and of no effort on the part of the public men with whom I act as a party man to destroy the confidence of the people in the Government securities. Public confidence in those securities depends very much on our military operations, and the confidence in that loan was inspired more by the successes of our army upon the Mississippi and the Cumberland than by any political speeches, and the Senator ought to know it. After the victories of July last, the confidence of the public in the Government securities went up, very naturally. And now as the Senator claims that the rebellion is upon its last legs, why is it that he says the confidence in the public securities is not greater to-day than it was even at that hour? As the hour approaches, in the opinion of the Senator, at which the rebellion will cease to have power to resist the authority of the Government, the confidence in the Government securities is to go down, at least not to increase. Sir, the success of our armies has given this confidence, and no efforts of political parties in the country.

I am very sorry that upon a question that affects only the tax-payers of the country, the Senator should have deemed it necessary to go into any political discussion. I do not intend to be led into it even by the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not make myself understood when I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to the difference between this bill and the act to which it is an amendment. The point was not in regard to the payment of the interest in coin; but the act to which this is an amendment, the act of March 3, 1863, states specifically that the principal is to be paid in coin. That provision is left out of this bill. In the original act it reads, "not less than ten nor more than forty years from date, in coin, of such denominations, not less than fifty dollars, as he may deem expedient." This bill says, "not less than five years, and payable at any period not more than forty years from date, and of such denominations as may be found expedient." The words "in coin," which are in the original act, are left out of this bill. I do not know that it makes any practical difference, but I think it is desirable to make this bill conform to the original act, as it may make some difference in regard to the taking of the loan, as capitalists are always very sensitive.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is this an amendment to the original bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; it repeats the language of the original bill, but leaves out the words "in coin."

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is supplementary to the act of 1863 and in lieu of a portion of it. I do not think it will make any difference; but those words were not intentionally left out.

Mr. ANTHONY. Ought they not to be put in? I submit that it will be of some importance in taking the loan.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt that the true construction of the act would be, however, that the principal is to be paid in coin also. However, differences of opinion exist on that point in the country, and I suggest to the chairman that it would be better to add those words.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the words about paying the principal in coin are of any consequence in either bill, but I think they ought to be alike; and the omission of those two words may make capitalists imagine that there is a difference between the two loans.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has the Senator the original act before him?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. The expression "in coin" is in this bill in regard to the interest and not in regard to the principal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator has any doubt about it, I shall not make any objection to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move, after the word "date," in the thirteenth line of the first section, to insert the words "in coin."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it is unnecessary; but still I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to strike out the second section of the bill, after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds, redeemable after five years and payable twenty years from date, for $11,000,000; the bonds so to be issued to be disposed of to the highest bidder or bidders, but at not less than par, after due notice thereof has been given by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the bonds so to be issued shall have the same force and effect as if issued under the provisions of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for other purposes, approved February 26, 1862.

The object of the amendment is to issue a sufficient number of bonds to cover the amount of money stated by the Senator from Ohio to have been paid in excess. I have moved to strike out the second section of the bill because I am not willing that any larger amount of bonds than authorized by law should be issued at the present time unless at the present market price. That is the object of the amendment that I now offer. It may not be in all its forms correct. I have written it in some haste.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit to the Senator from New York this practical difficulty: he desires to provide a fund from the sale of these bonds to pay back to the surplus subscribers to the five-twenty loan the amount they have paid in. I understand that is the purpose of his amendment. Now it is impossible for any one to determine who are entitled to the last of the five-twenty loan. The subscriptions, as I said before, were made at twenty-five hundred different agencies at different dates. The very day the Secretary of the Treasury knew that the loan was taken he stopped, by telegraph, this whole machinery; but the loan became so valuable and so desirable the last two or three days that it was open that it was subscribed for to the excess of $11,000,000. It is impossible for him to designate who are the subscribers of the last $11,000,000. Shall he take the date of subscription as final and conclusive? If so, then probably on a given date there were $6,000,000 subscribed. Part of this would come within the $500,000,000 and a part would fall outside of the $500,000,000. Who are within and who are without? What hour of the day shall he fix when the $500,000,000 was exhausted? What time in the day? Six million dollars were subscribed on a given day, part of it before the loan was exhausted and a part of it afterwards. How can he designate who subscribed before and who after the time?

Take another case. A portion of this loan was subscribed in St. Louis, and a portion in Cincinnati. By the ordinary course of the mails three days were consumed before notice of that subscription and payment of the money into the sub-Treasury there came to Washington. The money would be paid into the United States depository at Cincinnati or St. Louis. It would be transmitted by ordinary course of mail to Philadelphia or to Washington, occupying three or four days' time. Will you cut off these subscribers from the benefits of the loan merely because they were at too remote distances from the Government and the Government had not notice of the amount subscribed by them? How can you do so justly? They subscribed and paid in their money in good faith. There is no loss to the Government in carrying out this contract. The Government was very anxious to make this loan. The loan hung upon the money market for six or eight months and only $10,000,000 were subscribed. It was only after this system of private associated agencies was organized and thoroughly spread over the country that this loan became popular, and the people of the country subscribed to it. It has been said in the public prints that $64,000,000 of this loan were taken in the State of Ohio. Whether that is correct or not I do not know. It seems to be a very large sum; but a very large amount of it was subscribed there by farmers and mechanics in small sums, from fifty to one thousand dollars.

The amendment of the Senator from New York would make it perfectly impossible to tell who was entitled to the remnant of the $500,000,000 loan, and who fell beyond. It seems to me it is fairer and better to give to these men, who before notice was given of the expiration of this loan came forward and paid their money, the bonds in accordance with law, rather than to attempt to save a little money and retain from them what they are fairly entitled to, and thus make trouble and "confusion worse confounded." It will be impossible, as the Senator must perceive, to separate those who are entitled to this loan and who came within the $500,000,000, and those who subscribed afterwards.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senate, and particularly to the Senator from New York, in regard to the faith of the Government about this loan; and I desire that Senators should keep in mind the time at which the transaction was entered into, which was, I think, some time in the month of October or November. I do not now remember the precise day when the subscription was concluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. In January.

Mr. CLARK. I think it was in January. At the time this money was subscribed for these bonds, when the Government took the money, this loan was not at par; it bore no premium. The Government had asked its citizens to subscribe for the loan, and they took the loan at par. I desire Senators to keep fully in mind that that was the time at which the obligation of the Government accrued to the men who subscribed for the fulfillment of that contract. It was in January when the money was subscribed and when the loan was not at par that the Government undertook to take the money and deliver these bonds. Now here is the point. The bond is now at a premium. But suppose the bond had depreciated; suppose it had gone down to ninety cents; would the Government then have refunded, and said to the subscribers, "It is at your option to take the bond or not?" Certainly not. They would have insisted; they had the man's money; rightfully had his money; he had subscribed for his bond and agreed to take it, and here was his bond. We did not agree that it should be maintained at par, or he should take it if it was at par; but here is the bond; he must run the risk of the depreciation, and he must take the bond.

But, on the other hand, the bonds have appreciated. Now is it not rather a small matter for the Government to say, "It is very true when you paid your money the bonds were at par and you ran the risk of depreciation, but now it has appreciated a little and we are not going to give you the bond; we propose to place those eleven millions in the market and sell them? You shall not have the premium. We are going to give you your money and the interest back again, and we are going to keep the balance." Would that be a fair transaction among merchants? The Senator from New York is a merchant, and I ask him if that would be a fair transaction in the mercantile world? Should not the Government keep its faith?

If we had no more bonds to put upon the market, the consideration might be just whether we would be very liberal; but we have got many bonds undoubtedly to negotiate in the market. Those people who have come forward must come forward again. Is it worth while for us to say to them, "We will be niggardly with you; it is very true you came forward and subscribed for this loan when it was at par; it has appreciated a little; we will not let you have it; we will make the money out of it; you shall run the risk, but if there is any profit we will put it into our pocket?" I appeal to the Senator from New York if he would think that a very liberal or just mercantile transaction. I know the point he aims at. I know he is desirous of saving everything he can to the Government. So am I if it can fairly be done; but while we do that we must be very careful that we do not defeat the very object we aim at, and that is to get from our citizens a sufficient amount of money to answer the purposes of the Government in this great struggle.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire that every subscriber to this loan, in whatever part of the country, was, on that last day, told that it was uncertain whether he could receive his bonds; that the money would be taken undoubtedly subject to be returned if there was an excess. I will say also to the Senator from Ohio that I never heard of a popular loan for which the bids were not in excess; but the Government always found means of returning the excess and reducing the amount to the proper sum. Very frequently in the States, when a loan of two or three millions is advertised, four or five million are bid for. Of course the actual amount required is the only amount issued. I think there will be no difficulty in this case; but still there may be. I am not aware of the difficulties raised by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will remark to the Senator that this is entirely different from a loan where the bids are all opened at one place, and where the lowest bidders are first taken, and so on up the scale until the loan is exhausted. Here the loan was subscribed all over the country, and the money was authorized to be deposited anywhere within the United States in the depositories of the United States, at St. Louis, Cincinnati, and various other places. It would be impossible, therefore, to tell even by telegraph precisely when the loan was exhausted. We could not ascertain when the $500,000,000 was taken, except by a comparison with the books at the Treasury office. They could not tell it in New York, they could not tell it in Philadelphia, or anywhere, until by comparison at Washington they ascertained that the loan was taken; and that I understand was done on the 27th day of January last. Perhaps I do not give the precise date; but I think that was the date; and that very day telegraphic dispatches were sent all over the country to stop the subscriptions to this loan; but it was found that nearly ten or eleven millions were subscribed in excess, and the money was paid in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I will renew the proposition of the Senator from Indiana as an amendment, in line fifteen of the first section to strike out "six," and insert "five," so as to make the rate of interest five per cent. instead of six. Upon that proposition I wish to say a word. This bill authorizes the borrowing of $200,000,000. The difference between five and six per cent. interest upon it is $2,000,000, a sum well worth the attention of the Senate if it can be saved. Whether a financial measure of this character should contain a limit upon the rate of interest at which it should be negotiated, and what that limit should be, depends altogether upon the state of the money market.

I take it for granted that there cannot be any doubt upon this proposition, that there is a very large mass of capital in the United States seeking investment in Government securities, and at the present time that the amount which the owners of that capital thus desire to invest is largely above these $200,000,000. I think, then, that there would be no doubt whatever that the Government would be able to negotiate the loan of these $200,000,000 at five per cent. in the present state of the money market, unless, as in this case, the bill permits the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate the loan at six per cent. My belief is that when a large amount of money is to be loaned, and the Government is to go into the market, in the position in which it is at present, for the purpose of borrowing, that the maximum rate of interest at which the loan is permitted to be made will in every case be found to be the minimum; and that if six per cent. is authorized by the terms of the bill to be given by the Secretary of the Treasury, he will not be able to negotiate it for a less rate of interest.

I reach that conclusion upon this reasoning: moneyed men that desire the investment of their capital will combine against the Government and against the Treasury. They will enter into a secret arrangement among themselves by which they will take the whole of the $200,000,000 or a large proportion of it. They will make secret arrangements by which they will divide it out among themselves upon the understanding that they are to force the Secretary to give the six per cent. interest, and in that way they will be able to coerce and to control the Secretary of the Treasury to come up to that rate of interest. Why? They look into the law; they see that Congress contemplates that the Secretary may be forced to negotiate at the interest of six per cent.; they know that the Secretary will, if he cannot get it at a less rate of interest, agree to give that rate; they combine among themselves to an extent that enables them to control his action in relation to the loan and to coerce and to compel him to give the six per cent.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] I have no doubt is familiar with such transactions, and he knows how a combination of capital in that way will coerce the agents of the Government and the Secretary of the Treasury in negotiating large amounts upon a loan. But if the law itself contained an express and positive prohibition that the loan should not be negotiated at a greater rate than five per cent., those capitalists would at once perceive that their desire and their combination to obtain it at a greater rate of interest could not be made available, that it would not be practicable, and therefore they would refrain from entering into such a combination. But the amount of money in the country seeking investment in Government stocks being so large and the securities of the United States being so much more desirable to men who hold capital than to hold on to the greenbacks themselves, when they looked into the law and discovered that five per cent. was the maximum rate which the Secretary of the Treasury was allowed to give, they would immediately come to that rate, and take the loan at five per cent. In my judgment, if this bill is not made to assume that form, and there is not a positive and absolute restriction upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury that he shall not negotiate the loan at a greater interest than five per cent., as certain as six is allowed by the terms of the bill, that will be the interest that will be agreed upon by the Secretary and capitalists, because capitalists by a strong combination will coerce and force him up to that rate of interest.

Under this view of the case, I think the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] is judicious. There might be a state of the money market in which that should not be the limit. There might be and often is a state of the money market when probably there ought to be no limit; but with the full and perfect knowledge which the Senate have of the present state of the money market and the amount of plethora in it in the form of greenbacks, the interest on this loan being bound to be paid in gold or its equivalent, it seems to me it would be unwise in the Senate of the United States not to fix the limit at five per cent. as the maximum, because I have the most perfect conviction that the loan could be obtained at that rate, and if that is not the rate established inflexibly by the bill that the loan will not be negotiated for less than six per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 6, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Powell, Saulsbury, and Wright—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—31.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is the report of the second committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; upon which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate further insist on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, and ask another conference; and the conferees on the part of the Senate are instructed to agree to proper amendments to the amendments of the Senate disagreed to by the House, providing for a tax of twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand.

Mr. SHERMAN. After consultation, I have concluded to withdraw the instruction asked for, with a view to let the House of Representatives act on the subject in the first instance. I simply ask that the report of the committee of conference showing the disagreement be concurred in, so that it may go to the House of Representatives for that House to take a definite position.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire of the Senator what there is for the Senate to concur in?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is nothing. I withdraw the resolution containing the instructions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems to the Chair that there is no question for the Senate upon the report of the committee of conference. The committee simply report the fact of their disagreement.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the bill, with the report, ought to be sent to the House of Representatives, and that House may then ask for another conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator may submit that motion, that the report and bill be sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do submit that motion, that the report and bill be sent to the House of Representatives for action; and then they may ask for a further conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio that the bill and report be sent to the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

E. F. AND SAMUEL A. WOOD.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now I ask the Senate to indulge me by taking up and passing bill No. 105, which I wished to get up in the morning hour. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 105) for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, or cause to be issued, executed, and delivered, to E. F. and Samuel A. Wood duplicates of the following described bonds of the United States of America, Treasury Department, for the Oregon war debt, issued under an act of Congress approved March 2, 1861, payable at any time after July 1, 1881, at the Treasury of the United States, with interest at the rate of six percent. per annum, namely: Nos. 1329 and 1334 to 1338, inclusive, for the sum of $500 each, and No. 271 for fifty dollars, dated Washington, March 24, 1862, and Nos. 1352 to 1359, inclusive, for $500 each; No. 665 for $100, and No. 266 for fifty dollars, dated Washington, March 24, 1862, and No. 877 for $100; No. 400 for fifty dollars, dated Washington, May 22, 1862, and each and severally signed L. E. Chittenden, Register of the Treasury, entered R. E., recorded J. O., with thirty-seven interest coupons attached to each of the $500 bonds for fifteen dollars each, payable semi-annually; eighteen interest coupons attached to bond No. 665, and nineteen interest coupons attached to bond No. 877 for six dollars each; eighteen interest coupons attached to bonds Nos. 266 and 271; nineteen interest coupons attached to bond No. 400 for three dollars each, payable annually; all of which coupons are signed "G. Luff, for the Register of the Treasury;" in all nineteen Oregon war bonds, amounting to the sum of $7,350; but before the issue of duplicate bonds E. F. and Samuel A. Wood, or either of them, must execute, or cause to be executed, and deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, to his full acceptance and satisfaction, such bond of indemnity as is usually required by the regulations of the Treasury Department for the issue of duplicate certificates of inscribed stocks and bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON. Were the original bonds lost?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a case where the memorialists mailed at San Francisco for New York certain Oregon war debt bonds, and sent them by the steamer Golden Gate, which with her mails was lost. The evidence that the bonds were mailed is perfect, taken before a notary, attested by the notarial seal, and the proof of the whole transaction is complete. The bill provides that duplicates shall be issued on the memorialists filing a bond with the Secretary of the Treasury satisfactory to him, to reimburse the United States in case the originals shall ever appear. Such is the usual practice of the Department in such cases, I believe.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

LAND GRANT TO A MINNESOTA RAILROAD.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 31, making a grant of lands to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, in the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior, with a view of modifying an amendment which I offered several days since, and having it printed.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose now to amend the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands in the first section by striking out after the word "Minnesota" to the end of the section, and inserting what I send to the Chair; which I desire to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The proposed amendment will be read.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that the Senator from Minnesota merely desires to have his amendment printed, and then will permit the bill to go over.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is what I desire.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that this is a very material amendment to the bill, changing it in important particulars. If so, it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is not material. It is a very slight alteration of the original amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that when the amendment shall have been printed we can then see what it is, and if it shall be necessary to refer it he can then make the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to the motion to print, but I want the bill then to be laid over.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed till to-morrow.

POST ROADS IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill (S. No. 102) to establish certain post roads, to regulate commerce among the States, and for other purposes, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia. It was laid upon the table on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

MARGARET M. STAFFORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to pass a bill granting a pension to the widow of a man who was killed in the service of the Government, which was reported by the Committee on Pensions yesterday morning. The case is a very clear one, and I hope the bill will be passed at once. I move that Senate bill No. 139 be now taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 139) for the relief of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Coshocton county, Ohio, was read the second time. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Coshocton county, Ohio, on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 26th of August, 1863, and to continue during her widowhood.

Reuben Stafford was requested by the deputy provost marshal, in accordance with instructions from the district provost marshal, under paragraph twenty-five of instructions to provost marshals, to assist in arresting a number of drafted men in Crawford township, in Coshocton county, Ohio. Stafford, while attempting to arrest two drafted men, was instantly killed by them while in the faithful discharge of his duty. The committee think that the duty in the performance of which the husband of the petitioner was killed was a part of the military service of the United States, and on that ground the bill is based.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF LIQUOR TO INDIANS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senate to take up and pass a bill which was reported this morning from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It will take but a moment. It has but a single object. It is simply to amend the existing law for the punishment of the offense of selling liquor to Indians, by conferring jurisdiction on the circuit as well as the district courts of the United States. The only change it makes in the existing law is to insert the two words "or circuit," so that the indictment may be in the proper district or circuit court. I move to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 120) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the twentieth section of the act of June 30, 1834, so as to read as follows:

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall sell, exchange, give, barter, or dispose of any spirituous liquor or wine to any Indian under the charge of any Indian superintendent or Indian agent appointed by the United States, or shall introduce or attempt to introduce any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, such person on conviction thereof before the proper district or circuit court of the United States shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding two years, and shall be fined not more than $300. Provided, however, That it shall be a sufficient defense to any charge of introducing or attempting to introduce liquor into the Indian country if it be proved to be done by order of the War Department or of any officer duly authorized thereto by the War Department. And if any superintendent of Indian affairs, Indian agent, or sub-agent, or commanding officer of a military post, has reason to suspect or is informed that any white person or Indian is about to introduce or has introduced any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country in violation of the provisions of this section, it shall be lawful for such superintendent, Indian agent, or sub-agent, or commanding officer, to cause the boats, stores, packages, wagons, sleds, and places of deposit of such person to be searched, and if any such spirituous liquor or wine is found therein, the same, together with the boats, teams, wagons, and sleds used in conveying the same, and the peltries of such person, shall be seized and delivered to the proper officer, and shall be proceeded against by libel in the proper court, and forfeited, one half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the United States, and if such person is a trader, his license shall be revoked and his bond put in suit. And it shall moreover be lawful for any person in the service of the United States or for any Indian to take and destroy any ardent spirits or wine found in the Indian country, except such as may be introduced therein by the War Department. In all cases arising under this act, Indians shall be competent witnesses.

Mr. CONNESS. In the latter part of the section, where it reads that "it shall, moreover, be lawful for any person in the service of the United States" to destroy liquor found in the Indian country, I move to amend by striking out "lawful for" and inserting "duty of," so that it shall be the duty of officers to do the thing required.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 53) for the relief of Henry P. Blanchard, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Massachusetts, I apprehend, has accomplished all that he is desirous of accomplishing now; he has got the bill before the Senate. There is evidently not a quorum here, and I am unwilling to go on any longer in the transaction of public business without a quorum. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I think the business that will come up in executive session will be such that a majority will soon be present after the doors are closed.

Mr. SUMNER. This is a small bill which I think can be acted on in three or four minutes; it is a bill for the relief of an individual; the facts are very few, the case simple, justice clear; and there is a very brief report which the Senator can hear if he requires it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand the member from Iowa to propose to go into executive session and not to go on with the present bill, because there is not a quorum present; he is unwilling to do any business in open session for that reason. I want to know if there is to be any business done in executive session.

Mr. GRIMES. I think that if we go into executive session we shall soon have a quorum by sending out for members who are in the building. The bill of the Senator from Massachusetts may be a very small bill in its amount; but it may establish important principles, and I do not think it right for us to go on here in the transaction of business with not more than twenty Senators present. The bill can wait; it will come up as a matter of course in the morning.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I will make no further objection.

The motion of Mr. GRIMES was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 1, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That hereafter, for the purpose of facilitating business and effecting an adjournment as early as the first week in May, this House will hold night sessions as often as four nights in each week, commencing with Wednesday night, March 2, and will also hold sessions on every Saturday until the time of adjournment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

EXCHANGE OF BONDS.

Mr. F. CLARKE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an office in the city of New York, under the direction of the United States Assistant Treasurer in that city, for the transfer of Government bonds; and also as to the expediency of authorizing the exchange of registered and coupon bonds, one for the other, as holders may desire; and report by bill or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICHOLAY, his Private Secretary; also a message notifying the House that he had approved and signed, on the 27th ultimo, bills and resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 42) authorizing the payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read; and

An act (H. R. No. 230) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes.

FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have read for the information of the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to a fraud upon the revenue. I hope members will pay attention to it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 29, 1864.

SIR: It is reported to me from authentic sources that many of the vessels employed in the cod-fisheries are in the habit of procuring salt, for the purpose of curing their fish, at ports in the British provinces, thereby evading the import duty laid upon salt coming into the United States from foreign ports; and upon their return from fishing voyages the salt thus procured, being incorporated with the fish, cannot be considered a dutiable article; and they claim the allowance of bounty the same as if they had purchased their salt at United States ports.

Although the practice is plainly at variance with the spirit of the laws regulating the allowance of fishing bounties, there does not appear to be any provision of law directly forbidding it.

I have therefore the honor to submit the inclosed draft of a bill providing that no bounty shall hereafter be allowed except in case the claimant shall have furnished satisfactory proof that the foreign salt used in curing the fish, upon which the claim is based, has paid an import duty to the United States; and I request that it may be presented for the action of Congress as promptly as possible, in order that, if passed, it may become operative at the commencement of the ensuing fishing season.

I am, very respectfully, S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Chairman Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there be no objection, I will introduce a bill to prevent that fraud.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. COX. There will be no objection if the gentleman will amend the bill so as to repeal the codfish bounties altogether. We are all opposed to them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I offer the bill on my own responsibility. The House is in possession of the facts. It does not come from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRICE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SWEAT. I object to it.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that call for the present. I was not present yesterday when Michigan was called for resolutions. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution now.

Mr. ELIOT. I withdraw it for that purpose, if there be no objection.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas our home-manufactured article of salt is heavily taxed to support the Government, while the cost of manufacturing is largely increased, and the sales necessarily diminished by reason of the competition of foreign salt, which pays no more duty than was exacted before the increased tax was imposed upon the home article; and whereas we believe it to be the duty of Congress while devising ways and means to meet the extraordinary demands upon the Treasury to see that no unjust discriminations are made so that foreign manufacturers may derive a benefit from the misfortunes of our own: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of levying an increased duty of ten cents per bushel on all salt imported into the United States, or such other amount as they may deem just; and to report to this House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to state there is a misstatement in the resolution, for the duty has been increased, and is now more than ten cents a bushel. I do not object to the resolution.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 30th day of April next, at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution of privilege. Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdrew it and this resolution intervened. It has always been looked upon as a privileged question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to let me say a word.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Connecticut will make it May instead of April I will vote for it with pleasure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I accept that amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Say the last day of May.

The SPEAKER. The last Monday of May at noon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to fix a good time and work up to it. I accept the last Monday of May at noon as the time.

The SPEAKER. It has been usual to fix on Monday. The 30th of May falls on Monday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am opposed to fixing a day for adjournment of Congress at so early a day of the session. The effect will be to furnish a reason for passing measures of importance with little consideration. The gentleman says he wants to fix a day and to work up to it. We have seen the extraordinary haste with which appropriation bills have been sought to be forced through this House; and I am unwilling for one that this kind of argument shall be furnished for cutting off legitimate and fair consideration of matters of grave public legislation. On that account I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. THAYER. I suggest to the mover of the resolution that he alter it to "Tuesday, May 31, at noon."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I accept that suggestion. The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the previous question upon the passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote last taken, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. FENTON. Will the gentleman give way a moment that I may offer a resolution?

Mr. ELIOT. I will yield this time, but I cannot give way any more.

DUES TO DECEASED SOLDIERS.

Mr. FENTON asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to ascertain what legislation, if any, is necessary to authorize and require the payment of the certificates, issued by the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller of the Treasury, for arrears of pay and bounty due deceased soldiers on presentation thereof to any paymaster of the Army in the city of Washington, as well as in the district where the claimant resides.

Mr. BROOKS objected.

Mr. ELIOT. I now demand the regular order of business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announced that the Senate have passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) of thanks of Congress to the veteran soldiers who have re-enlisted in the Army, without amendment.

Also, that the Senate have passed an act (No. 140) to provide for the protection of the overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports, and under that call the House resumes the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KNAPP] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KNAPP addressed the House in opposition to the bill. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, when the bill for the creation of a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs was introduced it was my intention to do as I have heretofore done since I took my seat in this House, examine the subject carefully and cast my vote as my judgment should dictate, without taking up any of the time of the House by remarks of mine. But, sir, the singular course pursued by some gentlemen on the other side has induced me to change my purpose.

This bill opens up a new field for legislation, and the subject of its provisions and the objects contemplated are such as to call for the fullest exercise of prudence and caution. I presume the people of the country for whom we are legislating expect that we are carefully and honestly examining the questions involved in the provisions of this bill, and endeavoring by a comparison of ideas to arrive at such conclusions as will be promotive of the best interests of our common country.

We find ourselves, in this trial hour of the Republic, surrounded by facts and circumstances such as our fathers dreamed not of, such as never before existed, and we are consequently without precedents to guide us; and it remains to be seen whether we are equal to the task of piloting the vessel through the storm and bringing her to a safe anchorage.

When seas are calm, and skies are clear, the veriest novice may sail the vessel safely; but when the lightnings flash and the thunders roar, and sea and sky seem to meet and tremble in each other's embrace, keeping time to the music of heaven's artillery, it is then that stout hearts and strong arms are needed to man the yards and furl the sails and guide the vessel to a secure harbor.

This wicked rebellion, forced upon us against our will, and in violation of all law, both human and divine, has upheaved and unsettled the very foundations of society, and thrown its component parts into chaotic wildness, and forced upon us the necessity of reorganization.

This requires action, effort, arduous and self-sacrificing it may and no doubt will be. But shall we therefore shun it? Shall we prove to a world of witnesses, who are anxious spectators, our degeneracy by endeavoring to avoid the responsibility thus thrust upon us? Shall we waste time by inaction, indecision, fault-finding, and charging the difficulties under which we labor to this or that cause? Or shall we not rather go to work like men to correct the evils and bring order out of confusion?

The bill before us proposes simply an organization to direct in a proper channel the physical, the bone-and-sinew energy of the black race who have been made free by the fortunes of war—only this and nothing more. The stock in trade of these people consists almost entirely of muscle; their manner of life heretofore, loaded with manacles and groaning under the lash, has not been favorable to mental development and a business education. They must have assistance now that their stock in trade may be made available; and it would seem as though the only question to be settled is not whether it shall be done, but how shall it be done?

But, sir, we are met at the very threshold of this discussion with objections, not as to the manner of doing it, but objections to doing it at all.

The gentleman from Ohio says there is no provision in the Constitution for this Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs. I grant there is no specific provision for this purpose, neither is there for saving the passengers and crew of a sinking ship, or extinguishing a conflagration, or doing a thousand other things that require to be done; and yet if the necessity existed for any or all of these, and they could not be done without congressional action, I presume we should act without any specific constitutional provision.

But, Mr. Speaker, the great, the overshadowing, the all-prevailing objection to lending a helping hand to these unfortunate people to enable them to take care of themselves is, that it will involve the nation in the vortex of miscegenation, a new name, sir, for an old thing. But will the establishment of this bureau necessarily lead to this result? Does any sane man believe it? Are not the facts of history and the proofs of observation all against the conclusion? Does not the history of our own country prove, beyond successful contradiction, that the establishment of a bureau for the sale of the slave has produced the very results which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] seems so much to dread, while in States where the negro has been free no such results have been produced?

These are facts which have passed into and become part of history, known and read of all men. Slavery, sir, negro slavery, has in the last three fourths of a century produced in this country near half a million of a mixed race; and yet, with these facts staring us in the face, and making us as a nation a hissing and a by-word, we hear no sound, no whisper of disapprobation from those who hold to the political faith of the gentleman from Ohio. As long as the negro was fettered and lashed, as long as the clank of his manacles could be heard wafted upon every breeze, ay, sir, the very breezes which caused the flag above you to curl like a wave of the ocean, so long as the slave-pen stood yawning beneath and in the very shadow of the churches of this God-given heritage of ours, so long as men and women and children of all ages, conditions, and colors, ay, sir, colors through every change and grade and hue, from jet black to Caucasian white, were exhibited and sold upon the slave auction-block, so long these gentlemen were as silent as a charnel house as to mixed races. They read "the Constitution as it is" in such an accommodating manner as to persuade themselves that "black was not black, nor yet was white so very white." But the moment the fetters are knocked off, the moment the black man begins to breathe the free air of heaven, the moment he begins to exercise some ownership over his own bones and blood and muscles, these guardians of the Constitution take the alarm. That moment this raw-head and bloody-bones of miscegenation, amalgamation, and all the other ations are paraded with a flourish of trumpets before this House and the country with a view, I suppose, to scare some men from their propriety.

The fulmination of the home-made thunder, the reverberations of which have been heard for many months in every part of our land, have not as yet, I believe, done much serious damage. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] is to be believed, the calamities which are to follow the passage of this bill are twofold: first, the negro is to be destroyed, is to die. But that no injustice may be done that gentleman, I give his own language:

"But, sir, if slavery is doomed, so, alas! is the slave. No scheme like this bill can save him. The Indian reserves, treaties, bounties, and agencies did not and does not save the red man. No Government farming system, no charitable black scheme, can wash out the color of the negro, change his inferior nature, or save him from his inevitable fate. The irrepressible conflict is not between slavery and freedom, but between black and white, and, as De Tocqueville prophesied, the black will perish."

That might be supposed to be the end of him. If he is "doomed" and he "perish," might we not reasonably expect to be rid of him for this world? But no, it seems not; for a little further on this same gentleman says to us who favor this bill, "Now you are in the millennial glory of abolition; so it will be hereafter with amalgamation."

I might hurl back with scorn and contempt the foul slander in his teeth, but I do not consider it my business to bandy epithets. I understand my business here to be of a different character, and I say to that gentleman now and here, that if he will devise a better plan for the accomplishment of the object sought than is found in the bill before the House, he can count on my vote for it. But when I asked that gentleman the other day how both these objects were to be accomplished, first, the destruction, the annihilation of the black race, and then, hereafter, the "millennial glory of amalgamation," I received for answer that "they will all run, according to the new gospel of abolition, into the white people on that (our) side of the House." This answer may be smart, may be sensible, may be courteous, gentlemanly, and statesmanlike, but I confess I lacked then, and do now, the penetration to perceive it. According to this new theory the negro is dead to-day and alive to-morrow; "all things by turns, and nothing long;" either dead or alive, black or yellow, to suit the wishes or the fancy of these defenders of the "Constitution as it is." These men have millions for slavery, but not one cent for freedom.

In another part of his speech the gentleman from Ohio was led into a train of thought and expression which, in my opinion, were very unfortunate for him. He quoted from his pamphlet, his text-book on that occasion, these words, "the practical recognition of the brotherhood of all the children of a common Father," and proceeded to say, "just what our miscegenetic Chaplain prays for almost every morning, and you all voted for him, even some of my friends from the border States."

Now, what is there in this that is objectionable? Is it the expression "children of a common Father?" Does that form of expression grate harshly on the highly-polished sensibilities of that gentleman? Has he never, in his reading of history, met with similar expressions and entered no protest against them? If not, allow me to read a short extract, for his benefit and the benefit of those who sympathize with him, from the words of one who in times past was good authority for Democrats, and is good authority for genuine Democrats to-day:

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
MOBILE, September 21, 1864.

To the Free Colored Inhabitants of Louisiana:

Through a mistaken policy you have heretofore been deprived of a participation in the glorious struggle for national rights in which our country is engaged. This no longer shall exist.

As sons of freedom you are now called upon to defend our most estimable blessing. As Americans your country looks with confidence to her adopted children for a valorous support as a faithful return for the advantages enjoyed under her mild and equitable Government. As fathers, husbands, and brothers, you are summoned to rally round the standard of the eagle to defend all that is dear in existence.

Your country, although calling for your exertions, does not wish you to engage in her cause without remunerating you for the services rendered. Your intelligent minds are not to be led away by false representations; your love of honor would cause you to despise the man who should attempt to deceive you. In the sincerity of a soldier and the language of truth I address you.

To every noble-hearted freeman of color volunteering to serve during the present contest with Great Britain, and no longer, there will be paid the same bounty in money and lands now received by the white soldiers of the United States. The non-commissioned officers and privates will also be entitled to the same monthly pay and daily rations and clothes furnished to any American soldier.

On enrolling yourselves in companies the major general commanding will select officers for your government from your white fellow-citizens. Your non-commissioned officers will be appointed from among yourselves.

ANDREW JACKSON.

But, sir, it may be urged by those who oppose this bill, and who are horrified at calling black men "adopted children" and "fellow-citizens," that this was an experiment of Old Hickory's, and that after trying it once he never would have indorsed the same course again. But this objection is answered and silenced by the fact that the old hero subsequently issued the following "proclamation to the free people of color:"

"Soldiers! when, on the banks of the Mobile, I called upon you to take up arms, inviting you to partake of the perils and the glory of your white fellow-citizens, I expected much from you, for I was not ignorant that you possessed qualities most formidable to an invading enemy. I knew with what fortitude you could endure hunger and thirst, and all the fatigues of a campaign. I knew well how you loved your native country, and that you had, as well as ourselves, to defend what man holds most dear, his parents, relations, wife, children, and property.

"You have done more than I expected. In addition to the previous qualities I before knew you to possess, I found, moreover, among you a noble enthusiasm which leads to the performance of great things.

"Soldiers! the President of the United States shall hear how praiseworthy was your conduct in the hour of danger, and the representatives of the American people will, I doubt not, give you the praise your exploits entitle you to. Your general anticipates them in applauding your noble ardor."

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the language of the hero of New Orleans; such the sentiment of a patriot and soldier—"adopted children," "fellow-citizens," "Americans," &c., &c. And yet I believe his Democracy was never doubted. How comes it, then, that in these last days men calling themselves Democrats are so much shocked if our Chaplain prays for the "children of a common Father?" Verily these men have the "form of Democracy without the power," the shadow without the substance.

But as another reason why this bill should not pass, we are told that because the Indians as a race of people are passing away, so necessarily will the negro, if made free. I undertake to say there is no parallel between the two cases. The Indian is of a roving and unsettled nature, not domestic in his habits. The negro is the very reverse of this. The Indian accumulates no property, the negro does. Upon these points there is no room for conjecture; the experiment has been tried. The Indian absorbs the vices without the virtues of the white man, and is fast passing from the earth to the land of the great hereafter.

The negro has learned to live with and copy the virtues as well as the vices of the white man. He is careful, kind, and affectionate in his disposition. He seeks a fixed habitation, he accumulates property, he grows rich, he builds churches and school-houses, and he feeds, clothes, and educates his children as the white man does.

But hear the gentleman from Ohio again. He says:

"When the party in power by edict and bayonet, by sham election and juggling proclamation, drag down slavery, they drag down the very genius of our civil polity, local self-government. They strike constitutional liberty in striking at domestic slavery."

These are strange sentiments to be proclaimed in the Capitol of the nation boasting of civil and religious liberty—the Capitol whose summit is crowned by a statue representing the goddess of Liberty. According to this doctrine the "genius of our civil polity" is dependent for its existence upon human slavery. "Domestic slavery" is not only the "corner-stone" but it is the support and protection of constitutional liberty. What a paradox! What political heresy! What an insult to common sense!

But, Mr. Speaker, the action of the border States seems to trouble some of the gentlemen who oppose this bill; not only the gentleman from Ohio who wrote a book, but also the gentleman from New York of the smooth sentences and many languages, feels much aggrieved by the action of these States, and now we cannot have a discussion as to the necessity and propriety of establishing a bureau for the purpose of enabling men long bound, but now free, to take care of themselves, without lugging in a certain quantity of abuse of the border States.

I do not name this, sir, for the purpose of defending those States. No, sir; there is no need of that. This would be a work of supererogation. The border States are here in the persons of their Representatives, equal to the men of any State upon this floor, able and willing to take care of themselves; men with whom I am proud to be allowed to act; men who, when commanded to bow down and worship the image which traitors had erected, refused, bravely, boldly, nobly refused, and refused, too, in sight of the furnace of persecution heated seven times hotter than ever before, and through which they knew they must pass. They have passed. The protecting angel of liberty and patriotism was with them, shielding and protecting them, and to-day they are here without the smell of fire upon their garments. But I refer to this attack of the gentleman from Ohio upon the border States for a different purpose, namely, the corruption produced upon them by the "greenbacks." His language is:

"Judging by what we daily see here in this House, the border States, through the blandishments of power, the fear of ruin, the tyranny of the bayonet, and the corruption of greenbacks, are, I think, gradually being persuaded to yield before the genius of universal emancipation."

These greenbacks, sir, must possess very singular as well as very powerful qualities. To-day they are "trash," "rag currency," "worthless," and to-morrow they are corrupting the entire border States, and by the witchery of their power seducing the entire border line (behind which these gentlemen expected to take shelter) into the support of "universal emancipation." If they possess so much power they cannot be altogether worthless.

This bureau is to be established because the abolition of slavery has set free thousands of persons, who, having heretofore labored for others, must now be directed how they are to help themselves. The gentleman of many languages, from New York, accepts the fact that slavery is abolished, and declares his intention of abandoning a hobby so long and so successfully ridden, and to go before the country on different issues and a different platform. And here it is worth a passing notice, that when the institution is no longer likely to be of any service to this class of politicians, they are ready to acknowledge, what has all along been claimed by the most ultra abolitionists, namely, that the preaching on the Mount of Olives and on Mars Hill was calculated to abolish slavery; not suddenly, but gradually, this gentleman says. I say to him that "the times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commands all men (even Calhoun Democrats) everywhere to repent," so that a "nation may be born in a day."

I have looked through that gentleman's speech for the material out of which to manufacture this new platform, and find what I suppose to be one of the planks. I give his language:

"Before we have finished this war the debt will be $4,000,000,000—a huge, monstrous, and crushing debt—which will inflict upon posterity, upon my children, upon your children, and their children hereafter, for hundreds of years, taxation under which they will groan as negro slaves have groaned under the white master; a tax of thirty cents on the day-laborer's dollar."

What does this mean? Has the gentleman looked into the future and fixed the time when this war is to cease? Can it not stop until the national debt reaches $4,000,000,000? If that is so, if the fiat has gone forth from the powers at Richmond and their friends here that that is the point, then the sooner we make the debt that amount the better. Or does the gentleman wish the impression to go abroad to the country that our national debt is now about that amount? Has his fertile imagination so soon created "sixteen men in buckram?"

And then, Mr. Speaker, this debt is to burden our children and our children's children for hundreds of years, taking thirty cents out of every dollar earned by the day-laborer. I am fearful that that gentleman has cultivated his knowledge of the languages to the neglect of his knowledge of arithmetic. This thirty cents out of the day-laborer's dollar, I suppose, is to be the battle-cry of this new party, or rather an old party with a new name. The toiling millions are to be told that they will be compelled to pay thirty cents out of every dollar of their hard-earned wages. That will do. That will bring votes, if you can make them believe it. But I think the gentleman miscalculates, for while the masses may not be able to quote Latin, French, and Arabic as readily as he does, yet they know the multiplication table, and are able to detect all such shallow attempts to catch their votes.

How will this look when you apply the figures to it? If we call the population thirty millions, at an estimate of one dollar per day for one third of them and nothing for the other two thirds, then estimate the taxable property at $20,000,000,000, and tax it one dollar on a hundred, one tenth of what Jeff. Davis does, and then take thirty cents on the dollar, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, and in four years we should pay off the entire national debt, and have $400,000,000 over. Then what becomes of this "crushing, monstrous debt?" "for hundreds of years upon our children and our children's children?"

But the debt is not $4,000,000,000, nor is it the half of it; and that gentleman knows this as well as any person living, and he knows also that it is not expected or intended to pay this debt all off in a few years, but merely pay the interest, and provide a small sinking fund, which can be done without affecting the day-laborer's dollar. This talk about the day-laborer's dollar is all clap-trap manufactured for the occasion. There is not a country in the world to-day where the laboring classes are so well paid as in this country, and they know it and appreciate it, the clamor of demagogues to the contrary notwithstanding.

Again, sir, there is another feature connected with this country that is cheering to the heart of every patriot. We have been engaged in a war of immense magnitude for near three years, and yet the bonds of the Government are worth more to-day than when the war began. No other country in the world ever made such an exhibit. It is worse than folly, sir, to talk of bankrupting a people whose fields teem with abundance of the necessities and comforts of life, and whose mines excel in richness those of Golconda. No, sir. Give us but a united people, standing shoulder to shoulder, not sympathizing with rebels, not making speeches which are cheered in Richmond, but honest and earnest in their efforts to suppress re-billion and maintain the supremacy of the laws, and we need have no fear of national bankruptcy. A common-sense examination of this monster bankruptcy will find it as unsubstantial as the baseless fabric of a vision.

The objects contemplated in the bill now before us will cost something, I grant. But, sir, it is an incident to the war, and we cannot avoid it if we would. And the cost need be but trifling, and after the first year nothing. These people will rapidly learn to take care of themselves. Some of them have taken care of their masters and their masters' families for years, and consequently are now well qualified to take care of themselves, and with a very little encouragement the balance will soon learn. Besides, sir, there are some things worth more than gold, among which are "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Is it possible, sir, that we must contend with these gentlemen at every step? First, we must have no coercion; our southern brethren must be allowed to do as they pleased. They could fire upon the old flag, the ensign of our nationality; but if we attempted to restrain them, we were charged with violating the Constitution. Second, we must be very careful to guard the property of rebels, and see to it that all their men and women property were kept at home, and when Order No. 3 was issued they were hugely pleased—an infamous order, sir, and loyal and true men all over the country wonder its author is still kept in power; an order that has cost us the lives of thousands of good and true men. Next, when necessity compelled them, they agreed the negro might dig, drive, and cook, but he must under no circumstances fight. Finally, when we have driven them from all these positions inch by inch, and we come to a point where it is necessary to set the negro to work to do something for himself and for the country, these gentlemen's hands are raised in holy horror for fear the Constitution will suffer, and the "day-laborer's dollar" be taxed. Oh, ye lovers of the people and defenders of the Constitution, ye time-servers, ye sunshine, ye holiday friends, ye criers of hosannah to-day and crucifiers to-morrow, the people, the country understand you. Your day of power has passed; your glory has departed; Ichabod is written upon your old temples, and ye may well seek for other issues and another platform to keep your devoted heads above the accumulating waves of oblivion which are about to roll over you.

But, sir, this bill will pass.

"In spite of rock or tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on this floor," it will overcome the law of the land. The industrial energies of the nation will be set in motion, and good will be achieved. Yes, sir, the clouds are lifting, rebellion recedes, redemption draws nigh. The rays of glory are already brightening the horizon with their splendor, and a proper exercise of vigilance on our part will work from the important events now transpiring around us the great problem of man's political salvation.

RE-ENLISTED VETERANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 26th ultimo, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War, relative to the re-enlistment of veteran volunteers.

The letter from the Secretary of War was read, stating that the transmission at the present time of the information called for, to wit, a statement of the number of volunteers re-enlisted into the United States service, how many and from what States, and to what particular State or States of which they were non-residents they were credited, would be in his opinion prejudicial to the public service.

The message and accompanying letter were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) of thanks of Congress to the volunteer soldiers who have re-enlisted in the Army; when the Speaker signed the same.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS—AGAIN.

Mr. ELIOT took the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it is his intention to call the previous question at the close of his remarks?

Mr. ELIOT. It is my intention to do so.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to occupy a few minutes on this bill before the debate closes; whether now or hereafter is immaterial to me.

Mr. ELIOT. I believe it is time that the House came to a decision as to whether it desires to have this debate longer continued. This bill stands now in the way of the action of the House on the business of all other committees. I therefore felt it to be my duty to seek the floor as soon as I could for the purpose of moving the previous question.

At the time this bill was proposed last session; there were two bills pending before the House and Senate, providing for the issuing of bonds in case the State of Missouri or the State of Maryland should enact laws of emancipation. It was believed advisable that some provision should be made, in case such legislation should take place, for the management of those bonds. The third section of this act was introduced mainly for that purpose. But all that has passed away; and many of our own friends believe that the bill, which would not be affected at all by the provisions of the third section, had better be disembarrassed of it; and if laws shall hereafter be passed concerning emancipation, it will be time enough then to declare how the bonds shall be distributed. Therefore, sir, with the authority of the committee, I move to strike out the third section of the bill. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that I can possibly accommodate him in the time which I have the right to use after the previous question is seconded; and I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. PENDLETON. That will answer my purpose entirely. I desire to occupy but a very few minutes.

Mr. ELIOT. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—there being, on a division, ayes 61, noes 46—and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio how much time he will be satisfied to have?

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no doubt that I can conclude in ten or fifteen minutes all that I have to say.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman shall have fifteen minutes.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to acknowledge the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The time he has given me compels me to stick closely to the bill. I could not if I would wander into the discussion of the many topics already alluded to in the debate. I cannot waste words or even take time to elaborate any view of this bill. I must content myself with bare suggestions, leaving to the House to supply whatever in my haste I am obliged to omit.

I regret that the debate on this bill has degenerated on the part of its friends from the high position in which it was left by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the select committee, [Mr. ELIOT.] He appealed to our highest humanity. It is true he touched upon the question of power, and asserted that he found it among not only the implied but also the express grants of the Constitution, but he touched lightly upon this point, he pressed it with none of the fervor with which he advocates his well-settled convictions. He urged us to pass this bill in mercy if not in justice to a race whom he described as poor, houseless, homeless, destitute, thriftless, ignorant, whom the fortunes of war had thrown upon our care, and whom we were bound to protect while they were passing from a state of bondage to liberty, while they were becoming habituated to the difference of the cares and duties imposed by their changed condition from compulsory to compensated labor.

The gentleman from Philadelphia dragged the discussion down into the dirtiest puddle of partisan politics. He participated in the debate, and contamination was in the contact. He rehearsed his oft-repeated anathema against the Democratic party. He seeks to compensate by the intensity of his manner for the staleness of his matter. He seeks to convey the impression that new and strange tones of his voice necessarily imply new and varied thoughts. He labors under the impression common to apostates, that all its intelligence, all its virtue, all its patriotism left the Democratic party when he left it. He is not more important nor yet less vain than many another man whom I have seen attached to that great party, and by the aid of its power rising to high place. Their appreciation of themselves and the party has no parallel except in that of the fly upon the coach wheel, which, clated with the smoothness and rapidity of the motion, called to the coach to be duly thankful that itself and the wheel were carrying it along so swiftly.

My colleague, [Mr. Cox,] before he had finished an analysis of the bill which he had commenced with his accustomed ability, was easily seduced by the taunts of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to enter upon the discussion of the old doctrine of amalgamation under the new name of miscegenation. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] avoiding the practical questions suggested by this bill, announced his belief that slavery is dead, and gave several reasons for believing and for saying so. Both gentlemen, however, agreed that if this bill could be so changed as that it would impose no burden on the Treasury, they would be prepared to give it a favorable consideration.

Sir, I am not willing to let the opposition to this bill rest entirely on the argument made by either of them. They have given up one of the strong points of the case.

If there is no constitutional power to pass this bill, the fact that it costs nothing makes the infraction none the less flagrant. If there is constitutional power to pass it, then there is power to incur all the expense necessary to carry it into full operation.

Nor, sir, am I quite willing to have the question embarrassed by any view we may take of the proclamation of emancipation. The effect of that proclamation, or its authority, have nothing to do with this question.

I agree with the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] that no lawyer whose opinion is worth having thinks it worth more than the paper on which it is written. The power of Federal armies may be brought into requisition to give it validity. Test oaths unconstitutional in themselves and extorted as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of any civil right may give it some sort of effect; but of itself it is utterly void; it is illegal; it is of no authority; it ought never to have been issued; it ought to be immediately recalled; it has never freed a single slave; it never will. But that is not the question here. It is not even remotely involved.

We have within our lines now five hundred thousand men, women, and children who are actually freed by the chances of war. The number increases daily. They consist of slaves who have run away from their rebel masters, slaves who have been run away from by their rebel masters, and slaves who have been made captives by our troops. They are all free, actually free, legally free, and will never be reenslaved.

It was in behalf of these that the gentleman from Massachusetts appealed to us. He told us they were poor; without food, except Government rations; without clothes, except Government clothing; without houses or homes, and without knowledge enough to take care of themselves and provide for their families. He did not tell us—but it is frequently alluded to in the various reports of those who have looked into this subject—that they long for the repose and quiet of their old homes and the care of their masters; that freedom has not been to them the promised boon; that even thus soon it has proven itself to be a life of torture, ending only in certain and speedy death. But he did tell us that this ignorance arose from the circumstances of their former life; that we have changed those circumstances, and that it is our duty to fit them to bear and to benefit by the change which we have wrought. Sir, the appeal of the gentleman made a deep impression upon me. But reflection has convinced me that the highest considerations of official duty and of sound policy require that we should not yield to those sympathies and pass this bill.

I stand, sir, here substantially with my friend from New York, a member of the select committee, [Mr. KALBFLEISCH,] who addressed the House so forcibly a few days ago. We have not the power; if we had, its exercise would destroy our best hopes for a restoration of our Union.

As my objections to the bill are radical, I will not be so uncandid as to dwell upon the objections to its details, faulty as I think I could show these to be. I will only pause to point you to the officers created by it: the commissioner, eight or ten assistant commissioners, and all needful superintendents and clerks to carry into operation this complicated machine wherever it may once get a foothold. I will only suggest the enormous powers you give to one or another of these officers. They shall have power to decide all questions arising under any law heretofore or hereafter to be enacted concerning persons of African descent, whether they have ever been slaves or not, and all persons who have or may become free, or in anywise entitled to their freedom. They shall have power to assign to the freedmen all lands which have been at any time abandoned, even though they may now be occupied by their owners; and to advise and aid them, organize and direct their labor, adjust their wages, and arbitrate their quarrels. Extraordinary power, indeed! Were such ever intrusted to man and not abused? Nor will I remind gentlemen that this very difficulty was frequently foretold, that the incapacity of the negro to take care of himself was often alluded to, and that you always ridiculed the idea. What will you do with the negro when you shall have emancipated him? was frequently asked; and as often your virtuous indignation boiled over at the bare intimation that he was not thoroughly competent to take care of himself. Is he not "a man and a brother?" "Is not his soul white if his skin is black?" "Did not one God make both white and black?" This was the answer from most of the Republicans of the last Congress. Some few took refuge, as the gentleman from Maryland did a day or two ago, in the suggestion that these troublesome questions were devices of the Democratic devil to disturb the minds and unsettle the faith and shatter the harmony of the faithful. Nevertheless these questions are now here for solution, and the care of the negro bids fair to be as troublesome in the future as his emancipation has been in the past.

Sir, we have no power to pass any bill of this kind; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] frankly means that when he says:

"But if all proclamations were wrong and all laws were without constitutional support which have sought to liberate the slaves of enemies, still the rebellion itself has freed them, and they are subjects of our charge. We must protect them or be faithless in our office."

But if we had the power we ought not to exercise it.

I have seen the orders of General Banks at New Orleans, and of General Butler at Fortress Monroe, and the report of Mr. Mellen, the Treasury agent on the Mississippi, in relation to this very subject. I believe those orders establish as good a system as you can expect to organize under this bill. They provide for the care, training, education, wages, clothing, support, and compulsory labor of the colored people. This is done under commissioners and superintendents, who, being officers of the Army and directly amenable to those generals, will doubtless perform the duties as well as any others who might be selected. And as for those generals who are thus to supervise the arrangements, whatever higher places they may be fit for, their worst enemies would not dare to say that they have not eminent capacity to organize and control a village of contrabands and to regulate the occupation of abandoned plantations. Their scheme, then, is equal in good results to that proposed by this bill, and is far superior in this: that it is a military order; that it is limited to military occupation; it is short in duration, contracting in its tendency, and will expire soon by the very law of its being. On the other hand, the plan of the committee, large at its commencement, is in its nature progressive, expansive; begins a bureau, aspires already to be a Department, and will last as long as the Government itself.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] will say that the number of these contrabands is now too large for management by these military orders. That I think is not the difficulty. But if it is, let me suggest a remedy based upon the reasonings of his speech and of these various reports. You say these contrabands are patient, docile, brave, industrious, but too ignorant to take care of themselves; that they are in our charge; and that it is our duty to support, train, and educate them for the duties of life, and to compel them to labor as a means at once of supporting themselves and of reimbursing us. The concurrent testimony of all the reports on that subject, which the gentleman himself furnished me, is that the discipline of the military service is the very best method of imparting this education in the shortest possible time. You say that it has become the settled policy of this Government to use colored soldiers. In the loyal States you draft both the free negro and the slave. Why not, then, take these contrabands, whom you say you are bound to educate, put them into the Army, which you say is the best school, and thus, while you fulfill the duty to them, relieve your citizens at home from that ever-present, fearful foreboding which haunts the home of every family too poor in these times of high prices to lay by $300 for each draft?

The gentleman will say, "The women and children will still remain to be cared for." True; but surely for them General Banks and General Butler and Mr. Mellen will suffice; and if not, then I answer, in the language of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] the other day on another question, "Let the Government take charge of the charities of life, and, after deducting a proper sum from the wages of the colored soldier, appropriate a sufficient sum for the support of each needy member of a poor family whose protector is taken away," to be administered through the agency of these military authorities.

But, sir, I pass to another consideration. I am one of those who still hope for a restoration of the Union; not the unity of our territory only, but the maintenance of the Union under the Constitution. I hope that we may maintain the integrity of our system of government: the system of confederation; the system whose foundation is State rights. The Constitution is a compact of government made by sovereign States, which assigns to the Federal Government its powers and duties, and reserves all others to the States and people. Its foundation is that all power not granted is reserved; all duties not specifically enjoined are forbidden. The duties of the Federal Government are few and simple. They relate to foreign affairs and matters of general and universal interest. Its powers were intended to be limited also. To the States were committed all matters of local concern and the care of the rights and liberties of all their citizens. Their reserved powers were consequently very large. Our fathers thought this the very hidden secret of their system. They thought they had discovered in this the philosopher's stone of government. And so they had. It was the beauty and the pride of our system. It secured to us liberty; it secured to us prosperity; it secured to us self-government beyond the example of any people. In an evil hour it was abandoned. Since then we have had war, and misery, and tyranny; but I forbear.

I see the efforts made to reconstruct State government. They are upon a wrong basis; they ought to fail; I believe they will fail. They would be a perpetual mockery of the duty on the part of the Federal Government to guaranty a republican form of government to the States. Nevertheless they may succeed. If they do, it will be the right and the duty of each State to take care of her own poor; it is a duty she cannot shift upon another, a right she cannot surrender. It is a duty which the Federal Government has no power to perform, a right which the Federal Government has no power to accept. Build up the system proposed by this bill, and you will have established in the heart of each State that which will prove the very strongest obstacle against its return to the Union on the basis of the old Constitution. Establish it firmly, and you will have in each State a settlement of negroes superintended by your officers, more difficult of management either by the Federal Government or by the State than were the Indians in Georgia, which will either draw the Federal Government into the performance of a State duty, or will harass and annoy and embitter the officers of the State in the performance of it themselves.

I have said nothing, sir, of State institutions. They may perish. They are but for a time. Their duration depends upon many causes. But State rights belong to our Government, are an essential part of its system, are essential to liberty itself.

I am pledged to maintain them; pledged by every oath in which I swore to support the Constitution of the United States. That oath I intend to keep sacredly to the end. And because I intend to keep it, I am constrained thus to oppose this bill.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body returned House bill No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, with the report of the committee on conference thereon, in which the committee were unable to agree, for the action of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that by unanimous consent the House proceed to the consideration of that report.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the gentleman to postpone it for a little while.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would be glad to do so, but for the circumstances under which I am placed. I am obliged to leave town at five o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I submit from the committee of conference the following report.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) "to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

JOHN SHERMAN,
DANIEL CLARK,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
E. B. WASHBURN,
JOHN A. KASSON,
JOHN L. DAWSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen by that report that the committee of conference has not been able to agree. While I do not state anything, of course, that occurred in the committee of conference, I will state that I think there would have been no difficulty with the managers on the part of the House in coming to an agreement on the subject. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DAWSON,] who represented the minority of the House, was willing, in order that the difference between the two Houses might be accommodated, to agree to the tax of twenty cents; but he wanted the tax in future to remain at sixty instead of eighty cents. This contained the difference between the two Houses.

Mr. STEVENS. He does not represent the minority of the House if he does not disagree to that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe the gentleman from the Brownsville district of Pennsylvania [Mr. DAWSON] voted with the gentleman from the Lancaster district, [Mr. STEVENS,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, on every proposition against taxing the stock on hand.

I was proceeding to say it was insisted by parties who are against any retaxation that the House had decided against the principle of taxing whisky on hand. It was insisted upon the other side that the House had not decided upon any such principle, but had only decided against taxing it forty cents a gallon. In order to test the sense of the House upon that subject, I move the following resolution in connection with the report made by the committee:

Resolved, That the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments to House bill No. 122, and that the House request of the Senate another committee of conference on the said bill; and it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House that in an adjustment of the differences between the two Houses on the said bill there should be an additional duty of not less than twenty nor more than forty cents per gallon imposed on spirits on hand for sale.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a point of order. It is that that is not in order as an amendment to the report of the committee of conference. The committee can report nothing but their disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the resolution is not in order as an amendment to the report of the committee; but it is in order for any member of the committee or the House to offer such a resolution; and he understands it is offered in that shape.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I offer the resolution, and demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee did not offer the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, a member of the committee, offered it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will keep cool.

Mr. STEVENS. Of course he will.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the House of Representatives has the power to instruct any committee which it authorizes to be appointed. It is a judicious check upon the power of the Speaker in appointing committees. They have a right to instruct a committee of conference, as they have a right to instruct a standing or a select committee. The gentleman from Illinois moves this himself as a resolution. It seems, however, susceptible of division, first upon asking another committee of conference, and secondly upon the instructions. As to the right to move instructions the Chair has no doubt.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask the Chair whether he holds that an individual can offer the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I rise to a point of order. It is that when the committee made their report they ceased to be a committee, and therefore it is not in order to instruct them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order also, as stated by the gentleman raising it. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] having been one of the conferees moves for another conference, and in addition offers a resolution instructing them, which he has the right to do.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then two questions are involved.

The SPEAKER. There are.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I raise another point of order. It is that no committee being in existence, a resolution of that kind is not in order. If it requires unanimous consent, I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that it does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. LOVEJOY. What right has the gentleman to introduce it unless he has unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rose as one of the late conferees and offered it, as applying to the bill on which the two Houses have thus far failed to agree.

Mr. LOVEJOY. He had ceased to be one of the conferees.

The SPEAKER. It is usual, when a conference committee reports a disagreement, to recognize one of the conferees for any motion he desires to make.

The Chair would modify his previous statement on another point. Upon reflection he does not think the resolution of instructions will be susceptible of division. It being really a commitment of a bill to a committee with proposed instructions, the rule is imperative that the vote must be taken on it as a whole.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I rise to a point of order. There is no committee to instruct.

The SPEAKER. It is an almost every-day practice to move the appointment of a select committee with instructions to them to perform certain acts.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be if the previous question is not seconded.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to move an amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois had not the floor to make a motion of that kind. A motion to raise a committee of conference is not such a privileged motion as will take precedence of other business. When the gentleman made his report he exhausted his privilege. Having exhausted that privilege, he cannot hold the floor for the purpose of putting in a motion which is not a privileged one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and for the reason that when the conferees reported to the House they brought with their report the bill and the amendments upon which the two Houses disagreed. These are now on the Clerk's table and before the House. The Chair then recognized the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and the papers being before the House, he made the motion which he did in reference to it, and in order.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe the gentleman from Ohio cannot do that while I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion of the gentleman from Ohio as taking precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio cannot be entertained if the previous question should be sustained.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will consult the gentleman whom he said the other day was "the best parliamentarian in the United States," [the Journal Clerk] in which opinion the Chair concurs, he will find that the Chair, in this ruling, is sustained.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall beg leave to differ on this occasion from the "best parliamentarian in the United States." I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. Not unless the gentleman withdraws the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will withdraw it, if I have the control of it.

The SPEAKER. Certainly the gentleman has; but the Chair will state that all motions to bring the two Houses together take precedence of motions which tend to keep them apart.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that very well, provided the motion is made when the previous question is not pending. But I do not understand that when the previous question has been demanded, another motion can be interposed. That is my understanding of the parliamentary law, although I may be mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the Manual read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not wish to engage in any controversy with the Chair. I am quite willing that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio shall come in, so that the House may vote understandingly on the whole question, and that we may make some disposition of it; because I take it that it is for the interest of all parties that this question should be settled, and settled speedily. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio what would be the condition of the bill if his motion should prevail?

Mr. PENDLETON. I have not the bill before me, but if I had I could soon inform the gentleman as to what the condition of the bill would be. I can only say this: that it will maintain the principle upon which this House has acted, that no tax shall be placed upon the stock on hand.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is the point.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose that if the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, shall prevail, the amendment sent to us by the Senate taxing whisky sixty-five and seventy cents a gallon after a given period will then be the law.

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The House will understand that if the motion of the gentleman from Ohio prevails there is to be no tax upon the stock on hand.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the House are of opinion that that is right they will vote for the gentleman's motion, and there will be an end of the whole question, and the speculators and liquor-holders will go unwhipped.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is the gentleman's set speech, and we do not care about that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not propose to debate the question myself, because, if I should do so, it would not become me to demand the previous question. Every member of the House understands the question: it is whether we will permit the immense stock of liquor on hand, which would yield a large revenue, to go untaxed.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire of the Speaker if it is in order for my colleague to be permitted to discuss the merits of the bill to the exclusion of every one else upon the floor?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think it is, as long as I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is in order, under the rules, for one hour.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not propose to occupy an hour. I do not wish to take up the time of the House. I merely wish to show to the House and the country what will be the effect of the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. By my motion the whole question is left open with an instruction to your committee of conference that in the adjustment of the differences between the two Houses they may take into consideration this question of taxing the stock on hand from twenty to forty cents a gallon. That is the whole matter, and I now demand the previous question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope my colleague will not insist on the previous question after discussing the matter himself.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have only stated the proposition as it stands before the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being first upon agreeing to Mr. PENDLETON's motion that the House do recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate,

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Bliss, Blow, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Dennison, Eldridge, Fenton, Fluck, Griswold, Harrington, Holman, Hooper, Kelley, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Long, Lovejoy, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McIndoe, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Wilder, and Winfield—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chauler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cox, Creswell, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Eliot, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Norton, Perham, Pike, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Scofield, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, and Windom—78.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ASHLEY stated that on the question of this bill he was paired off with Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, who would have voted "ay," while he [Mr. ASHLEY] would have voted "no."

Mr. BAXTER stated that he was paired off on this question with Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. ANDERSON stated that his colleagues Messrs. RANDALL and SMITH were absent in consequence of sickness.

Mr. BEAMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. UPSON, was confined to his room by sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on Mr. WASHBURNE's resolution.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I understood the Speaker to decide that the resolution was indivisible.

The SPEAKER. It is indivisible, being a motion to refer the bill with instructions.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. The question that I desire to ask the Chair is this: suppose the House vote down the resolution instructing the committee, will it be then in order to move the appointment of another committee without instructions?

The SPEAKER. It would be if the motion were made before the House passes to the consideration of other business—the bill being still before the House.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I give notice that I will make that motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. Has the Speaker decided that the resolution cannot be divided, so as to have a vote on the appointment of the committee and a vote on the instructions?

The SPEAKER. The rule, to be found on page 49 of Barclay's Digest, is that a motion to commit with instructions is indivisible.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have demanded the previous question, and the House is now acting under that demand, so that all this debate is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer all proper inquiries put to him as to parliamentary points which are not in the nature of debate.

Mr. LOVEJOY. This is not a motion to commit with instructions. It is a motion to appoint a committee. Now, cannot the House by one vote appoint a committee, and then by another vote decide whether it will instruct the committee or not? That certainly is divisible.

The SPEAKER. The rule is on page 49 of the Digest: "A division of the question is not in order on a motion to commit with instructions, or on different branches of instructions."

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the Chair whether this is a motion to commit at all; whether it is not a motion to create a committee? Having created it, then a motion to instruct would be an entirely different thing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the every-day practice of the House is to authorize special committees to be appointed, with instructions to perform certain acts. The present resolution is to refer the bill and amendments to a conference committee with instructions.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I inquire if this can be called a conference committee, when we tie the hands of our conferees?

The SPEAKER. It is in the power of the House to tie up the hands of any of its committees, otherwise the whole power would be in the hands of a Speaker in appointing the committee. The Chair would draw the attention of the House to the fact that the resolution refers the whole subject, as the Chair understands its phraseology, to the conference committee already appointed. The Chair supposes that that might not have been the intention of the mover of the resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. Does this continue the old committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. It would seem to the Chair to effect that result.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I only ask that the last part of the resolution shall be before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it not a resolution to create a committee?

Mr. LOVEJOY. As this refers to the practice of the House, I wish to ask the Chair whether any such practice has prevailed?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to this constant questioning of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has answered questions put for the purpose of obtaining information, but questions tending to debate, or in the nature of debate, the Chair cannot answer under the previous question.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to a question of order. Under the construction which the Speaker has given to this resolution the whole subject is referred back again to a committee of conference which has already reported, and which is now, to all intents and purposes, functus officio. It has discharged the duty imposed upon it by the House; and, therefore, its duty having been discharged, this subject cannot be recommitted to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, on the ground that whenever a select committee is appointed and has discharged its duties, a reference of similar matter to it by the House revives the committee. The gentleman from Illinois is aware that that is also a nearly every-day practice. The adoption of this resolution would therefore revive the committee of conference.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. In answer to that I have to say that the conference between the two Houses ceased the moment the committee made its report. Such has been the practice universally recognized in this House, that the functions of a committee of conference ceased with their report to the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call my colleague to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order that the committee of conference closed its labors with the rendition of its report, but the House by referring other matter to the committee revives it.

Mr. KING. I rise to a point of order. The resolution seems to contemplate referring new matter to the committee about which there is no difference between the two Houses. I understood the Speaker to decide the other day that no point about which there was no difference or controversy between the two Houses should be considered by the committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order. He is stating his point of order.

Mr. KING. If this be submitted to the committee of conference it will be within the power of that committee to add twenty cents to the tax upon the stock on hand when there is no point of difference between the two Houses on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The committee can add one hundred cents tax if the matter be referred to them. It is within the power of the House to determine.

The question recurred on the resolution of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. I want to ask a question for information. What will be the condition of the bill—the tax on the article manufactured—

The SPEAKER. That can only be asked by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cole, Creswell, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Longyear, McAllister, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Norton, Perham, Pike, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Scofield, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, and Windom—76.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, Chauler, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Fenton, Fluck, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hooper, Kelley, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Long, Lovejoy, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, and Winfield—67.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. DAWES stated that his colleague, Mr. GOOCH, absent on the business of the House, was paired with Mr. ROBINSON.

Mr. STILES stated that his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, was still confined to his house by sickness.

Mr. ELDRIDGE stated that his colleague, Mr. WHEELER, was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that he be excused from further service on the committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SPALDING to fill the vacancy.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS—AGAIN.

The House then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 51, to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. ELIOT took the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to let me state my objections to the bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The demand for the previous question came unexpectedly upon me. My State has a deep interest in this matter.

Mr. KERNAN. We will not let the time occupied by the gentleman from Kentucky be taken out of the hour of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ELIOT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only a few moments.

Mr. ELIOT. I want a vote to-day, and I prefer to have voting rather than speaking from either side of the House. I think that the House is ready to vote, and I am willing to give up my right to close the debate for that purpose.

Mr. COX. This side of the House will give you the time taken up by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ELIOT. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, if he can state what he wants in ten minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think I can.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I yield to the gentleman for that length of time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am content to leave the discussion of the eleemosynary features of this bill and its details to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] and others better acquainted with the subject and with more time to develop it.

I did not expect the previous question would be so soon moved on a bill so important as this is. I desired to be heard upon it at some length before the vote was taken. I regard it as one of the most radical and important bills introduced into this most radical Congress. I must, in view of the few moments only accorded me by the gentleman, [Mr. ELIOT,] confine my attention to what I consider the main objections to the bill; not to the expense the plan will entail upon the Treasury by the subjection of the negro population of the United States to the exclusive control and care of the Secretary of War or anything of that sort, but to its direct attack upon the rights of the States to control and legislate for their own people. I say that this bill directly claims the power of exclusive legislative control over the freemen of the States, freemen by the assumption of the friends of the bill. It has no relation to anybody but free persons. It does not relate to slaves, but to free persons.

The bill proposes to confide to a bureau in the War Office "all questions" "touching the general superintendence, disposition, and direction of all persons, being freedmen of African descent, who are or shall become free by virtue of any proclamation, law, or military order issued, enacted, or promulgated during the present rebellion, or by virtue of any act of emancipation which shall be enacted by any State for the freedom of persons held to service or labor within such State." All "military and civil officers charged with the execution of any law of the United States, or of any military order," looking to the freedom of negroes, are to report to this bureau "under such regulations and in such form" as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. The bureau is to establish and enforce regulations for the "judicious treatment and disposition" of all such free persons, for their protection, and the protection of "the Government of the United States," and for determining "their respective rights and interests." It assumes to deliver over these free persons, inhabitants of the several States, to this bureau, with its Commissioner, superintendents, clerks, agents, &c., in number so many as the Commissioner shall deem necessary. These superintendents are to assign them lands, "to advise and aid them," "to organize and direct their labor," fix "their wages," collect and account for same "to the commissioners," not to these free persons. And these assistant commissioners and superintendents are to have power to adjudicate and settle "all difficulties arising between freedmen, except when resort to a provost judge or other legal tribunal becomes necessary."

Such and so monstrous are the pretensions of this bill. It aims at swallowing up people and States. Where does this Federal Legislature get the power to take possession body and soul of the free people of the States, and put over them overseers, clerks, and a raft of mercenary masters to fix their wages, direct their labor, adjudicate their rights without judge or jury, and regulate their whole social and political life by orders from the War Office? Can Congress thus fetter free men? If it has this power over one freeman it has it over all; if over a free negro then over a free white man. The usurpation is flagrant.

But this bill proposes to take from Kentucky and other States active in support of the Federal Government the control of their own people and transfer it to this Federal body.

By the act of the extra session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, all slaves employed by the consent of their masters in aid of the rebellion are declared free.

By the confiscation act of the last Congress, which the indefatigable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] fomented to the extent of his ability, all slaves belonging to masters in rebellion, or who in any manner have given aid and comfort to the rebellion, are to be proclaimed free. Well, sir, that would embrace a pretty large class of people in the State of Kentucky—I do not know how large, but certainly a pretty large number—and a good many in Missouri, Maryland, and West Virginia, and their slaves are claimed to be free by the friends of this bill.

This bill also embraces all who may by any State action become free hereafter. They too are to be taken into this class of freedmen, and to be placed under the control of Congress. They are to be put under a bureau which is to be controlled by the War Office, to be kept under the control of those who under the action of Congress are to have charge of them as completely as if they were slaves still. The bill proposes to remove from these States all power to control a considerable portion of their own citizens, and transfers them to this bureau. It is unconstitutional; it overthrows our form of government, and must let in a flood of mischief. The result will inevitably be a conflict between the authorities of the States affected by this usurped power and the Federal authorities. Is it to be supposed that the people of Kentucky can surrender to Congress the control of two hundred and twenty-five thousand of her people? No, sir, they will never do it to this or any other Congress so long as they are worthy of the people from whom they are descended.

Is it to be supposed that the State of Maryland, who it is said is about to emancipate her seventy or eighty thousand slaves, will consent to put them under the control of a bureau of the War Office, to be "disposed of," to be hired out, to have their suits arbitrated upon and all their motions regulated, all their rights prescribed, all their conduct controlled, by these petty, petting agents of the Secretary of War? Will the State of Maryland consent to have those who are to be freemen within her borders thus controlled? Will West Virginia or Delaware submit to it?

It is said that Missouri has adopted a system of prospective emancipation. Will she allow her one hundred thousand slaves when they become free to be placed under the control of this Federal bureau, to be placed at the disposal of the War Department with a bureau to direct their labor, to make contracts concerning their wages, to collect and disburse their earnings, arbitrate their difficulties, and take this monstrous control of her free citizens? Let no man believe it.

Mr. ELIOT. With the consent of the gentleman from Kentucky I merely want to call his attention to the fact that the bill does not contemplate any such effect. It does not contemplate interfering with the slaves in Kentucky, Missouri, or Maryland.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I confess that I am not able to see it in that light.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman may perhaps have a draft of a bill which is not the bill under consideration before the House. The last clause of the first section of the bill under consideration provides that no rules and regulations shall be made concerning persons held to labor or service in any State not now or heretofore in insurrection against the United States, nor concerning any other persons than freedmen. That relieves the bill from all the difficulties the gentleman has so far stated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If that were so it would work a very radical change in the bill before me, I admit. The gentleman, however, is mistaken. This bill applies to such persons as are made free by any act of Congress, by any military order, or by any proclamation now or hereafter to be issued, or by any future act of State emancipation, "or who shall be otherwise entitled to their freedom." All these are to be taken from the control of the States in which they may be found and placed under this Bureau of Emancipation. Does not the act in terms embrace all free negroes in the United States now or hereafter free?

Now, sir, what is the modification to which the gentleman alludes, and the only one? It is this, at the close of the first section, namely:

"But no rules or regulations shall be made concerning persons held to service or labor in any State not now or heretofore in insurrection against the United States."

This language does not embrace persons emancipated from "service or labor" within such States, but only such as are held to service; that is, slaves. Now, the bill applies to freedmen, all freedmen in each and every State, and as soon as the slaves are freed they will pass into the bondage of this War Office bureau. The modification seems only intended to make it clear that the slaves of loyal States, so called, were not to be bureaued, that is all.

But, sir, I should scorn myself if I had no words for any but my own State. This bill attacks eleven States, eleven imperishable States in the Union, and which shall stay in the Union; eleven States, some of revolutionary renown, with Virginia at their head. They are, come weal or woe, now and forever in the Union, founded upon the rock of the Constitution: if the prayers and arms and blood of patriots can avail, the gates of hell shall not prevail against them. In every one of these States this bill enters to seize and fetter a large portion of the population, to subject them to the control of the Federal Congress. It is a usurpation of the right of the States to control their own free inhabitants and their slaves as well.

There are now elements at work it is said by which Arkansas is soon to resume her place as a sister in the Union, and yet under this bill she is to come back with a large portion of her people beyond her control. So with Louisiana and Tennessee. Three or four million in eleven States of the Union are by this bill to be placed in the hands of Congress to be managed and controlled in spite of the authorities of the States wherein they reside.

I ask gentlemen to look for a moment at the consequences of such a measure if it were possible to carry it out; but it will not be possible to carry it out. What State will ever permit Federal agents to manage a large portion of its people, to direct their labor, to make contracts for their wages, to collect their wages and to arbitrate their suits? Freemen as they are claimed to be, what State will ever permit such a thing? These bureaucrats, these negro-catchers, meddling with the inhabitants of States, would find their road a hard one to travel.

It is a dangerous assault upon the independence of the States. I have before me the resolutions of instruction of the State of Massachusetts to its delegation in the Convention that framed the Constitution. Who believes that State, noble in that noble era, would have ever even gone into consultation with her sister States, if any possibility had existed that her own domestic institutions and her own people were to be placed under the control of Federal power? Listen to the language of her bill of rights in 1780:

"The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not, or may not hereafter be, by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled."

Have the people of Massachusetts the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free people? When did they renounce it? This bill denies, tramples that sacred right under foot; her own offspring deny it, and do despite to her ancient spirit of freedom, for if they deny the right of Kentucky, of Virginia to govern themselves, they deny the right of all States wherever throughout the Union. It will give a large advantage to some sections of the country not embarrassed by this population to transfer the control of three or four million people from the States to Congress. I see no possible resurrection for the agricultural States in the South and West if the control of four million ignorant people be removed from those States to this Hall, to depend upon legislation which has its origin here for their future welfare. To give Massachusetts the control of three or four hundred thousand people in South Carolina is a new and short way to settle the tariff controversy. There are very many people in this country who are foolish enough to think this bloody quarrel is deeper than the negro question, older, and destined to survive it. They think it springs from rivalry among free and aspiring Commonwealths, from a desire for political pre-eminence and commercial and manufacturing wealth. They recollect the storm of 1832. Negro was not the cause then, any more than now. Ambition, lust of power and wealth stirring the corners of the Republic fills the land with blood and tears. The policy which puts the control of three or four million men seated in southern and western States in the hands of the commercial and manufacturing parts of the country, thus removing them from the control of those among whom these dependent people must labor, live, and die, is big with the destruction of the agricultural States of the South and West.

[Here the hammer fell, the ten minutes allowed the member having expired.]

Mr. ELIOT. It was my intention to avail myself of the privilege, which the rules of the House accord me to ask the attention of the House, in closing the discussion upon this bill, to some considerations which seem to have been rendered somewhat necessary by the course the debate has taken. But there has been no such attack upon the provisions of the bill as, in my judgment, would justify me in detaining the House to so late an hour as they would be kept here were I to go on with the remarks I proposed to make. The House wants action, and I want action. All the objections which have been made to the bill to-day have been anticipated before by myself and my colleagues upon the committee, and by the gentleman who has spoken to-day. Inasmuch, therefore, as the freedmen have had to give way so long this morning to whisky, and inasmuch as gentlemen upon the other side of the House cannot complain, and will, I hope, in consideration of my withholding my speech, help me to a final action on the bill, I waive the right I have and ask the House to come to a direct vote now.

The question recurring on the motion to commit the bill and substitute to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. COX withdrew the motion.

The question recurring on the motion made by Mr. Brooks to recommit the bill with instructions.

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announced to the House that the Senate had agreed to an act (H. R. No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (No. 105) for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood;

An act (No. 120) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834; and

An act (No. 139) for the relief of Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, of Coshocton county, Ohio.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask leave to take up the bill (H. R. No. 265) just returned from the Senate with an amendment, supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," for the purpose of concurring in the amendment. The amendment supplies merely an accidental omission in the bill.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up and the amendment, which was to insert the words "in coin" at the end of line twelve, page 1, was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the adoption of the substitute for the original bill reported by the committee.

The substitute was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY moved to lay the bill on the table, and upon that demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin,

Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Mallory, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Winfield—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—68.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. BLISS stated that upon all questions on this bill he had paired off with Mr. SPALDING, who would have voted for the bill and he against it.

Mr. LAW stated that Mr. CRAVENS had been called home.

Mr. EDEN stated that Mr. ROBINSON had paired off with Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.

Mr. PENDLETON stated that Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, had been called home by sickness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. ASHLEY.

Mr. HOLMAN stated that Mr. ORTH was still at home, and upon all political questions had paired off with Mr. CRAVENS.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELIOT called for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MALLORY demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moonhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Winfield—67.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to amend the title of the bill by striking out the word "emancipation" and inserting "freedmen's affairs" in lieu thereof, and upon that motion demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I move that the House do now adjourn. My object is that we may have a full vote upon this question. We cannot have it to-day.

The SPEAKER. This is merely an amendment to the title.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I do not insist on my motion.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at twenty-five minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 2, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 18th of January, a copy of the proceedings of the advisory board appointed under the act of July 16, 1862, entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy."

Mr. RAMSEY. I understand that is a communication in answer to a resolution I offered some time since. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented the memorial of William Trevitt, praying for compensation for his services as consul of the United States for the port of Valparaiso, from September 30, 1859, to March 3, 1860, and to be refunded the amount paid by him for clerk hire and extra office rent; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of the board of trade of Philadelphia, praying that the provisions of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to protect liens upon vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," may be extended so as to preserve and continue the lien of any judgment of loyal citizens of the United States upon any real estate which shall be condemned, or confiscated by virtue of any act of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of William Harding, eighty-seven years of age, blind and poor, praying for compensation for services as a soldier in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Taunton, Massachusetts, and a petition of citizens of Concord, New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery, and an amendment of the Constitution forever prohibiting its existence; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. CONNESS presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of a modification of the order of the President of the United States of November 18, 1862, which prohibits the exportation of ammunition and munitions of war, so that it shall not apply to the article of "blasting powder" from the port of San Francisco for mining purposes; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POMEROY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of a grant of lands to that State for the benefit of schools, in compliance with the terms of the act of September 4, 1841, distributing the proceeds of the public lands among the several States; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Scott, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Manitowoc county, Wisconsin, praying for the construction of a canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of James Pool, praying for the reimbursement of money paid by him for supplies for the Shawnee tribe of Indians, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on For-ign Relations, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Secretary of State and accompanying papers relative to the claim on this Government of the owners of the French ship La Manche, and recommending an appropriation for the satisfaction of the claim, reported a bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of the owners of the French ship La Manche; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 133) in relation to the pay of cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 163) for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a memorial of the National Land-Transfer Association for the State of Missouri, praying for aid to promote the emigration of skilled laborers to that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was recommended the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers of the United States Army, to report back a new bill in lieu of the original joint resolution.

The bill (S. No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army was read, and passed to a second reading.

CHARLES A. PITCHER.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles A. Pitcher, have directed me to report a joint resolution for his relief. The committee had no doubt about the right of this party to compensation; but they did not feel that Congress was competent to assess the damages, and therefore they thought the case ought to be sent to the Court of Claims. This joint resolution proposes to send the case to the Court of Claims and to give that court jurisdiction of the claim. As there can be no objection to it, I ask that the joint resolution may be put upon its passage at once.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. No. 30) for the relief of Charles A. Pitcher was read three times, and passed. It recites that on the 1st day of September, 1857, letters patent were granted to Spencer Rowe for an improvement in machines for making brooms for the term of fourteen years; that the patent was by Rowe, on the 4th of December, 1857, sold, transferred, and assigned in proper form to John Fox, and on the 2d day of April, 1861, by Fox to Charles A. Pitcher, together with all the right and claim which Fox had to any damages for any infringement of the patent before then suffered, and authorizing Pitcher to prosecute and recover for his own benefit damages for such infringement. After the assignment by Rowe to Fox had been made and recorded, and during the period of the possession of the patent-right by Fox and by Pitcher, the improvement and the machine for its use have been used in the penitentiary of the United States for the District of Columbia, whereby the United States has enjoyed large gains and profits in the employment of convict labor. The resolution therefore proposes to confer upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear the claim, and to allow and adjudge, as in other cases, to Pitcher what he ought to have for the use of this improvement and machine, upon the principle, however, that punitive damages shall not be allowed against the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked; and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 143) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 144) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 146) to enlarge the canals and improve the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, for military, naval, and commercial purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

B. C. BAILEY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 48, for the relief of B. C. Bailey.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to B. C. Bailey $4,496 98, being for damages for detention and expenses incurred in the seizure of the ship Argo by the flag-officer of the blockading fleet, in the month of May, 1861.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a report. It will be read.

The Secretary read the report of the Committee on Commerce, from which it appears that the ship Argo was under a charter in 1861 to proceed to City Point, Virginia; thence to Bremen, with a cargo of tobacco on foreign account; and thence to Quebec. While loading at City Point the ports of Virginia were blockaded, allowing to owners until the 15th of May, 1861, to load and clear their vessels.

The Argo left City Point on the 12th of May, and was proceeding on her voyage to Bremen, and on the 14th of May, at Hampton Roads, was seized and taken possession of by the United States flag-officer of the blockading fleet, and sent to New York as prize of war.

The ship was held in custody of officers of the United States at the latter place until the 24th of May, when she was released, and afterwards returned to the custody of the captain, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, no legal proceedings having been instituted.

The owner of the ship Argo presents a claim against the Government for money paid in New York, the port to which she was taken, being her expenses, &c., $2,051 60. For damages of detention eighteen days from her seizure at Hampton Roads on the 14th of May, and her discharge and departure on her voyage from New York on the 31st of that month, estimated at $5 50 per ton per month, $3,557 34. For damages consequent on the delay of the ship at New York, whereby she lost her return cargo at Bremen, which was to be taken on a given day, $3,000. For extra insurance, by reason of being late at the river St. Lawrence, on her return voyage, $800; and for loss of two anchors and one cable, $490. The committee deem a claim for disbursements and expenses in the port of New York, the direct result of her detention by the Government, and also the damage for detention, should be paid by the Government; but claims for supposed loss of return cargo at Bremen, money paid for insurance, loss of anchors and cable, do not fall within the same principle; the contingency upon which they are based remote and uncertain, and are not such as the Government can recognize as just. The committee estimate the expenses and disbursements at New York at $1,916 98, and damages for detention eighteen days, at four dollars per ton per month, one thousand and seventy-five tons, $2,580.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone all prior orders, with a view to take up Senate bill No. 125, which was before the Senate the other day.

Mr. SUMNER. May I ask what it is?

Mr. SHERMAN. The foreign immigration bill. I think it will take but a little while to pass it.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (S. No. 125) to encourage immigration was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are one or two verbal amendments that I desire to make. In line two of the second section I wish to strike out the word "foreign" before "immigration." It does not change the meaning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line seventeen of the same section I move to strike out the word "one" and insert "the next," so as to read, "during the next fiscal year."

The VICE PRESIDENT. This amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line twenty-nine of the same section I move to strike out the word "annual" and insert "during the next fiscal year."

The VICE PRESIDENT. This amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. WILKINSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a personal explanation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks the consent of the Senate to submit a personal explanation. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hold in my hand, Mr. President, the Boston Post of February 24, containing a speech of Governor Andrew in Faneuil Hall at the reception of the twenty-fourth Massachusetts regiment. In that speech Governor Andrew said:

"I observed with keen regret, in a congressional debate sketched in this morning's newspaper, some remarks which I might have called unpatriotic did I not believe them thoughtless, quoted from the lips of a gentleman occupying the position and who ought to say nothing unbecoming a statesman. He attempted a contrast of the soldiers of the East with the soldiers of the West. He affirmed that the eastern troops had as yet done nothing but to carry on a pendulum dance between the Potomac and the Rapidan, while they of the West had beaten rebel armies and had opened the Mississippi. I need not pause to repel the taunt against the army of the Potomac."

And in a brief editorial on the first page of that paper the following language occurs:

"EASTERN TROOPS.—We have already printed a pretty full abstract of the Governor's speech at the reception of the twenty-fourth regiment on Saturday; but in justice to eastern troops generally we feel bound to publish it in full, as reported for the Boston Journal; because it presents a manly and conclusive answer to the slur cast upon them by Senator WILKINSON of Minnesota, on the floor of the United States Senate. The Senator was sharply replied to by Mr. FESSENDEN, but not with that precision and array of facts which render Governor Andrew's remarks so triumphant a refutation of the calumny uttered upon brave and faithful men honorably serving their country. See the fourth page."

So, Mr. President, I have pretty good reason to believe that I am the Senator alluded to by the distinguished Governor of Massachusetts. His excellency, it seems, based his remarks upon what he says he observed sketched in a morning newspaper; and taking for granted that what he saw "sketched" as the report of a congressional debate, contained a full and fair statement of the debate as it took place in the Senate, he proceeded in the most formal manner, in old Faneuil Hall, the cradle of American liberty, in the presence of the brave, patriotic, war-worn veterans of Massachusetts, to arraign me for making an unpatriotic attack upon the noble citizen soldiers whom he was addressing.

Mr. President, I do not think that as a general rule it is profitable to notice here in the Senate what may be said or written of its members outside of this body; but, sir, I also think that there

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 57.

are occasions when such notice may not only be proper but necessary. The speech from which I have quoted was made upon an occasion of peculiar interest, in the presence of the authorities of the city of Boston and of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It was made by the Governor of that old and honored State. He was addressing war-worn veterans, whom he had two years before sent forth to the field of danger and of death, to struggle, to suffer, and to die, if need be, that their country and freedom might live. They had returned covered with glory and with honor, and the doors of old Faneuil Hall were thrown open wide to receive them. The Governor ascended the rostrum, as he said, to salute them in behalf of Massachusetts with all the honors due from the Old Bay State to those of her bravest and her best.

Before, however, his excellency had fully determined in his own mind what fitting words to employ, what line of thought to pursue, in his address to the brave sons of Massachusetts, his eyes accidentally fell upon a sketch of a debate as reported in one of the morning papers of Boston. It was a garbled report, as most of the newspaper reports of the proceedings of Congress are. I should have supposed that the honored Governor of Massachusetts was perfectly aware that very little reliance can be placed upon the correctness of the meager telegraphic reports of the proceedings of the Senate. And, sir, would it not have comforted more with the dignity of the high office which he so ably fills if his excellency had withheld his criticisms and his rebuke until he could have seen and read the official report of the debate to which he seemed so eager to except?

Mr. President, to show how imperfect was the understanding of Governor Andrew in regard to the debate which he was so ready to assail, I will read from the Globe report what I said on the occasion alluded to by him, which was in answer to some remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN:]

"I spoke of the Army in the aggregate. I do not believe there was a braver class of men ever assembled together in an army than the private soldiers who constitute the grand army of the Potomac. It is my humble judgment that the battle of Gettysburg was the greatest and most heroic victory that ever was won on any battle-field, and it was done by the stubbornness and by the bravery of the soldiers."

Again, on the 24th of February last in another debate on this floor, I said:

"I believe that this army of the Potomac is just as good an army as the army of the West. In some particulars, I am inclined to think it is a better army than the army of the West; but there is one particular in which it falls far short of the army of the West. The western army has had a man at its head who has made that army a unit. There is not a traitor nor a disloyal man in it. There is not a person connected with that army, from General Grant down to the boy who drives a wagon, that is not devotedly attached to this Union and in favor of striking the rebellion the hardest and heaviest blows they can hit it."

Mr. President, I think this is enough to show that Governor Andrew was mistaken respecting what I said of the brave soldiers of New England. I have never entertained any prejudice against New England either as regards her soldiers or her people. I was not born in New England, but my father and mother were; and from them I derived such early impressions as true and faithful New England parents were likely to impart to their children.

But, sir, I did say that I thought the army of the Potomac as an army had not been successful. Will Governor Andrew deny that? Will Governor Andrew stand up in old Faneuil Hall and justify the slaughter of Massachusetts men at Ball's Bluff? Will he stand up before the veteran soldiers whose comrades fell at Ball's Bluff when there were twenty-five thousand men within seven miles of them, and when after Colonel Diven and Colonel Baker had been ordered over the river the men under McCall and Smith were ordered back again though they stood in supporting distance of the men who had been ordered over, and justify that transaction? Will he justify the course of McClellan, who, landing on the Peninsula with one hundred and twenty-six thousand men, sat down before the city of Yorktown and there besieged the works occupied by only eight or ten thousand men, leaving Massachusetts soldiers to dig and to die without winning for the country or themselves that glory which their patriotism demanded, and which their courage upon every battle-field has shown they were willing and able to win? To show that this statement which I make is not overdrawn I will read from the testimony of a late Senator on this floor, Hon. Lemuel J. Bowden, a gentleman whom all here respected, and of whom all were pleased to hear the glowing and honorable eulogy which was pronounced upon him by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY.] Mr. Bowden, in answer to the question, "How many troops did they have at Yorktown when McClellan landed on the Peninsula?" answered:

"Personally I do not know; but I had frequent conversations with the officers and men of the confederate army, and I think the information they gave me was correct. My impression decidedly is that the force under Magruder at the time McClellan advanced upon Yorktown was from eight to ten thousand men."

The Richmond Sentinel published a few days ago, in speaking of the advance of General Sherman, says:

"He aims to march with celerity upon Mobile, trusting that luck will crown his blundering audacity as it did Grant's at Vicksburg."

Sir, what would not this country have gained if McClellan had only had one tithe of Grant's "blundering audacity" at Yorktown!

But again, the vanguard of that army marched up to Williamsburg after the enemy had kept the grand army of the Potomac for a month or more at Yorktown and then abandoned it. After they had been followed up to Williamsburg, and attacked by General Hooker, his corps fought there all day from early dawn until five o'clock at night, with thirty-five thousand men lying idle under the direct command of the commander of the army of the Potomac, and within five miles of General Hooker. Thus that hard-fought battle resulted in nothing, although there was a force under the command of General McClellan eager for the fray, and sufficient to capture and destroy the entire army of the enemy at Williamsburg.

So, again, it went along until the battle of Fair Oaks came on. General McClellan had placed General Casey with forty-five hundred men across the Chickahominy, and had all the residue of his army on the other side of the river. A heavy rain swelled that river, and the enemy with all their force attacked the little division of General Casey. He held his ground stubbornly all day long, and at last General Sumner was enabled to cross to his relief. They attacked, repulsed, and drove back the enemy, and General Hooker marched his corps, as he swears before the committee, within three miles and a half of Richmond. He was then ordered back again to take a position far to the rear of where he advanced. Oh, for one hour then of Grant's "blundering audacity!"

Again, at Malvern Hill, after our forces, as all the reports say, had been fighting battles and winning victories every day and retreating every night, while General McClellan, the commander of this grand army of the Potomac, was lying on a gunboat in the James river, the brave officers and soldiers of that army fought and won a battle, and the enemy were driven in consternation toward Richmond. Oh, for one hour of Grant's "blundering audacity" at that time and at that place!

Again, the army of the Potomac came back to Washington. General Pope was driven with his small force to Bull Run. He had advanced with forty thousand men to meet the whole rebel force, and being overpowered he fought every day upon his retreat, until he arrived at Bull Run. He had then come within supporting distance of the grand army of the Potomac, and I think General Hooker and some others of the army of the Potomac were sent forward. General Sumner and General Franklin, with I suppose about forty thousand men, were retained at Alexandria and at Chain bridge. There again our men were fighting the whole rebel army with about one half of this army of the Potomac. When General Pope sent in for supplies, the answer from the commander of this grand army of the Potomac was substantially this—this is the result of it—"If you will draw your men out of the fight, and send them on to guard the trains you can have provisions." Will Governor Andrew stand up in old Faneuil Hall and justify that?

But, sir, none of these things are owing to a want of patriotism or a want of bravery in the men. Notwithstanding all these discouragements, their patience has been enduring. They have fought and won, while they have been constantly warred against by those in command of them.

But, again, without wearying the Senate or occupying too much time, this army at last followed Lee to Gettysburg. I am told, and I believe it can be proven, that before the fight commenced at Gettysburg, wherein the men of New England and of all the country covered themselves with glory and with honor everlasting, the order went forth from the commander of that army to retreat; and but for the single fact that one of the corps commanders had got into a fight before the dispatch reached him, the whole army would undoubtedly have been retreating, broken, and ineffectual before the powerful forces of General Lee.

But, sir, the battle was fought and won—fought as a battle was never fought, in my judgment, in the world before. Our men fought as soldiers never fought before, and won a victory more honorable and glorious than any victory that Napoleon ever won. What then occurred? After the battle of Gettysburg that army marched down, knee-deep in mud, eager to attack Lee on the banks of the Potomac, and to annihilate him. They could have done it. They wanted to do it. They were thirsting for such a conflict, because they trusted and hoped that it would end this rebellion. They reached the banks of the Potomac, and, according to General Lee's own dispatches, he had but eight rounds of ammunition for his guns. Eight rounds of ammunition—just enough to last four minutes! Oh, for four minutes of Grant's "blundering audacity!" Who believes that Lee's army would have ever crossed the Potomac if the army of the Potomac had had such a general as Grant at its head? And then the rebellion would have ended, and the brave sons of Massachusetts would have been permitted to return to their homes and pursue the peaceful avocations of life. But, sir, it was not so.

Again last fall, just before our elections, General Meade ordered his whole force to the Rapidan and crossed it. He met General Lee in force, probably strongly intrenched; probably he met him in a position where an attack upon him might have been considered rash, and therefore he concluded to withdraw his troops, which I think probably was right; but the disgrace did not end there. He ordered his whole army of seventy-five or eighty thousand men to retreat; Lee followed him over the Rapidan, and with thirty thousand men drove him without firing a gun clear up to the old battle-ground of Bull Run. Comment is unnecessary.

I repeat that this army has not been treated as it should have been treated. It is the most astonishing thing in the world that they should have retained their courage and discipline under all these reverses, under the humiliation and disgrace of being ordered to retreat fifty miles when every soldier knew that that army had the power to fall upon and crush and annihilate the army of the enemy. I think General Meade himself knew it.

I wish to say, with regard to General Meade, that I believe he is a patriotic man. I believe he is as pure a gentleman as there is in the country. I believe he has the honor of his country at heart. I believe that he means and wishes to do his duty; but he has none of that "blundering audacity" of Grant, which will enable him to win battles and to crown his army with glory.

The army of the Potomac is not exclusively an eastern army. A Minnesota regiment fought side by side all through the campaigns of that army with the fifteenth (I think) Massachusetts regiment. I went over the battle-ground of Gettysburg with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, a few days after the battle, and there we saw Minnesota graves and Massachusetts graves side by side upon the line of battle. As we marched toward the intrenchments of the enemy, near to the very foot of the intrenchments, we picked up knapsacks with "fifteenth Massachusetts" written upon them. I remember well that I called the attention of the honorable Senator to it at the time, and how I thought that men who could fight as those men fought were entitled to win more glory and more renown for themselves and their country than they had been permitted to do.

Mr. President, this grand army stands to-day nearly where it stood two years ago. Did I not believe that it might have done vastly more than it has done if it had been properly directed, I would not say one word; but for the honor of those troops, for the honor of our country, for the honor of the brave men who have already fallen to enrich Virginia soil and whose blood has crimsoned almost every rivulet in that State, it is right that the blame of their not having advanced further should fall on the men on whom it should rightfully fall, and the country should know that while this army has not been as successful as the western army, it is not the sons of Massachusetts or of Ohio, or Indiana, or Michigan, or Maine who are to blame, but it is because the army has not been managed as the grand, conquering, victorious army of the West has been managed.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member had confined himself—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will allow the Chair to suggest that there is no question before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the consent of the Senate to say a word or two.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will proceed if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member had contented himself with defending himself against the imputation which he understands has been made upon him by the Governor of Massachusetts, no Senator would have thought it his duty to say a word in reply. Having heard the honorable Senator on the occasion which gave rise to the remarks of the Governor of Massachusetts, I am satisfied that the Governor has misunderstood the course adopted by the member.

But while he deemed it necessary to protect himself against unjust imputations, I wonder it had not occurred to him that perhaps he was offending in the like way by casting imputations upon others. He has stated two things in which the country has an interest, and in regard to which we should all be advised. He has assailed two officers in whom the country heretofore have had confidence, in whom the Executive of the United States has had confidence, in one of whom the Executive still has confidence, we must suppose, for he leaves him in command.

The honorable member has told us—upon what authority I am yet to learn—that when the battle of Malvern Hill was decided upon and fought, the commander of the army was safely on board a gunboat in the river. I ask the honorable member for the authority upon which he speaks. No matter what it is, no matter what may be the quarter from which the information is derived, the fact is unquestionably otherwise. General McClellan was at Malvern Hill, assisted in selecting the site, was present when the battle was fought, not in the advance, for a general never is, but a spectator of the whole scene, and directing as far as it was proper to direct the movements of the corps engaged in that battle—a battle, too, that covered not only the army of the Potomac with glory, but added glory to the military renown of the United States.

He has also stated—and in relation to that statement likewise I think we are entitled to the authority upon which he has made it—that the commander of the same army previous to the battle of Gettysburg ordered a retreat. There is nothing on file in the Department of War, nothing has been communicated from that Department or by the President of the United States, or by any corps commander as far as we know, that any such order was given; and, independent of any express authority to show that any such order was issued, all the circumstances prove almost the impossibility of the assertion. When General Hooker was removed from the command of the army only a few days before the battle of Gettysburg, and General Meade by the President of the United States put at its head, he marched with a celerity unexampled, and fought the battle even sooner than the public had reason to believe it could be fought with anything like safety, and every military man who has spoken on the subject, as far as I am advised, from that day to this, (unless the honorable member be an exception and he be a military man, of which I have no particular knowledge,) has spoken of that battle as one of the best that ever has been fought, both as regards the bravery of the men engaged and the skill of the leader.

Mr. President, at this period it is, and I submit it to the honorable member, exceedingly inappropriate and impolitic to be assailing the leaders of our armies. They peril life; they peril reputation. The honorable member from time to time has told us that the black soldiers who have been enlisted in the service of the United States are to be paid not only by a gift of freedom to them, but by the same pay that we give to the white soldiers, because they are periling life in defense of the country. The men who lead our armies, devoting themselves day and night to the service of their country, anxious to carry its flag wherever it can be carried successfully and to put down this rebellion, are on the floor of the Senate charged either with gross ignorance or with some crime, if ignorance be a crime, worse than ignorance.

And the honorable member tells us that this might have been done and that might have been done, and he places himself, in relation to some of the matters which he thinks could have been accomplished, upon the authority of General Hooker. I am the last man to call in question the gallantry of General Hooker and his ability to lead a corps or to lead a division, but I am yet to be advised by anything that has happened in the course of this war that he is capable of commanding the army with more skill and success than either McClellan or Meade. He was placed in the command of the army, the unrestricted command of the army, an army not in the condition in which McClellan was obliged to lead his, but an army in as fine condition as ever were placed under the command of any chief, and what was the result? A movement, however skillfully conducted in the beginning, resulting in a lamentable failure. I suppose it could not be avoided, and I repeat that I am not here for the purpose of challenging in any acrimonious spirit the skill or the gallantry of General Hooker; but it is proper to say in this connection that in the testimony which he gave before the committee on the conduct of the war, he almost said in words that if he had been in the command of the army when McClellan was, Richmond would now have been in our hands. I have no doubt he thought so; but judging of what might have been the result if he had been in command by what was the result when he got to be in command of the army, the country would have found that that would not have been the result.

Now, the honorable member assails, and not for the first time, the army of the Potomac; not upon the ground of any want of valor or of loyalty in the materials of which the army is composed, but upon the ground of the inefficiency of its officers; and he tells the Senate and tells the country that it has literally done nothing. The honorable member closes his eye to what has happened during the last two years. Done nothing? The North has been saved twice from having this battle for the safety of the nation carried on within her own limits; and upon the last occasion when Meade so gallantly and successfully commanded the army, if there had been a failure Philadelphia would have been in the possession of the enemy in less than ten days, and that done the confederacy would have been recognized.

But is that all? Maryland was invaded, Pennsylvania was invaded; the disheartened and demoralized army who fled from Virginia, dispirited and desponding, were placed by the President of the United States under the command of General McClellan, and the result was instantaneous; demoralization ceased, order commenced, confidence in the chief began, and the confidence continued until the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, and the result of those battles was that Lee was driven across the Potomac bootless to his home and we were again saved—if not Philadelphia, Maryland was saved, Baltimore was saved. And what would have been the condition of the country if the enemy had got possession of Baltimore? What would have been the condition of this capital? What would have been the plight in which the honorable member himself, in common with his associates in this Chamber, would have found himself? Obligated to fly, fly for safety, abandon the seat of Government; and that done, it requires no prophet to say that the confederacy would have been recognized by both England and France; and that done, although I have as much confidence in the ability and power of the United States as any man living, I should almost have despaired of the fate of the nation.

When, therefore, gentlemen tell us—and the honorable member has told it more than once—that the army of the Potomac has failed, they go in opposition to the history of the day. It has not done all that was expected, but it has saved the city of Washington, it has saved the credit and honor of the Government, it has saved the North, it has saved the State from which I come.

But, sir, the army of the Potomac has not always been under the command of either McClellan, or Hooker, or Meade. McClellan, while on a march and apparently about to meet the enemy, and with every confidence existing in his own mind and in the minds of his corps officers of success, was taken from the command without a moment's notice, and the army placed under the command of General Burnside, a gallant soldier, a brave man, a patriotic man, in whose heart there exists an undying devotion to the Union; but we all know what the result was. He crossed the river which had divided the two armies, and with what a fearful loss! How did we suffer by that failure; how in our own eyes, how in the eyes of Europe! Burnside's defeat and Hooker's defeat nearly lost us the confidence which had in a great measure been before reposed in the ability of the United States by the Governments of Europe.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. The report of General Burnside has not been printed; but I desire to state to the Senate and to the country my opinion, based upon some knowledge of facts, a portion of which are in the possession of Senators around me and some not, that when all the facts of that campaign are known it will be evident to every one that the movement of General Burnside was well conceived, well planned, and that its failure was owing entirely to the disobedience of officers high in command. I appeal to the chairman of the committee on the conduct of the war if that statement is not correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. That, I have no doubt, is the impression of General Burnside; and I am not here to say whether he is right or wrong about it; but then it will be recollected that General Burnside, in the estimation of the world, is no better a soldier than the corps commander with whom he finds fault.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not stand here to assail any man; but I desire to protect, at least so far as this declaration will protect, the reputation of General Burnside; and I ask my friend from Ohio if the statement I have made is not borne out by his opinion, based upon the testimony before him.

Mr. WADE. I am very unwilling to be dragged into this debate at this time. I have very strong opinions, derived from the testimony of witnesses who ought to know the facts, upon all the points which are now raised here. I am not a military man, and it would be very presumptuous in me to volunteer an opinion on such a subject, except what is derived from officers that ought to know the facts. I do believe that the battle of Fredericksburg was lost through the disobedience of officers in high command that did not carry out the orders of General Burnside. I attribute that entire defeat to that circumstance, because I derive my information from officers high in command who were there, and they make it exceedingly plain to a man who is not a military man when they go on to explain how it was. I could give their evidence on the point; but I think it is not necessary to go into that here.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree with the honorable member from Ohio that it is not necessary. The honorable member from Rhode Island is very much mistaken if he supposes that I intend to cast the slightest imputation on General Burnside. I have as high an opinion of General Burnside as he can have, and would be as unwilling (even if I could be induced to do it) to assail General Burnside as the honorable member from Rhode Island. I do not know who were the particular corps commanders, or whether they were corps commanders, who are said to have disobeyed the orders of General Burnside. I recollect having read a defense of himself by one of his corps commanders, General Franklin, and if his statements of fact were true, there was no disobedience of orders as far as I am capable of judging, and that is a capability no greater than the honorable Senator from Ohio claims for himself. I thought General Franklin made a very good case of it.

But I did not mean to say that there was any blame to be attached to anybody. What I protest against is that we should be found here from time to time assailing our officers. For the soul of me, I cannot imagine what good to the country is to result from it. But when the honorable member from Minnesota thinks proper to assail these several commanders, I wonder it does not occur to him that each one of them has acted but a subordinate part. Had McClellan the direction of his campaign, or the President of the United States? Was McClellan given all the troops that he thought to be necessary for the campaign, or was a portion of the troops originally promised him taken from him, and if taken from him taken by whom? By the President of the United States. Who placed Burnside in command and removed McClellan from it? The President of the United States. Who placed Hooker in command, one of the officers whom General Burnside, that stands so high in the estimation of the honorable member from Rhode Island, thought ought to be dismissed the service because, as he alleged, he had disobeyed his orders? The President of the United States. Who visited the Army from time to time for the purpose of directing its movements? The President of the United States. Where did the several commanders from time to time go when they were not visited by the President, for the purpose of getting orders? To Washington, seeking interviews with the President of the United States, and taking and following out his orders.

The honorable member from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] the other day said, and said truly, that when gentlemen charged disasters to the army of the Potomac, and, as one of them was understood, charged them to the army of the Potomac because of the inefficiency of the army itself, its rank and file, they should recollect, and he reminded the member from Minnesota to bear in mind when he drew a comparison between the eastern and western troops, that the man who managed the army of the Potomac was a western man, and that man the President of the United States.

It has become a common saying throughout the country (whether justly or not it is not for me to say) that the army of the Potomac has been successful or unsuccessful just as it has been left to the management of its leader; in proportion as it gets out of the influence of the Executive and stands upon its own resources, so is it triumphant; but immediately it comes within the hands of the President—hands I have no doubt honestly and patriotically used, but he is no more of a soldier than either of us—then from some cause or other there is disaster. What have we now, carrying distress to hundreds and hundreds of households? A loss in Florida of from ten to twelve hundred men, a defeat not disgraceful to the men concerned, but apparently disgraceful to those who planned the expedition. Who planned it? Not McClellan, not Meade, not Hooker, not Burnside, not Gillmore. Who then?

Mr. WILSON. Can the Senator tell us who did?

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot, but I am sure who did not. We all know what the result is, and we all deplore it. The men were gallant. Gillmore was supposed to be a successful leader. But yet there is a defeat. Who suggested the campaign, I am as ignorant as the member from Massachusetts, if he is ignorant; but the public suppose, and if they are in error that error should be corrected, that it was planned here, and charge the defeat to the Executive, whether justly or not I do not know. I do not suppose that the President of the United States would have ordered a campaign of that description unless he had been supported by high military authority; but whether he was or was not, one thing is certain, it had not the support of the officers whom the honorable member from Minnesota has thought proper to impeach.

I have said all, Mr. President, that I rose to say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Maryland in his remarks just now alluded to the fact that I reminded the Senator from Minnesota the other day that the President was a western man, and that he was in command of the Army. I made no imputation whatever on the President in reference to any interference or any attempt to command the Army, because I knew nothing of that. I alluded to the fact that he appointed the officers and they were under his eye, and such officers as they were he was responsible for.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly; so I understood.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into this subject now, though I may at some time give my views upon it as derived from testimony. The Senator from Maryland, however, has charged the President, I think unjustly, with the responsibility of the plan of the peninsular campaign. I think that if the President's plan had been adhered to by General McClellan there would have been no particular trouble. Before the President of the United States would permit General McClellan to follow the plan of a campaign on the Peninsula, he made it a condition precedent that General McClellan should consult with all his division commanders, I believe twelve in number, and that he should have their unanimous opinion as to the number of troops it would be necessary to leave here for the defense of Washington, and that he should leave such a number as would be sufficient in the opinion of all the division commanders, and that unless he did so he was not to go.

He had not the opinion of more than eight of those commanders; and, in direct violation of the condition prescribed by the President, he went to the Peninsula without leaving here the troops that the division commanders were of opinion should be left. He had hardly reached Yorktown before he was crying out for more soldiers, though he had so many then that, I may say, he did not know what to do with them; he did not land them all. As has already been stated, he had more than one hundred and twenty thousand to encounter seven or eight thousand miserably entrenched in mud fortifications that were of no consequence; but I am not going into that.

He continued to call for troops. He called for McDowell's corps, when he knew as well as we knew here that there was a large rebel force under Jackson in front of Washington. If the President had yielded to his demands, Washington must have fallen without resistance into the hands of the enemy who had a force in front of it.

The objection of the President to permitting him to go to the Peninsula was that it would inevitably lead to a division of our army. You could not march to Richmond by way of the Peninsula without leaving the capital entirely uncovered to the rebel force that was lurking about here northwest of the city; therefore the President made that a condition, and McClellan knew it well enough when he was calling for troops. He had his selection of the troops, and he left but about fifteen thousand here when he should have left forty thousand.

I say then that it was not the fault of the President that he went to the Peninsula. He went against the President's orders and without complying with the condition on which the President permitted him to go; and therefore the President is justified. McClellan had no right to call for additional troops, and he knew it. He knew that they could not be spared to him. As a military man he could not help knowing it. What would have been our condition if the President had yielded to his request and sent McDowell's corps to Richmond? As I said before, the capital would have been overrun without resistance. That is all I wish to say now, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I have listened to this debate with a great deal of regret. On the one side officers are criticised and censured, and on the other side the Government is held responsible for our misfortunes, and between the two it seems to me the country suffers. I doubt the wisdom of undertaking on this floor to criticise the movements of our armies in the field, or to hold the Government responsible for our defeats, unless we have conclusive evidence of the interference of the Government with the plans of Army commanders.

The Senator from Minnesota makes a personal explanation in reference to remarks made by the Governor of Massachusetts. It may be that the Governor of Massachusetts should not have said what he did say in Faneuil Hall on the evidence furnished by telegraphic dispatches; but the Senator knows full well that Governors and presses and people criticise our words and acts here, and criticise them sharply, upon evidence furnished by telegraphic dispatches. The Senator from Maine says, in an under-tone, "That ought not to be so."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say that they ought not to do it on such dispatches. I accord them the largest liberty of criticism.

Mr. WILSON. I agree with the Senator that we ought all to be careful how we criticise any body of men or any man in the country upon the mere evidence of brief telegraphic dispatches. But, sir, all of us know that the people of this country see very little of what we do here except from brief telegraphic dispatches. Those dispatches go to the country daily. The Globe goes along in the mails afterwards, and is read by few of the people and by very few even of the conductors of the public journals. The country to-day judges of us, and of our acts and of our words, by the dispatches that go to the associated press and by the correspondence of the leading journals. It is our misfortune; we cannot help it; and it is impossible for those who send the telegraphic dispatches always to give to their readers an accurate idea of what is said and done here.

In saying this I do not wish to find fault with the reports that go out from this body by telegraph. Considering their brevity, they are as good as we have reason to expect them to be; but I say to the Senator from Minnesota we may complain of it as much as we please, the public journals of the country, the public men of the country, the people of the country will daily pass upon our words and acts here upon the telegraphic dispatches that daily go to the country, and we cannot avoid it. It seems to me, therefore, we had all of us better bear what we cannot help as best we can.

I find, sir, one thing to be true, and it has been true throughout the war, that when we win victories the victories are claimed by the officers commanding in the field, but when misfortunes and defeats come upon us, the public judgment of the country is apt to throw the blame upon the Government. I think sometimes that tendency is encouraged by defeated military men who wish, in order to relieve themselves, to put the blame upon the Government, to charge it upon the interference of the President, the Secretary of War, or General Halleck. I know that has been done in some cases where facts subsequently disclosed to the public showed that the President, the Secretary of War, and the General-in-Chief of the Army did not interfere, but that the advice they gave was not followed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Maryland that nothing can be more unprofitable than to assail upon this floor the conduct of our generals. I never do it; I am not a military critic; and if I were I should not exert my powers in that way; but since this question has been raised, I think it is but simple justice to General Burnside to read a little from the testimony taken before the committee on the conduct of the war touching upon the point to which the Senator from Maryland has alluded. This is the testimony of General Meade, who commanded a division in the first Army corps under General Franklin:

"Question. What number of men did General Franklin have under him there?"

"Answer. I am not able to state positively. He had his own grand division, consisting of two corps, which I suppose amounted to very nearly forty thousand men; and he had additional troops sent to him, probably to the extent of fifteen or twenty thousand men. I should say that he had from fifty-five to sixty thousand men altogether under his command. That is as near as I can judge; I am not able to state positively.

"Question. With what number was the attack made upon the enemy's lines?

"Answer. I estimate my division in my official report to have been about forty-five hundred. The division of General Gibbon on my right might have amounted to six or seven thousand. And the portion of General Birney's division that came up in my rear might have had from four to five thousand men.

"Question. How many troops actually advanced to the attack?

"Answer. The actual attack, as contemplated, was made probably by, at the outside, ten thousand men; that is, forty-five hundred men in my division, and I think General Gibbon's was probably something over five thousand men.

"Question. What was the success of this attacking column?

"Answer. My division succeeded in driving the enemy from all their advanced works, breaking through their lines, and occupying the heights they had occupied; piercing their lines entirely, and getting into the presence of their reserves.

"Question. How strongly were you supported at the time you pierced their lines and got into the presence of their reserves?

"Answer. The division on my right—General Gibbon's division—which I had understood was to have advanced simultaneously with my own, did not advance until I was driven back. It advanced until it came within short range of the enemy, when it halted. The officers could not get the men forward to a charge, and the division was held at bay there some twenty or thirty minutes, during which time my division had gone forward. That delay enabled the enemy to concentrate their forces and attack me on my front and both flanks. I had penetrated the enemy's lines so far that I had no support on either flank, and was, therefore, forced to fall back; as I came out General Gibbon's forces advanced, and got as far probably as the railroad, which was the enemy's outer line. The enemy were posted on the ridge, and the railroad ran along at the foot of the ridge.

"Question. And you finally failed in the object of the attack?

"Answer. We were repulsed after that success.

"Question. To what do you attribute that failure and your repulse?

"Answer. It was owing to the fact that, from inferiority of numbers, we were unable to hold what I had gained.

"Question. Had you been promptly supported by all the disposable force of General Franklin, what, in your judgment, would have been the result?

"Answer. I think if we had been supported by an advance of the whole line, there is every reason to believe that we could have held the ground.

"Question. And if you had held your ground, you would have broken their line?

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. And what would have been the effect of that upon the enemy?

"Answer. I should judge that the effect would have been to have produced the evacuation of the other line of their works in the rear of Fredericksburg; that is, had we driven them back on our front, the left, and held the position."

EXPEDITION TO FLORIDA.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire now to present a resolution which I intended to submit yesterday, but was prevented from presenting by the fact that the Senate went to other business. I desire to present it now, because the subject to which the resolution refers has been alluded to in the debate that has just closed. A very great deal of interest is felt in the country now touching the recent expedition to Florida, which in some respects, to say the least, resulted so disastrously to the Army of the country. Whether the responsibility be upon the President, the Secretary of War, the General-in-Chief, or the general who commanded the expedition in Florida, it is now important to know, because reasons are attributed to the author of the movement, whoever he may be, not calculated to promote the confidence of the country in the operations of the Government. I therefore offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the joint committee on the conduct of the war be directed to inquire into the causes of and circumstances attending the recent military expedition into Florida; with whom the expedition originated; for what purpose it was undertaken; and what were its results; and that the committee be instructed to report at as early a day as practicable.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 140) to provide for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863; and it was signed by the Vice President.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution "that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments to House bill No. 122, to increase the internal revenue and for other purposes, and that the House request of the Senate another conference between the committees of conference on the said bill; and it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House that in the adjustment of differences between the two Houses on the said bill there should be an additional duty of not less than twenty nor more than forty cents per gallon imposed on spirits on hand for sale."

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had appointed Mr. RUFUS P. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. JOHN A. KASSON of Iowa, and Mr. JOHN L. DAWSON, managers at the proposed conference on its part.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the message and resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the conference requested by the House of Representatives be agreed to, and that the conferees heretofore appointed by the Senate be instructed to agree to proper amendments to the Senate amendments disagreed to by the House, providing for a tax of not exceeding twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand for sale.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the Chair whether that is a parliamentary mode of proceeding. My understanding of a free conference is, that the persons appointed to conduct it may agree to make such an arrangement of the disagreeing votes as they think best. At any rate, I have never in parliamentary history read of an instance where a committee of conference were sent out instructed on the part of the body they represented to take a particular line of action in reference to the legislation they were to agree to. I should like to know if there is any precedent for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not examined for precedents; but I think there can be no doubt of the power of the Senate to instruct its conferees on any point. It is a question of discretion. Ordinarily it would not be done; but there have been two conferences on this disagreement, which has all grown out of one difference. The House of Representatives have now expressed their opinion on that difference, and I think the Senate ought also to do so.

The identical proposition now before the Senate has never been discussed or acted upon here in the words in which it is presented, or even in substance as it is now presented. I consider it therefore important to take the sense of the Senate on the question whether they will acquiesce in a tax of twenty cents a gallon on the spirits on hand. If that is agreed to by the Senate, there will be no difficulty in bringing about an agreement on the whole bill between the two Houses; but if the Senate conferees carry out the expressed wishes of the Senate heretofore not to agree to any tax upon spirits on hand, as a matter of course there can be no agreement, and it is scarcely worth while to provide for another meeting of the conferees. I do not wish now to discuss the main question, unless other Senators do, because it is perfectly familiar.

Mr. GRIMES. Had you not better strike out the twenty cents and leave the amount of the tax open?

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to say not exceeding twenty cents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine raise a question of order?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; I intended to raise the question in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can have no doubt that the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio is in order. Conferences are of two characters, free and simple. A free conference is that which leaves the committee of conference entirely free to pass upon any subject where the two branches have disagreed in their votes, not however including any action upon any subject where there has been a concurrent vote of both branches. A simple conference—perhaps it should more properly be termed a strict or a specific conference, though the parliamentary term is "simple"—is that which confines the committee of conference to the specific instructions of the body appointing it. The Chair therefore rules that the resolution is in order.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to inquire whether the instructions which this resolution proposes to give to the committee do not introduce into the bill a feature which is new, and which changes the character of the bill as agreed to both by this and the other House?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will reply to the Senator from Connecticut that upon that question there was a difference of opinion in the committee of conference. The House of Representatives, in the bill as it was originally passed by that House, proposed to impose a tax of forty cents a gallon upon spirits on hand. The Senate struck out that tax and made various other amendments to the bill. The bill went back to the House of Representatives, and that House agreed to strike out the tax of forty cents upon spirits on hand, but disagreed to the Senate's other amendments. The conferees on the part of the House proposed to amend those Senate amendments by adding a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon spirits on hand. I do not see any parliamentary difficulty in the way of accomplishing that if the Senate are willing to acquiesce in an amendment to their amendments.

There are disagreeing votes on two amendments between the two Houses, to either of which, in my judgment, an amendment proposing a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon spirits on hand might be added according to parliamentary rules; but all difficulty on that point will be obviated by the instructions of the two Houses. The Senate might very properly object to any action by the Senate conferees which was not strictly within the parliamentary rule; but the Senate itself may, by its instructions, enlarge the power of the committee. There is no doubt about that. There is no limit to the power of the Senate over its committees. It may authorize its conferees to agree to amendments to its amendments, which might not be in order if those amendments to the amendments came directly from the conferees without the action of the Senate. That is the view all the conferees took, although they differed on the question of parliamentary law.

I say again the simple question I wish to present by this instruction is, whether the Senate is willing to acquiesce in a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon spirits on hand. That subject I do not propose to debate unless other Senators engage in it.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand then that it is as I supposed: the Senate objecting to a tax on spirits on hand as proposed by the House of Representatives, sent the bill back to the House of Representatives, and that House agreed with the Senate in striking that feature from the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. A tax of forty cents.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, the House of Representatives proposed a tax of forty cents; we objected to it and struck it out, and the House agreed to striking it out. So then that feature was not in the bill. We disagreed on other matters. Now it is proposed to introduce into the bill a change of a feature which has been agreed to by both Houses, which the honorable Senator and many others here on former occasions have insisted could not be done. The Senator now suggests that, although the committee cannot do it, the Senate can do it by instructing the committee, and then the committee can do it. A committee once undertook to do that and asked the Senate to ratify it, and it was claimed that they could not ratify it, that the Senate had not the power to ratify it; but now it is claimed that we can authorize a committee to do that which if they had done we could not ratify.

Mr. President, I do not believe that, and I do not believe, therefore, that the honorable Senator is right, taking into view the previous decisions of the Senate upon this principle.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate will allow me to make an additional statement. Growing out of the rules of the House of Representatives, when a bill goes back to the House of Representatives with amendments of the Senate it is usual to call the previous question upon the pending amendments. That previous question extends to all the amendments. The question came up; the House of Representatives was willing to agree to strike out the tax of forty cents a gallon, and expressed that willingness by a very close vote; but it was not within its power according to the rules of the House to move to amend the Senate amendment, so that the proposition to put a tax of twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand could not under the rules of the House be in order, and was never submitted to the House until the question was taken there yesterday on these instructions.

The Senator's reasoning might have been correct if the House of Representatives had passed upon the identical proposition now before the two Houses. Then it would not be right to go back and reconsider that question. But the House of Representatives simply agreed to the Senate's proposition to strike out the tax of forty cents upon spirits on hand. That is all they agreed to. That is all their action. By their rules they were precluded from passing upon the question of imposing a tax of twenty cents a gallon, because they could not amend the Senate's amendments in the stage in which the bill was when it came up in that House.

I think it was the misfortune of the rules of the House that they could not amend the Senate's amendment. That would have presented the question fairly; but their rules precluded that; and now the only question is whether, to avoid the defeat of this bill, we are willing to allow the question to be taken upon a tax of twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand.

I ought to explain further that if the Senate reject this proposition, the conferees on the part of the Senate as a matter of course will be compelled to adhere to the position of the Senate. Then the only question will be, will the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement, or shall the bill be lost?

Mr. CONNESS. Permit me to ask—

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to ask a question right at this point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will not interpose, but will allow me to conclude. If the House of Representatives recede, as a matter of course the bill will be passed precisely as it was passed by the Senate; but if the House should disagree, and should insist upon some amendment to the Senate amendments, then the bill will be lost. The effect of that the Senate will see. The Government will lose all the revenue from the enormous quantity of whisky that is now being manufactured every day, and before this subject can be brought up in a new bill, or as part of the revenue bill now pending in the other House, I may safely say that not less than two months time will be consumed, and within these two months the manufacturers of whisky can manufacture not less than twenty million gallons, yes, thirty million gallons. The effect of the long delay growing out of this disagreement between the two Houses has been to lose to the Government more, I think, than will be derived from the tax on spirits on hand.

Now my object is simply to get rid of the controversy if we can. I think a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon spirits on hand can be justified, but I do not want to enter into that argument. I think we had better acquiesce in it and advise the tax. It makes it moderate on those who hold spirits, and we want the money very much.

Mr. CONNESS. I desired to ask the Senator from Ohio whether, if we refuse to give the instructions now proposed by him, it will not be competent for the House of Representatives to reconsider the instructions that they have given to their committee, and then allow it to be a committee of free conference again. I understand the Senator to assent to that proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CONNESS. Then we are not presented with the alternative alone of either giving the instructions in the shape the Senator proposes or losing the entire bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will observe that I did not say so. I said we present the alternative of either losing the bill or the House of Representatives receding.

Mr. CONNESS. Receding from their instructions. I understand the Senator to state that the bill would be lost unless the other House receded from the former vote that they had taken—not the vote upon the instructions to the committee. But, sir, I did not rise to find an inconsistency in the Senator's statement, but to be able to show that by appointing a third committee of free conference, which I think is our proper course, the alternative will then be presented to the House of Representatives to recede from the instructions they have given to their committee and let there again be a free conference between the committees of both Houses.

I do not desire to discuss now the question of the propriety of imposing a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon the stock on hand, and yet I will say that it is my deliberate conviction that if we authorize a tax of twenty cents upon the stock on hand in the country, we shall so have to increase our collectors and assessors throughout the land that we shall excite and make an enemy of every man in the country that has a barrel of whisky on hand as to make it the most unprofitable effort to raise revenue that this Government has ever engaged in. The matter has been very fully considered by the Finance Committee of this body, and I will say that when I went into the room of that committee it appeared entirely just to my mind to apply this tax to the stock on hand; it seemed to me that no injustice could occur to any party if on a given day an equal sum was affixed as a tax on all the whisky in the country. But after a full deliberation there, not founded upon the testimony presented by interested parties, as has been stated by the press—I trust I shall be pardoned for alluding to that—but upon a full and complete investigation, as patient, I think, as ever was made, the committee were nearly unanimous in the opinion that the Government would be a loser and not a gainer by undertaking to impose a tax upon the whisky on hand.

The position of the Senate would have been accorded to by the House of Representatives but for a persistence there that I will not undertake to speak of. I am now informed, however, by intelligent and able gentlemen of that body that in their opinion the proposition of the Senate will be acquiesced in if the question be submitted again to that House. I hope, in view of the importance of the question, that the Senate will not vote to give the instructions presented and asked for by the Senator from Ohio, but that we shall refuse them and then proceed to appoint a third committee of free conference, and let the question go to the House of Representatives as to whether they will not recede from the position of instructing their committee. Though it may be legitimate and parliamentary to instruct committees of conference, it certainly is not the best course of procedure, and I hope we shall not take it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from California makes one remark which had weight with me yesterday. He says now what he has said before, that the House of Representatives would recede from its disagreement; and for the purpose of enabling that House to recede so that the bill might be passed, I yesterday withdrew this resolution of instructions, and the bill was sent to the other House unembarrassed by any action on the part of the Senate, in compliance with the suggestion of the Senator from California and other Senators. It was there taken up, and a motion was made by a colleague of mine that the House should recede from its disagreement to our amendments, and that proposition was negatived by a vote of 53 yeas to 78 nays—a majority of twenty-five against the House receding. Then the question came up on agreeing to the instructions which have been read, and the vote was 76 yeas to 67 nays.

Mr. CONNESS. A difference of nine votes.

Mr. SHERMAN. A difference of nine votes on the second question.

Mr. CONNESS. On the instructions.

Mr. SHERMAN. But there was a majority of twenty-five against receding, which in the popular branch is a very large majority. We have no means of knowing the action of the House of Representatives except through its votes. A member of that House may say to Senators that the House will do so and so, but we can only judge of the action of the House by its votes.

The question of a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon spirits on hand has never been discussed in the Senate thoroughly. When the bill was pending, and was near its passage, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] moved to recommit it to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to report a tax of twenty cents. Although I have always been in favor of putting a moderate tax upon the whisky on hand—twenty cents was about what I considered just—I voted for the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin with some doubt, because I did not wish the bill recommitted to the Committee on Finance with instructions; I preferred that it should go back to the other House. But we have never considered the question of the propriety of levying this tax, and it has never been discussed in this body.

I will say now but one word in regard to this tax. I agree with the Senator from California that a tax on the spirits on hand would be unjust, unless we proposed to raise the value of the article on hand by our legislation. By our proposed legislation we add to the value of spirits on hand forty cents a gallon; so that the price of the article on hand at the time this bill was introduced has advanced forty cents a gallon. The question occurs to me, is it not right that the Government by a system of taxation should at least share this increased value conferred by our act upon this article? I say there is no impropriety in it. The tax of forty cents on spirits on hand was unjust, because the cost of this article was very much added to by our proposed legislation; but a tax of twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand would not be unjust, because it only divides with the holder the profit that he derives from the act of the Government.

In the argument the other day, when this subject was before the Senate, one Senator—I think it was the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON]—said it was unjust for the Government to levy taxation on benefits conferred by itself. Why, sir, we do it always. In every act chartering a railroad company we provide that certain special benefits shall be deducted from the damages sustained by the land owners. When we authorize a railroad company to enter on the land of an individual and to take his land, we deny to that company the right to offset general benefits, the benefits which were conferred only upon this citizen like all others; but if special benefits are conferred on the owner of the land, as by draining his swamp or by locating a town upon it, or locating improvements upon it, we authorize that benefit to be deducted from the injury. That is precisely the nature and character of this tax. We by our act confer upon the holders of this article an actual cash value of forty cents a gallon. We propose, in the form of taxation, to take, to enable us to carry on the operations of the Government, one half of that increased value.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me a word, to spare further discussion on this point?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I admit that there is justice in the abstract proposition as now stated by the Senator from Ohio; but the fact is not as stated by the Senator from Ohio. It is not true that this commodity remains in the hands of a single party or particular parties while the advance is obtained; but, on the contrary, it is constantly changing hands. It is constantly enhancing in value under the prospect of additional taxes by us, and it is simply impossible for the Government to divide that profit with any holder. Each subsequent holder, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS], pays an additional price. That is my reply to the Senator on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me the answer to that is obvious. The Senator says that people buy and sell this commodity pending our legislation. If they buy they take all the risk of our legislation. They have no right to assume because a bill is introduced in either House to impose a tax of forty cents a gallon on spirits in the future that that will become a law. They take that risk; and I repeat that these persons dealing in spirits will make large sums of money by our proposed taxation. Some few of them may lose the benefit of speculation; but, taking them as a whole, they will make more money by our legislation than any other class of our citizens, because we have added to the value of their article fully forty cents, and we only propose to take in the form of taxation twenty cents. But I will not discuss this matter further. The arguments pro and con. are obvious; and I do not wish to detain the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. CARLILE rose.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to offer an amendment, and then I will give way to the Senator.

Mr. CARLILE. I wish also to offer an amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I will withdraw mine if it will not suit you.

Mr. CARLILE. If it is in order I will submit a motion that the Senate agree to the amendments to the bill as made by the House after it had gone there from this body.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Secretary read the amendment that I propose?

The Secretary read the amendment, to strike out all of the resolution after the word "resolved," and to insert:

That the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday's date, proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNESS. That will meet the case.

Mr. CARLILE. I should prefer the motion that I have submitted. It has been stated in this discussion that the delay already in acting upon this bill has lost to the Treasury a considerable amount that would have been placed there by taxation upon this article of whisky, if this bill had been enacted into a law when it first came to this body.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me say one thing to the Senator. If we agree to the bill in the shape in which it came back to us from the House, the result will be that we shall have a tax of sixty cents from now until the 1st of July, and after that time it will go back to twenty cents, and remain there.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not only that: the tax still exists on spirits imported into this country, and not on those manufactured here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is my construction. That is the view I take as to what the effect would probably be.

Mr. CARLILE. In answer to that it might be replied that that could be remedied by subsequent legislation; but before I would consent to do an act of injustice, as I think would be done by the Congress of the United States if they should tax the article on hand after it has paid a tax under the law as it now exists, I would allow the bill to fail entirely, and allow this question as to the tax to be placed on whisky to come up for consideration in connection with the other subjects of taxation when we consider the revenue bill. I will withdraw my motion, and allow the Senator from California to present his amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I will simply say that I agree entirely in what was last stated by the Senator. I prefer that this bill should fail than that we should agree to the demand of the House of Representatives at the present time, and then take up the question and legislate upon it at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia withdraw his motion?

Mr. CARLILE. Yes, sir; I withdraw it to allow the amendment of the Senator from California to be presented.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear that amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday's date proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California is understood to move to amend the proposition of the Senator from Ohio by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting what has been read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the Senate will not agree to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. Such legislation as he proposes would operate very disastrously to a large interest that I am required to represent in connection with my distinguished colleague in this body. I agree with the decision of the President of the Senate that it is competent to instruct a committee of conference on the part of the Senate; but I submit whether the particular instruction proposed in this case is within the power of the Senate. What subject goes to a committee of conference? Not the whole bill, but only the questions in difference between the two Houses. Now what are those questions? Three and only three, neither of which relates to a tax on the article manufactured in this country now on hand. There is a disagreement between the two Houses in respect to the proposed increase after July and January next. There is a disagreement between the two Houses in respect to the tax proposed to be imposed upon that in the market which has been imported from foreign countries; but there is no disagreement touching the proposition to tax whisky manufactured in the country and which is on hand.

I will ask the attention of the Senate to this fact: that the bill as it came to the Senate from the House proposed a tax upon three articles: first, whisky to be manufactured; secondly, whisky manufactured in the country and now on hand; and, thirdly, liquors imported from foreign countries and now in our markets. The House and the Senate have agreed to the tax now to be imposed at sixty cents upon the article hereafter to be manufactured. The House and the Senate have disagreed as to the tax upon the article brought into the country from foreign countries and now on hand; but the House and Senate have both agreed not to tax that which is produced in the country and now on hand. The Senate struck out this provision of the House bill:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864, except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law approved July 1, 1862, shall not bear more than the additional or increased tax proposed by this act.

The Senate struck that provision out of the House bill. That amendment went to the House and the House concurred in the amendment of the Senate. The House agreed that that tax should not be imposed, and the two bodies stand concurring, not disagreeing, upon the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. I know he says that he proposes a tax of twenty cents and that this was a tax of forty cents on the article in market; but the Senate decided by its vote, on the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] and on the proposition in the bill, not to tax the stock on hand at all. That was the decision of the Senate. That decision of the Senate went to the House, and the House concurred in it; but the House refused to concur in two other propositions. Now I want to know—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to ask my honorable friend if he does not know that practically the House of Representatives do not concur in that amendment, and that the vote of the House on the subject of these very instructions shows that the opinion of the House is that the tax should be levied. Therefore it is the same as if it still stood in the bill, and there was a disagreement between the House and the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should be happy had the Senator from Wisconsin not asked me any question which would require me to explain the conduct of the House. I am sure he will find himself embarrassed if he should undertake that work. The course of the House in respect to this matter has been extremely strange, and such as not to demand of the Senate to abandon a principle that it has asserted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend will allow me, I do not think it necessary for me to say anything on the subject of the conduct of the House by way of justification or by way of impeachment, but I think it is very susceptible of explanation. The House, as I understand, by a very decided vote determined in the first instance to impose this tax upon whisky on hand when the bill originally passed. It came to the Senate. Certain amendments were made here. It went back to the House, and under the operation of their previous question, which takes everything, at a moment and with hardly any discussion, it is probable, as the gentleman states, that at first there was a concurrence.

Mr. SHERMAN. In striking out the tax of forty cents.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; but subsequently there has been a determination on the part of the House, as I understand, to insist on a tax on this liquor on hand to a certain extent, between twenty and forty cents a gallon. I will say to my honorable friends here the practical question is this: whether we shall come to it now, or kill this bill and come to it three weeks hence. That is the practical question before Congress.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Permit me to ask the Senator a question. Did not the very member of the House of Representatives who moved this amendment to tax the stock on hand vote against his own amendment? I understand that the distinguished member from New York who proposed it did vote against it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I look upon this as the practical question before Congress: Shall we kill this bill now, or shall we go into a conference with the House on this subject? If we kill it now, we shall come to this same question about three weeks hence; and in the mean time we shall lose what revenue we might otherwise have secured.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator has gone beyond the point to which he called attention. He asked me if the House has not in fact insisted on this proposition to tax the article in market. I say that the Senate struck that proposition of the House from the bill. It went to the House; and if the House wished then to tax the article in market thirty cents instead of forty, it should have been done by concurring in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment, which was competent under the rules of the House.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Indiana is perhaps technically right, but practically upon the case as it stands now on their vote on these instructions the House have reconsidered that vote and have decided to insist upon putting the same tax on the liquor on hand. We shall have to meet the House on that question either on this bill or, by killing this bill, on a new bill. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator repeats what he said before, that the question now before the Senate is whether we will agree to what the House demands or allow the bill to be lost. I do not think that is the question. I do not think that the House is going to defeat an important measure of legislation merely because it cannot force the Senate to come to its views.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir. The Senator misunderstands if he understands that the House has undertaken to force the Senate to agree to this proposition; but I say the direct effect will be, we shall have to meet this proposition at some time; we can either meet it now on this bill, or we can kill this bill and wait and meet it on some new bill to come up some two or three weeks hence, perhaps.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, sir, when the new bill comes up I hope the Senate will be able to meet the question. That is all I can say to the Senator from Wisconsin on that point. The Senate has met this particular proposition. The Senator has said on a proposition offered by the Senator himself that we would not agree to a tax at the rate of twenty cents a gallon. In response to the proposition of the House the Senate has said we would not agree to a tax of forty cents. To be sure, we have not gone up from one to forty cents, giving a vote on each cent; but the Senate has distinctly informed the House that we do not agree to the proposition that the article now in market and produced in this country ought to be taxed at all. The will of the Senate on that subject has been clearly made known.

But, sir, that was not the question that I desired now to speak upon. I say that the instruction proposed by the Senator from Ohio is not proper; it cannot be given to the committee of conference. That committee has nothing to do with this bill except upon the questions of disagreement between the two Houses. In respect to the questions of disagreement, the Senate may instruct its part of the committee; but outside of the questions of disagreement the Senate cannot instruct that committee, for the reason that that is not one of the modes of legislation known to parliamentary usage. Let me ask the Senator this question: is it competent for the Senate to instruct its portion of the committee to tax cotton two cents per pound on this bill? The Senator would say no; and why? For the obvious reason that that question was not referred to the committee. The Senate may instruct the committee upon all the questions that were referred to that committee, but not upon other questions. Can we in this mode, through a committee of conference, bring into this bill measures that we could not place in it if the bill were directly before the Senate? Let me ask Senators, if this bill were now in the Senate and we were considering it, could we now propose and could the Senate by a vote put a tax upon the article now in the market? Clearly not, for the reason that we have declined to do that, and the time for reconsideration has passed. We cannot reach that question. It is beyond the reach of the Senate, and clearly we cannot do it by instructions to the committee of conference.

But, sir, upon the question of right, I have merely one or two suggestions to make. This body ought certainly to treat with great respect the opinion of the House of Representatives, and go as far as possible to meet that House upon important matters of legislation. If the Senate agreed with the House upon the main feature of the bill and differed in respect to some matters of detail, we ought certainly to go a great way to meet that body; but if the House asks us to tax an article which we think ought not to be taxed, and we cannot agree with the House in opinion, and we say that that article ought not to be taxed, and say it by a very emphatic vote, is it right for the House to say to the Senate, "We will kill the bill if you do not come to our proposition?" Is it right for the House to say to the Senate, "We will not allow a tax to be laid on that which is to be manufactured hereafter unless you also consent to tax that which is now in market?" Is the Senate to be forced from its judgment by the threat that the bill is to be lost? I am not willing to agree to that. The Senate has said by a very large vote—I think by 29 to 14; two to one—that we would not agree to tax spirits on hand either twenty or forty cents. The House now says to us, "We will not pass the bill unless you come to our views."

But, sir, in respect to the right of the question, ought the Senate to agree to tax the article now in the market, the liquor that has already paid its tax? To illustrate that point, I will call the attention of the Senate to the last disagreement between the two Houses. It is to be found in the seventh section of the bill. The Senate struck these words out of the bill:

And that upon all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under the direction and according to regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate striking that provision from the bill. The House then insists that we shall impose a tax of forty cents upon liquor that has passed the custom-house and paid the duty in the custom-house. Is the Senate prepared to agree to that proposition? Is the Senate prepared to agree to it in respect to other matters of merchandise coming through the custom-house? After the importer has paid the duty at the custom-house, does he not suppose that the article which he then holds shall be sold free from all tax so far as the Federal Government is concerned? Has it ever been heard of in this country that the Government, after an article has paid the duty provided by law, has again taxed that same article? I think no such instance can be referred to in the history of the country. It would be astonishing if such an instance could be found.

Mr. President, as an attorney I paid ten dollars, I think last May, for the privilege of practicing law for one year. The Government received the money, and gave me a license and authority to practice for one year. Would this Congress now say that I should not practice my profession for the residue of the year unless I paid ten dollars additional? The Senate would not entertain the proposition for an hour; and why? Because I have paid the Government what she asked for the privilege. She has received the money, and said I might practice for the term of a year; and it would be a breach of faith to change the law pending the enjoyment of that right.

The manufacturer of liquor pays his license fee, and the Government says he may manufacture liquor for that consideration for the coming year. Could we change the law so as to require him at the end of six months to pay twice as much as the law when he paid his tax required him to pay? Clearly not; and why? For the simple reason that he has paid what the Government demanded. She has received his money, and said for that he should exercise this privilege for the coming year.

Mr. COWAN. The Senator will allow me to ask him whether, if the additional imposition of ten dollars on attorneys raised the price of fees, it would not be fair that they should divide with the Government? That is the argument of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not suppose that that consideration would govern the conscience or the judgment of the Senate. I expect, if the attorneys of the country were taxed an additional ten dollars, in some way or another some unfortunate client would feel the weight of that additional charge. [Laughter.] I do not doubt that.

But the question is one of right. If we would not do it in respect to a question of that sort, how is it that we shall tax an article after it is manufactured, when the Government agreed that for manufacturing it the party should pay so much. I say it is a breach of the faith of the Government. We have said to the men who are engaged in this business, "If you pay your license fee, and in addition to that when you manufacture the whisky, you pay a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon it, you shall be at quits so far as the Government is concerned; you may go into the market and sell your liquor for what you can get." That is what the Government has said. And now, after it is manufactured, while it is still in their hands, after they have paid this tax of twenty cents, is it good faith on the part of the Government to require them to pay an additional twenty cents? I say it is not. It is a breach of faith; and in these times especially, the Government ought to be very careful to maintain good faith. When we hear rumblings of repudiation, we cannot very well afford now, if ever a nation could afford, to violate its faith. We ought to stand upon what we have agreed to. We have agreed that these people might manufacture and sell liquor and pay a license fee and a tax of twenty cents on the gallon.

Some gentlemen argue this question as though this article of commerce were altogether in the hands of speculators. I do not know that that would make any difference on the question of right if it were so; but that is not so. A very large producer of whisky in an important point in the State of Illinois, Peoria, was talking to me yesterday on this subject. He manufactures very largely. His enterprise has secured to the Government during the past year a very large revenue. He told me that he had about eight thousand barrels on hand, upon which he has paid his tax. If this bill should pass, he would be required at once to pay twenty cents per gallon more upon that liquor, which would require him to pay about eighty-nine thousand dollars more, and that, too, before he can sell. He would have to go into the market and borrow money, anticipate his sales, to pay this tax to the Government, although he has already paid for the privilege of producing it what the Government had fixed by law.

I say then, sir, that this would be a very great act of injustice toward the men who have paid this tax, and it would not pay the Government any amount of revenue for the loss she would sustain by the breach of her faith.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do not intend to go into the discussion of the question of the propriety of imposing this tax upon the liquors on hand in anything that I may say now on the pending question before the Senate. I desire to refer very briefly to some considerations that have been thrown out by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. President, these revenue bills by the Constitution are required to originate in the House of Representatives. Why? Because the Representatives in Congress in that House are nearer the people than the representatives of the States in this body. So jealous were the men who made the Constitution of the exercise of this power of taxation over the people that by the Constitution it is required that these bills shall originate in that House; that the subject of taxation shall come from the body nearest the people, and that the men who impose the tax shall be more directly responsible to the people. Therefore, I say it is the duty of this body, while they are not to forego their convictions of the propriety of certain measures and may freely discuss them and act upon them, at least to pay great deference to the opinion of the House of Representatives on this subject of what articles shall be subjected to taxation.

Now, sir, let us look at this case just as it stands. A bill came here from the House of Representatives imposing a tax of forty cents a gallon upon liquor on hand. The Senate, after discussion, refused to concur in that provision of the bill, and struck it out. It went back to the House of Representatives, which body agreed to that amendment; but I will assume they must have been taken by surprise, for their vote, both before and since, demonstrates that it is the clear judgment of a majority of that House that a tax should be imposed upon this liquor on hand. Such being the deliberately expressed judgment of that House, the question now is whether, because by the forms of legislation technically, they concurred in the amendment of the Senate striking out this provision of the bill, we shall insist upon the technical advantage in the form of legislation, and thereby refuse to confer with the House on this question.

Mr. COWAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him this question? As I understand it, having been in the body at the time it was passed, the Senate sent the bill back to the House with an amendment, and the House concurred in the amendment. Then there is no disagreement upon this point. If there be any disagreement between the two Houses, wherein or where does this disagreement arise from? Who makes it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend is placing himself on what I stated to be the position of himself and his friends here. He takes the technical ground that because the House by a vote concurred in the proposition of the Senate, although both before and after the House declared against it, we should refuse to go into a conference with them. That is the substance of it. I believe it is but paying a proper respect to the House for us to say we are willing to confer with it, assuming that the House is still insisting upon the propriety of levying a tax upon the liquor on hand; and that it is not dignified in us to insist upon this technical objection when the House by its subsequent vote, and the instruction it has given its committee of conference, has declared that it is in favor of still insisting upon imposing some kind of tax on the liquor on hand. Why not go into a conference with the House on the question?

It may be that the form of these instructions to compel our committee to agree with them is going further than there is any necessity for. I am not speaking of the forms of our instruction; but I want the Senate to go into a conference with the House on the ground that the House is still in substance insisting upon the right to impose this tax upon liquors on hand. I do not know that it is necessary that our committee on the part of the Senate should be instructed on the subject any further than to go into a conference with the House on the understanding that the House are still insisting on the right to tax this liquor on hand. Then the question will come up, and the bill will not be lost through any technicality, nor will any technical advantages be taken of the House by the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. The proper way would be for the House to reconsider its vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps the motion was not made at the proper time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I merely wish to say that the question suggested by my honorable friend from Wisconsin is not the question before the Senate. He says that he is willing to waive the technical objection. Well, sir, if that is all that is requested, the House should have sent us this committee with permission to insert in the bill a tax of twenty cents, and not an instruction to do it. If we appoint a committee with permission to do it, the committee of the House being instructed to do it, the Senate is at a disadvantage, because the committee on the part of the House is not at liberty to act contrary to its instructions, while our committee is at liberty to act as it pleases. Therefore we do not stand in the same light. If they had sent us simply their committee with permission on the part of the House to insert this tax of twenty cents, the question would address itself fairly to the Senate whether the Senate would give the same permission to their committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the very form adopted by the House of Representatives. They do not instruct their committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I am mistaken. I would like to hear the action of the House of Representatives read.

Mr. SHERMAN. They simply say, as the judgment of the House, that such an amendment should be made, providing for that tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is not that substantially the same as instructions? I think it is.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine for information's sake, supposing all this be done and the committee of conference report, whether that report is amendable in this body?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not amendable. We may reject it.

Mr. COWAN. We must reject it in toto or not at all?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWAN. That strikes me as a very strong argument why we should not introduce this practice. It is the right of this body, when a measure is proposed to make amendments, to discuss them and to adopt them, according to the usual form. By adopting this most extraordinary mode of legislation, it seems to me it will be establishing a very bad practice, one that we shall hereafter regret. I think it is due to the dignity of the Senate to resent an interference of this kind. There is no disagreement here except from outside parties. If the two Houses have agreed, what right has anybody else to say they disagree and insist that we shall reconsider our action and allow them to impose upon us their particular measures?

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the Senator with whom we are disagreeing?

Mr. COWAN. I have made the same inquiry myself, and I am at a loss to know with what body we are differing. It seems we have agreed with the House of Representatives—the House concurred in our action. Now, I should like to know with what body we are disagreeing. If there is a third estate to be represented here, I should like to know who it is, and where it is, and what are the relations which we hold toward it exactly. I know there are parties outside who have disagreed with both Houses; but how they expect to affect legislation through the medium of committees of conference, I cannot say.

Perhaps the Senator from Iowa can inform us who the third estate is that is dissatisfied with the action of both bodies.

Mr. GRIMES. I can only tell by the newspapers, to which the Senator has had the same access as myself. I have had no intercourse with any of those inside or outside parties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very sorry to see Senators rest on technicalities on a plain proposition like this. The Senator from Pennsylvania says that the House have agreed to the proposition of the Senate. That is not so. The House proposed a tax of forty cents a gallon on spirits on hand. The Senate disagreed to that. It went back to the House, and the House agreed that forty cents should not be put on spirits on hand; but at the same time—

Mr. COWAN. I will ask, if the House did not agree to the bill as returned to them by the Senate, with the exception of the differences which were referred to the committee of conference?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I explained—the Senator could not have heard me—that it was not within the power of the House under their rules, and we are bound to take notice of their rules, at that stage of the bill to make a proposition to levy a tax of twenty cents a gallon.

Mr. COWAN. Could they not disagree?

Mr. SHERMAN. They might have disagreed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer that the Senator would wait until I get through; Senators are propounding questions to me on all sides.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish to reply to the Senator, and therefore I would like him to answer a question now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will answer the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator say that an amendment to our amendment was not in order in the House according to the rules of the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at that stage. I say that at that stage an amendment to our amendment was not in order, because the previous question is always called on propositions of this kind, which cuts off all amendments. We are bound to regard that. We are bound to regard the action of the other House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Was it not the House that called the previous question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. Now here we are, the Senate of the United States, in the position of a technical lawyer, picking at little flaws to avoid a plain vote. I do not think it is done for that purpose; but the argument looks like an attempt to avoid a plain vote on the proposition. I would prefer to take the vote on the direct question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am willing to take it on that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the Senator is. I have no doubt every Senator has made up his mind on the merits of this matter honestly and fairly, and therefore I simply desire to present the question free from technicalities. I say there is nothing in the action of either House to prevent us from taking a fair vote on the question whether we will levy a tax of twenty cents a gallon on the spirits on hand. That is all I want.

Now in regard to another matter, the Senator from Indiana seems to think that this is a gross outrage, because, by the bill as it now stands, on spirits imported into this country, which have already paid a duty, there is an additional duty levied of forty cents a gallon. I say that is grossly unjust; that it would be wrong and outrageous for us to levy such a duty on imported liquors and not levy the same duty on domestic liquors. When spirits are brought into this country and pay the duty, they stand like any other property of similar character; and we have no right to select that particular property because it has been imported and levy a new tax upon it. The bill as it now stands does levy a tax of forty cents on imported spirits, and levies no tax on domestic spirits. That is unjust.

It is perfectly competent now as a question of parliamentary law for the Senate or the House to propose to amend the Senate amendments in that particular, in regard to the tax on imported spirits. I will first state, however, that the House levied a tax of forty cents a gallon on imported spirits, and also the same tax on domestic spirits. The Senate struck out the tax on imported spirits on hand. The House may very properly say that they will agree to a tax of twenty cents on imported spirits if the Senate will agree to a tax of twenty cents on domestic spirits. It would be perfectly right and perfectly proper to put it in that form. The committee of conference may report that amendment. But what is the condition of affairs in a committee of conference, unless you instruct the committee? Three Senators are selected from this body to represent the Senate. You cannot expect those conferees to settle the point about taxing spirits on hand unless they receive instructions from the Senate, and therefore it is important to obtain the instructions of the Senate. I was a member of one of these committees of conference, and I know we were constantly embarrassed by the vote of the Senate. I wish to stand by the action of the Senate until the Senate by a deliberate act revokes that action.

Mr. CONNESS. If it will not disturb the Senator I should like to make a suggestion to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. CONNESS. I was going to suggest to the Senator that so far as I am concerned I am entirely willing that this body shall vote on the plain proposition whether they will consent to a tax of twenty cents on the stock on hand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the Senator is prepared to vote on that question.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to say in that connection—I will consume no time—it is a proposition that has never been before this body, never been examined or discussed. It is an important proposition, important in its consequences to us, to the Government, and to the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Pennsylvania have just argued at some length that it was not only considered here, but finally decided, and it is beyond our power and the power of the House to reconsider it. The Senator from California may settle this matter with them.

Mr. CONNESS. It was considered in an indirect manner on a motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin, but it was never discussed in this body as a proposition involving the policy connected with it. The Senator knows that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I leave that disagreement between the Senators and will let them settle it among themselves. I say myself it has never been settled beyond the power of either House. The only reason why I ask for instructions is to relieve from embarrassment the committee of conference who may go out on the part of the Senate, and it is but fair and right that the Senate should give those instructions. This complication has grown out of the action of the two Houses, and I think it is but fair that the committee of conference, when appointed, should be relieved by instruction or request in any form Senators may desire, expressing the opinion of the Senate. The proposition of the Senator from California and the proposition I have submitted will enable us to take a fair vote. If a conference is appointed without instructions, as a matter of course the conferees appointed will represent the sense of the Senate, and that would be considered as against any tax on spirits on hand. If on the other hand the instructions which I submit are adopted by a majority of the Senate, the conferees will no doubt be appointed with a view to carry out those instructions. I think the question may be fairly presented by these two propositions. If the proposition of the Senator from California prevails, then whoever is on the committee of conference will be bound to adhere to what is then considered the action of the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator from Ohio talks about technicalities. He says we are standing on technicalities, sticking in the bark, caviling upon the ninth part of a hair. Sir, I do not understand this question exactly in that way. What is a technicality? A technicality is something which has been produced by the operation of a rule. Is this body to have no rules? Is it to abandon its rules and give them up whenever it suits the whim or the caprice of some third estate, some outside parties, to compel us to do so? Why, sir, the essence of everything we do is, that it is done according to rule; and when we abandon rule we abandon law, and the body will have no constitution and no guidance, and may then do anything.

But how is this question? A bill came here from the House of Representatives. We amended it, and sent it back to the House. The House agreed to that amendment. The honorable Senator says that they could not amend that amendment. Why? Because the previous question was called. Who called the previous question? The House. When the House calls the previous question, as I understand it, they mean to say, "We will not amend; we do not desire to amend;" and that is the reason that amendments are cut off. Then the two Houses concurred upon all points save three, and committees of conference were appointed to adjust those three points. What was the duty of those committees? What was the limit of their authority? To consider those points of disagreement, and those alone. They had no right to consider any other point of disagreement. That was not their function, and could not be. If they could not agree upon those points, it was their duty so to report; but it was not their duty to introduce a third element and attempt to force its passage through both bodies by rules not known to the bodies. A committee of conference, as I understand the theory of the constitution of these Houses, has no right to originate any measure. Measures must originate in one of the Houses from the regularly constituted committees. The function of the conference committee is confined solely to the subjects of disagreement, and not to other amendments which they, in their judgment, might suppose to be beneficial and for the good of the country.

Then, sir, as to the main question, it is said that by levying a tax of forty cents a gallon on whisky we thereby add forty cents a gallon to the value of the whisky; and that if we do so it is but fair that the Government shall share in that increased value. Sir, that is a most extraordinary argument in favor of a tax, and one which I think is entirely novel; at least I never remember to have heard or read of it before this debate commenced. Suppose that should not be the fact; suppose that instead of conferring an increased value of forty cents a gallon, which we compel the holder to pay, we only conferred an increased value of thirty cents per gallon. A loss of ten cents a gallon upon whisky, if a man has any considerable quantity of it, would ruin anybody. Gentlemen who insist upon this theory should also provide in it that if the Government did not confer an increased value equal to the amount of the tax, they should compensate in some way, return the money, or perhaps a system of drawbacks would effectuate it.

But, sir, the original proposition itself is absurd, iniquitous, unjust, unfair, and unequal from beginning to end. When was it ever proposed to take the property of one man and tax it and exempt the property of another man, his next door neighbor? Not, I think, in the history of the civilized world. That is the objection to this measure. That is the place where the difficulty arises, and that is the stumbling-block which lies in the way of all measures of this kind. A invests his money in whisky; B invests his money in flour; C invests in cotton, if you please; and D invests in tobacco. Now, you select one of these commodities and impose an enormous tax upon it. What reason is given for this? It is no answer to say it is whisky; because in the eye of the law whisky is quite as lawful a commodity as tobacco, cotton, flour, or bread, if you please. Whatever may be the opinions with regard to it in a moral and religious sense, in the eye of the law it is as lawful to deal in the one commodity as in the other.

Then it resolves down simply to the question, whether you can select a certain number of people and a certain kind of property, and out of that property levy enormous taxes. The salvo proposed, the apology offered is, that we confer an additional value upon it. The holder says, "That may be, or it may not be; but my fortune is not to be hazarded by these experiments of yours in that way, especially when my next door neighbor is not subjected to the same risks. I have no right to run this hazard without having the same hazard imposed upon all my neighbors." Then, as I said a moment ago, suppose that this fact assumed here and made the basis of the argument, should not turn out to be a fact at all; then ruin ensues inevitably.

Mr. President, I am not prepared to say what would be the result of the practical operation of a bill of this kind. In my own judgment it would be utterly impracticable. I suppose no free people would submit to it for a moment. I suppose that the common sense of all civilized people would at once detect its injustice and its enormity, if I may use the phrase, and I think I may properly.

It so happens, however, in legislation of this kind, that it opens the door to speculations. It is utterly impossible to prevent that. No human foresight or wisdom can prevent it. When it is proposed to tax an article everybody knows that the tax, if imposed, will make the commodity rise, and therefore men eager for gain—and I do not know that that is a crime or an offense—invest their money in it. The object of this proposed measure is to endeavor to punish that class of men. When we proposed an additional tax of forty cents on whisky, whisky rose, because everybody wanted to have it, and everybody wanted to buy it, and a great many people did buy it. Now, the allegation is that that was wrong, wicked, a speculation, and that we must do this extraordinary thing in order to correct that evil. Sir, the attempt would be as vain as the procedure would be unjust.

This kind of speculation will occur, and occur always under like circumstances. It is as perfectly fair and as legitimate as it would be, when we were about to impose an additional tariff, for the holders of imported goods to retain them in their possession until that additional duty was levied so that they could get the additional profit. This is a perfectly analogous case. We impose a tariff, if you please, of a dollar upon a specific article; say a hat for the sake of illustration. A large number of hats are imported, and a large number of hats are on hand; and then it is in further contemplation of the legislature to levy an additional tax of a dollar on hats. Has any Government, levying an additional dollar upon imported hats, ever undertaken to go around and levy also an additional dollar on the hats on hand?

Certainly not; because the hats on hand have fallen into the general mass of property in possession, and if it is to be taxed, the taxation ought to be uniform and equal, falling on all alike, and in no other way can it be justly levied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the amendment? I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is to strike out all of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio after the word "resolved," and to insert:

That the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday's date, proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 123, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the vote is taken on that amendment, I wish to move an amendment to it, by adding at the end the following words:

And upon the disagreeing votes upon the resolution of instruction of the House in relation to said bill.

That will enable them to confer upon the whole subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. The matter proposed to be taken into consideration by the conference committees of the two Houses, by the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, is not original matter or matter that can properly go before them at all. The question that would be propounded by each to the other would be, not what points are in dispute between the two bodies, but what shall the form of legislation of each body be? We have no right to consider a proposition of that kind.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I know what the question before the Senate is, and I rise for the purpose of making the inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment submitted by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose the amendment to that amendment be adopted, and the whole be adopted afterwards, what will be the power of the committee of conference? Can they report a bill taxing the whisky on hand?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair they might do it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I am opposed to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a question of order, however, for the Chair to decide.

Mr. CONNESS. The form of the question before the Senate at present is, first, a resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate appoint a committee of conference and instruct that committee to agree to a tax of twenty cents upon the stock on hand.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand.

Mr. CONNESS. To that I have moved an amendment striking out all of that resolution substantially and recommending that the Senate appoint a committee of free conference to consult with a like committee of the House de novo upon the question of disagreement between the two bodies. To that proposition the Senator from Wisconsin moves to add that that committee of free conference thus appointed shall also take into consideration whether each body will instruct its committee or not. I say that the latter is clearly not a subject for us to vote upon, because the Senate may not be called upon in this manner to determine whether they will instruct their committee to do anything. If they desire to instruct their committee they may do it, they have the power, but they are not called upon here properly to take a vote as to whether they shall do that or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin this question: the instructions of the House are to their own conferees, and now the Senator from California asks the Senate to disagree to the instructions which the House chooses to give to its own conferees.

Mr. CONNESS. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. There is somebody at fault; and I think it is not myself. The Senator from Ohio has stated the case on the part of the House correctly; and upon that state of facts the Senator from Ohio moves a resolution that the Senate also instruct the committee of this body to assent to the proposition of the House, to agree to a tax of twenty cents on the stock on hand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will simply say to the Senator from California that my proposition does not relate to the instructions given to the House committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that perfectly; but he asks us to give like instructions to our committee, to which I am opposed. I move to strike that out, and to appoint a new committee of free conference. If the Senate assent to that, it will go back to the House, and the question then for the House to consider will be, whether they will recede from the instructions they have given to their committee. If they recede and appoint a committee of free conference, we meet again and confer. If they do not, I suppose the bill will be lost.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will get at the question in this way. I will call for a division of the amendment of the Senator from California, and let the question first be taken upon striking out. That will raise the question directly. The Senator moves to strike out the instructions contained in my proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Ohio that a motion to strike out and to insert is not divisible.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether that would not be the better way, to take the question first on the motion to strike out the instructions, and let us have a vote directly on the subject.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know why the Senator should wish to have the question taken on his proposition first; but really I think the Senate now so fully understand it that I do not care in what form the question is presented. I am perfectly willing that the question shall be taken on the proposition of the Senator to instruct our committee, for I feel assured that the Senate will not vote for that proposition; but the proposition which is now before the Senate, the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin, seems to have been lost sight of. That, I say, is a new and novel one, unheard of by me before.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator from California that if my motion shall fail, I shall have no objection to voting upon his proposition, because then there will be no other course left.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend from California, it seems to me, must take one of two positions: either that the resolution of the House of Representatives is before the Senate to be disagreed to or concurred in, or that it is not before the Senate at all. The Senator assumes that it is here and moves that the Senate disagree to it. Very well; what is my proposition? If we do disagree to it, it is something pending between the two Houses that I want this committee of conference to settle. If there is not any resolution here, we cannot either concur in it or disagree to it.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the fact that I assume nothing? There is a resolution before this body submitted by the Senator from Ohio, to which I have moved an amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But in the amendment the Senator assumes to say that the Senate disagrees to a certain resolution of the House of Representatives. If that resolution is not here, we have nothing to do with it. If the resolution is here, and we disagree to it, I want the committee of conference which is to be appointed to consider that disagreement. That is my amendment. The resolution of the House of Representatives is simply that in the judgment of the House a tax should be levied upon the spirits in hand of twenty cents a gallon. The Senator from California moves that this body disagree to that resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. No.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I so read it.

Mr. CONNESS. That is not the state of the question at all. I knew that the Senator from Wisconsin did not understand the shape in which this question was before the Senate. I have repeated to him that I do not offer any amendment to the resolution of the House of Representatives, but that I offer an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio—a Senate resolution. And yet the Senator from Wisconsin iterates and reiterates that I offer an amendment to a proposition coming from the House of Representatives. I hope he will correct himself in that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure now that I understand what will be the question before the Senate if either of the propositions should be adopted. I understand that the message of the House of Representatives states that they have appointed a committee of conference and have instructed their committee to propose a tax of a certain amount on liquors on hand. If that is to be considered as in the form of a resolution proposed by the other House, it is to be disposed of by the Senate either by affirming it, acceding to it, or by rejecting it, or by modifying it.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator call for the reading of the propositions as they stand before the Senate? If he does, I know he will understand precisely what they mean.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think I understand them. Now suppose, Mr. President, the amendment suggested by the Senator from California to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is accepted by the Senate; he proposes that we should appoint what he calls a general free conference; and suppose the House of Representatives abandon the proposition which they have sent to us and accede to a free conference, what will be the power of that free conference?

Mr. CONNESS. To consider the propositions which divide both Houses.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to answer that question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have had two conferences, and there have been disagreements, and if a free conference is again ordered, according to the proposition of the Senator from California, we shall have the same dispute over again just as certain as fate. There is no doubt about it in my judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I meant further to ask was whether that free conference can agree that a tax shall be levied upon the liquor on hand. I suppose they can without instructions. We have had two of them already, and the second conference have been unable to agree upon that point and only upon that point. If I was a member of that committee of conference, I should like to know, after the action of the Senate on the subject, whether the Senate would consider the committee as authorized to abandon the ground which the Senate has heretofore taken, abandon the ground which the antecedent conferences have taken, and adopt another, the one which the House of Representatives now proposes, that is to say, to levy a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon the amount of spirits on hand.

Whether the one or the other is done we shall have precisely the same question before us after that committee shall have reported as we have now; and in the mean time if we shall come finally to the determination which I think the Senate at least at present are inclined to adhere to, that no liquor on hand shall be taxed, the Government will be losing a large amount, an amount proportioned to what shall be the tax upon the quantity of liquor that may be made, and is no doubt being now rapidly made between to-day and the day when the subject shall be disposed of.

Mr. CONNESS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland and also the Senator from Ohio I will withdraw my proposition, and let the vote be taken. As I before observed I have very little doubt as to what the vote of the Senate will be now upon the direct proposition of taxing the stock on hand twenty cents. Therefore at present I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from California being withdrawn the question recurs on the original resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio what amount of revenue he estimates that a tax of twenty cents a gallon on liquor on hand will produce.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is difficult for me to answer that question, because gentlemen differ so much as to the stock on hand.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the Senator's impression from the best information the committee had before them?

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that the stock on hand is about forty millions. That is just about the average between the two extremes, but I cannot say that it is the exact quantity.

Mr. RAMSEY. Forty million gallons?

Mr. SHERMAN. Forty million gallons. That would yield $8,000,000. I will not be positive about the quantity. It is estimated variously from twenty to eighty million gallons.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have been informed that large holders of liquor were willing to compromise on this tax of twenty cents. For the life of me, I cannot see why the Senate can afford to throw away this amount of revenue for the sake of accommodating speculators.

Mr. CONNESS. This last remark of the Senator from Minnesota demands notice.

Mr. RAMSEY. I mean of course speculators out of doors.

Mr. CONNESS. But there is contained in the Senator's remark the suggestion that action here by the Senate or by a Senator can be based upon the interests of what are called speculators. I undertake to say that that thing is impossible. We do not know in our legislation here who are speculators and who are not. We do not know who hold or who do not hold this property, this commodity that is to be subject to taxation. The considerations that govern my mind in this case are these: How much tax can we get? Is it worth the effort to obtain it? Shall the Government violate a great principle, upon which it has always proceeded heretofore, to obtain a comparatively small amount of money? Shall we say that our tax collectors and assessors throughout this country shall be increased perhaps five-fold to hunt up every package of this article wherever it may be found, and to make enemies for this Government wherever it is to be found at a time like this?

These are the questions, or a part of them, that affected my mind in dealing with this proposition; and I say here before I take my seat, that I would vote a great deal more readily for a tax of forty cents a gallon upon the stock on hand than for a tax of twenty cents. The more you reduce the tax the less revenue you will obtain; but the machinery, the agencies that you employ to collect it will be the same in number; the degree of enmity that you will create among the people will be the same; the fact that you will make a smuggler out of every man who holds a gallon of whisky in the country will exist, while the amount to be obtained as the result of this effort on the part of public agents will be, as a matter of course, one hundred per cent. less.

How Senators can be in favor of taxing the stock on hand at twenty cents as a mere matter of compromise, and against taxing it forty cents, I cannot understand and see, in the face of the fact that the expenses of collection will be the same, the enmity created throughout the country against our Government will be the same, while the revenue to be received will necessarily be one half the amount.

It is considerations of this kind, Mr. President, that affect my mind. I have no sympathy with either whisky or whisky dealers. It is a mere question of opinion as to whether it is wise or unwise. I have said that I believed it unwise; that is the best conclusion of my judgment; and therefore I have opposed inflicting this tax.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am disposed generally to follow the lead of committees, and I voted the other day with the Committee on Finance against taxing liquors on hand. But the House of Representatives with great persistency has insisted upon taxing liquors on hand, and I shall vote to secure a tax of twenty cents a gallon upon the whisky now on hand, and I shall do so on the principle of equity and justice.

We propose by our legislation—it is what was expected of us—to tax whisky forty cents a gallon additional. I think the tax ought to be at least a dollar a gallon, and it could be fixed at that rate without any harm to the interests of the country; but we have settled upon an increase of forty cents a gallon, and it will increase the price of the article to the people nearly or quite that amount. We put this tax, not upon whisky manufacturers, but upon the people of this country, who have to pay the tax. If there be forty million gallons on hand and we tax it an additional forty cents a gallon, there is a tax of $16,000,000, not to be paid by the whisky manufacturers, but by the whisky drinkers, the people of the country.

It is proposed to tax the liquor on hand twenty cents a gallon; why? If you tax it forty cents some persons who have engaged in that business or who have speculated in it will lose money. Some dealers have bought at a great advance. A tax of twenty cents per gallon on the article on hand does not add anything to the cost of it to the people; not a farthing.

It is asked, why select this article alone for taxation? If you have any other article or any number of articles upon which you propose to put a duty of thirty, forty, or fifty per cent. additional, I would tax those articles on hand. Who is harmed by it? Suppose you were to put an increased tax upon dry goods, upon tobacco, petroleum, anything and everything in the country, of forty, fifty, or one hundred per cent., you would cause a great advance in the price of the article taxed. There would be no harm at all in the present needs of this country by taxing all these articles on hand, and I would vote for such taxation most cheerfully. You need the money, the country needs the money to save itself; the mass of the people have to pay it, and it is quite as equitable and just that the Government should have part of the profit as it is that the persons who hold the articles and who are to be profited by our legislation should get it all. Sir, if I were a merchant—

Mr. COWAN. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts, suppose the speculator makes a very large sum, as he alleges he will in this case—

Mr. WILSON. I am not speaking of speculators.

Mr. COWAN. But in the case of a whisky dealer who gets a large profit by the rise, does not the Government get a fair share of his profit through its income tax? If he makes $100,000, does not the Government get its share through the income tax?

Mr. WILSON. No doubt of that. Merchants do not suffer by this taxation. If I were a merchant I should regard the increase of the taxes on articles that I dealt in as an additional opportunity to make money instead of losing. I say that nineteen twentieths of the business portion of the country have made money out of this system of internal taxation. Nineteen twentieths of the manufacturers and merchants make money out of tariffs whenever you raise the duties, and out of internal duties. The price of articles of commerce must be increased by the increased taxation.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me? I submit to him, if he is stating the general rule correctly, whether we had not better go on and inflict a taxation of a thousand or two thousand per cent. all around, so as to make everybody very rich.

Mr. WILSON. I am speaking of reasonable taxation put upon both goods imported and goods manufactured. We propose a large duty on whisky. It will carry the price of the article up immensely; therefore we can afford to tax it on hand because we shall get a large revenue. You tax manufacturers three per cent.; suppose you add two or three per cent., the increase is very little. If it was thirty, forty, or fifty per cent. I would certainly tax the articles on hand at least during the war, but two or three per cent. makes a very small advance. Suppose you double the duties on the manufactured articles now three per cent., you will carry the goods up, we will say three per cent. or a little more than that. A tax of three per cent. on all the articles of the country amounts to something, but the difficulty of collection is increased. I do not know that I would apply this tax to articles on which we made so small an advance, but I believe our duty is to raise money by taxation, and to raise it upon such articles as will bear the taxation. I believe that a great deal of our difficulty grows out of the fact that we have not taxed enough. Instead of three per cent. taxation, it ought to be double or treble in the present exigencies of the country, for three dollars can be paid by the people now in taxation easier than one dollar can be paid immediately after this contest is over. The country never enjoyed such apparent material prosperity as now. The land is full of money, goods are going up, marked up almost every day, and the more they advance the more eager the people are to purchase. The people now can bear taxation. If we had raised four or five hundred million dollars by taxation on our people during the past two years, we should have saved to the Government and the people hundreds of millions of dollars. We have issued paper, inflated prices, increased the expenses of the Government and the people, and put a great debt upon the country without any benefit to ourselves. Taxation would have kept down gold and checked speculation, and large taxation alone will check the wild speculation that feeds on increasing issues of paper money.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the Senator to assert as a principle that the country is very much richer now than it was before this war began. Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. WILSON. I will tell the Senator precisely what I mean. I mean to say that in no period of the history of the United States did the people of the country, capitalists, laboring men, and business men, earn so much money, have so much money, pay their debts so promptly, pay their taxation so easily, or live—I will not say so extravagantly—but so well. You may travel the loyal States from one end to the other, you may go into your corner groceries, you may go to your dry goods dealers, and they will tell you they never sold so much for cash; that the mass of the people never earned or spent so much money, were never so well off, never paid so promptly; that they never lost so few debts. The jeweler never sold so much jewelry as now; the dry goods merchant never sold so costly goods as now; the extravagance of the people was never so great as now.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him briefly to state his opinion how all this prosperity has occurred, why it has occurred?

Mr. WILSON. I will tell you, sir, why and how it has occurred. The reason is that Congress has not taxed the people and raised money, and paid the expenses of the war as we went along. We have created an immense debt, filled the country and flooded the country with paper money, inflated prices, and stimulated speculation, extravagance, and luxury. And this policy has cost the people hundreds of millions more to live than it would if we had taxed them heavily, and it has cost them millions more to support the war.

Mr. CONNESS. I asked the Senator how all these riches came. He answers me that it is because the Government have not taxed enough. Then I propose to him that we tax less still, so that the country may become richer. If everybody can become rich in that way, it is clearly our duty to impose as little taxation as possible.

Mr. WILSON. I am very willing the Senator shall express these views if he entertains them. I am speaking of the stimulating effects upon all interests of this enormous issue of paper money, this creation of an immense national debt. Of the effects of this increase of debt, this issue of paper, I know something.

Mr. CONNESS. That is apparent.

Mr. WILSON. I know something of the effects of this issue of paper money, this use of the national credit upon the business of the country and the people of the country, and the Senator knows it quite as well as I do—

Mr. CONNESS. I think so, too, and better.

Mr. WILSON. I will admit that Senator's superior knowledge of all things that may arise in the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. No; on that proposition.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator knows full well that we have in circulation a vast mass of paper money. He knows what the price of gold is. He knows why gold has gone up. He knows that it goes up under the issue of paper money and the borrowing of money to carry on the war. The position I take is that if we could have raised forty or fifty per cent. of our expenditures by taxation, the Government would have purchased its articles hundreds of millions of dollars cheaper than it has done, and the people could live hundreds of millions annually cheaper than they are doing. I would rather pay ten per cent. on an income taxation than pay thirty or forty per cent. advance in the price of all the necessities of life.

I give it as my judgment, and I believe that nineteen twentieths of the business men of the country agree in the opinion, that the Government has not taxed so strongly as it ought to have done, that we have not raised so much of our expenditures as we ought to have raised from taxation, and that the effect has been to increase paper money, to inflate prices, and put a debt on the country without any benefit to the Government or the people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then we cannot be growing rich.

Mr. WILSON. We are growing nominally rich. I do not mean to say that upon a gold standard we are growing rich; but that measured by your legal-tender notes we are growing rich. I mean to say further that the laboring men of the country, the mechanics, the farmers, the mass of our people, never had so much money, never earned it with so few hours of labor, never paid their debts so promptly, and never had so good credit as they have now. Everybody knows this. Go anywhere you please; go to dry goods merchants; go to the corner groceries, and ask the dealers in the luxuries or the necessities of life how they are paid, and they will tell you that they sell more to poor laboring families now than at any other period, that they pay more promptly, and that if they want credit it is given more freely than at any other period of our history. Everybody knows this to be true. It is so all over the country, and what I mean to say and all I mean to say is that we have an apparent prosperity, immense enterprise, immense industry, high prices for labor, a great deal of money in circulation. I think we ought to increase our taxation and pay at least one third of our annual expenses by taxation, foreign and domestic. That, in my judgment, is the duty we owe the country. The tendency is to expansion, inflation, speculation, and this tendency can only be checked by increasing our resources and using our credit moderately. This is clear to the comprehension of the country, and I believe the interests of the country and the reason of the people demand increased taxation. Taxation will bring down the price of gold, and tend to steady the business affairs of the country.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I might be disposed and even somewhat inclined to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts on the general subject of taxation, and the propriety of changing the rule which is now advocated by some, to explain the reason of the large amount of money required, the necessity for raising money, and why I think mistakes which have been committed require that money should be raised, and to state the reasons for a change of policy. But as those remarks may as well be made upon some other occasion, and as I feel exceedingly anxious that we should have a vote on this bill, I shall cheerfully abstain from making those remarks if it is possible to get a vote on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon further consideration I will submit this as a substitute for the resolution, which contains the Senator's proposition and the alternative:

The Senate do not agree to a further conference upon the House bill No. 123 in the manner proposed by the House of Representatives, but do agree to a further free conference upon the differences between the two Houses upon the said bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wish to say that that will only bring the action back here again.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, to facilitate the vote, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be withdrawn only by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think we may as well meet the question on the proposition of the Senator from California as not. It meets it squarely. The Senate just says to the House, "We will not agree to a strict conference, but we will agree to a free conference." It seems to me we can meet it there just as well as anywhere. As the Senator from Ohio says, it will bring the question back here again. Of course it will bring it back here again if the other House do not agree to the proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me say to the Senator from Indiana that my desire is twofold: to come to a vote, and not to divide gentlemen who agree on the main proposition. I hope there will be no objection to allowing me to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I will not object if the Senator wishes to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the withdrawal of the amendment. The question now is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Canlie, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Harding, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Saulsbury, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wright—25.

So the resolution offered by Mr. SHERMAN was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move the adoption of the first proposition that I before offered as a substitute, preceding it with the word "resolved," in this form:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday's date proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 123) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRIMES. Is a motion for the indefinite postponement of the whole subject in order? It is evident that there can be no agreement between the Senate and House of Representatives on this subject, and I think therefore we had better let the matter drop, and let the House of Representatives originate a new bill to cover the whole subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator to make that motion?

Mr. GRIMES. I make the motion if it be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Iowa that the whole subject be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I doubt very much whether that is in order. This is a report of a committee of conference, which ought to be acted upon directly.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand from gentlemen around me that my motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no doubt that the motion is in order. The question is on the motion to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the whole subject.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend that by adding:

And upon the disagreeing votes upon the resolution of instructions of the House in relation to said bill.

The resolution offered by the Senator from California is that we disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives. I desire not only that we have a free conference on the disagreeing votes on the bill, but on the disagreement upon this resolution which expresses the judgment of the House of Representatives in relation to the bill; and I want to know whether, when that House is struggling to go to a conference on that question, we are unwilling to confer with them, but will stand on a mere technicality.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senate have already decided that question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to reply to the honorable gentleman by saying that the Senate have not decided that question. The Senate have just voted on the question of instructing our committee to go for twenty cents taxation.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, let us come to a vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The propositions are entirely distinct. This is simply a proposition of whether we are willing to confer with the other House on that question, whether that question should be regarded as a question between the two Houses as a matter of conference—not that we instruct our committee to go for one cent taxation, but we are willing rather than have the bill lost to confer with the other House on that subject.

Mr. CARLILE. When the bill first came to the Senate from the House of Representatives this proposition to tax liquor on hand was in it. The Senate struck it out. It was entirely competent, then, for the first committee of conference to consider the question whether they would impose a tax upon liquor on hand or not, and that question was considered and the House of Representatives receded from its original proposition. This question, therefore, which is proposed to be again committed to a committee of conference, has already been committed to one and considered, and both Houses have agreed upon it. I see, then, no necessity for again submitting the same question.

Mr. HOWE. I am not going to detain the Senate; but this strikes me as a very remarkable controversy. When you wanted to increase your revenue, you consented to the principle a year or two ago that you would tax certain kinds of products, manufactured articles, and you did not exempt the article known as spirits or whisky. I do not think you ought to have excepted it; but you resolved that you would tax it as you taxed other manufactured articles, and you were guided to that conclusion by the understanding that whatever duty you put upon the article could be collected of the consumer by the producer. This very session it seems to be the judgment of both Houses of this Congress that you did not put so large a duty upon that one commodity as you ought to have put; that is to say, you did not levy so heavy a duty on that as the consumer would pay, and therefore as the producer could collect, and you propose to raise that duty.

It happens that there is a quantity more or less of that article on hand, and from the commencement of this session down to this day the two Houses have been wrangling upon the question whether you shall attempt to collect the whole or a part of that duty from that quantity of the commodity which is now on hand. It strikes me as a curious struggle. It is said that that quantity, whatever there is on hand, has been laid up by speculators; that they have obtained it in anticipation of your putting on such a tax, and that the price of the commodity in the market is going to be enhanced by your legislation, and you say that that increase ought to go into the Treasury of the United States and not into the pockets of those men who have bought the article.

Upon that point I have three things to say. The first is that you do not know that this forty cents, or this twenty cents, or this ten cents, whatever may be the amount, will be added to the value of the article in the hands of the holders. You do not know that fact, for you do not know what the holders paid for it. You know that since you commenced to talk about this legislation, they have bought for all prices, from fifty up to ninety-eight cents a gallon; and when you say that every man who holds a gallon or a barrel or a thousand barrels shall pay a given sum on that, you do not know that he will be able to sell it at an advance which will remunerate him; you do not know but that the producer can undersell him, whatever may be the additional duty that you put on.

On the other hand—and this is the second thing I want to say—you know that a great deal of this liquor cannot be sold by the holder at a remunerative price if he is made to pay twenty cents or ten cents additional tax. The man who bought in January at ninety-eight cents a gallon, if you make him pay ten cents tax, must sell at a sacrifice.

I have one more thing to say: if you mean to establish the principle that the Legislature of the United States shall hang over the trade of the United States, and in the name of taxation collect all the profits that are realized from that trade, just advertise the proposition at once and go at it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I look upon it as confiscation to the extent that it goes. So much of the value of the property in the hands of loyal men is confiscated to the use of the Government.

Mr. HOWE. Of course it is in effect confiscation. That is the principle. You say that by your legislation an additional value is given to a certain commodity, and you say the man who happens to hold that commodity shall not realize it, but the Treasury of the United States shall. Sir, I was told yesterday that what you know as "five-twenty" bonds are worth a premium of six per cent. I do not know how the fact is. I was told it is so. You have sold $500,000,000 of those bonds in the last year at par. The holders of those bonds by your legislation have realized $30,000,000; they are worth that. Why do you not go to work and levy six per cent. on the holders of those bonds? You say you can get $6,000,000, or $12,000,000 some say, by undertaking to collect this duty from the holders of whisky. You can get $30,000,000 if you will levy that tax upon the holders of the bonds. And there is another thing to be considered. You know who has got the bonds; you can find them; you do not know exactly where to look for the whisky. You can get hold of all the bonds; you will get hold of but a very small share of the whisky; not all you will want.

I vote against the whole enterprise. I desire to speak respectfully, but I do think we have contended over this question a great deal longer than becomes the Legislature of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the Senate has had enough of whisky to-day. I therefore move that we do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no. Let us take this vote.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.]

The amendment was rejected; and the question recurring on the resolution of Mr. CONNESS, it was agreed to.

The Vice President was authorized to appoint the third committee of conference on the part of the Senate; and he appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CLARE, and Mr. HENDRICKS.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs was read twice by its title, and referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 2, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHAMPLAIN CANAL.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be requested to inquire as to the importance and expediency of enlarging the Champlain canal, in the State of New York, for the passage of armed and naval vessels from the tide-waters of the Hudson river to Lake Champlain, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether Congress will deem it advisable to take definite action on projects of this character at its present session. If they should, it can, I think, be demonstrated that no one possesses stronger claims to their consideration than the one alluded to in this resolution, viewed in a military or commercial light.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF OVERLAND EMIGRANTS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table bill of the Senate No. 140, to provide for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific, in order that it may be acted on at once.

Mr. BROOKS. It seems to me that that bill should go to some committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the amount that it appropriates?

The SPEAKER. Forty thousand dollars.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. It is very important that the bill should be passed at once, and I hope the gentleman from New York will not object.

Mr. BROOKS. If western gentlemen have had their attention drawn to this question and do not object, I will not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to the bill being brought before the House.

The bill was then taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I now ask unanimous consent of the House to consider and pass the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to inquire as to the amount of appropriation made for this purpose at last Congress.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, there is a paramount object why this bill should be acted on now, whether it take more or less time. Legislation, I presume, is made to be suited to times and circumstances. If any appropriation is to be made in this case it should be made immediately, as emigration will commence in the latter part of this month, or in the early part of next month. As to the merits of the bill I have nothing to say; but I simply mention the fact that if there is to be any such legislation it should be had now. It will be unavailing if not acted on immediately.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that some gentleman familiar with the subject will give information to the House as to the manner in which this money is to be expended.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. This bill proposes to make an appropriation for the protection of emigrant trains to the States and Territories of the Pacific. It is to provide military escorts for those emigrant trains crossing the plains. It is important that action shall be had on it immediately.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to know how the money is to be expended.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. It is to be expended under direction of the Secretary of War by providing military escorts for the emigrant trains. These trains have to pass through an Indian country of six or eight hundred miles in extent. The whole route is also infested with robbers and highwaymen at the present time. A similar appropriation of $30,000 was made at each of the last two sessions. This bill provides an additional appropriation of $10,000 for another route. The emigrants are now getting ready to start, and it is of the utmost importance that they be protected.

Mr. ASHLEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa also state the fact that a number of emigrants from his own district have been murdered this summer?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. That is so. No less than seventeen men, with several women and children, were murdered in one company coming from the gold mines of Idaho to the States. Unless protection is afforded, hundreds of emigrants will probably be murdered on these routes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that there are two regiments stationed in Utah. Cannot they be used for the purpose of furnishing, to some extent, this protection? Those troops were not, I believe, stationed there last year, but have been sent there within the last twelve months.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. These troops may be used to some extent, but there is a region of between six and eight hundred miles, between the Missouri river and Utah, on which emigrants must be protected, and also on the route to Idaho.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYD. I would inform the gentleman from Iowa that there is now a bill on this subject pending before the Committee on Military Affairs; and the committee will soon be prepared to report.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. This is a copy of that bill. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HARDING asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. GRIDER, called home on account of sickness in his family.

MISSOURI POLITICS.

Mr. McCLURG. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to address the House for one hour. I merely wish to reply to the personal attacks made in the speeches of my colleague from the sixth district [Mr. KING] and my colleague from the first district, [Mr. BLAIR.] I have been unable from the press of business to get the floor at an earlier day. I hope consent will be granted.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN and others objected.

PERCENTAGE ON COMMUTATIONS.

Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, requiring the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of presenting a bill, establishing a percentage on the amount of salaries to be paid to the collectors in the different congressional districts, for receiving commutation money under the last draft or any other draft that may hereafter occur.

INTERNAL DUTIES.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the tabular statement of moneys received from internal duties, as required by the thirty-third section of the one hundred and nineteenth chapter of the statutes of 1862, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

CRIMES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DUMONT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire whether there is any statute punishing larceny upon the property of the United States by any Federal court, when the crime is not committed on the high seas nor at places over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction; and that they also inquire whether there is any statute whereby a person murdering a marshal or other officer of the United States in the discharge of his duty is punishable by judgment of a United States court, unless the killing is at a place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, and that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War be directed, to report and furnish to this House the names of all persons, if any there are, arrested and held in prison or confinement in any prison, fort, or other place whatsoever, for political offenses or any other alleged offense against the Government or authority of the United States, by the order, command, consent, or knowledge of them or either of them respectively, and who have not been charged, tried, or convicted before any civil or criminal (not military) court of the land, together with the charge against such person or cause for such arrest and imprisonment, if there be any, and the name of the prison, fort, or place where they are severally kept or confined. Also, whether any person or persons for any alleged like offense have been banished or sent from the United States, or from the States not in rebellion to the rebellious States, and the names, times, alleged offense or cause thereof, and whether with or without trial, and if tried, before what court.

Mr. GRINNELL. I object.

OVERLAND MAIL.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California on the overland mail; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINERAL RESOURCES.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 140, to provide for the development of the mineral resources of the United States, and of the public domain; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

INTERNATIONAL STATISTICAL CONGRESS.

Mr. STEBBINS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to transmit to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of the report and accompanying documents made to the State Department by Mr. Samuel B. Ruggles, in December last, of the proceedings in the International Statistical Congress at Berlin on the subject of uniform weights, measures, and coins.

Mr. STEVENS. My impression is that that has been done already.

Mr. STEBBINS. I think the resolution which was passed related to another subject.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

CONSTANCE READ.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill explanatory of the act authorizing the payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, to his widow, Constance Read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

SUSPENSION OF TAXES.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution. I would like to have it adopted to-day; but if there be objection I will move that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, suspend the collecting of taxes for internal revenue from the loyal Union citizens and sufferers in the counties of Jackson, Cass, Bates, and Vernon, in the State of Missouri, by reason of a military order forcing these citizens to abandon their homes, their property, and all their material interests, by which they are so reduced in means as to render most oppressive, if not impossible, for them to pay said taxes at present; and that said suspension be ordered for such time and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not object if it be referred.

Mr. HARDING. I object, unless I am permitted to move an amendment to include Kentucky.

Mr. KING. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

Mr. KING. I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863, and to rely upon the legal-tender notes issued by the United States for the currency of the country until the specie basis shall be restored.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

CONSTRUCTION OF FORTS.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the payment of labor performed and materials used in the construction of forts, fortifications, rifle-pits, and other defenses which were constructed by the direction of the War Department and under the superintendence of the engineers and other officers of said Department; also, for the payment of damages to land used and for crops destroyed by such erections and constructions.

BOUNTIES TO FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. ELIOT asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the allowance of bounty to certain vessels employed in the Bank and other cod-fisheries, as provided for in the act of July 29, 1813, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries," and the act of March 3, 1819, amendatory thereof, shall not hereafter be paid to any such vessel until satisfactory proof shall have been furnished to the collector of customs charged with the payment of such bounty that the import duty imposed by law on foreign salt imported into the United States has been duly paid on all foreign salt used in curing the fish on which the claim to the allowance of bounty is based.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will allow me to amend so as to put a bounty on cat-fish and suckers I will not object.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. COX. Then I object to the introduction of the resolution. Western interests are not consulted at all.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to this House all the diplomatic correspondence on the present state of Mexico since that published by the Thirty-Seventh Congress. Also all the dispatches of Hon. E. A. Turpin, minister to Venezuela, relating to the change in that republic from a constitutional form of government to the government of General Paez. Also all the correspondence between the Secretary and Henry T. Blow and E. D. Culver, the one late and the other present United States minister to Venezuela.

PRESQUE ISLE DISTRICT.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to change the name of the district and port of Presque Isle to the district and port of Erie; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

POST ROUTES IN KANSAS.

Mr. WILDER, by unanimous consent, introduced a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, asking for a post route from Atchison to Topeka, in the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, asking Congress to declare a post route from Rising Sun via Osawatie and Grasshopper Falls, in the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CAVALRY ARMS FOR KANSAS.

Mr. WILDER, by unanimous consent, also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, asking Congress for two thousand stand of cavalry arms to be turned over to the Governor of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIANS IN KANSAS.

Mr. WILDER, by unanimous consent, also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, petitioning Congress to pass a law for the removal of Indians from the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion to reconsider and lay upon the table the vote taken yesterday, by which the bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs was passed.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ELIOT. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. COX. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Ohio vote with the majority?

Mr. COX. I did not.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman cannot renew the motion.

Mr. MALLORY. Cannot the gentleman renew it by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He can.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to renew the motion.

Mr. ELIOT. I object; and call for the regular order of business.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 66) concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back January 12, 1864, with an amendment; amendment agreed to, ordered to be printed, and the further consideration postponed to Thursday, January 21.

The bill, which was read, provides that the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or appropriation of or damage to property by the Army or Navy, or any part of the Army or Navy, engaged in the suppression of the rebellion, from the commencement to the close thereof.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question on that bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maryland that the bill reported by him was postponed until the same day to which this bill was postponed.

Mr. WILSON. I will hear what the gentleman from Maryland has to say.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know what motion the gentleman from Iowa has submitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has demanded the previous question.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call for the previous question and allow me to move an amendment to the pending bill that which I now hold in my hand, and which has been printed for the information of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to make an inquiry of the Speaker. Was not the bill to which the gentleman from Maryland refers reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on the same day on which this bill was reported?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. WILSON. Then I will state to the gentleman from Maryland that the bill which he proposes to offer as an amendment to this bill will be the next report in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I will explain my object, if the gentleman will allow me a moment. As is very well understood by the House, the bill before us is one of vital importance to all the border States. The judges of the Court of Claims have signified, I believe, in an informal manner, that under the existing law they will take jurisdiction of claims of two several characters. One of these is a class of claims which I presume the House would not hesitate a moment to pay if the subject were brought fairly under their consideration. The class of claims to which I refer comprehends all cases where officers of the Army have taken and applied to the uses of the Army the property of persons, but have given them no certificates such as the forms and modes of proceeding of the War Department require, and that will enable them to obtain pay.

The Court of Claims have signified that they will entertain jurisdiction in all that class of claims which grow out of the occupation of the border States by our armies, of the plundering and the unauthorized depredations sometimes committed by our soldiers, and the appropriation sometimes to the uses of the Army of the property of the people of the border States.

Now, I do not think that when the House come to understand this subject they will agree to deprive the Court of Claims of all jurisdiction in both the classes of cases to which I refer without substituting for it some other tribunal, some other mode of redress to which the people may resort.

I propose, therefore, if the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the previous question, to submit the two amendments which I hold in my hand to the bill now under consideration, so that when we take from the Court of Claims the jurisdiction in these cases, we may substitute for that jurisdiction some other tribunal.

One of my amendments—and they are so framed as to enable the House to act separately upon each of them—proposes to authorize the Quartermaster General, or the Commissary General of Subsistence to take testimony in each several case of claim, and if satisfied that the property has been applied to the uses of the Government, to pass that claim over to the Third Auditor of the Treasury and direct it to be adjusted and settled. I will send my amendments to the Clerk's desk and have them read, and then, perhaps, what I have to say will be better understood.

Mr. WILSON. I do not yield for the purpose of having the amendments offered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for the purpose of having them read?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly. I have no objection to having them read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maryland that the bill proposed by him as an amendment will come up next in order after this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Chair will allow me to respond to that kind admonition I will say that I am unwilling to vote to deprive the Court of Claims of jurisdiction in these cases without substituting some other tribunal to decide upon these claims.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all claims for quartermaster's stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States may be submitted to the Quartermaster General of the United States, accompanied with such proofs as each claimant can present of the facts in his case; and it shall be the duty of the Quartermaster General to cause such claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of said Army, then to report each case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, with a recommendation for settlement.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all claims for subsistence actually furnished to said Army may be submitted to the Commissary General of Subsistence, accompanied with such proof as each claimant may have to offer; and it shall be the duty of the Commissary General of Subsistence to cause each claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and that the subsistence has been received or taken actually for the use of said Army, then to report each case for payment to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with a recommendation for settlement. And the action of the Quartermaster General, and of the Commissary General of Subsistence, as the case may be, and of the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be final and conclusive upon such claims, which may be paid either by special requisition and warrant, or by a disbursing officer of the quartermaster and subsistence departments, as the case may be, or as may in each case be most proper or convenient; and the officers paying shall be relieved from all liability for, or on account of, the property so paid for.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one commissioner and one solicitor of claims for the district composed of the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and the District of Columbia; one commissioner and one solicitor for the district composed of the States of West Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana; one commissioner and one solicitor for the district composed of the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Illinois; and one commissioner and one solicitor for the district composed of the States of Missouri and Kansas, who shall severally hold their respective offices during the pleasure of the President, and be entitled for their services to a salary of $— each per annum, to be paid quarterly, and such other sums as shall actually be expended or incurred by them for traveling expenses in the discharge of their duties under this act, and certified as reasonable by the Secretary of War or First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That each of said commissioners shall appoint a clerk and marshal for his district, who shall hold their offices during the pleasure of said commissioners, and perform such duties as may be required of them under this act. The clerk shall receive a salary of $—, and the marshal a salary of $—, to be paid quarterly, and, in addition, the amounts they shall actually expend for traveling expenses in discharging their duties under this act, and which shall be certified as reasonable by the Secretary of War or the First Comptroller of the Treasury. And said commissioners, solicitors, clerks, and marshals shall each take and subscribe an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully discharge the duties of their respective offices, and shall, in addition, take and subscribe the oath of allegiance required by the act of Congress passed August 6, 1861; which oaths shall be filed in the War Department.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners shall severally have cognizance of all claims against the United States arising in their respective districts, and which shall be presented to them by any person who, during the present rebellion, has sustained, or may sustain, damages by injury to or destruction of any property which has been or may be injured or destroyed by the use or occupation of our Army, or of any division or portion thereof: Provided, however, That all claims embraced in the provisions of this act not presented for adjustment and allowance within three years after the close of the present civil war or the suppression of the rebellion shall be forever barred.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the claimant or claimants who may present his claim under this act shall in every case make out an account against the United States, containing the items of such damages and losses, together with a statement of the circumstances attending the same, and names of the officers who commanded the troops by whom the damages or losses were occasioned, the time when, as near as may be, and place where, such losses and damages were sustained, which account shall be verified by the oath of the claimant to the effect that the account presented by him or her to said commissioner for adjudication is accurately stated; and that the prices charged are reasonable; and that the amount claimed is justly due after allowing all just credits and set-offs; that neither the whole or any part of said claim has been assigned or transferred, except as therein stated; and that he, she, or they have actually sustained the damages charged in said account as having been done to his, her, or their property by the troops of the United States, over and above the value of the portions of said property which remained after its injury or destruction; that the same damage or destruction has not been done by reason of any fraud, connivance, collusion, or procurement of the said claimant, or any other person or persons in his, her, or their behalf; and that no payment has been received by the claimant, or any person for him, for any part of said claim except as stated in said account; and that he has not given any receipt or voucher except as stated in said account, by which any officer of the United States or other person has received or can receive, as claimant believes, a credit therefor from the United States. Said claimant or claimants shall also exhibit and prove to said commissioner, his, her, or their title to the property, and the extent of their share or interest therein; and also furnish them with the names of all other persons, if there be any, who have any share or interest in said property, and their residence, as far as may be. Before presenting said claims to said commissioner the party or parties making the same shall publish in such public newspaper as shall be designated by the commissioner, published in or near the county in which he, she, or they reside, once in each week for four consecutive weeks, a notice containing a statement of the particulars and grounds of said claim, the locality of the property injured or destroyed; and that the same will be presented to the commissioner of claims under this act for adjudication, which notice shall state under whose authority, or under what circumstances, the property for which a claim is made was damaged, lost, or destroyed. Due proof of said publication shall accompany any account or claim presented to said commissioner under this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That said solicitor of claims shall represent the Government of the United States, and attend the examination of parties and witnesses in relation to any claim which may be pending before said commissioner of their respective districts, prepare interrogatories and cross-interrogatories, and superintend the taking of testimony, and render such other services as may be required of him from time to time by said commissioner.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall corruptly practice, or attempt to practice, any fraud against the United States in the statement or proof of any claim, or any part of any claim, against the United States under this act, shall forfeit the same to the Government; and it shall be the duty of said commissioner, in such cases, to make a special report of the facts and fraud which was practiced, or attempted to be practiced, to the Secretary of War; and in case he shall approve and concur in said report, the claimant shall be forever barred from prosecuting said claim.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That each commissioner shall have power to issue subpoenas to require the attendance of witnesses for examination before said commissioners, which subpoenas shall have the same force as if issued by a district court of the United States, and compliance therewith may be compelled under such rules and orders as said commissioner shall prescribe, and for the purpose of compelling the attendance of such witnesses, and taking their testimony, said commissioner shall have all the power of said district court.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That each commissioner shall adopt such rules and regulations for carrying this act into execution as the President of the United States shall approve, and publish the same for eight weeks successively in the newspapers in the several States and Territories in which the laws of the United States are published.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That each commissioner shall have power to hold their sessions at such times and places, in their respective districts, as they shall deem proper and conducive to the public interest and convenience of claimants. They may also, in their discretion, make a personal examination of any farm, boat, plantation, building, or property in relation to which any claim for losses or damages shall have been presented. They shall also have power to examine on oath any claimant, and all other persons, in relation to said claim, who have any knowledge thereof; and shall cause the testimony so taken to be reduced to writing and signed by the person taking the same; and shall return said testimony, with their proceedings and their several opinions in writing in relation to said claims, respectively, to the Secretary of War; and it shall be his duty to lay the same before the Congress of the United States at the commencement of the session next succeeding said return, to the end that such provision may be made for the relief of the claimants as shall be deemed just and proper.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners shall not take cognizance of any claim against the United States for any person who has in any manner favored or supported a secession ordinance in any State, or has engaged, or shall at any time engage, in the present rebellion against the Government of the United States, or given aid and comfort to those engaged in said rebellion. And it shall be the duty of each of said commissioners to inquire into and take testimony as to the loyalty of every person who has sustained loss or damage to his or her property during the present rebellion, and who may present their claims under this act; and also as to whether the said persons in any manner favored or supported a secession ordinance in any State, or in any manner supported or favored rebellion against, or resistance to, the laws of the United States. And no person who has engaged, or shall at any time engage, in the present rebellion against the Government of the United States, or been at any time hostile to such Government, or given aid and comfort to those engaged in said rebellion, shall derive any benefit under this act.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I cannot give way for the gentleman from Maryland to offer the two bills that have been read as amendments. In the first place the committee authorized me to report the first bill that has been read as an amendment, (sections two and three.) That bill is the next pending report, and will come up in regular order for consideration. The other bill has not been before the Judiciary Committee. It emanates from some other quarter, and treats of matters entirely foreign to the subject-matter. I cannot consent to have the report loaded down with a proposition of this kind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish the House to understand something about these claims, in order that we may protect the Government and Treasury against these enormous claims. I ask the Clerk to read the following letter from the Solicitor of the War Department, addressed to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, January 15, 1864.

SIR: Your letter of the 13th instant has been received, in which you have requested me to "state, if consist-with my views of public duty, the nature, extent, and character of the various claims which have come to my notice against the Government, growing out of the loss and destruction of property during the present rebellion; and also to make any general suggestions on the subject that may seem proper."

In reply I have the honor to state that a great variety of claims have been made against the United States, growing out of the loss or destruction of property in the southern States. Damages have been claimed by loyal citizens who have always resided in the northern States for real estate situated in the rebellious districts, and taken into possession of the Union troops for military purposes, as for quarters or for storage, or hospitals, barracks, &c.

Damages have also been asked by the same class of persons for personal property, as cotton, sugar, flour, horses, mules, wagons, agricultural implements, money of the United States, money of the confederates, hay, grain, corn, and all kinds of forage; wood for burning, and wood cut down but not removed from the spot when cut; and damages for crops trampled or eaten up by our cavalry, &c.

But by far the larger proportion of claims are made by persons residing in the disloyal districts for every species of real and personal property alleged to have been used, injured, seized, or destroyed, by our troops; fences burned, crops trampled down or consumed by the Army; horses, mules, beef cattle captured, seized, and taken away; money, furniture, and household articles lost or stolen; cotton captured, burned, used, lost, or damaged by dirt or otherwise in the use of it for military or naval forces. Every variety of personal property lawfully captured by our forces has been claimed or damages have been demanded for its use, detention, or destruction. Rents are continually requested for the use of real estate seized by our troops; property which has been condemned as lawful prize in our courts has been claimed, or its value in damages.

And what is singular, every claimant purports on affidavits to be a LOYAL CITIZEN, even when in some cases it is well known to the Department that the party really interested in the claim is actively engaged in rebellion at the time the claim is presented.

Respectable gentlemen, in many occasions, act as claim agents on behalf of the party interested.

Often it happens that shift is made in the title or apparent title of property in order that the party making the application may be deemed loyal. And were we to regard the evidence presented to this Department as conclusive on the question of loyalty, it would be doubtful whether there is or ever was a disloyal person in the seceded States.

Many claims have been made for property seized in attempts to violate the laws regulating the commerce with the inhabitants of the rebellious States. Few, if any, instances have occurred of claims for restoration of property seized in transitu on its course from Maryland, New York, or other States, to Virginia, without being accompanied by testimony of the loyalty, honesty, and high character of the claimant, even where he has been arrested and caught in the act of violating the law.

Rebel printing offices have been gutted out, secession houses have been burned, arms and munitions of war have been seized, vessels have been used, seized or captured by our forces, railroads have been taken for military use, their rolling stock has been worn out, tracks have been destroyed, bridges burnt or blown up, and every form of devastation and destruction has been inflicted on the enemy's property by our armies.

From all these injuries, the inevitable result of warlike operations, claims arise against the Government from some persons claiming to be LOYAL; even though residing in the districts at war with us. Whenever the armies move they scatter broadcast the prolific seed which will ripen into claims against the Government.

As to the character of these claims, so far as known to me, some of them have but a slight foundation in fact, many are purely fictitious, and a large proportion of them have been exorbitant and unreasonable.

Sometimes the amount of annual rent demanded for a piece of real estate is equal to half or the whole of its value. The valuation placed upon many articles has been more than ten times their real worth; and as a general statement these claims are of so gross and outrageous a character as to stamp them as fraudulent.

Although some claims of this class are fairly stated, yet it would seem as though it were thought fair game by some claimants to rob the Treasury to any practicable extent.

In answer to the inquiry as to the amount of these claims which have been or will be brought against the Government, I can only say that it is impossible to ascertain the aggregate. I believe that hundreds of millions of dollars will be required to satisfy these demands.

If it were now understood that they were allowed and promptly settled in the War Department and paid by the Treasury, I do not believe that we could carry on the war three months, for want of money or credit.

I look upon the army of claimants as really quite as formidable to the Government as the army of rebels; and if this great and impending danger is not looked in the face, and promptly and decisively met by Congress, I shall feel a diminished confidence in the ultimate preservation of our national honor.

In regard to all claims arising in the rebellious districts of the character above described, I have uniformly refused to acknowledge their legal validity, whether the claimant is loyal or otherwise. I have not felt at liberty to waive the legal right of the Government to act according to its own will and pleasure in recognizing these obligations. The question as to what shall and what shall not be conceded to persons, whether loyal or disloyal, friendly or hostile, who reside in those parts of the country now in rebellion, is a question of public policy to be settled by Congress. Congress may or may not assume such obligations. If they should amount to hundreds of millions of dollars, Congress may refuse by recognizing them to add such an amount to our national debt; but if they should be of comparatively trifling amount, a different policy might be justified.

Perhaps the time has not yet arrived when we can tell what is best to be done; for we do not know when the war will end, what will be the amount of our debt, nor what the extent of demands upon our national resources.

It therefore seems to me that we ought not to allow any court or tribunal to pass upon this class of claims in anticipation of the action of Congress, however small the amount involved may be, and the Government ought not to commit itself through any of its legislative or executive departments or through the Court of Claims, or by any commissioners or other functionaries, to an acknowledgment of the validity of claims of persons residing or having property in rebellious districts while the war is going on.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM WHITING,
Solicitor of the War Department.
Hon. ELIHU B. WASHBURN, U. S. Ho. of Reps.

Mr. WILSON. That letter, sir, presents the views of the case that obtained when all these claimants were pressing their claims upon the War Department for adjustment. The Solicitor of that Department decided not to entertain them. Then the claimants turned their attention to the Court of Claims, and there they are seeking every avenue of approach to the public Treasury. I hold in my hand the record of one case now pending in the Court of Claims. It was sent to me by a gentleman who is acting as attorney for the claimant, in order that I might see how great would be the hardship imposed on claimants if Congress should determine to withhold this jurisdiction from the Court of Claims. It is as follows:

"The petition of Mrs. Virginia Scott to this honorable court respectfully shows:

"That she is, and always has been, loyal to the Government of the United States. That she is the owner and occupant of certain lands in Fairfax county, Virginia, which have been occupied by the forces of the United States. That she has thereby suffered damage to the extent of $37,193 75, in the following particulars:

"Three acres and upward of wood cut down and used, of the value of $450. Two thousand five hundred and thirty-five panels of worm-fence, of the value of $1,826 25, carried off. Twenty acres of wheat, twenty-five tons of hay, hogs, cattle, and poultry destroyed up to July 29, 1861, amounting in value to $1,535; and since said last mentioned time, two hundred bushels of rye, of the value of $170. Five hundred bushels of oats, to the value of $250. Two hundred and fifty bushels of potatoes, to the value of $187 50. Two hundred and fifty bushels of green corn, amounting to $975. Garden vegetables to about the value of $100; besides much other damage to growing crops, which cannot be exactly ascertained and computed. A horse-shed, outbuildings, the underground pipes, water reservoir, and hydraulic ram, formerly attached to the mansion, taken down and carried off, to the value of $500. One carriage horse, worth $300. Farming utensils to the value of $500. Injuries to the dairy, the blacksmith's shop, and the iron fence around the grounds adjacent to the mansion, to the extent of $400. Thirty-four negroes, of whom the petitioner is the owner and entitled to their services, induced to run away by the soldiers; which services aforesaid this petitioner computes at least at $30,000.

"And your petitioner further shows that a part of this claim, to wit, the loss accruing before July 29, 1861, aforesaid, has been submitted to the War Department by Brigadier General O. O. Howard, but that no notice has apparently been taken of it. And further, that she is the only and sole owner of this claim.

"Wherefore she asks that she may receive relief for the loss and injury aforesaid in the said sum of $37,193 75."

Thirty thousand dollars out of the $37,193 75 claimed is asked as compensation for negroes who ran away from the estate. And this is but one of many claims of this character being pressed on the attention of the Court. Unless we take this matter into our own hands, and withhold jurisdiction of these cases from the Court of Claims, we will find, as the Solicitor of the War Department states, that hundreds of millions of dollars will be required to satisfy these claims. It may be that many of these claims should be paid, but we cannot pay them now. They must wait. They must pass along with the events of this war, and be adjudicated and paid when we can more fully consider them and provide for their payment. We cannot do it now.

There is another feature in these cases to which I wish to call the attention of the House. When these claims are resolved into judgments by the Court of Claims, Congress has no further jurisdiction over them. If, in the case to which I have referred, the court should render a judgment to pay $30,000 for the negroes escaped, Congress has no remedy but to direct its payment, under the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1863. After the judgment is rendered, all that is required to enable the party to get his money from the Treasury is to have a certified copy of the judgment to present to the Secretary of the Treasury. It may be said that Congress will have to make an appropriation. That is true. But we must remember that we have established this court, conferred upon it certain jurisdiction, authorized it to enter judgment, and provided that that judgment, when certified to the Treasury Department, shall be paid. So that we will be put in the attitude of repudiation, unless we make appropriations to pay the judgments rendered by this court.

I submit to the House whether we can at this time provide for the satisfaction of these claims, leaving out of consideration the question as to whether the citizen has a right to demand satisfaction at the hands of Government. We all know that all of these cases against the Government are based on a mere matter of grace, and not as a matter of right. No citizen has the right to demand of the Government compensation for injuries growing out of acts of the war. The compensation extended by the Government to the citizen is based upon the grace of the Government, and not upon the right of the citizen.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand him to say that the damages sustained by individuals from the Government itself, by the order of its generals, do not furnish a just claim against the United States?

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to inform the House, if it were not for the Court of Claims how any citizen could sue the Government? If it were not for that, how could any suit be brought against the Government?

Mr. STEVENS. When damage was caused by the Government, that no remedy was granted did not affect the right of the citizen, for that exists all the time until satisfied.

Mr. WILSON. I speak of the legal right of citizens to demand legal satisfaction. I say it never did exist since the first time it was declared that the king could do no wrong.

Now, if it were not, as I have stated, for the existence of the Court of Claims, no citizen could bring a suit against the Government. It is a mere matter of grace. We must not forget, sir, that the existence of the Government is of much more importance to all of the citizens than the immediate payment of any claims of any portion of the people of the country. It is not just, it is not right that these claims should be pressed upon the Government for adjustment and payment which will deprive us of the means of carrying on the war by the payment of the Army and the other necessary expenses of the Government. It is impossible that we should do it.

I am willing that the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] shall be taken up and passed, which provides for a class of cases which should be provided for—that is, where property has been taken for the use of the Army—where material has been taken for the use of the quartermaster and the commissary departments. I have no objection to the adjustment of those claims. They can be adjusted under the bill reported by the gentleman from Maryland. Insist that the House should not take these two bills together. They have no connection with each other. One refers to the Court of Claims and the other to the commissary of subsistence.

I therefore ask the gentleman from Maryland not to oppose this bill because I have refused to let this amendment come in, but to adopt the order of the House for the consideration of the bill, when I have no doubt the House will pass it. I ask to have action on this bill at once. We must cut off this jurisdiction, and do it speedily. We must do it before these claims are passed by the court. We must do it for the purpose of protecting the Treasury and to save the Government. Regarding this as of the utmost importance, I demand the previous question on the third reading and engrossment of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, if the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary had given attention—perhaps it is difficult to do so—to the proposition I have submitted for the consideration of the House, he would have found it entirely unnecessary to consume the time of the House by the reading of what I must style a clamorous letter from the War Department. Why, sir, there is nothing in either of the propositions a single one of any character touching the rebellious States. Not one. The propositions I have submitted are not my own—ill-digested as they might be if they were—but they come from the Committee on the Judiciary. They have been sanctioned by the entire committee. The other is nothing more than a report from the Committee of Claims, which a majority of that committee reported at the last session of Congress, and which received within a few votes of a majority of this House, having previously passed the Senate. As to the bill sanctioned by the Committee on the Judiciary I am glad to learn that it is the purpose of the chairman of the committee to adhere to the position taken in the committee, and vote for the bill when it comes up.

Now one single word in regard to that bill. If it were true that there was such a critical condition in the financial affairs of the Government as made it doubtful whether the Government could pay all these claims in full and still meet all the other claims pressing upon the Treasury, would it be unbecoming the Representatives of the border States to ask the Representatives of the States more remote from the theater of war to forego to a reasonable extent the receipt from the Treasury of the United States the claims of their constituents, in order that our constituents might receive part payment of theirs? If it be true that the Government of the United States is too much burdened in meeting the current expenses of the war to meet all these claims for forage, quartermaster and commissary stores which have been swept from the border States, would it be unbrotherly in us to invite gentlemen from other sections to forego in part their claims for cotton and woolen goods, arms, ammunition, and other Army supplies furnished by them, living far away from this storm of war, in order that we who have felt its heavy hand severely may partially receive our claims?

But is that true? May we not assume that the Secretary of War understands fully as well as the Solicitor of the War Department the ability of the Government to meet its engagements? And in the report of the Secretary of War made at the beginning of the present session he has particularly called the attention of Congress to the reasonableness and perfect justice of these claims, and he has frequently recommended legislation with a view to their prompt payment. I will set the information of the Secretary of War and his recommendations in the scale against those of the Solicitor of the War Department, and the opinion of the Quartermaster General against this clamorous outcry which is brought into this discussion. I repeat that we do not contemplate the payment of these claims in the insurrectionary and rebellious States.

But let us not confuse ourselves; let us see whether it is not reasonable that at least one of the amendments which I have offered should not be permitted to come before this House. What does it propose? Merely that we shall take up and dispose of the whole subject-matter of these claims against the Government at one and the same time; and that while we are restricting and removing the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims we shall substitute for that court some other tribunal. That is all. I should be very sorry to believe for a moment that the first class of claims provided for in my amendment will be ignored in this House upon any principle whatever. What is the nature of that class of claims? General McClellan, after the battle of Antietam, occupied and possessed with his army the county of Washington, in Maryland—and when I speak of my own county I presume I speak only what would be said by every Representative from the congressional districts of the border States—he occupied that section of the country for some three or four weeks. I have visited that section since. It is a most beautiful section of country, fertile, productive, and highly cultivated; is occupied by as sterling, as patriotic, and as faithful a population as exists in any section of this country, North or South.

Standing on an eminence from which I could take a view of the surrounding country four or five miles in every direction, what a revolting prospect presented itself for contemplation! Not a vestige left of all the works of a quarter of a century of diligent labor upon the part of that population; not an inclosure, scarcely a house left standing, no grain growing, the old crop all taken off, and not a living animal in view. All these things were swept away, not by the enemy, but by your Army, and appropriated to its use to supply it with necessary subsistence. We do not complain of the matter. We know the necessity which existed. We do not complain of the conduct of the officers upon the part of the Government which makes it necessary to bring this matter up for the consideration of Congress. The supplies thus seized by our Army have not in one instance out of twenty been paid for. Why? Because the quartermasters and other officers of the Government were negligent, or careless, or incompetent, and did not give the necessary certificates such as the accounting officers here could pay; and sometimes because they have not reported to the War Department that these quartermaster and commissary stores have been taken and supplied for the use of the Army.

Now, what does my bill, sanctioned by the Secretary of War, sanctioned by the entire Judiciary Committee, propose? Simply that the Quartermaster General and the Commissary General of Subsistence shall take these cases into consideration, receive testimony in the absence of the certificate of the quartermasters—many of whom are out of the service and many dead—and when satisfied that these quartermaster and commissary stores have been taken for the use of the Army, the Quartermaster General shall refer the claim to the Third Auditor for final adjustment. That is all, and I repeat that I cannot and will not believe it until I see it that those gentlemen who happen to represent sections of this country over which the storm of war has not passed will sit here, day after day, coolly and deliberately appropriating millions upon millions of dollars, and yet refuse to those who have to share in these burdens any participation in the means and resources of the Government. I do not concur with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee in the opinion that the finances of the country are in such a condition that the payment of these claims will seriously embarrass the Government; but even if that were so, my constituents are content to wait. These are claims for property that has been taken and applied to the uses of the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, as to the other amendment which I have offered, it is nothing more than a transcript of a bill—modified in some particulars—which was sanctioned by the Committee of Claims at the last session of Congress, which passed the Senate, and which has been sanctioned by the Committee of Claims of the present Congress. Let any gentleman read that amendment and he will find that there is not one word in it that can be construed by any man in Congress or out of Congress so as to justify its application to any claims growing up inside of the insurrectionary States. In express language it is confined to Maryland, Pennsylvania, the District of Columbia, West Virginia, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Tennessee, and Kentucky. It does not contemplate either the taking of any money from the Treasury; it involves no promise to pay; it imposes no obligation; it merely authorizes the appointment of commissioners, without judicial powers at all or any authority to pay, merely to collect the facts of the cases, that they may hereafter be reported to Congress for its final action. What danger is there in that, or what apprehension can gentlemen have? These claims are some day to be voted on “yea” or “nay.” They will be persisted in until they are finally disposed of by the Representatives of the whole American people. Can we not as well meet them now as hereafter, in this initiatory measure providing that testimony shall be taken and brought before the next Congress, or before the present Congress at its next session? It will then be competent for Congress, not only to postpone the whole subject indefinitely, but to select out of these claims, with great nicety and discrimination, all these cases that they think proper and ignore the balance.

Mr. WILSON. I have yielded to the gentleman almost all of my time, and I must now claim the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was not aware how rapidly time was passing; but I have had both the Solicitor of the War Department and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to reply to.

Mr. WILSON. I think the discussion of the question which the gentleman from Maryland has been discussing has taken the House entirely by surprise; and I am not willing that it shall be brought before the House for action now. And in order to settle this matter, members having now had abundance of time to consider it, I ask the House to sustain the previous question in order that it may be disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to inquire of the Chair as to what condition this bill was left in when it was last before the House?

The SPEAKER. The bill was postponed on the 12th day of January until the 21st day of January; and it now comes up for the first time in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. My recollection is that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary demanded the previous question and that it was seconded, and that the vote seconding it was afterwards reconsidered by a vote of this House with a view to debate and amend the bill. An amendment proposed by myself, saving the rights of claimants under contracts, was discussed; and while that amendment was pending, and while those in favor of such an amendment proposed, unless the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary agreed to admit that amendment, to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was by general consent postponed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the previous action of the House. The bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee on the 12th of January, and the previous question was moved and sustained. That was afterwards reconsidered by a vote of 71 to 69, which would have left the bill open to amendment, had it not been for the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The pendency of that motion prevented any amendment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Schenck] rose and said that he desired to offer an amendment, which was debated at some length, but was not offered in consequence of the pendency of the motion. Finally, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Wisconsin withdrew his motion, and the bill was postponed till the 21st of January. It is now reached in regular order. The gentleman from Ohio, having reported the bill, was recognized, and therefore the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio has not yet been properly before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to have the amendment read for information.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot consent to the amendment, and therefore I do not withdraw the previous question.

Mr. GRIDER. Will the gentleman yield to me? Mr. WILSON. I cannot.

Mr. GRIDER. Then I hope the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. WILSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and THOMAS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 69.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now offer this amendment: Add to the bill the words:

Except in cases sounding in contract where food, forage, or other property for the actual use of the Government has been taken and certificates or other evidence of indebtedness in writing by some officer of the United States authorized to take said property given therefor.

I desire to say that I am not unfriendly to this bill, as believing in the necessity of some such legislation. I have only sought to perfect that legislation according to my best judgment by offering the amendment of the character of that now reported, and which, when the bill was up before, I brought to the attention of the House. This bill takes away from the Court of Claims jurisdiction in all these cases arising out of claims for property taken during the war. I desire to save that jurisdiction by adding those words to the bill, so that where there is outstanding some written evidence of property having been taken, that written evidence given by some officer authorized to take the property, and that property having been used or applied for the benefit of the Government, the court may have jurisdiction. If an amendment of that kind prevail, I will have no objection to vote for the bill.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee is entirely mistaken in supposing that such an amendment is offered with any view of defeating the general objects of the bill itself. To show, however, what was the disposition with which this amendment was offered before, I will now have read a portion of the debate which took place on the 12th of last month when the bill was before the House. I ask for the reading of a single paragraph showing the temper with which the amendment was offered and sustained at that time by gentlemen on both sides of the Hall, who concurred with me in the saving of so much jurisdiction as is absolutely necessary to advance the rights of the party having a just claim against the Government.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to have reports of debates read here?

The SPEAKER. It can be read as part of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I have the right to object, I do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could object to having the proceedings of the other House read by anybody. The gentleman from Ohio has a right to have an extract from the debates of this House read as part of his speech.

The Clerk read from the report of Mr. SCHENCK's remarks in the Globe of January 13, as follows:

"But as to that wide extent of claims which will be heaped up mountain high against this Government for ground simply trodden over, for ground encamped upon, for timber incidentally destroyed, for horses let loose, for fences burned, if you open the door to cases of that kind, you will bankrupt the Treasury before you get through the war. And I say plainly and distinctly that, although I admit the justice of many of these claims, but to a much smaller amount and degree than applied for, we ought to postpone the consideration of the whole of them, and use all our means first to put down the rebellion, and pay that part of the cost of it hereafter. Believing that to be the case, I propose to limit the inquiry to matters of contract, where property has been actually taken, used, and enjoyed by the Government, and adjourn inquiry into these other questions until after the rebellion is put down."

Mr. SCHENCK. What I said then I repeat now: that, while I am unwilling to throw open the door to all these classes of claims for wrongs done, for incidental damages, I yet think we ought, so far as is proposed by this amendment, to save the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and let in applications of the class described and limited by the terms of this amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I now move the previous question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to accept a modification of his amendment. I know a great number of cases where, for want of time, the Army being in retreat or pursuit, property was taken without vouchers being given for it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose the gentleman only desires to advance the public good. That is what I desire. When I proposed to introduce bills here the gentleman objected. I propose to set him an example by yielding to him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am a man always "tractable to any honest reason," and the manners of which he complains I have borrowed from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] Late one evening he pressed an important bill through the House when almost every gentleman on this side of the House was absent, and took a gentleman off the floor to do it unexpectedly to us, and he refused, though it could not affect the result, to permit us to record our votes the next morning.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not see any impropriety in my course when the House was left almost without a quorum by the absence especially of many of my own friends against my own remonstrance. I gave notice that I would object to any one of them casting a vote afterwards on the bill. I meant it as a warning to gentlemen on the other side. I did not want it to appear that gentlemen were here transacting public business when they were not present. If it fell upon gentlemen upon the other side it was accidental. I will say that I am going to set a good example to the gentleman. I think that he is going to amend this bill for the public good, and I am willing to hear what he has to say.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We thought the gentleman's objection to our voting was meant for us and not his friends whom it is our pleasure to watch. It is an old maxim, Save me from my friends and I will attend to my enemies. I am glad the little attention I have given the gentleman from Ohio has burnished his courtesy. I never refuse to yield the floor in debate.

I ask the gentleman to modify his amendment. I know a great many cases where quartermasters, under the directions of the general commanding in the field, have taken forage, subsistence, and many other kinds of property necessary and proper for the Army when it was in retreat or on the march without having time to give any vouchers. There were no pen and paper at hand at the time, perhaps, and there was no time if there had been to draw up a voucher. I ask the gentleman to modify his amendment so as to embrace cases of that kind. I refer to the retreat from Cumberland Gap of General George Morgan through my district. The people of that country are loyal. They brought all that they had to our Army. They brought horses, forage, and subsistence, and the quartermasters received them, and the Army used the property. In many instances they gave imperfect vouchers. In no single instance did they give a perfect voucher. In some they gave imperfect vouchers, and in most of the cases none at all. What I desire is, that this class of cases shall have the same justice as the others. I ask the gentleman to modify his amendment by saying, "or where from want of time or other cause no voucher was given."

Mr. SCHENCK. I am afraid to open the door so far. This is a question to give jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, and I prefer to confine it to those cases where there is some paper given by the proper authorities, and to leave legislation in regard to the other claims to be taken care of in another bill. I cannot accept the gentleman's proposition for that reason.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to urge the importance of the proposition of my colleague. When Morgan went through my State on his raid, a member of this House, my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] commanded the troops which went after him. Those troops took horses and other property, and in the hurry of passing through they could not give vouchers in all cases. In some cases vouchers were given; but in the majority of the cases none were given. I am now written to by men in my district who suffered to procure vouchers from my colleague for property taken; but he refuses upon the ground that he is out of office. My colleague himself took this property, and can testify to these facts. Yet gentlemen refuse to allow these claims to be satisfied.

There were never more just claims upon the Government. I know that some of my constituents had their property taken for the use of the Army and that the quartermasters went off without giving them any vouchers. They have never been paid a cent for their property which was taken. Will gentlemen get up and say that that class of cases shall not be paid upon the plea that the officers did not do their duty in not furnishing vouchers for property taken? I ask the gentleman from Ohio to accept the amendment of my colleague in order that that class may be embraced. They are just and equitable claims, and I trust that this House is not ready to repudiate any part of its honest debt at this early day. Why do you refuse to pay men upon the outskirts of this war, while in all other portions of the country you pay for everything you get? It seems to me these are too just claims for gentlemen to contend that they shall be laid aside to await payment at the end of the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] allow me a single moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. We of the border States most cordially thank the gentleman from Ohio for the motion he has made to amend this bill. If the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary be passed—which God forbid—and the amendments I have proposed be rejected by this House, yet we will not be left altogether in an unprotected condition, because, under the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, we will have yet open one tribunal to which our constituents may appeal for justice. But I respectfully call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that the cases of the character which he proposes to provide for are very numerous, and range in amount from five dollars to five thousand. It will be readily perceived, therefore, that if they are to go before one tribunal, like that of the Court of Claims, there will be a physical impossibility to render judgment in all those numerous cases within any reasonable period of time.

Again, the gentleman will reflect that if the Court of Claims is to have jurisdiction of these cases, no claim agents can appear there; none can appear but educated lawyers who have some knowledge of special pleadings and of the forms of proceedings used in that court, and who generally sell their knowledge at a very large premium. The gentleman will perceive, therefore, that he will add enormously to the costs of these claimants if, instead of the ordinary channels of the Quartermaster General's office, and the office of the commissary of subsistence, these claimants have to appear before the Court of Claims.

If we who represent these claims more particularly—and I hope we have not reached that period of time in our history when we have not all a fellow-feeling, coextensive at least with the border States, and comprehending in our sympathy every man within the jurisdiction of the Government who sincerely acknowledges his loyalty—I say if we are to be denied the remedy I have proposed, the remedy offered by the gentleman from Ohio is certainly better than nothing. Under it we would get our claims through in the course of years. Those claims are probably five thousand in number, and take a wide range in amount. I hope the House will not on this occasion come to the same determination reached by the Judiciary Committee. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, but I shall vote against the bill as amended, unless we can also have the amendment I have proposed. I hope that if the House comes to the conclusion that they will repeal the law which gives jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, they will substitute for it the officers in the Treasury Department in the manner proposed by my amendment.

I conclude my remarks by asking the gentleman from Ohio to move my amendment as a part of his amendment, so as to give the House an opportunity to vote upon them all seriatim.

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer not to do that, and I will state briefly why.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the gentleman to allow me a few moments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me that the House can come to a safe determination upon these various propositions. House bill No. 66 was reported from the Judiciary Committee, and, I believe, with unanimity. It takes from the Court of Claims jurisdiction of any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction of property, or for damages to property, by the Army or Navy. The committee thought it necessary to do this in order to save the Government from the appearance of the recognition of claims which, whether just or not, we are not in a condition to meet. We thought it necessary to relieve the Treasury from all claims actual or possible in present circumstances, growing out of the incidents of a condition of war. That is exactly what is proposed by the first part of the bill reported by the committee.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio proposes to except from that exclusion all claims for damage or destruction of property sounding in contract. I do not know how clear may be the distinction in Ohio between actions sounding in contract and in tort; but in Massachusetts, where we have, by the judgment of this side of the House, some very good lawyers of the second class, and by the judgment of the other side of the House, lawyers of the first class, it is not settled either by the bar or the bench that it can in all cases be decided whether an action sounds in contract or tort. And hence we have a provision of law that a cause may be tried without knowing whether it be an action on contract or in tort.

Now, it is proposed to authorize the Court of Claims to investigate claims presented, and ascertain, in the first place, whether the action sounds in contract or in tort, and if it sounds in contract, to proceed to adjudicate it and tax the Treasury of the country with the amount allowed.

It happened to be my fortune to serve upon a military commission at Cairo for five or six weeks in the summer of 1862, and we had presented to us from the States of Missouri, Kentucky, and Illinois more than sixteen hundred claims against this Government.

I submit that this is not the time to leave to the Court of Claims jurisdiction in these matters. I am, therefore, in favor of the bill and opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] asks that a bill reported by him from the Judiciary Committee shall be adopted as an amendment to this bill. I think it was the understanding of the Committee on the Judiciary that the first bill, the one reported by the chairman of the committee, should be acted upon separately, and the gentleman from Maryland had assurances of the support of the committee to his bill, but not as an amendment. This being a different bill, and upon a different subject, it seemed to the committee, proper that the judgment of the House should be taken on each question as a separate proposition. While, therefore, the Committee on the Judiciary are ready to sustain the bill reported from the committee by the gentleman from Maryland, I think it ought not to be offered as an amendment to the bill reported by the chairman of the committee.

I will say further that the bill reported by the gentleman from Maryland covers all the cases that ought to be covered. If any person in this country has furnished subsistence to the Army, either to the quartermaster's department or the department of the Commissary General, he is to be paid in the ordinary way, and we go behind the ordinary vouchers. The officers of the Government are instructed by the bill, if it becomes a law, to investigate to the foundation the justice of these claims and to pay them, and the constituents of the gentleman from Maryland and the constituents of all the gentlemen from the border States will receive pay for all that they have furnished to the Army of the country, either in the commissary or in the quartermaster's department, and that is all they ought to ask.

Now, what I say is, first, that in my judgment the House should reject the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and the amendments submitted by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] and that it should pass the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary first, and then, when the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee by the gentleman from Maryland, and which he offers as an amendment to this bill, to which, in my judgment, it is not germane, comes up, we can pass that bill giving to every person who has furnished supplies to the Army compensation under the law.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] why persons holding such certificates as are described in his amendment cannot now receive from the Government the amounts which their certificates show to be due?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is frequently informality in the papers.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman says then, in effect, that the evidence of the certificates is not sufficient to support the claims before the several Departments of the Government; but he proposes to refer these claims to the Court of Claims, for the purpose of having judgment rendered against the Government upon evidence which is not sufficient to support the claims before the Departments. That is the effect of it, and I therefore hope the House will not concur in the views of the gentleman from Ohio, and will vote down his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am inclined to think that I occupy a sort of golden mean between the objections made upon the one side and the other, and therefore I am perhaps nearly right.

I had not intended to be drawn into any discussion of this bill, but the inquiries that have been made by gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and the suggestions which have been made in regard to modifications of the amendment which I have offered, make it proper for me perhaps to say this much: I am as much impressed as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] who last occupied the floor can be with the necessity, at some time, of considering the vast amount of just claims originating in this war upon the part of citizens against the Government. I believe, as he does and as the gentleman from Maryland does, that there are, especially in the border States, a great number of cases of much hardship, cases where property has been destroyed, where property has been necessarily taken, and families left destitute and thrown on the charities of the world, without the Government having given, as yet, any compensation.

But, without any further argument on that point, I say again that such is the present condition of the country, so far as these claims are of the character of incidental damages, so far as they are consequential to the war, so far as they are unsustained by any of that clear, decisive form of proof which makes it safe and proper to give jurisdiction of inquiry into the merits of the case to the courts of the country, I feel it necessary that jurisdiction of the cases should, for the present at least, be withheld.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has alluded, as a reason why I should have accepted the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] to the circumstances that attended the Morgan raid. Property was taken for which, in the hurry, no voucher of any kind was given, and yet that property was applied to the use of the Government. I know that that is not only true as to the State of Kentucky, but is also true—to some extent, but not so far—in regard to the raid which took place in my own State. Very often both parties were in such hurry that they took very little time to consider what they did or how it had been done.

I have limited my amendment to the terms in which it is worded for the reason that I wished to take care not to open the door too wide. The bill, as reported from the Judiciary Committee, takes away jurisdiction entirely from the Court of Claims. I wish to save it so far as I think it should be saved. I am not willing to open the door to the extent to which gentlemen on the other side would like me to, by modifying my amendment according to their views. But I am equally sure that I do not dangerously open the door notwithstanding what has been urged against my amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL.] He says it is impossible to distinguish between claims sounding in contract and those which partake of the character of tort. He has not listened carefully to my amendment. The words "sounding in contract" are by no means the only limitation of the grant of jurisdiction. They are to be cases sounding in contract for food, or forage, or property actually taken for the use of the Government, and with some certificate or evidence in writing given by the officer authorized by the laws of the United States to take the property. All these limitations on the grant of jurisdiction are extended over the cases, making it very different from what it would be, and very much more limited than it would be, if it simply said that all cases sounding in contract should be considered by the court. Repeating, sir, that perhaps I have struck what is about the safest medium course to be pursued in regard to limiting the jurisdiction of the court, I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. THOMAS. I now propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by substituting for it the proposition which I have the honor to submit to the House. I signified before that the Judiciary Committee—I hope I am not trespassing on any rule by stating what transpired in that respect—after full examination of the whole subject, came to the conclusion that it would report a bill taking away from the Court of Claims a right to exercise jurisdiction in these cases. At the same time the Judiciary Committee sanctioned a bill authorizing the payment by the accounting officers of the Treasury of all claims growing out of the appropriation of property for the use of the Army. The two bills, therefore, proceed on an entirely different theory. The bill reported from the Judiciary Committee and the bill which I propose do not conflict. They proceed entirely on the supposition that the accounting officers of the Treasury are better qualified to adjust these cases than the Court of Claims.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] proposes to continue the Court of Claims as the tribunal to try and determine these claims—to allow them a limited jurisdiction. He would deprive the court of jurisdiction in all cases of damage, and allow jurisdiction in all cases sounding in contract. I stand in this dilemma, and I presume that the Committee on the Judiciary will coincide with me in this. I cannot vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio; for if adopted it will give an imperfect remedy for these wrongs. It will leave the jurisdiction in a tribunal incompetent to discharge it. It will confer power upon the Court of Claims to examine into all of these claims ranging, as I have said before, from five to five thousand dollars and thousands in number. They are to be brought before the Court of Claims to be disposed of one after another; and I will not be extravagant in saying that they will occupy that court for the next twenty-five years. In the mean time nearly the whole amount will be absorbed by the lawyers who are pressing the claims before this tribunal. At each new trial a new fee is to be asked. In the course of twenty-five years the Government will not be relieved, for ultimately the Government will pay every dollar of these debts—not to those who have suffered, but to the lawyers who have been presenting these claims.

It is because I am anxious to see these parties who have lost this property paid now and paid the whole amount without delay, that I am opposed to the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. WILSON] even when amended as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and I propose, if the House will reject that amendment, to offer a substitute upon a different theory and for a tribunal which, in my judgment—but each gentleman will judge for himself—is the very best that we can have. I propose that every claim shall be made before the Quartermaster General, and that where he discovers negligence or ignorance on the part of officers in failing to give proper vouchers he shall be at liberty to inquire into the claim, and then if satisfied that the claim is a just one for property taken for the public use he shall thereupon send it to the Third Auditor for payment. I propose, also, that the Commissary General shall take charge of all cases in his department.

I make the proposition upon the ground that these claims can be prosecuted in the quartermaster and commissary departments without much loss. There will be no lawyer required. Any claims agent is competent to press them, even though he has not been educated to the technicality of the law. His charges will be moderate. Besides all of that there will be more expedition, because we know the head of a bureau does not in practice undertake to inquire into the details of every case, but leaves that to be done by some subordinate in whom he confides, reserving to himself the final judgment. The Quartermaster General, then, we may presume, will rapidly go through with all of these cases. Some will be adopted, and others will be rejected. The party who has suffered, and not the lawyers, will be paid. It is not for the lawyers who will clamor for this and take every cent, but for the people who have been wronged, that I am advocating the measures I have presented to the House.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio falls short of the second proposition I propose to offer to the House. These claims are not mixed up; they are not confused; they are not conglomerated; they are luminously distributed, so that the members of the House may vote for whatever class they desire. The additional proposition I shall ask to submit contemplates not the creation of a tribunal, but of a commissioner, like a commissioner in chancery, to cull and collate the facts. After the collection of the evidence one claim out of five hundred may not be paid. This testimony arranged in luminous order is to go before a future Congress. The probability is that the duty cannot be performed in less than two or three years. The testimony will be voluminous; and it is to be prepared and submitted to Congress for final determination at a future day.

Let me pause here to say that the majority of the House do not mean that the border States should lose both classes of claims. They are willing to delay those sounding in damages. It cannot be that the Representatives of a free people are willing that these people shall lose both classes of claims against the Government of the United States for the damage inflicted upon them.

My propositions are therefore in such form as to elicit the opinions of the House, separate and distinct, and not in a confused manner. The second and third amendments I have moved cover the first class of claims. It would be a great relief to those persons if these claims could be paid. Why, sir, it seems amazing to me that any man could find himself at the head of a regiment as a colonel and make out such papers as I have been compelled to pore over times almost without number. A large number of these claims have been certified to by a board of survey. Two or three officers have been detailed for the purpose of making the survey, and in these boards of survey they have conglomerated almost all kinds of materials. They have assessed matters of damage, and at the same time have estimated the value of property taken. Well, when such a voucher as that is presented to the Department, the Quartermaster of course ignores it, as there is a regulation of the War Department which forbids the payment of damages in any case. The officers point to the orders of the War Department which forbid the payment of vouchers for property which has been taken for the Army unless it is certified to by the officers who took the property that it was so taken, and unless the officer has also made a report of the fact to the War Department and charged himself with the property. Now, these vouchers are defective in the manner I have designated, and the remedy is in the Quartermaster General and Commissary of Subsistence, who may go beyond the certificate, and who shall not take advantage of the wrong of the Government officer. The remedy is in their taking up the subject de novo, and receiving evidence that the property was taken and applied to the use of the Army.

In no case and under no circumstances do I propose in any amendment to come within the purview of that letter from the Solicitor of the War Department. There is not one word in the amendment I propose which contemplates taking jurisdiction over any claim, either for property taken or damage done inside of the insurrectionary States. I contemplate no such measure. Whenever we of the border States come before Congress asking only to be paid for our property taken, and express our willingness to postpone all controversies in relation to the payment of damages done by the armies of the United States, it strikes me we present ourselves in a form and after a fashion which will meet the approbation of a large majority of the members of Congress.

I conclude by moving to strike out the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and substituting for it the amendment which I have indicated.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a point of order. It is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland is not germane to the bill. The bill relates to the Court of Claims and its jurisdiction, while the amendment relates to the Quartermaster General and his duties.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he would be inclined to sustain the point of order if the gentleman from Iowa had raised it in time. The gentleman from Maryland introduced his proposition and debated it at some length without objection being made, and therefore the Chair thinks it is too late to raise the question of order, although the Chair thinks the amendment is hardly germane to the bill.

Mr. KING. I desire, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, to submit a few remarks upon this subject. I fully concur in the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary relative to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, because

I can see that without this legislation very great wrong may perhaps be done to the Government. On the other hand, I see that it may so induce delay in regard to just claims for unliquidated damages to have such cases liquidated by that court, that it will almost amount to a party giving up his claim. Therefore I desire to see some more expeditious remedy established, by which parties who have just claims may have them adjudicated. But I object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] for the reason that in my opinion it will not embrace the hard cases which exist in the country growing out of the operations of the war. He makes the adjudication depend upon a contract, and that contract evidenced by some kind of writing by which it may be known that there was a contract existing. But there are a great many claims in which that character of evidence could not be, and cannot be, produced. And here I will ask by whose fault, by whose act or conduct, or neglect, has it become necessary that we should have any legislation upon this subject? A necessity for legislation is admitted upon all hands, and I ask—and we ought to settle the question in this House—whose fault is it that there is a necessity for legislation?

Was it the fault of the farmer that when the military authorities came along and took his corn, his bacon, his horses, his beef cattle, and his stock of every kind, the proper officer—the quartermaster or commissary—did not discharge his duty by giving him proper and legal vouchers which no one could controvert? If the officers of the Government had done their duty there would have been no occasion for these claimants to have come before the House. The officers of the Government neglected their duty. Sometimes they gave those from whom they obtained supplies a little slip of paper, which they knew very well would not operate as a voucher. But the plain, honest countryman supposed when he received a little piece of writing from a military officer that that was all that was needed to enable him to receive his pay. I have seen a number of such cases. And when these farmers who had furnished supplies went to the quartermaster's department and the commissary department they were told that, although there was no doubt they had furnished the supplies, the papers they held were not legal vouchers. I have known many such cases; and have had my pockets full of such papers, and have had to aid men in hunting up the proper officers to get the proper vouchers. I have known many men to abandon their claims, because they could not find a quartermaster or a commissary or the proper officer to furnish them with proper certificates. Why, sir, when a man gets a quartermaster's voucher all properly made out, he has to have a certain certificate put upon it, and then it has to be presented to the officer in command of the post, the department, or the regiment, as the case may be, and he must indorse his approval upon it. Now, if the officers of the Government had discharged their duty properly these people would only have had to present their vouchers to the paymaster's department, and get their money. Does it make the claim of these men any worse, or weaken the obligation of the Government to pay for property which has been furnished for the use of the Government, that some military officer of the Government, through ignorance or negligence, has not done his duty? The fault is not in the remotest degree with the men who have furnished the Government with supplies.

The claims presented under this bill will have to go through the quartermaster's department or the commissary department, or some one of the Government departments, and unless the department is satisfied that the claims are just the men will get no pay. All we want is an opportunity to present our claims. Why, sir, I know of cases in which the quartermasters, whose duty it was to give certificates to the men from whom supplies have been obtained, and without which certificates the men cannot get their pay under the present regulations, are dead or have moved away, and we do not know where they are; and yet we have positive evidence that would satisfy any court and jury in the country that the claims are just and honest. All we want is an opportunity to present them.

In reference to the other branch of the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, there is justice in that also. I was struck with the force of a remark made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] when he asked if there was not an obligation upon the part of the Government to pay damages for property destroyed or taken for the use or benefit of the Government—destroyed sometimes with a view to deprive the enemy of the power of making use of it to annoy and injure us, and bring destruction upon our forces. There is a moral and a legal obligation on the Government to do it. It is true that we may not have the means ready, but the obligation unquestionably exists, and the question is now presented to the House whether or not we will recognize the obligation of the Government by our legislation here. We do not propose any appropriation for this class of cases. It is certainly a very slow process by which to obtain our just rights, but we are willing to submit to it.

Sir, hundreds of claims are pressing themselves upon the border State members here every day. Our tables are loaded down with letters from our constituents setting forth the most outrageous wrongs that they have suffered at the hands of the Government. We do not propose to take up each case and ask appropriations which would amount to millions and millions of dollars. We do not ask any such thing, because Congress may do wrong sometimes as well as do right. Congress cannot investigate these cases.

What then do we propose? We propose that the President shall appoint a commission, with a solicitor learned in the law, who shall protect the interests of the Government, and who shall give notice to claimants to come forward and make proof of their claims. The commission shall certify all the facts connected with the claims to the Secretary of War, who will lay them before Congress. For what? There is no obligation on Congress to appropriate money to pay them. Is there anything wrong in that? Is this House afraid to leave the matter to the decision of future Congresses? The people will lose confidence in the Government if the House show any such feeling.

Then there is a provision in this bill that unless claims are presented within three years after opportunity is had for their presentation, they shall be forever barred. I do not want them to go on for an interminable length of time. Three years is long enough for these claimants to have. We want the evidence of their claims as perpetuating testimony. Let them have the means of perpetuating the testimony legally, even though the claims may not be paid for the next twenty-five years to come. The Government cannot be harmed by that. If Congress do not choose to make appropriations to pay the claims, still the testimony will stand as a perpetual memento of the claimants' rights. The loyalty of the claimants will also be inquired into and reported upon.

I know that a bill has been reported by the Committee of Claims which substantially embraces the same cases as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] and I am informed that it contains a provision by which the loyalty of the claimant is to be tested. I do not advocate the payment of disloyal men for any property which may have been destroyed, or which they may have lost through their own fault. In civil wars like this the good have to suffer with the bad. We only ask that the right of loyal men to compensation for property taken for the use of the Army may be acknowledged.

The people of the northern States have been prospering during this war, while we of the border States have been laboring under a cloud of troubles and difficulties. If I undertook to recount them they would startle gentlemen and almost make them incredulous. Let us, at least, have our just rights recognized by the Government. Let us have these commissions organized. There can be no good objection to the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland. I fully concur in the propriety of taking this jurisdiction from the Court of Claims; but, at the same time I ask, on behalf of the people of my district, on behalf of the people of Missouri, that they shall have an opportunity of perpetuating the testimony of their claims. We will wait patiently if we see a disposition on the part of the Government to do justice; but we will necessarily grow impatient if, on the other hand, we see that our claims are to be ignored and disregarded.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee is designed simply to take away from the Court of Claims jurisdiction over the class of cases affected by it. The committee had been told that the Court of Claims had assumed to act in regard to certain of these questions; and understanding that the Government itself had already established the means whereby claims of this character could be adjudicated and paid better than they could be by the court, with able lawyers and competent accountants to examine the matter, deemed it unwise to have another jurisdiction for the accomplishment of the same objects.

It is true, sir, that in point of fact the only point which the committee claimed to decide, or would be decided by the bill reported by their chairman this morning, was this: shall the Court of Claims have jurisdiction over these cases when another authority has already jurisdiction? Shall the Government employ two jurisdictions? Will the Government be safer by such a course? Will the people be safer by establishing two independent jurisdictions? The committee thought not.

Then this point arises: it is said that a large number of these claims will be thrown out by the Department, because, relying upon the strict rules of law as construed by them, requiring the papers to contain a certificate that the property was taken for the use of the Army, and requiring that certificate to be executed in a particular way, that in this way a large class of just claims for property taken legitimately for the use of the Army, and of a character which the Government ought to pay for, will be rejected on account of some informality growing out of the neglect or carelessness of the officers who had a right to take the property.

The amendment of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS], introduced before the committee and reported this morning, was intended as a remedy for this evil which has been so much complained of, and which constitutes a real hardship. It provides that where claims are so presented for adjudication to the Department, written evidence may be presented, from persons competent to take it, and that even though it be not precisely in conformity with the regulations of the Department, if it be legal and competent evidence, showing that the property was taken under proper authority and in a legitimate way, such evidence shall be received by the Department as proof of the claim.

Then, by the adoption of the bill as presented by the gentleman from Maryland, this defect in the present law would find an adequate remedy. Under that amendment, where property has been taken for food, where it has been taken for forage, or taken for the use of the Army, it would be paid for under that law, the matter having been first adjudicated upon by the Department. In other words, if a man's corn was taken for food, or if it was taken for forage, or if his hay was taken for forage, if he presented proper and legal evidence of the fact to the Department, whether in strict accordance with the technical rules now in force or not, showing that it was properly taken for the public use, it would be paid for.

What is the objection to the amendment introduced by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK]? It is simply that so far as we ought to pay these claims now, it imposes no new obligation upon the Government which does not already exist. It gives the claimant no right or power or remedy that does not already exist under the law. It says that the Court of Claims, not the Auditor, who, by the experience of more than half a century has become familiar with all the circumstances under which such claims can be presented, who can act upon it intelligently, who understands precisely the principles upon which they should be allowed, shall pass upon these claims.

Now, the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and which may be entirely in conflict with that already existing, have no right to take and allow any claim for this property which cannot be allowed now by the quartermaster's and commissary departments, and certainly not if the bill reported by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] to the committee and offered to-day as an amendment to this bill shall meet the approval of the House.

This subject of claims arising from tort, so far as this Government is concerned, is a perfect futility. There may be claims for damage which may not come up under the rules of the Department for adjudication, however hard it may be upon the person who suffers it. But whatever a Government takes for the use of its Army, or for any necessary purpose in the prosecution of war, has always been considered in the nature of a contract. It is an implied contract. But I say the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is right; he is right to-day, as he would have been a hundred years ago, in saying that the "king can do no wrong." Sir, the Government here in the prosecution of this war can in law do no wrong. Whatever property the Government takes, it takes upon contract, express or implied.

But the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] extends the power. It says that property "taken for food and used, and forage with other property." Now, sir, I am not going to quarrel with my friends on the other side of the House. I am naturally as liberal as they are. I am certainly desirous that this war shall be brought to an end with the least possible loss of property and life; to an honorable end. I am desirous that every dollar the Government can properly pay and which ought to be paid shall in the end be paid. But I say if we extend this to other property which the Government has taken as a matter of necessity, such as cutting down the fences of a man's farm, forage that may be valuable, and timber for the comfort of the soldier, or to build fortifications; if we include those cases, and they are legion, too numerous to mention; I say if we undertake to pay them now, if we undertake to pass a law for that purpose, then we shall have the condition of things referred to by the Solicitor of the War Department in his letter read this morning, and the Government will be called upon to pay hundreds of millions of dollars. I say that as a matter of necessity we must restrict the payment of the claims of loyal citizens by reason of this war. The time may come, and doubtless will come, when all of these claims will be paid, when a recuperated Treasury will be able to pay them.

Let me say here that in my judgment, within ninety days after an honorable peace the securities of the Government will be sought for abroad, when we will be able to do justice to every citizen who has suffered by this war. Now we cannot do it.

Gentlemen talk about horses—that men cannot get pay for horses that have been lost. I do not understand that this is for horses or cattle that have been taken for the use of the Army, for I understand when properly presented to the Department claims for horses taken for the use of the Army, or for cattle for subsistence of the Army, are paid now.

Mr. Speaker, the simple question is this: Shall we give this jurisdiction to the Court of Claims? I have nothing to say against it. I do not know that it is not one of the most safe and useful courts established by the Government. But I do say when you open the door, when you give to them jurisdiction respecting such claims as we have under consideration, there is an opportunity for fraud which will escape their attention, but which will never escape the eagle-eye of the men used to such matters from experience for years and years, and whose sole business is to alike protect the citizen and the Government. If there were no other remedy at hand, if there were no other means by which these claims could be properly adjudicated, I might then say, go to the Court of Claims; but I do say that in the prosecution of this war where claims arise legitimately from the necessities of the case let them be presented, adjudicated, and paid at the Department which has this whole war under its eye and all the time devoting its attention to this matter. In that the Government will be the saver, and, in my judgment, the rights of the citizen will be equally protected.

Mr. GRIDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state the facts existing in the border States. I desire, if I can, to present as an illustration the condition of the third congressional district of Kentucky. The people of that region had been under the ban and the heel of the rebellion for at least six months when our armies were sufficiently reinforced and organized to come to their relief. They came upon forced marches, without commissary stores, and they had to depend upon the country where they were located for subsistence. The citizens of my district furnished the Army with whatever it wanted, and many of them have imperfect vouchers and most of them none at all. The troops were in a hurry and took what they needed. The citizens brought them what they had, but in return they did not get competent papers upon which to draw remuneration from the United States Treasury.

I myself live directly upon the railroad and the turnpike where these armies pass, and in my neighborhood the Army subsisted for weeks; and I tell gentlemen that I do not know of two officers and their quartermasters and subalterns who, when they took their leave, left competent and sufficient vouchers upon which citizens who furnished supplies could receive their pay. In illustration I will give you a case. The Army moved down on the pike, upon which there were good farms, good cattle, and plenty of subsistence of every description. The Army did not stop to count or weigh the cattle, or to inquire to whom they belonged. They drove them off from the pastures along with the Army, for beef cattle. How could the citizens get vouchers for cattle so taken? A few men by persevering and following up the Army would get receipts for their cattle or anything else which had been taken, but the papers taken were not legal vouchers. They were mere receipts, and two thirds of the officers of the Army were utterly incapable of making out legal vouchers for those men.

This illustrates the necessity of a law of this character in order to give some plain, honest, and just method by which the citizen can prove, as he can prove in any other court and before any other tribunal, his just rights. That is all we ask. And then when you have given us such a law, we do not expect to get one tenth of all the damage which has been inflicted upon our country. Notwithstanding all the damage we have sustained and all the suffering we have endured, we have not complained. We have paid our taxes, and furnished our men to sustain the flag of our country, and I do not see any legal or patriotic reason why these claims, so palpably due to the men living in the border States, should be procrastinated or postponed.

A word or two more, and I am done. I want to give the House an honest history of these matters, and gentlemen here who have passed through those neighborhoods have seen evidence of the truth of what I state. It is my misfortune to represent a district which was subjected to secession raids for five or six months; it is my glory, however, to represent a people as patriotic as any under the sun. Six or seven of my counties are border counties, and have been continually harassed by rebel raids; and yet they have paid the taxes which have been imposed upon them, and have sent more men to the Army than any other counties in Kentucky. What prompted them? You will see the reason and the motive in the fact that they were upon the border, and felt that their liberties and their property and the rights of their families were jeopardized. Hence every man asked for arms, that he might defend his rights and his home.

As soon as they were recruited and raised the standard of their country and bid defiance to the enemy, that moment they were sent to the extreme South, to Shiloh, to Donelson, and Stone river, where they manifested their gallantry and shed their blood. But they left their families at home unprotected; and those families were invaded and their subsistence utterly exhausted by the raids of the rebels. Still those men left at home paid their taxes, met all requisitions of the Government, and were ruined; and yet men in this Hall talk about postponing the consideration of their claims on account of the exigencies of the times. Ah, gentlemen, the exigencies of the times have been upon us in the border States from the beginning. It is the veritable history of the times that in some of those border counties the wives and children of men in the field could not get to their homes or subsist themselves at all; and they went on to the next county, and the next county still, and also to Louisville, across the river. They did not leave their homes as a matter of choice, but in order to get something to eat and something to wear, of which, owing to the rebellion, they had been utterly deprived. What could these men do when your Army went there? The Army could get no subsistence by railroad, and when the Cumberland river was low they could get no subsistence by steamboat. Your Army, therefore, in traveling through that country subsisted upon the country, and our citizens gladly met them and gave them all they had to give. And now gentlemen have the heartlessness to talk about procrastinating the payment of those men. Well, gentlemen, if this were not my Government, and if I were not a member of Congress, I would scorn the Government that would do such a thing.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot stand this. Did the Speaker ever preside in a case of equity in a chancery court? I tell you, gentlemen, that this matter would not bear the test there. We pay our taxes; we have furnished our quota of men; we have been at Fort Donelson, at Vicksburg; we have been at Shiloh and at Mill Springs, at Stone river and Chickamauga; everywhere Kentucky blood has been poured forth for the country; and yet gentlemen from the North are disposed now to dispute our equitable claims against the Government. You of the North have not suffered these misfortunes. We have; and yet we have met the demands of the Government upon us for troops, for arms, and for everything; we have met this crisis in a manner, considering the circumstances which have surrounded us, in which no people in the history of the world have met a similar crisis. I say that for the border States. While you of the North have received pay for everything you have furnished to the Government, and while you have done no more than we have done for its maintenance, I ask you where is the equity or justice of postponing the claims of the border States until some future period, when everybody else is paid? It is not just. Neither justice, nor equity, nor fair dealing will sanction any such action on the part of the Congress of the United States, or any other body.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask you is it the enormity of the debt which induces gentlemen to propose procrastination? Is that it? Why, gentlemen, that is an argument upon the other side of the question. If the Government owes the border States so much money, and expects them to continue to sustain the Government and to meet all its demands, ought you not to pay off your indebtedness to the people of those States, so as to enable them to stand upon an equality with the other States and to discharge their duty to the Government?

Gentlemen have intimated in their arguments that the Government will soon reach a period when this procrastination will be necessary. Well, gentlemen, if that period does come, I ask you who ought to bear that procrastination? Ought the border States? Have they not already borne the heat and burden of the day? Have they not had an enemy on both sides, or, rather, two armies upon them all the time? They have had the subsistence of two armies, one or the other, upon them all the time, and frequently both at the same time. We ask nothing for the rebels—for what has been furnished to the rebel army. We are losers to that extent; but when we feed and subsidize our own Army we do trust that our Congress will not repudiate our claims.

When Mitchell got to Bowling Green, the evening was inclement and our army occupied one side of the public square, and that night they burned down half of that side of the public square by accident. The secessionists had burned the other half of our public square before they left, and in Mumfordsville and other towns the condition of things was almost as bad. We ask nothing for all these things. All we ask is an opportunity to present our claims in due form according to law, so that we may reach the equity of the case and see whether we shall have pay for our horses, our cattle, our flour, our corn, our pork, our bacon, and all that can subsidize men or animals.

I did not wish, Mr. Speaker, under the peculiar relations which my constituents bear to the rebellion, to permit the question to pass over without announcing some of those indubitable telling facts to the House. My constituents will adhere to their banner. They will remain true and loyal Kentuckians, worthy of the history of the State, whether their claims be allowed or not. But I trust in the sense of justice of this body that those claims will be neither rejected nor postponed.

I ask attention now to the particular character of these claims. If, in the progress of our Army, a man was found wealthy enough to supply all the subsistence needed, it would be an easy thing for him to present his claim, because the amount would be large. It would be such an amount as the officers and the claimant and Congress would take proper notice of. But here are thousands of poor people, including widows, who have at best only a pittance, and who in furnishing supplies have been compelled to give all they had, leaving themselves sometimes without means to get in another crop. They have claims for fifty, one hundred, one hundred and fifty, or two hundred dollars against the Government. How are their claims to be liquidated and paid? Can they come to Washington for that purpose? The expenses of an agent would exhaust their means; and for my part I would advise all persons rather to renounce their claims and tear up their vouchers than seek to have them allowed in that way.

Unless Congress pass a law that will meet these cases the rich claimants will be paid and the poor claimants left unpaid. Those who would be unable to prosecute their claims constitute more than two thirds of the claimants. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this plain statement of facts will not be without its effect on the House, and I humbly trust and hope that the House will act in such a manner as to do justice to all.

Mr. DUMONT. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important measure, indeed; and I am exceedingly sorry that the propositions are not separated. If the Court of Claims has undertaken to take jurisdiction of claims growing out of this war, it affords sufficient reason why the original bill should pass. In the first place the claims are so numerous that the court could not possibly get along with its business. It would be beyond the scope of human power to adjudicate on such a vast number of claims as would be presented to the court. The windows of heaven would be opened and the fountains of the great deep broken up. Then it would rain forty days and forty nights. Why, sir, it is perfectly preposterous to talk about it. Anybody who has a just conception of this matter can see that it is physically and mentally impossible. Therefore it is that I say I wish the propositions were separated.

I am not opposed, Mr. Speaker, to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS], if I understand it. I am not opposed to it in the abstract, but I am opposed to it in the concrete. I am opposed to it in the attitude in which it presents itself at the present time. It is a long bill, with twenty or thirty different propositions, and yet it comes before the House simply as an amendment, without having undergone the ordeal of examination by a committee.

I have great confidence in the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, not only in his intelligence, but also in his integrity and his wish to do right in regard to this thing. Such, too, is the feeling entertained by the whole House toward that distinguished gentleman. But suppose his amendment stood here as an original bill—which it in fact is—here a single gentleman on this floor who would be willing to act upon it without its reference to a committee? How does it alter the case that it stands as a mere amendment? It gives it an advantage to which it is not entitled, and that is the only way that it alters the case. It alters it not in any proper sense of the term.

Now, a word in regard to the proposition of the chairman of the Military Committee. I acknowledge that he has had great experience in these matters. He has been connected with the military operations of the Government since the beginning of the war. For judgment there is no gentleman upon this floor in whose opinion I have greater confidence than in that of the distinguished chairman of the Military Committee. But I have no opinion whatever of this particular thing; that is, no good opinion. He wants to give jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, and the limitation which he proposes to place upon its jurisdiction is one which, in my judgment, has no correctness, no justice, no sound principle whatever. He says he would limit the jurisdiction of the court to matters growing out of contract. He would exclude from their consideration altogether everything having a foundation in tort.

Now, let us illustrate that proposition. General Morgan, the thief Morgan, the robber Morgan, the bandit Morgan, passed through our State, and also through the State of the gentleman from Ohio. He passed through counties adjacent to the Ohio river, with the gallant troops from Kentucky and Indiana hot upon his heels. That gallant and glorious man from "the dark and bloody ground," Colonel Woodford, followed on with his troops. They were necessarily compelled to eat and drink; their horses were compelled to eat and drink; as they pursued this robber band. They were bound to have corn and forage; they were bound to have subsistence for their men. Sometimes they gave vouchers, and sometimes they did not, because they had no time for such things.

Now, I want to know if it is equitable for this Government to refuse to pay the man who gave his hay, his corn, his bacon, and his flour freely, but failed to get his vouchers, and at the same time pay his neighbor, who was so fortunate as to get a voucher.

But let us view the matter in another light. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] would exclude everything growing out of tort—everything not founded in contract. This man passed through these border counties of Indiana and Ohio, adjoining the Ohio river, as I stated, and those who were so fortunate as to get their vouchers are to get their pay before the Court of Claims. Right upon the heels of these guerrillas are our troops in pursuit. The gunboats of Uncle Sam passed up the Ohio river burning every flat-boat and every description of river craft on the Ohio that could possibly be used by the enemy to enable John Morgan to get across the river.

The little town of Vevay, in the county of Switzerland, the town in which I was born—though I have not been in it for a number of years—that town represented by the honorable gentleman now before me, had at its wharf half a dozen flat-boats, coal-boats, and other craft, laden with corn, hay, and other produce, which were reduced to ashes in the twinkling of an eye by these gunboats of Uncle Sam. They, the owners, were loyal men, who lived in that town and county, citizens of a State as loyal as any State in this Union; and what I ask, is the reason that the owner of this property, corn, hay, and potatoes, who had his property reduced to ashes on board these boats, has not as yet just a claim against the Government as if his property had been sold to the Government and he had received a voucher for it?

Then the proposition of the gentleman is simply an absurdity. But my objection to it would still apply if it were not absurd, for I am not willing to give this Court of Claims jurisdiction of this subject at all. But my objection is not a distrust of the court. I know, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many unjust claims; they are as numerous as the stars. I had a little demonstration of it one morning at the city of Nashville. An old lady owning a farm in the neighborhood of that city, who had a son in the rebel army with the commission of captain in his pocket, but who had advertised in the Nashville papers for blood-hounds to run down the Yankee soldiers, this old lady presented to me one morning a claim of $30,000 for thirty Cashmere goats which one of my companies had eaten for breakfast, and a very poor breakfast at that. [Laughter.] Nor was it a very good day for goats either.

Now, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAY] talks about the loyalty of his constituents, and I believe that they are about as loyal as the constituents of any gentleman now on this floor from the State of Kentucky. Gentlemen may laugh; but I intend no slur or insinuation. I have stood by Kentuckians as Kentuckians have stood by me. In days that tried men's souls, when the tomahawk and scalping-knife were felt along the northern frontier, the noble Kentuckians came to our relief, and Kentuckians and Indians stood side by side and shoulder to shoulder in these bloody strifes. They are gone, but as our fathers stood side by side so let their children stand.

Mr. Speaker, I have been in the gentleman's district, and I have been there for months. I saw the conflagration to which he has referred. He lives in or near the town of Bowling Green, in Kentucky. He says that the rebels burned one half of the town and that the Union soldiers burned the other half. Let me tell him that the latter was mainly the continuation of the conflagration begun by the rebels. The gentleman says that he represents a loyal constituency. I believe this to be true, and also have no doubt that he is himself a loyal man. But that conflagration was caused in this wise: the rebels burned up corn that they could not carry away. It was terribly cold weather when we came into the town. The rebels left thousands of barrels of flour behind, and we found a great many of the gentleman's constituents of the copperhead persuasion ready to hide it in their cellars. It took some considerable time to resurrect it all, and the loyal people helped us do it, God bless them. If the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction of this matter, or any other tribunal, I care not what, a great many of these people will prove that we obtained flour from them for the Army that was not paid for. We took from some ten, and from others twenty, thirty, and as high as one hundred barrels of flour which the day before had belonged to the rebel army, but which they could not take away.

Mr. GRIDER. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to charge the loyal men of Bowling Green with having done that, or does he confine it to the rebels of Bowling Green?

Mr. DUMONT. I believe that they were disloyal men. Some of them claimed to be loyal, but the heart of man is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. [Laughter.] It will not do therefore to let a man decide his own case when the bridle hide of the wolf is so manifest.

I wish to make no attack upon the gentleman's constituents. I found a good deal of loyalty in his district. I found men who were willing to bare their bosoms to the shafts of the enemy to put down this unholy and damnable rebellion; and I never found kinder or better people than the loyal inhabitants of Bowling Green, but truth compels me to say some were disloyal.

Mr. Speaker, I had no desire to make a speech when I rose. I believe that the people of Kentucky ought to be paid for many things. I believe so in regard to Maryland. I believe so in regard to Western Virginia. Although I did not distinctly hear the provisions of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] I am inclined to believe that it would have my hearty support if it stood by itself. I will not support the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] for it is not right in the abstract or in the concrete, if for no other reason that it breaks down a court that is now useful, and it makes an unjust discrimination between claimants equally meritorious. The declaration of the gentleman [Mr. GRIDER] that Kentucky would stay in the Union paid or not, I doubt not. His eloquent tribute to the noble people of Kentucky was well merited, and I was glad to hear it as applied to the loyal.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have risen to say that there is no bill which can be offered to this Congress in which my constituents are more deeply and vitally interested than the one now pending. There seem to be two objections to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS.] One is that the Government is not able to pay these claims—that now is not the time to settle and adjust them. One gentleman from New York the other day intimated in his speech, if he did not say in so many terms, that this Government would repudiate its debts. I had no idea there would be members of the House who would get up and say that the Government was neither able nor willing to pay its debts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. To what gentleman does the gentleman refer as having said that the Government proposed to repudiate its debts?

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. The gentleman from Iowa and several other gentlemen said that the Government never could pay these debts.

Mr. WILSON. I never said the Government could not in time pay all of the debts that it should pay. But I take issue with the gentleman and those who seek to crowd these claims upon the Government. The members from the border States, as they term themselves, a term which I consider a disgrace to our politics, ask to include in these claims such as no Government upon the face of the earth has ever allowed. It is for the purpose of keeping out these claims and to prevent this robbery of the Treasury that I have supported the bill reported by me from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is not the proposition of this bill, nor do the advocates of this measure propose, that you shall pay all sorts of claims that people may make against the Government.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from West Virginia directed his remarks to what I said, and my remarks were based upon the character of the claims which have been presented to the War Department, and which are now pending in the Court of Claims. They involve claims for negroes as well as for all other kinds of property, and for damages of every description. I say that many of them should not be paid, that it would be a disgrace to the nation to entertain some of them, especially those for runaway negroes. I base my remarks upon facts existing, upon claims which have been presented, and now the gentleman can direct his upon the same basis.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I have not, nor do I suppose that any gentleman who has advocated this bill has asked pay for any negroes; and I trust in God some measure may be brought before this Congress in which that subject will not be introduced. We have no negroes in West Virginia. I thank God that free soil is stamped upon her; and in her constitution she has said that she will rid herself of this exciting question.

Mr. WILSON. The negro question is involved in this bill by virtue of the claims now pending in the Court of Claims, in which compensation is asked for negroes.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. If the claims are unjust do not pay them.

Mr. WILSON. This bill is for the purpose of taking away jurisdiction in such cases and retaining it in the hands of Congress.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. If you were to pay for all the negroes, North and South, allowing me to be the appraiser, it would not cost much to pay for all of them.

Mr. WILSON. But the gentleman is not a judge of the Court of Claims.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. No, sir; I do not suppose I ever shall be.

Now, to say that you will postpone the day when you will pay these claims is virtually to say to the border States, to whom is due more than to any other people the efforts to put down this rebellion, that they never shall have any pay. I do not wonder that gentlemen who live in the New England States, and those who live in what are known as loyal States outside of the theater of the war, cannot and do not appreciate the condition of those who live in the midst of the war. Why, sir, there has never been a day from the time the Government was founded up to this hour when the North was so prosperous as now. She is actually wallowing in wealth. In order to protect them the Government does not have to station sentinels at their doors, nor in the streets of their cities and towns.

But how is it in the border States? Who could have made more sacrifices than they have to maintain this Government? Why, sir, the district I represented in the last Congress particularly, and many of the counties I now represent in this Congress, are made a barren waste on account of the desolations of this war. They have sent into the Army almost every man they had; and I am proud to say here that Western Virginia has sent more troops to this war to crush out and put down the rebellion than any other State of this Union in proportion to population. And I learn by letters received to-day that her quota under the last call made by the Chief Magistrate of the country is almost supplied, and that no draft will be required there. They have not only given their sons and their fathers to the country, they have not only watered every inch of soil in Western Virginia with their blood, but they have actually given every particle of property they possessed, so that multitudes of them are now in a suffering condition. In that State there are poor people living in the mountains, whose wants are few, and who have very few means to supply them. Rebel parties come along and steal their horses, drive away their cattle, and they sometimes have gone so far as to take the clothing from the children's backs and carry it away. Oftentimes everything in their houses is carried off by those parties. Reduced to extreme destitution, they go to work and get a barrel of corn and get it ground, and then come along Union soldiers, exhausted and half-starved, and cheerfully they divide their last morsel with them. They sometimes gave receipts, which were almost invariably informal. Sometimes they took everything a man had and gave him no acknowledgment.

Now, it is an act of justice that we are asking at the hands of Congress—nothing more and nothing less. We do not ask you to bestow a boon upon us. We are not asking you to make us a present. I appeal to northern men, to their sense of justice, to aid us in sustaining this measure. The issue is now before this Government, and is to be decided by this House, whether or not the people of the border States who have thus been sacrificed shall have their claims paid or not, or whether they shall be forever debarred.

It seems to me, sir, that every one must see the necessity, if the Government ever intends to pay these claims, that the question should be determined now when proofs can be obtained, and we can show whether or not our claims are just. If you postpone this matter for three or five years, there are probably not one tenth of the claims which are perfectly just, and which every judge in the land would give judgment for, in which the claimants will be able at that time to furnish proof. If, then, it is the intention of Congress ever to pay us our just claims, now is the time; and you will indicate whether you mean to do it by the votes you give now. But if you postpone anybody's claims, in God's name do not postpone the claims of those who are starving, of those who have stood by you, and without whose assistance you would not perhaps have been a Union this day.

I ask the House as a matter of justice to sustain this bill. We border-State men have stood by this Government as my friend from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] has said. We have voted millions and millions of dollars for your benefit. We do not ask you to pay unjust claims. I should be the last man to ask that a solitary rebel should be paid for any property he has lost. He does not deserve it; and we do not ask it. But it is for our own loyal men, who have been between the upper and nether millstones; who have stood by the Government in its darkest hours; who have been tried in the furnace of rebellion—it is for them that I am pleading to-day.

I trust, sir, that the House will give to this question their consideration, and will agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS.] In my humble opinion it does not embrace all the classes of cases which ought to be embraced; but I am satisfied with it, and I think that every gentleman from the North or from the West ought to be satisfied with it. I hope therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will receive the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the House is now ready to take a vote on the amendment. I will not occupy any further the time of the House. I move the previous question.

Mr. WHALEY. I hope the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will not press this matter to a vote now. This is the most important question that has been before the House this session.

Mr. WILSON. I merely wish to test the sense of the House. If the House is willing to have the matter delayed, so be it; but I ask the previous question, and I call for tellers on seconding the demand.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and WHALEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 62.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. WHALEY obtained the floor.

Mr. ECKLEY. Will the gentleman from West Virginia give way for me to move that this bill be recommitted?

Mr. WHALEY. No, sir; I must decline to yield for any such purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that a majority of this House, or even those who are opposed to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maryland, desire to deprive the loyal citizens of the border States of their just rights, or to prevent them from having an adjudication of their claims. I cannot believe that that is the object even of those gentlemen who have opposed the amendment. I wish to call the attention of gentlemen on this floor to the facts on which these claims rest, and not only of members, but of their constituents also.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important question. It is one that involves the rights and welfare of the suffering people of the border States. Could any one have expected that such opposition would be made to an amendment so fair as that offered by my friend from Maryland? Is there any reason why there should not be at least a mode provided by which these people shall have an opportunity of having their claims fairly and honestly adjudicated? I do not refer to the claims of secessionists and traitors, but to those of loyal people who have shown their devotion to this Union and have made sacrifices for it, undergoing sufferings that are unknown to the people of the North.

I wish to call attention, further, to the fact that hundreds of thousands of dollars of these claims are due to the unconditionally loyal people of the border States, for provisions and commissary stores furnished in good faith for the use of the Army, but where the certificates given did not comply fully with the requirements of the War Department. These claims have been therefore rejected, and are now piled up by the cord in the Third Auditor's office. Is there a proposition to deprive these people of a fair chance to have their claims adjusted? If not, then let some remedy for their case be recommended to the House by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILSON. I will inform the gentleman that the Judiciary Committee has reported a bill to meet the cases he speaks of, and that that bill comes up next in order. It is the first and second sections of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS.] I understand that another committee of the House has agreed to report, if it has not yet reported, a bill comprising the other portions of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I would like to know what possible objection the gentleman from Iowa can have to this amendment.

Mr. WILSON. The objection is that the bill has no connection whatever with it. The bill relates to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims—the amendment to the accounts of the Quartermaster General.

Mr. WHALEY. It is the duty of Congress to provide for the payment of the just claims of the loyal people of the border States. Contrast their condition with that of the people of the North. Every city, every town, every village and hamlet of the North is this day more prosperous than it ever has been since the settlement of the continent; while on the other hand, if you look to West Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, you will find nothing but desolation. Thousands of their population have been driven to the free States, who had happy homes three years ago, who had wealth enough for themselves and their posterity, but who are now reduced to absolute want. The loyal people of the border States have shown their loyalty in the Army and at the polls. They sent to Congress unconditional Union men, men who have stood by the Administration on this floor, who have voted for every appropriation to carry on the war. And now, when it is proposed to have these just claims honestly and fairly adjudicated, we are met with opposition from the other side of the House. If this is the policy let us know it. Let the constituents of every border State man know it. Let it go over the wires this evening that there is a majority in this House opposed to paying these loyal men or providing a way of adjudicating their claims.

Mr. ASHLEY. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a single moment?

Mr. ASHLEY. Certainly, sir. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. THOMAS. I simply desire to correct an error which seems to prevail in the House. I thought I had stated so as not to be misunderstood, that both sections of my amendment have undergone examination in committee. The second and third sections that I propose underwent examination in the Judiciary Committee, and were approved of. The other sections underwent examination in the Committee of Claims, and that committee has reported it to the House with some little amendments in the form of a bill. I now propose to withdraw this last part of my amendment with the permission of the House, and to substitute for it in words House bill No. 212, which has been sanctioned and approved by the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Does the gentleman withdraw all of his amendment except that part which was before the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment is so proposed that the House is not placed in any difficulty as to voting on it. If a portion of the House be willing to take that part of it that came from the Judiciary Committee it can say so and reject the other, or vice versa. It is only necessary, when going to vote on my amendment, to ask a division of it.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Do I understand that the gentleman from Maryland proposes to have a distinct vote on each of these bills?

Mr. THOMAS. Any member upon the floor has the right to call for a division of the question. And it results as I have already attempted to explain. It gives gentlemen the privilege of deciding between these propositions. It gives them the privilege of accepting the proposition of the Committee of Claims and rejecting that of the Committee on the Judiciary, or the opposite.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Maryland presenting his amendment in the shape in which he now offers it?

Mr. WILSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will then have to modify his amendment still further to make it in order. Rule 48 provides that "No bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

The gentleman will therefore have to modify his amendment to some extent to bring it within the rule.

Mr. THOMAS. The Speaker will bear in mind that the two constitute one amendment, and they are therefore not technically a violation of the rule.

The SPEAKER. That constitutes a double violation of the rules; if two bills entire are proposed in one amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. To comply technically with the rule, I have changed one or two unimportant words, and now modify my amendment by adding at the end of the other amendment as follows:

That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one commissioner and one solicitor of claims for the district composed of the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, the District of Columbia, and Virginia; one commissioner and one solicitor for the district composed of the States of West Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana; one commissioner and one solicitor for the district composed of the States of Tennessee and Kentucky; one commissioner and one solicitor for the district composed of the States of Illinois, Missouri, and Kansas; and one commissioner and one solicitor for those States not included in the foregoing districts, who shall severally hold their respective offices during the pleasure of the President, and be entitled for their services to a salary of $2,500 each per annum, to be paid quarterly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and such other sums as shall be necessarily and unavoidably expended by them for stationery and office rent in the discharge of their duties under this act, and certified as reasonable by the Secretary of War or First Comptroller of the Treasury.

And be it further enacted, That each of said commissioners shall appoint a clerk for his district, who shall hold his office during the pleasure of said commissioner, and perform such duties as may be required of him under this act, who shall receive a salary of $1,600; and the commissioner may from time to time employ a marshal, at a compensation of four dollars per day for the time actually employed by said marshal in subpoenaing witnesses for the United States, and for such other duties as may be required of him by the commissioner, whose salary to the clerk, and compensation to the marshal, shall be paid quarterly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on the certificate of the commissioner. And said commissioners, solicitors, clerks, and marshals shall each take and subscribe an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully discharge the duties of their respective offices, and shall, in addition, take and subscribe the oath of allegiance required by the act of Congress passed August 6, 1861, which oaths shall be filed in the War Department.

And be it further enacted, That said commissioners shall severally have cognizance of all claims against the United States arising in their respective districts, and which shall be presented to them by any person who, during the present rebellion, has sustained, or may sustain, damages by injury to or destruction of any property which has been or may be injured or destroyed by the use or occupation of the Army of the United States, or of any division or portion thereof, or by any military authority: Provided, however, That all existing claims embraced in the provisions of this act not presented for adjustment within three years from the passage of this act, and all subsequent claims not presented for adjustment within three years from the time such claims may or shall accrue, shall be forever barred.

And be it further enacted, That the claimant or claimants who may present his or their claim under this act shall in every case make out an account against the United States, containing the items of such damages and losses, together with a statement of the circumstances attending the same, and names of the officer or officers who gave the order or who commanded the troops, and the particular corps, division, brigade, regiment, or company by whom the damages or losses were occasioned, so far as within the knowledge of the claimant; the time when, as near as may be, and place where such losses and damages were sustained; which account shall be verified by the oath of the claimant to the effect that the account presented by him or her to said commissioner for adjudication is accurately stated, and is in all respects just and true, and that the prices charged are reasonable, and that the amount claimed is justly due after allowing all just credits and set-offs; that neither the whole or any part of said claim has been assigned or transferred, except as therein stated; and that he, she, or they have actually sustained the damages charged in said account as having been done to his, her, or their property by military authority, or by the troops of the United States, over and above the value of the portions of said property which remained after its injury or destruction; that the same damage or destruction has not been done by reason of any fraud, connivance, collusion, or procurement of the said claimant, or any other person or persons in his, her, or their behalf, and that no payment has been received by the claimant, or any person for him, for any part of said claim, except as stated in said account; and that he has not given any receipt or voucher, except as stated in said account, by which any officer of the United States or other person has received or can receive, as claimant believes, a credit therefor from the United States. Said claimant or claimants shall also exhibit and prove to said commissioner, his, her, or their title to the property, and the extent of their share or interest therein; and also furnish them with the names of all other persons, if there be any, who have any share or interest in said property, and their residence as far as may be.

And be it further enacted, That said solicitor of claims shall represent the Government of the United States, and attend the examination of parties and witnesses in relation to any claim which may be pending before the commissioner of their respective districts, and prepare interrogatories and cross-interrogatories when necessary, and superintend the taking of testimony, and render such other services as may be required of him from time to time by said commissioner.

And be it further enacted, That any person who shall corruptly practice, or attempt to practice, any fraud against the United States in the statement or proof of any claim, or any part of any claim, against the United States under this act, shall forfeit the same to the Government; and it shall be the duty of said commissioner in such cases to make a special report of the facts and fraud which was practiced, or attempted to be practiced, to the Secretary of War; and in case he shall approve and concur in said report, the claimant shall be forever barred from prosecuting said claim.

And be it further enacted, That each commissioner shall have power to issue subpoenas to require the attendance of witnesses upon the application of either the claimant or claimants, or of the solicitor, for examination before the said commissioner, which subpoenas shall have the same force as if issued by a district court of the United States, and compliance therewith may be compelled under such rules and orders as said commissioner shall prescribe, and for the purpose of compelling the attendance of such witnesses and taking their testimony, said commissioner shall have all the power of said district court. And the witnesses who may attend on behalf of the United States, in obedience to any subpoena issued by said commissioner, shall be entitled to the same fees for their attendance as those paid for similar services in the State courts of the respective districts, and to be paid by the United States upon the certificate of said commissioner and solicitor.

And be it further enacted, That each commissioner shall adopt such rules and regulations for carrying this act into execution as the Secretary of War shall approve, and publish the same for eight weeks successively in the newspapers in the several States and Territories in which the laws of the United States are published.

And be it further enacted, That each commissioner shall have power to hold their sessions at such times and places, in their respective districts, as they shall deem proper and conducive to the public interest and convenience of claimants. They may also, in their discretion, make a personal examination of any property in relation to which a claim for losses or damages shall have been presented. They shall also have power to examine on oath any claimant, and all other persons, in relation to said claim, who have any knowledge thereof; and shall have power to issue commissions for the examination of claimants and witnesses unable to attend before said commissioner, and in other cases in the discretion of said commissioner, and shall cause the testimony so taken to be reduced to writing, and signed by the person taking the same; and shall return said testimony, with their proceedings and their several opinions in writing in relation to said claims, respectively, to the Secretary of War; and it shall be his duty to lay the same before the Congress of the United States at the commencement of the session next succeeding said return, to the end that such provision may be made for the relief of the claimants as shall be deemed just and proper.

And be it further enacted, That said commissioners shall not take cognizance of any claim against the United States for the loss, value, or services of any slave or person of color, nor for damages or losses arising from his or her escape, capture, or detention; nor shall any person who has engaged, or shall at any time engage, in the present rebellion against the Government of the United States, or been at any time hostile to such Government, or given aid and comfort to those engaged in said rebellion, derive any benefit under this act. And it shall be the duty of each of said commissioners to inquire into and take testimony as to the loyalty of every person who has sustained loss or damage to his or her property during the present rebellion, and who may present their claims under this act; and also as to whether the said persons in any manner supported or favored rebellion against, or resistance to the laws of the United States. And no person who has engaged, or shall at any time engage in the present rebellion against the Government of the United States, or been at any time hostile to such Government, or given aid and comfort to those engaged in said rebellion, shall derive any benefit under this act.

Mr. ASHLEY. I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order for me to move to recommit the bill to the committee?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The question being upon the amendment to the amendment, it was adopted—ayes 64, noes 46.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays on the amendment as amended.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives imposing instructions upon the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, ask another free conference on the amendments to the said bill, and have appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. HENDRICKS as such committee on their part.

COURT OF CLAIMS—AGAIN.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is it in order to move to refer the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The House is still acting under the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion to enable me to move that the House agree to the request of the Senate for another committee of conference on the internal revenue bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I insist on the motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 60, noes 66.

Mr. THOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which his amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Upon the latter motion,

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, announced to the House that the Senate had passed the following joint resolution and bills; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (No. 30) for the relief of Charles A. Pitcher;

An act (No. 48) for the relief of B. C. Bailey; and

An act (No. 125) to encourage immigration.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the House accede to the request of the Senate appointing another committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the internal revenue bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay the whole report of the committee of conference on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in order; but the Chair will state that its effect, if carried, will be to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 32, noes 64.

Mr. KASSON. Before the vote is taken on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont I ask the Speaker to state the exact condition in which the matter now comes before us. The motion has been made by the gentleman without consultation with his colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means, and I desire now that the Chair will state what will be the effect of the motion upon the question before us, if adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely state in response to the gentleman from Iowa that he, I suppose, in common with all the members of the House, heard the message from the Senate that they had non-concurred in the resolution yesterday passed by the House.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will pardon me. I could not hear that message as it was announced.

Mr. MORRILL. Well, sir, the gentleman had the same chance that I and other members of the House had to hear it. Finding that the Senate had rejected the proposition yesterday made by the House, of course it becomes necessary to act upon the request of the Senate for another committee of conference. I did nothing more than to pursue the usual course in such cases, by seizing on the earliest moment to move for such a committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the condition of the question. By a vote of 76 to 67 the House yesterday referred this matter to the same committee of conference. The vacancy occasioned on that committee by the declination of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was filled by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. STEVENS. Referred to the same committee with instructions.

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir, recommitted with instructions. The Senate have sent us a resolution asking for a free conference between the two Houses, without instructions. The Senate having appointed the same managers on its part, it is due to the House to say that the Chair will appoint the same majority as yesterday of the House conferees. If the Senate had appointed different conferees the Chair would have felt it to be its duty to appoint different conferees, in case this proposition of the Senate be entertained.

Mr. KASSON. I was in the Senate when the action of the House was reported there, and I did not hear any instructions read to the Senate. I ask whether those instructions have ever been brought to the attention of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. If the House wants to reverse its action of yesterday, it will be easy for the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to move instructions of a different character.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not wish to move any instructions at all. I have not made the motion to go on the committee, and I do not desire to go on it. I do not desire the committee to go trammelled, for that would be casting a slur upon the other House.

The SPEAKER. Without new instructions the Chair will be obliged to appoint the same majority of conferees. If the Senate had appointed new conferees, the Chair would have appointed new conferees.

Mr. STEVENS. The only effect of appointing the same committee is that they go without instructions and untrammelled.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. The message from the Senate is that the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes. It has appointed the same committee, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. HENDRICKS, and Mr. CLARK. The instructions of the House were before the Senate, and they were disagreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senate appointed the same committee because we had appointed the same committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. They were appointed by a vote of the House.

Mr. MORRILL's motion was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed Mr. MORRILL, Mr. KASSON, and Mr. SPALDING the committee on the part of the House.

COURT OF CLAIMS—AGAIN.

The question then recurred on the Court of Claims bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 140) for the protection of the overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific; and an act (H. R. No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863; when the Speaker signed the same.

And then, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at a quarter to five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 3, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of Samuel Strong, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to examine and settle his accounts as assignee of the contractors for work done on the Portsmouth, New Hampshire, custom-house; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of manufacturers of Newark, New Jersey, remonstrating against the extension of the India-rubber patent of Charles Goodyear; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an extension of the time for the payment of bounties to volunteers in and for the State of Wisconsin until the 1st of April, 1864; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Daniel Fitzgerald, praying for a renewal of his patent for an improvement in fire-proof chests and safes; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of the Governor and members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the draft be postponed, and the payment of bounties continued until the 1st day of April, 1864; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the memorial of M. C. Marin, commander in the United States Navy, praying relief from the action of the advisory board; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of George D. Dods, praying for a pension in lieu of his support at the Naval Asylum; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of merchants and others of Providence, Rhode Island, praying that the petition of the South American Steamship Company for an appropriation for the purpose of establishing postal communication by steam vessels with the countries of South America may be granted; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and a motion to print the memorial was referred to the Committee on Printing.

COURT FEES IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of a bill to regulate the fees of the clerk's office of the supreme court of this District. The petition is accompanied by a bill. I ask that the bill may be read the first and second time, and referred with the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to that committee. The Senator also asks unanimous consent to introduce at this time a bill on the same subject.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 147) to regulate the fees of the clerk's office of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and it was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TEN EYCK, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a petition of seamen in the United States revenue cutter service attached to the revenue cutter Caleb Cushing, praying for remuneration for loss of property sustained by them in the destruction of that vessel by the rebels, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad have instructed me to move that the bill (S. No. 135) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," passed July 1, 1862, be printed. The bill has not yet been printed, and the committee desire to have it printed for their convenience in examining it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. The same committee have instructed me to report back to the Senate the bill (S. No. 11) granting public lands to the People's Pacific Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraphic line to the Pacific coast by the northern route, and to recommend that it do not pass. This recommendation, however, is founded entirely on the circumstance that the bill which I now report back is based upon a State charter granted by the State of Maine. The committee think it not right to act upon a State charter in so large a concern.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was recommitted the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties, to report it favorably and to ask for its consideration at this time. It is very important that it should be acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this resolution at the present time. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather it should go over for the present until Senators come in. I know the Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] takes a deep interest in this question, and he is not yet in his seat. I hope it will be allowed to lie on the table until he comes in.

Mr. WILSON. It can be laid aside for a few moments until Senators come in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TEN EYCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 31) authorizing the issue of a register to the steamer Mohawk; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 148) to prevent frauds in the collection of the internal revenue, and to prevent smuggling; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS FROM KANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 32) for the removal of refugee Indians in Kansas to their homes in the Indian country; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask that the preamble and resolution be read at length for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Whereas the Government is maintaining nine thousand two hundred refugee Indians in the State of Kansas at an outlay of $60,000 per month; and whereas said refugees are anxious to return to their homes in the Indian country; and whereas the Secretary of War reports to Congress that he is not aware of any reason preventing their return; and whereas it is important that they be returned in time to put in a crop of this spring; Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be authorized to take the necessary steps for the removal of the refugee Indians now in Kansas to their homes in the Indian country.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to state, in connection with this matter, that the Indian bureau are anxious to return these Indians to the Indian country, but are fearful of taking the responsibility. The Interior Department and the War Department differ as to the safety of the Indians after they shall return, and it is important to get an expression of opinion from Congress on the subject. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and insisted upon by the Senate, and it had appointed Mr. JUSTIN S. MORRILL, of Vermont, Mr. JOHN A. KASSON, of Iowa, and Mr. RUFUS P. SPALDING, of Ohio, managers at the same on its part.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DAVIS. A joint resolution for the amendment of the Federal Constitution was referred early in the session to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee reported back the joint resolution with an amendment. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee, and I ask that it be read and printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will receive it, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. It will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the resolution (S. No. 16) by striking out the word "an" and by adding the letter "s" to the word amendment in the fifth line of the preamble reported by the committee, and to strike out both sections of the amendment, and in lieu thereof to insert:

First. That no negro or person whose mother or grandmother is or was a negro shall be a citizen of the United States, or be eligible to any civil or military office, or to any place of trust or profit under the United States.

Second. That the States of Maine and Massachusetts shall form and constitute one State of the United States, to be called East New England, and the States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Vermont shall form and constitute one State of the United States, to be called West New England.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. WILKINSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate three thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia (No. 14) in relation to interference by military authority in elections in the States.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no other resolutions to be introduced, the Chair will present a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives. It will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1864.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Tuesday, the 31st day of May next, at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH SHIP LA MANCHE.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of the owners of the French ship La Manche, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. For the purpose of paying the indemnity awarded to the owners of the French ship La Manche, it proposes to appropriate a sufficient amount to purchase a bill of exchange on Paris for the sum of 140,735 15-100 francs, with interest on that sum at six per cent. from February 5 last past down to the date of the bill of exchange.

Mr. GRIMES. What is that for?

Mr. SUMNER. To carry out an award that has been made with reference to the claim of the owners of the French ship La Manche, they claiming more than half a million francs, and the arbitrators allowing them 140,735 francs, on account of damages to a French ship.

Mr. GRIMES. Damages by whom?

Mr. SUMNER. Growing out of our blockade.

Mr. CLARK. Is there a report?

Mr. SUMNER. Here is a message of the President covering all the documents in the case. The report of the Secretary of State is to this effect:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON,
February 16, 1864.

The Secretary of State has the honor to lay before the President a copy of the papers relative to the claim on this Government of the owners of the French ship La Manche, captured in August, 1862, by the United States ship-of-war Iro, and sent into Boston for adjudication, upon the supposition that she had, in violation of the blockade, sailed from a port in the possession of the insurgents. The vessel was subsequently restored, pursuant to a decree of the district court of the United States at Boston, but the owners claimed damages for the capture and detention. This claim, though unquestionably just in principle, seemed to the Secretary of State, as first presented by the French minister, to be exaggerated in amount. A proposition was consequently made to Mr. Mercier to refer the question to the sum properly due to an informal arbitration. This proposition was accepted, and the award of the arbitrators is one of the accompanying papers. From the high character of those gentlemen for integrity and intelligence, it is suggested that an appropriation of the amount found to be due may confidently be recommended to Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

The President.

The document which I have in my hand contains the original claim, the correspondence between our Government and the French minister, the appointment of the arbitrators, Mr. John M. Forbes, of Boston, being selected on the part of the United States, and Mr. Isaac Thacher, a merchant of Boston, being selected on the part of the French Government, and these two arbitrators together selecting William Perkins, also of Boston, as the umpire. After considering the case carefully, they have reduced the original claim, which was 524,577 francs, to the sum mentioned in this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the amount?

Mr. SUMNER. One hundred and forty thousand seven hundred and thirty-five francs. I will read the precise terms of the award, and that will explain the peculiar language of the bill. It is as follows, dated Boston, February 5, 1864, and addressed to Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, and to Monsieur Mercier, his imperial Majesty's minister to the United States:

"GENTLEMEN: The undersigned arbitrators appointed by you, and the umpire mutually chosen by the arbitrators, for the purpose of examining and deciding upon the claims for losses, by capture and detention, of the French ship La Manche by the United States ship Iro, beg leave to report, unanimously, that they have carefully examined the only claims laid before them by his imperial Majesty's consul here, Monsieur Souchard, being those of Messrs. Le Roux Frères & Co., the owners of the La Manche, for themselves and for the officers and crew of the ship, of which copy (marked A) is herewith inclosed.

"That they have examined the papers laid before them in support of said claim, and have called such witnesses as were deemed necessary, and that they do award, as full compensation for said claims, the sum of 140,735 15-100 francs, to be paid in a banker's bill on Paris, at sixty days' sight. To which amount is to be added interest at six per cent. per annum from this date until the bill is delivered to his imperial Majesty's representative at Washington."

The appropriation, therefore, is of a sum sufficient to buy the bill specified in this award, with interest from the date of the award, February 5, 1864, down to the date of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether the owners of the French vessel are parties to the reference and arbitration; whether they are concluded by it?

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that they are concluded by it.

Mr. HOWARD. Does that appear in the report itself?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will bear in mind that the whole has proceeded on the application of the French Government; the French Government is the party, and that Government has presented the claim of the owners.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand so. Of course it presents the claim as the agent of the owners. My inquiry was whether the owners are bound by the arbitration in law.

Mr. SUMNER. Unquestionably they are.

Mr. HOWARD. So that we shall not have this claim up before us again?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the only mode in which we can recognize a claim of a foreign individual. It is never made upon us by the individual, but through his Government. We in like manner present claims against foreign Governments, though they come from private citizens.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the usual course; but it may be pursued in another course.

Mr. FOSTER. Never.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Michigan will bear in mind that they have no claim in law; the only claim they can have is through the diplomatic representatives of their Government, and it is presented precisely as this was to our Government here. Of course, the satisfaction of the claim in the mode now proposed disposes of it forever.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

BRITISH PRESENT TO A SHIPMASTER.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (No. 29) reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think it will not occupy any time.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. No. 29) giving the assent of Congress to the acceptance of a watch from the British Privy Council of Trade by the master of the American schooner Highlander was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the title of the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I am inclined to think that there is no necessity for this resolution. This vessel, I believe, is a private vessel, not a public vessel of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a message from the President of the United States particularly proposing it and transmitting the correspondence between the Department of State and Lord Lyons on the subject. Here is the message of the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress the copy of a correspondence which has recently taken place between her Britannic Majesty's minister accredited to this Government and the Secretary of State, in order that the expediency of sanctioning the acceptance by the master of the American schooner Highlander of a present of a watch which the lords of the committee of her Majesty's Privy Council for trade propose to present to him, in recognition of services rendered by him to the crew of the British vessel Pearl, may be taken into consideration.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1864.

Then follows a letter from Lord Lyons to Mr. Seward:

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1864.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit to you herewith a copy of a dispatch addressed by order of the lords of the committee of her Majesty's Privy Council for trade to her Majesty's consul at New York, requesting him to ascertain whether there would be any objection on the part of the United States Government to the receipt by the master of the American schooner Highlander of a present of a watch which their lordships propose to present to him in recognition of services rendered by him to the crew of the British vessel Pearl.

I beg of you to be so good as to submit this matter to the proper authority for decision, and to inform me of the result, in order that it may be communicated to the Board of Trade.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

LYONS.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Then follows a letter from the Board of Trade addressed to her Majesty's consul at New York; and next is Mr. Seward's reply under date of Washington, February 20, 1864, in which, after setting forth the application of Lord Lyons, he says:

"In reply I have the honor to state that by the Constitution of the United States, as your lordship is doubtless aware, the power to give the required permission in such cases is exclusively vested in Congress; and that a copy of your note and of its accompaniment, together with a copy of this reply, will accordingly be submitted for the consideration of that body."

These are the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, my impression still is that the Highlander is a private vessel, a merchant vessel of the United States, not a public vessel. That is my belief; and the difficulty as to accepting such presents only applies to persons holding an office of profit or trust under the United States. The prohibition is in the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, and the provision is this:

"No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States:

and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State."

It is only in regard to persons who hold "an office of profit or trust under the United States." A private citizen—and the commander of a merchant vessel is but a private citizen—may receive any gift which any foreign Government may think proper to make for meritorious services, or without any other cause than their special like for the individual. I do not think there is any necessity for the joint resolution at all.

Mr. SUMNER. It can do no hurt, however.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed. If we embark in this kind of legislation without any necessity for it, there is no telling where it will end. I notice by the newspapers that three gentlemen in New York have just received presents and been knighted, I believe, by the King of Italy for some service they are supposed to have rendered to an Italian vessel a short time ago in the neighborhood of New York. I think it is wholly useless to take up our time or to cumber our journals or the laws with the passage of acts of this description that are wholly unnecessary. I therefore trust that we shall not set the example here now. Probably the Secretary of State, as the vessel is denominated in the dispatch from Lord Lyons "the United States vessel Highlander," without examining the Naval Register to see whether we had any such vessel, jumped to the conclusion that she was not a commercial vessel but a war vessel, and upon that hypothesis has called for legislation here in order to enable the commander of that vessel to accept this watch. Upon an examination of the Register I find that we have no such vessel and have not had any such vessel in our service, and on an examination of the Constitution by the Senator from Connecticut, it seems that there is no necessity for the passage of any such law for a commercial vessel; and I think we had better let the bill drop.

Mr. SUMNER. I am inclined to agree with the statement made by the two Senators in reference to the law, but I assume that the application of the Secretary of State, sanctioned by the President, was made with a knowledge of the facts. I assume that they knew the law also as the Senators know it.

Mr. CLARK. Will the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations permit me to make a suggestion, that he allow the vote to be reconsidered, and then let the resolution lie on the table?

Mr. SUMNER. I was about to come to that. I was going to say that I assumed that the Secretary of State knew the facts in the case, and also the law. It is notorious that there are merchant vessels of the United States at this moment in the service of the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. But we have the names of them. I have here the names of all vessels in the service of the United States, and there is no such vessel mentioned there.

Mr. SUMNER. It occurred to me that probably this was a merchant vessel in the service of the United States—

Mr. GRIMES. I presume that is the way the mistake originated; the Secretary of State so supposed.

Mr. SUMNER. And therefore the master was to a certain extent an officer of the United States, so that he would come under the constitutional prohibition. However, I am perfectly willing that the joint resolution should lie over.

The vote on the passage of the joint resolution was reconsidered.

Mr. CLARK. I now move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate take up the joint resolution to continue the payment of bounties.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will give way for a moment, I should like to ask the courtesy of the Senate to take up a bill with a view to make it a special order for some day next week.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. BROWN. There is a bill on the table in regard to the equalization of the pay of colored troops to which an amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] and subsequently an amendment was laid on the table to be offered by myself. I desire to make some remarks on that bill. I am not able to do so today; but I should like to take it up and make it the special order for some day next week, say Tuesday, if that will meet the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. The bill to which the Senator refers, I think, lies on the table. It is the bill to encourage enlistments.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator desires to take up that bill merely with a view to assign a day on which he can address the Senate upon it, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain the motion, if there be no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. The question now pending on that bill is on an amendment offered by myself, I believe. I desire to know if that is so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the pending question.

Mr. HENDERSON. My colleague has offered an amendment to the bill, which perhaps in the present condition of the bill and amendments would not be in order. He desires to address the Senate, as I understand, upon the amendment which he has moved to have printed, and in order that he may be permitted to address the Senate upon that subject, I will withdraw the amendment that I offered to the bill for the time being.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can do that with the unanimous consent of the Senate, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BROWN. I now offer the amendment that was presented by me on the 10th of February last, with the exception of the last section, which is no longer necessary in consequence of other legislation. The amendment is to strike out the third section of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the proclamation of the President, of January 1, 1863, declaring all persons held as slaves within certain designated States and parts of States then in rebellion against the Government of the United States to be thereafter free, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed and made of full effect as law; and all courts of justice are required to recognize the same, and all persons declared to be free by the said proclamation, or by this act or any subsequent act of Congress, shall be entitled to sue and be sued and give evidence in all courts of justice as other citizens.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the States or Territories of the United States otherwise than in punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, any law, usage, custom, or claim to the contrary notwithstanding; but all persons shall be held to be born free.

I ask that the bill may be made the special order for Tuesday next at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Tuesday next, and to make it the special order for that day at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, two thirds of the Senate concurring therein.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties. It directs that the bounties authorized to be paid under existing laws, and by regulations and orders of the War Department, to veterans reenlisting or persons enlisting in the regular or volunteer service of the United States for three years or during the war, shall continue to be paid from March 1, 1864, to April 1, 1864, anything in any law or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding; the bounties to be paid out of any moneys already appropriated for such purposes.

Mr. WILSON. This joint resolution was recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the War Department in regard to it. I send to the Chair a letter addressed to the Committee on Military Affairs by the Secretary of War, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, March 2, 1864.

SIR: Your note of this date, requesting my views regarding joint resolution No. 41 of the House of Representatives, to continue the payment of bounties, &c., has just been received, and in reply I have the honor to state:

First. That in my opinion the requisite troops can be raised more expeditiously by continuing the payment of bounties to the 1st of April than by any other means.

Second. That at present great exertions are being made in the several States to raise their quotas by volunteers, so as to avoid a draft, the people preferring that method of furnishing troops.

Third. That General Burnside, General Hancock, and State Legislatures and Executives are earnestly requesting the continuance of the bounties until the 1st of April.

Fourth. That in my opinion the joint resolution of the House is wise and judicious, and that its speedy passage by the Senate would greatly promote the public welfare, and strengthen the military force more quickly and efficiently than can be accomplished in any other mode.

Your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. HENRY WILSON, Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND GRANT TO A MINNESOTA RAILROAD.

MR. RAMSEY. I now move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 31, making a grant of land to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company.

MR. DOOLITTLE. There will not certainly be time to consider that bill in the morning hour. There are questions involved in it which will require examination and consideration. I desire, I will state to my friend from Minnesota, to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, for the purpose of considering the remonstrances which have been presented and the facts which will be presented to the committee bearing on the propriety of this legislation. I hope my friend from Minnesota will consent to allow this bill to go to the Committee on Public Lands to be considered there; otherwise we shall have the matter to be considered here in open Senate. I prefer that the committee should first consider it.

MR. RAMSEY. I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Wisconsin, but really I have several times waived the opportunity of getting up this bill. The remonstrances of the citizens of Wisconsin can be brought directly to the attention of the Senate. I think it is very unusual in the Senate to recommit a bill simply because there may be a remonstrance against it. I respectfully ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill. It need not occupy fifteen minutes of its time.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I am willing to take the sense of the Senate on the question of recommitment. If the bill is to come up for discussion, there are a great many facts connected with it that will take up some time in the Senate. The bill will certainly lead to discussion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question to recommit will not arise until the bill is before the Senate. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 31) making a grant of lands to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, in the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I will move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands for further consideration. In submitting this motion, I will state in a few words to the Senate some of the facts as they are presented to me.

The bill proposes to make a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a road from St. Paul to the head of the navigable waters upon Lake Superior at or near the city of Superior. Congress by an act in 1856 granted public lands substantially over the same route, or a route very nearly the same, from Hudson upon the St. Croix river to Lake Superior. Hudson is about fifteen or twenty miles from St. Paul. The point of reaching the lake is the same. Fifteen or twenty miles apart at the south end with two grants running to the same point on Lake Superior at the north end would make these grants substantially grants over the same route, commencing twenty miles apart and meeting at the same point, or very nearly at the same point, upon Lake Superior.

MR. CARLILE. When was that grant made? MR. DOOLITTLE. The act passed in 1856, I think.

MR. CARLILE. Have they commenced to build the road?

MR. DOOLITTLE. On that subject I will state the facts as I understand them. Nearly twenty miles of the road have been graded; contracts are in existence for the grading of the road, and for the iron to be put upon the road. I cannot personally state these facts; but I am informed and believe that contracts are in operation which will finish nearly forty miles of the road within a year from this time. The work was commenced on the road some years ago. When the war broke out work was suspended; but it was renewed last summer, and it is now going on at an expenditure, as I understand, of about two thousand dollars a week.

I cannot assume to make a statement upon my personal knowledge of all these facts; but there are facts bearing on this question which I think should be considered by the Committee on Public Lands; and therefore, without going into a full statement of the information which I received on the subject, I hope the Senate will allow this question to go to that committee in order that all the real facts may be ascertained and submitted to the Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order.

MR. RAMSEY. I hope the Senate will permit this matter to be disposed of now, without recommitting it to the Committee on Public Lands. Surely there can be no occasion for that. All the objections we are going to encounter from these gentlemen in Wisconsin we shall have to meet in the Senate again if the bill be recommitted. We may as well meet them now.

The Senator is mistaken in saying that this is substantially the same grant as the one to which he alludes. Sir, this has always been a favorite enterprise with the people of the State of Minnesota. As early as 1854 the Congress of the United States made a grant of land to unite the head of the navigable waters of the Mississippi river with the head of navigation upon Lake Superior. Within the State of Minnesota the distance between the heads of these two great systems of navigation is but one hundred and forty miles. Some interference with the bill occurred in the House of Representatives, and the House at once repealed the bill. The company, however, that received the grant at the time thought they had legal rights under it, and they contested those rights for several years in the courts of the United States, but finally it was determined against them. That was the reason why this particular line of road was not embraced in the land grants to Minnesota in 1857. In 1856, when the grant was made to the State of Wisconsin, this grant was still pending before the courts, and had not been passed upon, had not been approved or rejected, but was still in one sense a grant pending. Therefore that was a proper objection to the grant to Wisconsin rather than an objection to our grant. We were ahead of them in point of time.

MR. PRESIDENT, this is a matter of vital importance to us in Minnesota. We have now a surplus of wheat for transportation to the East rising three million bushels annually. The roads that carry off this wheat for us through Wisconsin, down the Mississippi river and through Illinois have not sufficient transportation, and they have increased the transit between St. Paul and Milwaukee to Chicago from twelve and a half cents in 1862 to twenty-five cents in this year. This is an oppression that our agriculture cannot endure. We are the furthest inland State of the northwestern tier of States. Surely it is of importance to the Government to give us the readiest facilities of getting to market with that large surplus of wheat without compelling us to pass through Wisconsin and Illinois. One hundred and forty miles of this land transit brings us to Lake Superior.

MR. HOWE. Will the Senator state how far it is from St. Paul to Lake Superior over the Hudson route?

MR. RAMSEY. Yes, sir, presently.

We have, then, about fifteen hundred miles of water navigation after we strike the lake. As we all know, the difference in cost in favor of that transportation is very considerable; it is but two or three cents a bushel; whereas on these lines of railroad it is from twelve to thirteen cents per ton per mile. It is to avoid that system of taxation on the part of the railroads east of us that the people of Minnesota have struggled for this road to the lake. In earlier times it was not a matter of so much consequence, because until 1858 we produced no surplus of wheat. Since then it has increased at an enormous rate. We did not ship a bushel in 1858; we now ship rising three million bushels annually. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] asks me the distance from St. Paul to Superior. It is about one hundred and forty miles.

MR. HOWE. How far by way of Hudson?

MR. RAMSEY. As I have always understood—and it is well known in that country; we are perfectly familiar with all this thing there—the other road is just across the line in the State of Wisconsin. Senators will recollect that. This does not come in conflict with that. We ask for no lands in his State. This is entirely a Minnesota enterprise. We only ask for the lands within our State. The distance from the town of Hudson, which is a small village of four or five hundred inhabitants on the river St. Croix, about thirty miles up from the Mississippi river, to Bayfield, which portion of the road this company have most at heart, is one hundred and eighty miles. From Lake Superior to Hudson—which road it is understood in that country the Wisconsin company never did really contemplate building—would be about the same distance as from St. Paul; but then at St. Paul you are upon the Mississippi river at the head of the actual navigation of that river. That gives the road its importance. This, then, is a work of national importance. It unites these two great systems of navigation, the lake system and the river system. But here we are met in search of this, which is no more than our due, by the opposition of enterprises in the State of Wisconsin that have already had a sufficient indulgence. As I said, they got their grant in 1856, and they have not made a mile of road, and we never hear of an intention to make a mile of road until we attempt to get what is ours.

The distance, by way either of Milwaukee or Chicago, to the East, is greater by two hundred and forty miles than it is around by the head of the lake. Then again we have one hundred miles of lake shore which we have no other way of getting to than by this road.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I do not in the slightest degree object to a railroad route from St. Paul to Lake Superior. It is between the Senator and myself a question really whether the route from St. Paul to Superior is not the better route over the very line for which a grant has already been made. Persons who are interested in this railroad company and who put their money into it state these to be the facts—I desire the committee to investigate and see if they are not—that the actual line is the best practical railroad line from St. Paul to Lake Superior, that the distance is just about the same by either route, that it is a much less expensive line, and it is claimed that a preliminary survey over both routes has been made, and that the expense of going on this route is less than on the one now proposed.

MR. PRESIDENT, it is to get these questions to the committee, that the committee may fairly examine them, that I make the motion to recommit, not that I oppose in the slightest degree the main thing for which the Senators from Minnesota struggle, and that is that there shall be a railroad route from St. Paul to Superior; but I understand that from St. Paul to this road there is a land grant over a line some fifteen or twenty miles long; I do not remember the distance, but at all events connecting with this so as to make a connected land grant route from St. Paul to Superior as it now stands. It is to have these facts examined in the committee that I make the motion to recommit, that the maps, the estimates, the surveys, and all these matters may be examined by the committee rather than to have it all come up here in the Senate and have a controversy upon facts.

MR. RAMSEY. The Senator is very kind, but this matter was very fully gone into by the committee. They had the whole subject before them a long time, and we met the opposition of this rival interest in the committee. The interests of this rival road in Wisconsin were presented and debated in the committee.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to know if a representative of that company, or that district, or of the State of Wisconsin, was before the committee?

Mr. RAMSEY. The chairman of the committee will mention. The matter was fully debated there, as I understood.

Mr. HARLAN. There have been no facts or principles stated yet in the Senate that were not considered in committee when this bill was under consideration by the committee. I think, therefore, there is no necessity for recommitting it to the committee.

If the Senators from Wisconsin know of other facts that we can hereafter obtain that have not been sent to the committee, it might be a reason for a reconsideration of the subject; but the committee have carefully examined the bill and considered all the principles which he has suggested and all the facts, and have made up deliberately their report and presented it to the Senate. I think there is no necessity for recommitting the bill to that committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWE. With the indulgence of the Senator from Minnesota, I wish to say that the question is whether any representative of the State of Wisconsin or any representative of the interests involved in this other road was heard before the committee, not what principles or facts were before the committee.

Mr. HARLAN. There was no hearing before the committee of either of the Senators from Wisconsin, or any other person; but all the facts to which they have alluded were considered on the suggestion of members of the committee, most of whom, as the Senator is aware, are western men, and conversant with the facts and with the legislation in the case.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is within the knowledge of the Senate, I presume, that the Legislature of Minnesota has recently memorialized for this grant; that the city of St. Paul, to show entire confidence in it, and to show that it is no bogus enterprise, but that we are really and sincerely in earnest about it, has voted $250,000 to assist in the work. The State has also given whatever of swamp lands she has received, along the line of the road, to it. We feel that our interests there would be entirely sacrificed, our agricultural interests, which are our great interests, unless we have this other outlet for our produce. I trust the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. POWELL. I desire that the special order may now be called up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky calls for the special order.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move to postpone the special order, and proceed with the consideration of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor, and therefore, unless he yields it, no other Senator can interpose a motion.

Mr. POWELL. I do not yield the floor.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties; and an enrolled bill (S. No. 140) to provide for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is before the Senate. It is the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It has been reported upon adversely by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The bill was read by the Secretary. The first section provides that it shall not be lawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men within one mile of the place where any general or special election is held in any State of the United States of America, and that it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States to prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State or in any manner to interfere with the freedom of any election, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State. Any officer of the Army or Navy, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States who violates this section is for every such offense to be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction to pay a fine of not less than $200, and not exceeding $20,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than twenty years, at the discretion of the court; and any person so convicted is moreover to be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under the Government of the United States. The bill is not, however, to be so construed as to prevent any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine, from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified, according to the laws of the State in which he shall offer to vote.

By the second section any officer or person in the military or naval service of the United States, who shall order or advise, or who shall directly or indirectly, by force, threat, menace, intimidation or otherwise, prevent or attempt to prevent any qualified voter of any State from freely exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election, or who shall in like manner compel, or attempt to compel, any officer of an election in any State to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified to vote, or who shall impose or attempt to impose any rules or regulations for conducting such election different from those prescribed by law, or interfere in any manner with any officer of the election in the discharge of his duties, is for any such offense to be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction to pay a fine of not exceeding $20,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary, not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court, and any person so convicted is moreover to be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States.

Mr. POWELL addressed the Senate in support of the bill, but without concluding gave way for an adjournment.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 3, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CAPTAIN J. L. FISK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with resolution of the House, the report of Captain J. L. Fisk, of his late expedition to the Rocky mountains and Idaho; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM moved that five thousand extra copies be printed.

The SPEAKER. That will be referred to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The first question is the unfinished business of yesterday, being Court of Claims bill.

Mr. WILSON moved that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, moved that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 46, nays 42; the Speaker having decided that it did not require a quorum to order a call of the House.

The roll of the House was then called, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. William J. Allen, Arnold, Baxter, Blaine, Chandler, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Donnelly, Edgewood, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, John, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Harburt, Philip Johnson, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Macey, William H. Miller, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Odell, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Starr, William G. Steele, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fremond Wood, and Yeman.

Mr. ELIOT. How many members have answered to their names?

The SPEAKER. One hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. STILES. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THOMAS. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Beaman, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denning, Dennison, Dixon, Briggs, Dumont, Eckley, Elliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garfield, Higby, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIntosh, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Tracy, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Woodbridge—69.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Auderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, Mallory, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Nelson, John O'Neill, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, and Windom—61.

So the bill was recommitted.

During the call,

Mr. ROGERS stated that Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, was absent on account of sickness; that if here he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the result is announced, I would inquire of the Chair whether the previous question was not seconded upon the passage of the bill before the House adjourned yesterday?

The SPEAKER. It was not. That is the recollection of the Chair, and he is confirmed by the Journal.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The next bill in order is the following bill reported from the same committee on the same day with the one just disposed of:

A bill (H. R. No. 63) supplemental to the laws relating to the War Department, and authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims against the United States.

The bill, which was read, provides that all claims for quartermaster's stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States, may be submitted to the Quartermaster General of the United States, accompanied with such proofs as each claimant can present of the facts in his case; and it shall be the duty of the Quartermaster General to cause such claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of said Army, then to report each case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, with a recommendation for settlement. It further provides that all claims for subsistence actually furnished to the Army may be submitted to the Commissary General of Subsistence, accompanied with such proof as each claimant may have to offer; and it shall be the duty of the Commissary General of Subsistence to cause each claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and that the subsistence has been received or taken actually for the use of the Army, then to report each case for payment to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with a recommendation for settlement. And the action of the Quartermaster General and of the Commissary General of Subsistence, as the case may be, and of the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be final and conclusive upon such claims, which may be paid either by special requisition and warrant, or by a disbursing officer of the quartermaster and subsistence departments, as the case may be, or as may in each case be most proper or convenient; and the officers paying shall be relieved from all liability for, or on account of, the property so paid for.

Mr. THOMAS. As I cannot foresee what course will be taken by the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill which has just been recommitted to it, I was about to propose to postpone the bill now under consideration to a future day, that we may await the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I have an amendment to offer before that is done.

Mr. THOMAS. Before any action of the House is invited upon this bill, I desire to move a verbal amendment to correct a mistake made not only by myself, but by the entire Judiciary Committee. While the bill was before the committee we were not aware of the fact that the provisions of this bill are not confined to loyal citizens. I move to amend both sections of the bill by inserting the words "of loyal citizens" after the word "claims."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON moved to amend the bill by adding to the end thereof the following proviso:

Provided, That no claim shall be examined, audited, or allowed under the provisions of this act until the claimant shall have taken, subscribed, and filed with such claim the oath prescribed by an act to prescribe an oath of office, approved July 2, 1862, except so much of said oath as relates to the discharge of duties of office; and every person who shall falsely take said oath under the provisions of this act shall be liable to the penalties prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman, as I understand, proposes in the Committee on the Judiciary to separate the bill which was a few minutes since recommitted to that committee, and to report a bill from the committee providing for the repeal of the law which gives jurisdiction to our Court of Claims in cases of this character, and to add to it sections equivalent to the bill we have now under consideration. I would therefore very much prefer for myself, individually—it is for other gentlemen to decide for their constituents—that we should not act separately upon the bill now before the House, but that we should either recommit it, as we did the other bill, to the Committee on the Judiciary, or postpone its consideration until the Committee on the Judiciary shall have acted on the subject already recommitted to it. I have stated before, and I now reiterate, that I cannot, under any circumstances, with a just regard for the rights of those I represent here, vote to deprive the Court of Claims of its jurisdiction under the existing law in all these cases, unless at the same time and in the same law the House proposes to substitute for that tribunal some other to hear and determine these matters; because, Mr. Speaker, we have a coordinate branch of the Legislature, and it might happen that the Senate would pass one bill and reject the other; and in that case we of this House, who have now a tribunal before which our constituents may present their claims and have a fair chance of trial, would be in a very awkward dilemma indeed. We should have consented to take away from the Court of Claims all power over this subject, without substituting any other tribunal whatever.

I state to the House that from the western boundary of the District of Columbia to the base of the Alleghany mountains, and all along the northern boundary of Maryland, from one end to the other, the armies of the United States, not the enemy—we are not proposing to pay for the depredations of the enemy, but the armies of the United States, the officers of the Army of the United States—have swept bare all that region of country of all its crops on hand and almost all its live stock, and to that extent they have saved the Secretary of the Treasury the necessity of issuing a currency to pay for these supplies that must have been had elsewhere. The Representatives of those people will agree to no proceeding of this body that leaves us at the mercy of the Senate. I do not know how the Senate would act. I hope they would act mercifully. But it is our duty, as the immediate representatives of the people, not to leave it optional with the Senate to adopt the one bill and reject the other. The subjects are kindred. They belong to one and the same bill. It is only necessary to alter the caption or title of the bill originally reported, proposing to take away jurisdiction from the Court of Claims, and add one or two words to it, and then my bill belongs to it. If the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will signify now before the House that in the Judiciary Committee he proposes to connect the two bills, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman give way to me to enable me to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. THOMAS. Not at this moment. If, I repeat, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will signify a willingness on his part to couple these two measures in the Committee on the Judiciary, and report them as kindred measures to be voted on at the same time, I shall myself very cheerfully agree to send this bill where the other bill has been sent.

The SPEAKER. Before the debate progresses, the Chair will call the attention of gentlemen to the rule which prescribes that a motion to postpone admits of a very limited debate.

Mr. WILSON. I merely desire to say in reply to the question of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] that I do not think it proper to state in the House what my action may hereafter be in the Committee on the Judiciary. I therefore, sir, and for that reason, decline to answer the gentleman's question. But I would ask the gentleman what objection he can have to having this bill acted on now?

Mr. THOMAS. I have explained that, or at least I supposed that I had superseded any necessity for such an inquiry as that. I tried to make myself understood upon that point. I explained that we are not willing to send to the Senate a bill taking away from the Court of Claims jurisdiction in these cases without substituting some other tribunal, thus leaving ourselves at the mercy of the Senate, taking away the only remedy that our people now have, without at the same time coupling it with a proposition to give them some other tribunal for the trial of their claims.

Mr. WILSON. My suggestion is that this bill shall be acted on now. I have no doubt that it can be passed, and then the gentleman's constituents will have a remedy in addition to the one they now have.

Mr. THOMAS. A man must be a very young parliamentarian indeed not to see the error of that proposition. Would we not send this bill to the Senate? Let the gentleman then delay action in this House on the other bill proposing to take away jurisdiction from the Court of Claims until the Senate has sanctioned the other measure.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Maryland introduced this bill as a separate measure. He did not couple it with the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THOMAS. I have been long enough in this House, Mr. Speaker, to ascertain, by a sort of absorption or electricity, what is going on in the mind of the gentleman in regard to this matter; and I soon found out that I would not put my foot into a trap of that character; and I warn gentlemen around me not to fall into it either. I soon discovered that if we first send one and then send another of these bills to the Senate, the Senate might think proper to reject one and to pass the other. I want to have these measures connected. I think their subjects are kindred. The question is, will you give a judicial trial to these claimants, or will you repudiate your debts? If you intend to give them a judicial trial, and if the Court of Claims be not the proper tribunal, substitute another. If the House be of opinion that in fairness there ought to be another substituted, let these measures be kept together, and let them be sent in that form to the Senate. It will then be for the Senate to decide whether it will pass the bill in its entirety or reject it in its entirety. In the latter event the claimants will be left with the wretched chance they have in the Court of Claims.

I do not like to occupy so much of the time of the House. I thought yesterday that I had made myself thoroughly understood on this subject.

I now withdraw my proposition to postpone, and move to recommit this whole matter to the Committee on the Judiciary. Then we will be able to see what is the final disposition not only of the committee, but of the House also.

Mr. KING. I have an amendment which I desire to offer, that it may be sent with the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit will prevent the offering of the amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the recommitment of this bill. I think that if the whole matter were distinctly understood by the House, the House would concur in the opinion that the bill now before it ought to be passed now. It should be borne in mind that the bill which has just been recommitted is a combination of three bills, two of which were reported to the House from the Judiciary Committee, and one reported from the Committee of Claims. The bill now under consideration is the second of the bills reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee agreed unanimously that this bill ought to pass. With the amendment suggested or moved by the chairman, the committee is ready to sustain this bill, as far as I know, in the belief that it is due to claimants against the Government that they shall have some ready, efficient, and cheap means of securing payment of their claims.

The third part of this bill, which has been recommitment to the Committee on the Judiciary, was originally reported by the Committee of Claims. It is No. 212 in the orders of the House, and is a measure originating in an investigation of which the Judiciary Committee is entirely ignorant. The Committee of Claims has reported that bill, and is undoubtedly ready to explain and defend it. But the Committee on the Judiciary neither is to-day ready to explain and defend it, nor will it be when the bill shall have been returned to this House. It would seem that, in the ordinary course of business, we should have acted on the short bill limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and then have acted on the bill now before the House. But the gentleman from Maryland, acting, I have no doubt, under the guidance of his sense of what is proper and right, but with a degree of disingenuousness which I cannot commend here or elsewhere, did attempt in the House, and succeeded in, the combination of two bills which were distinct in themselves, which had not been considered together by the Committee on the Judiciary, which relate to different matters, and which, in my judgment, should have been kept separate. They have gone back to the Judiciary Committee coupled with the bill reported by the Committee of Claims. Now, unless the Committee on the Judiciary be expected to investigate this matter, already investigated by the Committee of Claims, it cannot be expected to report in favor of the passage of that part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, bill No. 212.

It would seem to me, in order to relieve this House and the Committee on the Judiciary from all disagreeable entanglement, that we should act now on this bill, which provides ways and means by which a certain class of creditors can secure the adjudication and payment of their claims. The gentleman from Maryland originated that measure. The Committee on the Judiciary agreed with him that it ought to be reported and passed. We are ready to do what we can in this House to secure the passage of it; and there is no reason why a measure proposing to take from the Court of Claims certain jurisdiction should be connected with a measure to audit and pay just claims against the Government. And I take it that the other legislative branch of the Government has a right to judge of these measures separately.

Mr. Speaker, if the measure now before the House has not merit enough in itself to command the approbation of this House and the Senate, then the presumption is that it ought not to pass; and to couple it with a measure which, in the judgment of anybody, has more merit, is an apparent indirection. The Committee on the Judiciary, not supposing that there was any intention to connect these two bills, expected to maintain each on its own merits. They attempted to do so. Now there is an opportunity to do that which ought to be done. It is meritorious, as I think. No. 212, which did not originate in the Committee on the Judiciary, the result of an investigation of which that committee was entirely ignorant, and coming from the Committee of Claims, it would seem that that committee, having knowledge of the facts, should have the management of their own bill; and I am opposed to the recommendation, and hope that this House will pass on this measure.

Mr. STEVENS. I must beg leave to differ entirely from the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] The House has already acted on the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to take away jurisdiction from the Court of Claims, by committing to that committee two sections for the adjustment of these claims, and allowing the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to be abolished on condition of creating other tribunals to adjust the claims of citizens who have suffered by this war. Now, while I have great doubts as to the propriety of depriving the Court of Claims—for I know of no reason why they are not to be trusted as well as any other tribunal, taking away from the House the vast labor that court was created to remove from this House—while I know of no such necessity, yet I am willing, if it is thought proper, to remove and transfer that jurisdiction somewhere else; but I am not willing to take it away unless it is coupled with an act creating another tribunal to try all questions which are legitimately triable before any of the tribunals of the country. I am not willing to try one by itself; to pass one, and then to trust to luck to have something substituted in its stead. And I cannot understand the zeal with which gentlemen, who say they are willing to pass this, are opposed to connecting them together, so that one may be dependent upon the other. I do not suspect a trick, but I may suspect an accident, and that when one is passed there will be no such thing as passing the other. Therefore until I know what the Committee on the Judiciary are to report back to me I am not willing to pass this one.

I hold it to be the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary to put into shape the instructions of the House in those two bills; not to cut them off, not to alter them, but to put them into a better shape. The House, as clearly as can be, by a considerable majority, amended the bill by two amendments; and I hold it to be unworthy of the action of the committee afterwards to ignore that action of the House and cut off these amendments.

I understand the gentleman from Maryland moves to commit.

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope it will be done, and that we shall not spend another day upon this question. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof, the bill and amendments were recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING. I have a proposition similar to that of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] and I ask that it may also be referred to the committee with the bill. I want to get the proposition before the committee.

No objection being made, the paper was referred as requested.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that an amendment I intend to offer to this bill may also be referred to the committee.

The amendment was so referred.

REPORT OF GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House ten thousand copies of the report of General U. S. Grant, in addition to the number heretofore printed.

INTERNAL REVENUE STATEMENT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the tabular statement of moneys received from internal duties, as required by the thirty-third section of the one hundred and nineteenth chapter of the Statutes of 1862, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I submit a letter to be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING,
WASHINGTON, March 2, 1864.

DEAR SIR: The House ordered six thousand copies of the report of Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the use of the House, and one thousand for the use of Internal Revenue office. The type has been distributed, and, being nearly all rule and figure, it will cost a good deal of money to reset it; and besides, such is the pressure of other work, it cannot be done for some months.

Why not give the Department another thousand from the number ordered for the House?

Yours, respectfully, JOHN D. DEFREES,
Superintendent Public Printing.

Hon. A. W. CLARK, Chairman Committee on Printing, Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I now move that there be furnished to the Internal Revenue Bureau two thousand copies of that document out of the six thousand ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed sixty thousand additional agricultural reports for 1863—fifty thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, and ten thousand for the use of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. The committee were induced to offer this resolution in consequence of there being one hundred thousand less copies printed last year than are ordinarily printed of that document. They did that last year knowing that the work was to be stereotyped, and with the hope that paper would be cheaper this year than when they took that action last year. Now the Committee on Printing have seen fit in consequence of the great demand for that document to introduce a resolution to print fifty thousand more for the use of the House, and ten thousand for the use of the Department. I trust the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the House for a single moment to this question of printing. I know how difficult it is to resist an appropriation of this kind. The work that is to be printed is one that is called for by our constituents more, perhaps, than any other. I fully concede its merits; and its merits this year I believe are as great as they ever have been, perhaps more. But last year we had the pressure of taxation, and the immense calls of the Treasury upon us, so that in a sane moment we went for a motion of economy. Now we are called upon to reverse our whole position upon this subject, and to pass a resolution which will call upon us for an expenditure equal to what it would have been had we ordered the printing of the whole number last year.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. He has stated that the number now proposed to be printed will cost as much as one hundred thousand copies would have cost last year.

Mr. MORRILL. That is my judgment, because paper is higher now than it was last year.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. The paper costs the same.

Mr. MORRILL. So far as the sixty thousand additional copies now proposed by the Committee on Printing are concerned, we are asked to back out of the position we took last year. Now I am free to say if twenty thousand copies were printed for my use in my own district, the number would not supply and satisfy the desire of my people. We cannot print so many but what we should find a large number of our constituents dissatisfied because they have not got a copy of the document. All feel an equal interest in the work; nearly all are equally worthy, and all feel equally entitled to it. But it is manifestly impossible that the Government should supply this work to this extent, and equally so for any member to make the distribution.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that we have the largest printing establishment in the whole country and perhaps in the world, and yet we are by our lavish and extravagant use of it on the very verge of breaking it down. Why, sir, we ordered the other day ten thousand extra copies of the diplomatic correspondence of the Secretary of State—a document of unusual interest—which I understand cannot be printed for months, and may have to be sent to New York to be printed, if printed at all.

Under these circumstances the Public Printer is about to call upon us to enlarge our printing establishment, to increase the buildings, to buy more machinery; and I say to the House that it is due to ourselves and to the country that we should exercise some economy, some self-denial, on this subject of printing.

I know that we are able, under the present system of doing the work ourselves, to print a much larger amount of work than we could do under the old contract system. But what are the facts under the present system? Why, sir, last year we appropriated $540,000, in round numbers, for the public printing office, and at the present session a bill has been reported for a deficiency of over six hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and that does not comprise all the deficiency, for since that bill was reported further deficiencies have been found and are asked for.

To be sure, we stopped the other day one small job for the printing of a dictionary of Congress; and I desire the members of the House to understand this fact, that by a law of Congress already on the statute-book, any books printed for their own use the cost must be deducted from their pay. There are other jobs coming up here in relation to the printing of books, and I regard this as the best point at which to oppose any further extravagant expenditures for printing, because I consider this the most meritorious of the whole list of documents published by Congress. If we can curtail this, we can of course stop the less worthy.

I trust that the House will not vote for any further increase of the labors of the public printing office, and will vote down this proposition. If there were reasons for economy last year, those reasons remain in full force this year. We had better save $50,000 than add that much to our tax bills.

Mr. A. W. CLARK resumed the floor.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Will my colleague yield to me for one moment?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I must decline to yield just now, as I wish to correct a statement made by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would ask the gentleman to state the facts—I could not hear them when he stated them before—as to the number printed this year, and the number printed last year, and also as to the number furnished to the Department last year, and the number proposed to be furnished this year.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. In answer to the inquiries of the gentleman from Illinois, I will state that last year the committee reported in favor of printing only one hundred thousand copies of the agricultural report, whereas the House usually printed two hundred thousand copies. That was done by the committee not so much with a view of economizing on the whole amount, but at that time we knew that the work would be stereotyped, and we thought that at a later period it might be printed much more cheaply, because paper was then very high. The committee find, however, that paper remains now at much the same rate, and therefore they have seen fit to authorize me to report in favor of printing one half of the number of copies usually ordered of this document, and which were not provided for last session.

Mr. MORRILL. It will cost about thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. About seventy cents a copy.

Mr. MORRILL. That will be about thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. In answer to the remarks made by the gentleman from Vermont, I will state that the printing for the legislative department of the Government has been considerably curtailed; and the immense amount of the public printing is due to the fact that the printing for the Executive Departments has been largely increased owing to the war.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman please state how many copies of the report the Department usually has, and how many they are to have now?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. They have ordinarily had twenty-five thousand copies. They now ask for ten thousand. I will yield now for a brief period to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STEELE.]

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who is so anxious to economize upon this matter of the public printing, the best way to do it is to strike at the root of this monstrous evil that has grown up here, which is the franking privilege. If the gentleman will introduce a bill to abolish the franking privilege he will propose economy to some purpose, and he will find at least one member upon this side of the House to go with him.

If there is anything which the people want of this enormous amount of trash which is printed here in Washington it is this agricultural report. And if the excuse for this enormous expenditure, based upon the franking privilege, is to be justified upon the idea of distributing things to the people, then I say this agricultural report, which is almost the only thing that the people do read and do ask for, is about the last place where the gentleman from Vermont should begin his very nice ideas of small economy. Therefore, sir, I hope that this report of the Committee on Printing will be adopted, and that these sixty thousand copies will be printed. That will supply to some extent the demand for this really valuable public document.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased with the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont in regard to the retrenchment of our printing bills; but I was surprised that he, as a farmer—one of the few farmers on this floor—should not be ardently in favor of furnishing the farmers of this country with that information which they desire—that contained in this agricultural report.

It is my opinion, sir, that we should rather curtail the distribution of those military reports that only tell us how battles were lost, and not how battles are won or are to be. I think it would be much more becoming of us to cut down the publication of the reports of these military candidates, these presidential candidates, and furnish the people, instead of them, with information concerning the products of mother earth, the source of all our material prosperity.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman from Iowa speaks of presidential candidates and military candidates. I wish to know what he means by "military candidates" in contradistinction to "presidential candidates?"

Mr. GRINNELL. I mean the military candidates for the Presidency.

Mr. MALLORY. Does the gentleman mean General Grant? His report was proposed this morning to be printed.

Mr. GRINNELL. General Grant is the candidate for military position only, indorsed by the people who are for putting down the rebellion. The candidate of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] is a man who has been dead a number of months.

Mr. MALLORY. Who is that?

Mr. GRINNELL. Why, General McClellan. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. McClellan is a live man, sir, a live man. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. The proposition here, sir, is to expend—how much? One mill to each of the people of the loyal States, for the purpose of disseminating information upon national agriculture; about one fiftieth part of the cost of the gentleman's cigar which he smoked this morning, or of his glass of grog; untaxed grog at that. [Laughter.]

If there has been anything brought before Congress that commends itself to the judgment of those who represent farmers on this floor, it is this. We have never had so full and able an agricultural report as the one just issued. That is the unanimous verdict upon it. Let it be disseminated among the people. One tenth of the farming population of my district have gone to the war. Let us show those who have remained behind how they can best till the soil, how they can promote prosperity in the midst of our troubles.

I hope the resolution will be adopted. It is due to the farmers of the country, and myself, identified with them, a Representative of a farming constituency. I ask that this number of the report be printed. If the gentleman from Vermont desires to enforce economy, I repeat let him commence on the reports of these military gentlemen, not on the agricultural report.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I propose to amend the resolution by striking out "sixty thousand copies," and inserting "one hundred thousand copies."

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, the floor being in possession of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. A. W. CLARK,] who yields to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STROUSE. Then I will speak briefly to the resolution. But if the gentleman from New York will consent to permit me to offer this amendment, I will feel obliged to him.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Not at present.

Mr. STROUSE. I beg leave to say that I feel some surprise that there should be any opposition from any source in this House to the proposition made for the publication of sixty thousand copies of the agricultural report. If this opposition to the printing of this necessary and useful book springs from any principle of economy, it is the more surprising, and is very much, indeed, like sowing at the spigot and letting run at the bung. We have voted willingly millions on millions for all sorts of matters and things, appropriations for every Department and sub-department and subdivision of the Government.

Sir, we are asked to vote nearly $100,000,000 to cover deficiencies, and I suppose that it will be done, because these debts must be paid.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with my friend from New York, [Mr. STEELE,] that of all the books, pamphlets, and—I may use his term—"trash" printed at Washington city for circulation, there is nothing, I do not care what other document it may be in usefulness and positive value, equal to this report of the Agricultural Department; and I may say in passing that we have never had one equal to the present book, one as well prepared, by the efficient superintendent of the Agricultural Department, Hon. Isaac Newton.

Let me remind gentlemen when they talk of taxes that the majority of the people who pay them and support this Government, that the men from whom revenue is derived, are the men for whose use and benefit these books are sought to be printed and circulated. It is the agricultural population of the country, the bone and sinew of the land, the foundation and essence of our national strength, desire and insist on having this report. We as their servants cannot resist so just a demand.

We must bear in mind that agriculture is the cause of the prosperity of both commerce and manufactures. Agriculture is the root and the trunk of the tree, while manufacture and commerce are the twigs and leaves. What is commerce without agriculture? What is manufacture without agriculture? What country can be prosperous without agriculture? We are an agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial people. The larger part of our people are agriculturists and producers, tillers of the soil, and upon this great interest every other class depends.

Notwithstanding these facts, sir, we hear gentlemen talk of the vast expense of this publication. Why deny these few thousand dollars to satisfy the rightful demands of the husbandmen, the men who really do earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow? We want to circulate the reports from the St. Lawrence to the Rio del Norte; every man who puts seed into the ground, every man who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, to have everything in the way of information that they may need. Suppose it does cost a few thousand dollars. We are daily making experiments with steamboats, and a single trial trip costs as much as all of these books. Nothing is said of that expense; but when we ask these books shall be published, we are told that we must economize. It is real economy to foster the agricultural interest, and this publication is for the most useful, the most modest, and the most worthy class of our community. These men are our constituents, upon whom we depend and upon whom the country depends. If it were not for agriculture we would crumble to pieces like the States of ancient times, which foolishly attempted to found empires upon consumption without production.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am reminded that in the remarks I made this morning I used the word "disingenuousness." I did not mean to assail the motives of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] I only meant to say that I thought the gentleman ought to have informed the Committee on the Judiciary of his intention to connect the two bills.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, so that I may move to strike out "sixty thousand," and to insert "one hundred thousand."

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I cannot yield for that purpose.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF SURPLUS GOLD.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the gold bill, with various amendments.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to correct a statement in the report of the proceedings of the House day before yesterday. I did not vote upon the bill establishing a department for taking care of the freedmen of this country, for the reason that I was paired off with my colleague, Mr. WASHBURN. It was stated in the report of the proceedings that I was paired off with Mr. ROBINSON.

SALE OF SURPLUS GOLD—AGAIN.

The House proceeded, in order, to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell any surplus of gold in the Treasury.

Mr. STEBBINS. I desire to offer a substitute for the resolution reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the power to offer amendments has already been exercised to the farthest capacity. There is now pending an amendment to the resolution, and an amendment to that; also a substitute for the resolution and an amendment to the substitute. That is the full extent to which amendments can be offered now.

Mr. STEBBINS. Mr. Speaker, when the proposition was introduced into this House to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the surplus gold which had accumulated and which was accumulating in the Treasury of the United States beyond the amount demanded by the wants of the Treasury and the requirements of the law, I took the occasion to declare that I could not regard the question from any other point of view than its bearing upon the great interests of the Government and of the people. I felt constrained to forget my hostility to a paper-money system, and was only willing to remember the circumstances supposed to have compelled its introduction during the period of the war. Great wars having always been carried on under such a system, judgment and experience seemed to concur that this country could not hope to be an exception to the rule. I do not, therefore, now propose to discuss the system itself, nor attempt to point out its imperfections. I desire to see nothing but the great facts that we are in the midst of a civil war; that men and money are necessary for its prosecution; that the national life must be preserved, the honor of our arms sustained, and the integrity of the laws of the United States vindicated. A financial system, the offspring of this great necessity, has grown up. It has been in operation for the past three years. It is interwoven in every part of our industrial system. We cannot abolish it if we would; we ought not to do so if we could. We must wait for peace to prevail before we undertake to pull down the structure and build up another. To undermine and destroy it now is to bury the nation under its ruins.

The introduction of this perfectly legitimate and necessary bill gave rise to a very remarkable debate. The bill was opposed because it conferred fresh and enlarged powers on the Secretary of the Treasury. The injurious effects of the rapid accumulation of gold in the Treasury, as shown in its advance and price, and the consequent advance in the prices of all the necessities of life, were not denied; but these evils were not considered so important as the consequences which might flow from increasing the Secretary's powers. The Government was actually the unwilling instrument of the speculators on the sea-board, and was in the position of the capitalist who is lending money upon gold to advance its value; was hoarding gold beyond its requirements, making it daily more and more scarce in the market, was itself depreciating the currency and feeding speculation; and yet this House was disposed to consider the passage of a bill directing the sale of the surplus as on hand as the greater evil of the two. I did not so regard the subject. I felt that the national credit was endangered by this action on the gold market, and I was in favor of instructing the Secretary to sell, at his discretion, all the surplus he had, or was likely to have, over and above the requirements of his Department. I desired him to be so instructed for the purpose of regulating his powers in the direction of his country's necessities. To me his powers lay in the fact that he could hold the gold or keep it out of the market. To direct the sale of any surplus beyond the wants of the Treasury was to limit and restrict his powers.

I desired to protect the people against further expansion, to restrain the madness of speculation that was holding the nation by the throat, and to which the Government at the moment was an unwilling party; and, sir, I have not changed my opinion. Reflection has confirmed my previous judgment. But I pass from the further consideration of this part of the subject.

Each day has added to the testimony that if the importations do not suddenly diminish the price of gold will advance to much higher points; speculation receive a new impulse; prices of the necessities of life rise in a corresponding degree; and the responsibility of the whole matter rest upon Congress for declining to disembarass or relieve the Government from a position that no one in his senses ever supposed it would occupy.

The question, to my mind, is one of great national importance, second to none now influencing our action. It ought not to be regarded from a political standpoint. It shall not be, as far as I am concerned; but purely and entirely with reference to its practical bearing upon the interests of the people of the United States.

Sir, in the discussion that followed the introduction of this bill statements were made, and deductions drawn from those statements, which have passed into wide circulation. I think them calculated to swell the current of improvident speculation, weaken still more the public confidence, depreciate still more the public credit, advance still higher the price of the precious metals, increase to a still greater degree the necessities of the Government, and, just in the same proportion, add to the burdens of a people already staggering and reeling beneath the weight of great anxieties and expenses. Dark predictions were uttered of speedy national bankruptcy, and solemn warnings of national repudiation. These declarations were supported by references to the figures of our public debt. The currency was declared to be $1,000,000,000! In my judgment, such predictions and statements cannot be made in this House or anywhere else without damage to the public credit and to private interests. Nor can they be without their effect upon the thousands of soldiers in the field, far away from their homes, in an enemy's country. They look to Congress to build up the national credit, to strengthen it if it is really endangered, to fortify it where it needs a breastwork, that they may feel secure of ample supplies of men and money until the war is successfully and honorably terminated. Sir, with all my objections to the financial system of the country, I feel it to be my duty to support that system until the war is over. I think it the duty of every man in this House to labor with industrious zeal to inspire the public with confidence, and so enable the Government to negotiate its loans and meet with promptitude all its obligations.

But, Mr. Speaker, my main object to-day is to dissent from the statements made in that debate. as to the facts in respect to the amount and condition of the public debt; to protest against the deductions drawn from them, even if they are as represented; but more particularly to show that there is nothing up to this date in the condition of the debt or the currency which justifies a depreciation of from thirty-three and a third to forty per cent. in the latter as against gold and silver; or warrants the improvident and wicked speculations in merchandise and commodities now prevailing in the Atlantic cities to so fearful an extent. To effect this purpose I propose, in the first place, to call the attention of this House to the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury. On page 17 of the report to this Congress we find the following:

"The limit prescribed by law to the issue of United States notes has been reached, and the Secretary thinks it clearly inexpedient to increase the amount. When circulation exceeds the legitimate requirements for real payments and exchanges, no addition to its volume will increase its value. On the contrary, such addition tends inevitably to depreciation; and depreciation, if addition be continued, will find its only practical limit in the utter worthlessness of the augmented mass.

"When Congress authorized the creation of debt, to a certain extent, in the form of United States notes, and impressed on these notes the qualities of a circulating medium, its action was justified by the disappearance of coin in consequence of the suspension of specie payments; by the necessity of providing a medium in which taxes could be collected, loans received, and payments made; and by the obvious expediency of providing that medium in the form of national issues instead of resorting to the paper of banks. Under the circumstances its action was wise and necessary; but it was equally wise and necessary to limit the extent of the issues by the necessity which demanded them. They were wanted to fill the vacuum caused by the disappearance of coin and to supply the additional demands created by the increased number and variety of money payments. Congress believed that $400,000,000 would suffice for these purposes, and therefore limited issues to that sum.

"The Secretary proposes no change of this limitation, and places no reliance, therefore, on any increase of resources from increase of circulation. Additional loans in this mode would, indeed, almost certainly prove illusory; for diminished value could hardly fail to neutralize increased amount.

"Sufficient circulation having been already provided, the Government must now borrow like any other employer of capital temporarily requiring more than income will supply, and rely for the credit which will secure advantageous loans upon good faith, industrial activity, accumulated though not immediately available capital, and satisfactory provision for punctual payment of accruing interest and ultimate reimbursement of principal."

I regard these declarations of the Secretary as conclusive as to his opinions and designs. His opinions are that sufficient circulation has been provided; that it cannot be increased except at the hazard of swift destruction to the whole system; that no change in the limitation or increase of the circulating medium, which is $400,000,000, ought to be considered for a moment. Here is an official declaration that $400,000,000 of currency have been supplied and are the outside limit that the Secretary will consent to issue, although the law allows $450,000,000. Ought not the country to be satisfied with this, the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury under his official signature? Where are we to get the facts if not from this high officer, acting under the responsibilities of his official oath? These plans of the Secretary commend themselves to my judgment as the correct steps toward a healthy and sound state of things. They are all that any Democrat, considering the condition of the country and the existence of a fearful civil war, should expect or demand. The Secretary has a right to the support of this House in his efforts thus to gravitate toward a more solid system of finance. So long as he seeks to carry out these principles I shall support them to the best of my ability, because by this course I support the best interests of commerce and all other classes and conditions of men. I support the means whereby the Government hopes to check expansion, undue prices, restrict speculation, restore confidence, and diminish the public expenses. Sir, holding these views, nothing could justify me certainly in withholding my aid from the accomplishment of this great effort to reduce the issue of paper money and to check the inflation now rushing like a whirlwind over the country, and this, unhappily, because of the too general ignorance of our real resources, and of the exact character of the public debt.

On page 8 of the Secretary's report we find the estimated condition of the public finances up to the 1st of July, 1864, and the estimated total debt up to the 1st of July, 1865. On the 1st of July, 1864, the public debt will be $1,686,956,641, of which $400,000,000 is currency. On the 1st of July, 1865, it will be $2,231,935,190, of which $400,000,000 is still to be the currency. It follows, then, that the funded or merchantable debt will, on the 1st of July, 1864, be $1,286,956,641, and on the 1st of July, 1865, $1,831,935,190, without the $400,000,000 of currency. It will be remarked that I class all but the $400,000,000 legal tender as funded debt, and that I assume that the extreme limit of this kind of money has been reached, that it will never be exceeded; and here permit me to repeat, that I base this emphatic declaration on the language of the Secretary's report, that admits of no other interpretation. I now propose to make this clear to the House and to the country. The $400,000,000 legal tender, drawing five per cent. interest, and now being paid out by the Secretary, redeemable in one or two years, is, like the rest of the funded debt, a merchantable article, partaking of the character of the English exchequer bill. It varies in price according to the value of money. It increases in value daily by the augmentation of interest. It may float as currency for a few days after it is issued, but presently it is absorbed; it disappears from the market. At its maturity it must be paid. It differs from the currency in so far as it is made payable at a given date, and draws interest up to a given time. The debt certificates which are paid out by the Secretary are also merchantable. They are bought and sold for money. They occupy the same relation to the capital that any promissory note occupies. They are made payable at specific times, and draw interest at six per cent. They are not currency.

The long loan of the Government is like any other funded debt; and so, Mr. Speaker, out of $1,600,000,000 of debt created thus far, but $400,000,000 is currency.

The national bank currency act for the creation of $300,000,000 circulation of uniform value throughout the United States I understand as being designed to supersede the local State bank currency of the country; that it is simply the substitution of one plan for another—a plan which is regarded by the Secretary as the most suitable in time of war, calculated to strengthen the national credit, provide a means for the sale of Government debt in considerable quantities, and prepare the way for a resumption of specie payments as well as the gradual displacement of the legal tenders. It does not look to an increase of the currency. The new system comes into existence as the old system expires. There is no need, therefore, of any fresh alarm from this source. Congress may be called upon to modify the law of the last session on this subject, that the machine may work with perfect smoothness, but I think it will be demonstrated that, at the time the currency of the State banks is to cease to exist, that by enabling laws, or by other processes the banks themselves can readily pass under the new system. It therefore follows that no new device for the creation of more paper money is to be found in this bill. I am not prepared to say, in view of the fact of the introduction of the legal-tender currency during the war as an absolute necessity, and of its necessary existence to a greater or lesser degree for a time after the termination of the war, that the national bank currency act will not prove to be a wise and beneficent measure, calculated, as suggested by the Secretary, to insure an early return to specie payments, without the disorders and convulsions that have heretofore followed directly in the wake of great financial changes, and especially such a change as the substitution of specie payments for those of paper. A careful examination of this great question is certainly demanded by the best interests of the people, and I propose to give it the best attention of which I am capable before deciding upon my future course in the matter. I shall, however, examine it on its merits in connection with the probable wants of the country growing out of the war, and purely as a question of finance in which every human being in the nation is directly interested.

Mr. Speaker, the people buy the funded debt of the United States for income. They buy it with a full knowledge of all the circumstances under which it is created. They buy it on the credit of the nation, on its resources, on the present and prospective magnitude of its population and its productive power. They buy on the past history of the country, on its rapid growth, on its unsurpassed prospects for the future. They believe in the perpetuation of our institutions and in the preservation of our national unity. They believe in but one Government over our vast domain. They believe in the value of one million square miles of public lands west of the Missouri; in the thousands of millions of mineral wealth folded in its vast embrace. They believe in the construction of the Pacific railroad; in an exodus of millions of men to the Rocky mountains, prepared with their machinery to grind them to powder, and produce from their prolific sides huge volumes of treasure. They believe in the iron, the coal, the copper, the lead, the silver, the cinnabar, and all the valuable metals which they know to exist in unlimited quantities within that vast region of seven hundred million acres; and if they are willing to buy the funded debt of the nation on this security, how can you reconcile it that the $400,000,000 currency, based in reality on the same security, should sell at thirty-three and a third to forty per cent. discount? "There is more in this, if our philosophy could but find it out." Let us examine some of the reasons why this confidence should exist. Sir, in the very remarkable and highly valuable report of Hon. Samuel B. Ruggles, made in September of last year, to the International Statistical Congress at Berlin, on the resources of the United States—a paper that should be circulated all over the country—I find the following valuable statistics on the subject of the increase of the population of the United States when compared with other countries:

The population of France increased thirty-seven per cent. in sixty years, from 1801 to 1861; of Prussia, seventy-nine per cent. in forty-five years, from 1816 to 1861; of England and Wales one hundred and twenty-one per cent. in sixty years, against an increase in the United States of five hundred and ninety-three per cent. in the same length of time.

The increase of the national wealth within the last ten years is thus presented in the same report: assessed value of property actually taxed in 1850, leaving out the assessed value of slaves, was $6,174,780,000, and in 1860 $14,223,618,068; leaving an increase in the decade of $8,048,825,840. Mr. Ruggles thus distributes this vast increase of the national wealth: to New England $735,754,244; the middle Atlantic or carrying and commercial States, from New York to Maryland, inclusive, $1,834,911,579, and to the food-producing interior itself, embracing the eight great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri, $2,810,000.

Now, sir, at this rate of increase, in 1870, six years hence, we shall have $35,000,000,000 of national wealth, and in 1880, in only sixteen years, $80,000,000,000.

Sir, the legal-tender currency of $400,000,000, if divided equally among these States, to be paid by them out of this increased wealth, would have been extinguished in the first six months of the year 1860, and the balance remaining on hand of the increase of this wealth of the ten years preceding would have been the enormous sum of $7,500,000,000.

These figures are presented, Mr. Speaker, in order to show how unimportant is this amount of currency when regarded or examined in connection with the nation's ability to pay it. And yet we are told that the country is on the verge of hopeless ruin. No, sir. Let the Secretary only adhere to the principles and to the language of his report. In the words of the poet, the nation

In this connection, or in connection with that vast section of this country which stretches away from the Missouri to the Pacific, so forcibly alluded to in the report to which I have referred, let me request my colleague from New York, who is filled with apprehension of coming woe in the shape of national ruin growing out of the creation of $400,000,000 of paper money, to pass for a few moments from this Hall to the foot of the great marble staircase that leads to the upper story of this building. His attention will be arrested at the foot of the steps by a magnificent work of art illustrating the declaration of the distinguished Bishop Berkeley—for I believe this country is indebted to him for that brief but expressive sentence—

"Westward the course of empire takes its way."

Sir, we all know my colleague to be a man of fine imagination and of quick perceptions. As he will gaze on this effort of the gifted artist, he will in spite of himself find his heart swelling under the inspirations that will sweep unbidden over his kinder nature and his gentler judgment. Sir, he will acknowledge that in the truths of to-day the prophetic declarations of the writer of that sentence have been already realized. The course of empire has been westward. Hundreds of thousands of men have surged over to the shores of the Pacific like a flood, and now, like the tidal pulses of the sea, are rolling backward again east to the Rocky mountains to meet the still rolling western waves at the same point. On the sides of those mountains, and in the basins and valleys which they create, an empire of millions of human souls are destined ere long to concentrate their mighty energies, struggling with the sea-board for the supremacy in material wealth. Sir, they will be indorsers of this $400,000,000. Twenty-five millions of people living to-day have made these bonds or obligations. Forty-two millions of people will guarantee them in 1870. Why, sir, that is only six years hence, and according to the census of 1860 fifty-six millions will look after the debt if it is not paid in 1880, only sixteen years hence, backed up by $82,000,000,000 of capital or national wealth. Sir, no comment is necessary in the face of these wonderful figures!

But, Mr. Speaker, let us for the sake of argument suppose, what I will admit is hardly supposable, that this Government should, in the course of its struggles, overwhelmed with new embarrassments, find itself unable to pay its interest on its funded debt for one or more years. What would be the result? Viewed in the light of history it might bring national concern and mortification, but not national disgrace. Nor would it retard our national growth for a single hour. The soil would still produce its teeming millions of grain; the Pacific slope its immense treasures of gold and silver. The tide of population would still sweep in, in hundreds of thousands. Our industry would still flourish, our people labor, and the country, in all its greatness and its glory, still remain. Sir, we have already seen in our own brief history that which will serve as an illustration as to what may be seen again upon a larger scale.

There are two memorable instances on record which are worth more than a passing thought for the splendid lessons that they teach.

The western States, led on by a spirit of enterprise far in advance of the actual development in material wealth and in population, contracted debts for their internal improvements. In a dark financial hour they failed to pay their interest, and their obligations declined from a premium of twenty per cent. down to eighty per cent. below par. The great State of Ohio trembled to her center at the time from her apprehensions and fears. And powerful Pennsylvania with all her wealth saw her securities sixty per cent. below par. Some years elapsed before the western States responded. But, sir, they did respond, nobly responded, paid every dollar, and so vindicated the judgment of the pioneers who marked out the system of internal improvements. They vindicated the judgment of the investors in their securities who bought as men now buy the funded debt of the United States on what they see and believe in the future of this country.

Hence, I would urge upon the Secretary of the Treasury the great importance of acting with promptitude upon the clear and comprehensive language contained in his report: to borrow in the open money market, and at the market price, every dollar hereafter demanded by the wants of the Government. I would advise a sale of the funded debt to any extent necessary; and I would urge upon this House to exhaust its ingenuity in showing the magnitude of the security offered by the nation, and the great and growing power of the Republic, in order to facilitate the Secretary in the most effective manner in all his future negotiations.

The States of Indiana and Illinois are worthy of especial mention as affording the evidence of the wonderful recuperation of our people within the State limits. It is within the recollection of many members of this House, indeed all of them, how the realization of the financial disasters that broke over those young States of the West, and swept the sensibilities of both hemispheres. Europe was largely interested in these obligations, and very large amounts of them were held in this country. These States were covered with ignominy and reproach, and they were compelled to endure the base charges of repudiation and bankruptcy. Sir, they were never for one moment bankrupt, nor did they even for one moment falter in the resolution to repair the disasters of that fearful period by an early liquidation of all their indebtedness. Sir, the example of these States to their brethren of this country will live in all coming time, and it stands out, and will ever stand out, as the most incontrovertible testimony that the nation of which they form so magnificent, so illustrious, and so distinguished a part will pay every dollar, both principal and interest, be it funded debt or legal tender—every dollar expended to perpetuate the structure of this Government in all its splendid proportions, in all its graceful outlines.

The other instance to which I would refer is the railroad crisis. Railroad stocks and bonds passed in public estimation from a high premium almost to zero. Thirty-three thousand miles had been built, costing $1,300,000,000, or an amount equal to the present national debt; miles of railroad built by the enterprise of our people, and more than all Europe besides. Sir, when the hour came, and these securities were unsalable; when these corporations did not pay their interest, and when men who held them seemed in despair, what did it accomplish for the system itself? It did not destroy the railways; it did not diminish traffic; it did not stay the strong arm of the agriculturist; it did not retard the growth of our population. No, sir; the system was bound to live; it belonged to this, the nineteenth century; it was conceived in great foresight and wisdom, and it survived through new economies and the introduction of wiser and more prudent counsels in its management.

Who suffered by this remarkable crisis? Not the owners of the property, for they saved their money in the revival of the prices of both bonds and stock; nor the country, for it remains teeming with prosperity, productiveness, and power, stimulated and strengthened by this gigantic system of internal improvements.

Now, sir, where is the difference between the funded debt of a great community and the funded debt of a smaller community, or the debt and obligations of incorporated companies? Show me the difference in the character of the calamity that would befall the Government if we should fail to pay interest for a single year, and the calamity that befall the State of Illinois under the like circumstances or the circumstances to which I have referred.

The conclusion to be drawn from all this, Mr. Speaker, I take to be simply that the only thing which the country has to fear is the continued depreciation of the $400,000,000 of legal tender, which the people sell at thirty-three to forty per

"Is far as the farthest from ruin;
The field seem to know what their master is doing;
And pasture and orchard and cornfield and lea
All catch the infection, as generous as he."

cent. discount under the influence of the marvelous fears generated and encouraged by those who are utterly ignorant of the power and resources of the nation. To my understanding all our troubles lie with the legal tender. It is a matter of no consequence to the people of the country as a nation as to what the funded debt may sell at in the mutations of the future. The Government has only to look after the interest upon the debt and the principal at its maturity. With the currency, which every man is bound by law to receive for his property, it is another affair. There is no time fixed for its final extinguishment, and our enemies seek to discredit and destroy it both at home and abroad. People who take it hasty to invest it in real property, while speculation lives and flourishes by holding it up to public odium and contempt. The more speculation can discredit it, the more speculation thrives.

Speculation is sleepless in its efforts to discredit it; and yet, sir, there is a way to remedy the difficulty. It is by familiarizing the people with the power, resources, and wealth of the nation; and this, in my judgment, is the duty of every Representative in this House, and of every intelligent and reflecting citizen out of it. If this $400,000,000 of currency were secured to be paid to-morrow, if the nation could see it begin to expire by the establishment of a sinking fund of ten per cent. per annum, which would destroy it all in ten years, or if, by legislation, the Secretary was directed to burn $100,000 of it per day until the whole $400,000,000 were destroyed, do you imagine that you would hear anything more of a rise in gold? Sir, it would be the death of the speculators on the sea-board, and the nation would rise from its fears and apprehensions full of fresh power and energy. So small an effort as this, in my opinion, would reduce the expenses of this Government thirty-three and one third per cent. per annum. If, sir, I am right in this conclusion, why should the people be inflamed with fresh fears by the dark predictions of impending bankruptcy and ruin? And why are we not bound to present, in contradiction to statements such as I have referred to, facts that lead the mind to an entirely different judgment?

Sir, I repeat, with all the emphasis I am capable of expressing, that in advocating every measure for strengthening our financial system; by encouraging the Secretary of the Treasury to persevere in carrying out the ideas distinctly presented in his annual report; by pointing out, to the extent of my humble ability, the way to roll back the current that has set in such irresistible force against the public credit; by pointing out in even so feeble a manner the vast resources of our country, and showing that an issue of $400,000,000 of currency, which, after all, is only a substitute for the gold and bank circulation it has displaced, I fulfill my duty as a Representative. The people, who are to be swept away in case of so fearful a calamity as national bankruptcy, will sustain me in my efforts, and will sustain all those who take the same course in the midst of the emergencies of this fearful contest.

In the course of the debate, Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts who advocated the proposition to empower the Secretary of the Treasury to anticipate the interest on the public debt, and so dispose of the surplus gold in the Treasury, and avoid its accumulation hereafter by the same means, declared that, disguise or conceal it as we might, the currency had depreciated to the extent indicated by the price of gold.

Sir, the quotation daily made for gold in the New York market is certainly an indication for the day of the positive depreciation of the currency. Any one who owns gold can certainly sell it at the New York quotation for paper. No one can deny the truth of this proposition; but I submit to that gentleman, and to those who concur with him in opinion, whether there are not many good grounds for the belief that there are causes operating to produce this depreciation unknown before in the history of paper money, and whether some of them may not be regarded as wholly artificial, and capable of being easily exposed and dispelled? Sir, I think there are artificial means constantly being used to influence the price of gold. These means have been employed since the suspension of specie payments. They have increased from month to month for the past year, just in proportion to the growth of speculation, which to-day exceeds in volume anything ever known before in the history of civilization. It has become necessary for the safety of this huge structure of illegitimate traffic that the price of gold should continue to rise in respect to the currency; and, sir, it will not be permitted to decline if human ingenuity and human effort can prevent it. Such a state of things must give birth to every species of device, and to every kind of artificial process. They will come in the form of misrepresentations of the military situation of the country and exaggerated statements of any defeats in the field; they will be in the shape of extensive combinations for the temporary purchase of the floating gold in the market; in the false statements as to the character and condition of the public debt, and in the objects and designs of the Government; and all this is rendered more easily available by the ignorance that is permitted to prevail as to the resources and power of the nation.

To illustrate my views more fully as to "causes hitherto unknown" now operating to the prejudice of the currency, I would ask the House to regard New York city, the great commercial and financial center, connected by the electric wires with every city and every town of any importance in every State not in rebellion, away to the far off Pacific. The opinions of representative men are solemnly uttered in this House that national bankruptcy and repudiation are surging at our feet to engulf us in its formidable waves. The lightning that carries this fearful verdict to the people of the country flashes the tidings to the city of New York almost instantly from innumerable points in the shape of positive orders to buy gold, to buy merchandise, to buy commodities. Thousands of orders reach that great mart in an hour, and through all hours of the day, and hence a traffic, boundless in extent, and all in one direction, all to purchase property at the market prices, without limit, is carried on in that city by a frightened and frenzied population. Has the currency depreciated because of these transactions? Is national bankruptcy really here because of such declarations? I cannot so regard it. The truth is that this modern instrument, electricity, is playing a new and most important part in the affairs of men, and for the first time in the greatest drama in the history of civilization. It so concentrates and so intensifies the incidents of human life, so entirely controls and governs them, that those who measure the present by the past utterly fail of arriving at proper or just conclusions. Sir, I look for the moment when the people of the United States, moved by different impulses, influenced by calmer counsels, led by wiser judgments, and enlightened by the spirit of truth, will see with a clearer vision the actual condition of their country, and be overwhelmed with shame and mortification at their own folly.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, the existence of some vast building or theater crowded with thousands of human beings, all intent upon the enjoyment of some great dramatic spectacle; and suppose that, in the midst of their engrossment of the play, in obedience to a concerted signal, a few voices should raise the appalling cry of fire, and rush through the narrow outlets toward the street. Does it need any one to foretell the fearful disasters that might follow the efforts of that frenzied multitude in their attempts to escape through the contracted and crowded corridors? Sir, hundreds might be crushed to death, while thousands were being robbed by those who had precipitated the calamity. Sir, will any one undertake to declare that the building is really on fire because of the infuriated cry of fire? I think not, sir; and yet such is the condition of the people of this country on the great question of the national currency. Hundreds have been crying fire for the past three years, while multitudes have been endeavoring to escape the fearful calamity which is said to threaten the paper system. It is to be entirely demolished, say our enemies; and while the cry continues, and every imaginable auxiliary is being used to magnetize the nation into such a belief, and while the people are rushing out of the building in mad disorder, a system of pillage is going forward that defies description, and human ingenuity is taxed to its utmost capacity to keep up the alarm, that the spoils of the enterprise may augment, and the opportunities for plunder survive a little while longer.

I regard, sir, the depreciation of the currency of the United States from thirty-three to forty per cent. discount for gold as a monstrous crime or a fearful delusion; I regard every man as guilty of crime who does anything to assist that depreciation. While the few are benefiting by it, while the capitalists are rejoicing over their advantages, the masses of our countrymen are suffering fearfully, and must continue to suffer still more, unless we awake to the magnitude of the crisis, and use the great facts that God has furnished us with to counteract the trouble and restore the public confidence in all classes of our securities.

Sir, it may be urged that the most gifted intellects and the most profound wisdom have been exerted on the side of truth for the benefit of the nation, and that no good reason can be assigned for the declaration that that which is false has been the most extensively circulated through the modern machinery of the telegraph. To that I answer, that during the whole of this war, certainly during the existence of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, the talent of this House has not been exerted on the side of those questions which are operating so powerfully on the interests of the people apart from the war. The war itself, the measures for its prosecution and final settlement, have engrossed its entire attention, while for the want of practical legislation the solid industry of the country is being subordinated by wild speculation, and the currency rotting away daily, to the almost irreparable damage of the national interests.

But, sir, I look hopefully into the future. I cannot but believe that there is a great change approaching. The Secretary of the Treasury has indicated the policy which he designs hereafter to pursue. He asks no more legal-tender money from this Congress. He marks out for himself a well-defined line in the direction of a sound and stable state of things, along which he is resolutely determined to pass. A man reads with no understanding who does not detect such a resolution in his report to this Congress. Sir, this policy will have the effect to check the speculative madness of the present hour; it will have the effect to reestablish public confidence in the power of the nation and in the soundness of its obligations; it will restore to sanity those who are mad, and bring about a reaction of public sentiment in favor of the currency which so many have been dishonoring, and which, for a time, is indispensable to the safety and life of the nation.

When this moment arrives, as arrive it assuredly will, we shall again realize the influence of electricity. The current of disorder will as suddenly subside; it will be rolled backward to its source with an impetuosity of terrible strength. The wires will again be in requisition, and flash from all parts of the United States to the great center of traffic; but conveying very different tidings from what they have so long been used as the instrument. Sir, on that day I commend New York to the especial notice of this House. With the decline in gold huge values will disappear, from thirty-three and one third to fifty per cent. in a single day, and the masses of our people begin to find the proceeds of their labor again equal to their necessities.

Sir, it is our solemn duty to assist in bringing about such a state of things. The first step we are bound to take is to relieve the Government from the fearful position of being a hoarder of gold. It cannot afford to be an instrument in the hands of its enemies, a participant in the depreciation of its currency, a party to the speculations of the seaboard. It cannot be auxiliary to that without precipitating its own ruin.

The second step should be to allay the public fears as to the value and extent of the legal-tender issue. The amount is but $400,000,000, not $1,000,000,000. Instead of an unlimited issue hereafter, not one dollar more is to be added; but, on the contrary, the amount in circulation is to be reduced, and a more enlarged system of taxation established. Such, from the language of the Secretary's report, is to be the future policy of the Government.

The third is to exhibit and keep before the people the absolute resources and power of the nation, and show the difference between its ability to meet the formidable emergencies of this war and the ability of other nations at other periods to meet the emergencies of their revolutionary and other contests, because of the comparison that is constantly being instituted; to show that no parallel whatever can be drawn between the struggle on this continent and the past struggles between nations in the Old World. Comparisons are frequently instituted between the condition of the currency of the United States and that of the French assignats during the period of the Revolution. Why, sir, France issued $3,000,000,000 of that kind of paper within about the same time that we have issued $400,000,000, or less than five per cent. of that of France. Sir, there can be no parallel between the cases, certainly none when we regard the question in connection with the resources of the two Powers. The increase of the population of this country over that of France for the past ten decades is a plain answer to the question.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we must instruct the people as to the difference between currency and funded debt, a thing that seems to be so little understood. If we keep constantly before the public view the vast security afforded for the final extinguishment of our debt, and show our abundant resources to meet the continued demands of the war for a long time to come, in case it should be necessary to continue it, there need be no fear of bankruptcy or repudiation.

I now move the previous question upon the pending amendments, with a view to offer the substitute which I have indicated, and which I offer with the consent of the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask that the substitute be read.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell any surplus gold.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, first, reserving in the Treasury an amount sufficient to meet the payments in gold required by law, to sell from time to time at public auction, after having given five days' notice in the daily papers of New York, any portion of the surplus of gold in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, instead of such sale, apply the gold in the Treasury to the redemption in advance of the interest coupons of the United States, which by law are required to be paid in gold, whenever the amount on hand shall be sufficient to discharge the entire amount maturing and on the same day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman to give way a few minutes that I may submit some remarks upon this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would give way to the gentleman from New York, but as I understand the previous question is called upon the subject, I feel it my duty to adhere to my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say to the gentleman from New York that he could not occupy the floor even if the gentleman from Wisconsin should withdraw his motion, as the previous question is demanded by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FENTON. I ask my friend from New York to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and I will agree to renew it.

Mr. STEBBINS. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw my motion for the present.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties; when the Speaker signed the same.

SALE OF SURPLUS GOLD—AGAIN.

Mr. FENTON. I know it is not in order to offer a substitute at this time, but I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read, and give notice that I will offer it at the proper time, if the substitute already offered to the pending bill be voted down. I ask that the proposed substitute be read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

SEC. 1. The Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to sell gold or other coin received in payment for United States bonds negotiated, and also to sell any foreign exchange that may be received by the agents or officers of the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the sale of any gold or other coin now on hand or that may be received hereafter in payment of custom-house duties.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to anticipate a payment of interest upon the public debt of the United States from time to time, either with or without a rebate of interest upon the coupons, as he may deem expedient.

Mr. BROOKS. Before the gentleman from New York proceeds I wish to understand where we are. Are we under the operation of the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdrew his demand for the previous question in favor of his colleague, [Mr. FENTON,] who agreed to renew it.

Mr. BROOKS. Are we to understand, then, that after the two gentlemen upon the Committee of Ways and Means have expressed their sentiments, nobody else can?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. STEBBINS] called the previous question only upon the pending amendments, with a view, if they are voted down, to offer the substitute of which he has given notice. The bill will then be open to further amendment and debate.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I intend to discuss the general bearing of the proposition in its relations to finance and trade, and especially to reply to the statements of my colleagues, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD and Mr. BROOKS,] who addressed the House upon this subject on the 19th of February, making it the pretext rather than the text for argument.

I read from the Congressional Globe. Mr. BROOKS said:

"Now, Mr. Speaker, if there were no other than the mere political objection, if you choose so to call it, it would be sufficient to my mind. It is the worst policy, it is the most dangerous and alarming of measures to clothe any man with enormous power over the currency of the country. The President of the United States now has in his right hand the sword, and through the Secretary of the Treasury he has in his left hand the purse; and therefore stands completely the impersonation of despotism. If he chooses to exercise that power, the Secretary of the Treasury can now create, manufacture, and dispose $1,000,000,000 of paper money. It is now proposed to give him the whole control of the gold in the country."

The following extract is from Mr. Wood's speech of the same date:

"And that leads me, Mr. Speaker, to a consideration of the fallacious system upon which the finances of the country are now being conducted. We have had other wars in Christendom. We have had expensive wars. We have had wars costing $100,000,000 a year. The system of finances attempted to be adopted here is not new in the history of the world. It is as old as Christendom; and whatever merit there is in the present financial system, no man now living can claim the originality of the invention."

"Sir, paper money was established originally under Charles I. Previous to his time, when a monarch found himself in a strait, his resource was not to paper money, it was to debase the coin of the country, and give an official stamp to the representative of value by depleting the intrinsic value contained in the coin itself. Charles I originated paper money. What was the consequence? Charles II, whose administration was almost as profligate as this, ended in bankruptcy, ruin, and repudiation. That was the result of the paper-money enterprise in those days, and that will be the result of the present application of the same principle."

And again:

"Three years ago next August our experiments in paper money commenced, and we have already issued $1,000,000,000 of currency."

Mr. Speaker, the subject of finance and currency is one of great interest to the Government and people. It is not strange in this period of our history, the most remarkable in the magnitude of expenditure, that these questions should invoke grave attention and investigation. It is most fortunate that amid the events transpiring, which have no parallel in the world's history, one of our ablest and purest statesmen was called to the head of the national exchequer; and the result is that, amid difficulties the most momentous, our fiscal affairs have been conducted with unrivaled ability and success. Public confidence has been inspired and our credit has been maintained during a period of civil commotion, peril, and expenditure, hitherto unknown. An analysis of the Secretary's late report exhibits the most mature reflection and comprehensive mastery of the vast subject of finance, currency, and trade, and challenges the respect, if not the support, of every intelligent and fair mind in the country.

Mr. Speaker, I did not suppose that the paper currency of the country, necessarily disproportionate to the amount of gold and silver, could maintain during the period of so great expenditures a par value. It was impossible to avoid a depreciation of currency, and a corresponding appreciation of values, equally disturbing to the laws of exchange and trade.

I need not stop to argue that there was insufficient of the precious metals for a circulating medium. In times of peace experience has shown that they are the only safe reliance as a basis for currency and banking operations. In a time of war, when the amount of money required in the affairs of the Government is so largely increased, the credit of the Government, the good faith, and confidence in its resources and stability, must to a great extent take the place of the precious metals, and form in a great degree the basis of credit and currency.

The monetary problem of the country, with an expenditure of $800,000,000 annually, cannot be solved by any past practice or experience of our history. Nor can the financial strength of the United States be judged correctly by rules that govern the finances of Europe. 1. Because its basis is principally in the property of the country, in lands and agricultural products, whose value is not adequately represented in money, notwithstanding these products furnish an important element of trade and exchange by exportation to foreign countries. The intrinsic values of the products and sources of wealth are constantly expanding with the increase of population and the simple march of emigration to new Territories. 2. Because the labor of men employed in agriculture and the arts produces more here than in Europe. This increased production does not get its expression in money at once, and therefore it is undervalued; but it exists as real wealth, and constitutes a powerful reserve of resources, as this war has shown, and furnishes increased confidence in the fiscal ability of the Government to meet the present and any possible future demand upon it.

I am led to these reflections by the remarkable statements of my colleagues from New York city, [Messrs. WOOD and BROOKS,] who exhibited so much earnestness in discrediting the financial as well as the political policy of the Government, and who indulged in exaggerations of its enormous liabilities and prospective bankruptcy.

No country has such a vast extent of territory and such a rapidly increasing population, and no empire of contiguous territory possesses such a variety of climate, soil, and natural productions, whether of field, forest, or fishery, or such a wealth and diversity of annual agricultural products. We have a greater extent of mineral products than all Europe. Our coal-fields are thirty-two times greater in extent than those of England, Ireland, and Scotland. Our gold deposits, our copper, lead, and iron mines are the richest and most abundant in the world.

To give importance and additional value to all these elements of present wealth and future prosperity, we have vast amounts of cheap and fertile lands which invite occupants to our shores. We offer the largest liberty consistent with order, justice, and free government; and the result is, that the industrious poor and middle classes of Europe are coming to our country, in the midst of a civil war, in numbers that find no parallel in the history of this nation.

If we merely estimate the amount of present property brought to our shores by this flood-tide of emigration, we find it reaches hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. But if to this we add this influx of labor, at its constantly increasing ratio of value as applied to the development of these inexhaustible resources of latent, natural wealth, we see an ever-expanding basis of public credit altogether incapable of present estimation.

It therefore seems to me that the man who speaks of impending failure in our financial affairs is either grossly ignorant of the facts or mischievously designs to awaken distrust and impair public credit. I hope it is not true that a certain class of men, disappointed and exasperated at the success of the cause of the Union and the progress of liberty, seek to gratify a malignant opposition by detraction of our public men, and an attempt to depreciate our true financial strength and success.

The proof that we have a vast aggregate of real wealth derived from fresh Territories and an active population was made conclusive when the trials of this war began. Our productions then rose to their real value, and were freely distributed to other nations. Cotton and the southern staples fell off altogether, yet the vast reserve stocks of northern products at once rose to fill their place. In 1858-59 we exported the values stated in the table herewith submitted, and, after deducting imports, had a balance in our favor in each year.

	Exports.	Imports.	Balances.
1858-59.....	$356,789,462	$338,765,130	$18,024,338
1859-60.....	400,122,296	362,163,941	37,958,355
1860-61.....	410,856,818	359,775,835	60,080,983

In these three years cotton constituted a large portion of the value, and other southern staples were embraced in the exports. There was at that time no premium on gold.

Next came two years of war, in which there was no cotton exported. The undeveloped northern wealth then first rose to its true proportions:

	Exports.	Imports.	Balances.
1861-62.....	$229,790,280	$205,819,823	$23,970,457
1862-63.....	331,844,247	352,933,872	78,908,375

Thus, in three years of trade, with all our staples to send abroad, we realized a total of credits amounting to the sum of $116,063,676, a most gratifying proof of the strength of the country.

Yet, in the next two years, with war on a gigantic scale prevailing, and a total loss of what were then our chief exports, the credits arising from trade with foreign nations were $102,878,832, a sum nearly as large in two years as was the other in three years.

Such being the material wealth of the country, its aggregates being so far beyond all European precedents, the question of debt and currency becomes more easily understood. It is, however, true beyond all question that in all measures for the preservation of financial strength by the Government the taxes perform an indispensable and very important part. So long as they yield sufficient revenue for the ordinary expenses, including interest on the public debt, the finances are in a sound condition, and even if great extraordinary expenses are incurred in a state of war, it is only necessary that the revenue should be sufficient to warrant the belief that in future all just demands will be promptly met. This must be by providing prompt payment of interest and laying aside a fund for the ultimate redemption or payment of the principal. We are now engaged in a war in which the loss of life and property exceeds that of any known in history. In addition to this, the Government expenditures are of such magnitude as to astound those who, looking only to the past in their estimate of the future, fear that no adequate provision can be made for the public service and for payment. There is a greater amount of property of undoubted intrinsic value in the loyal States alone than in any two countries of Europe; more grain, more cattle, more cultivated lands, more houses built, more railroads constructed. There is also more activity in the exchange and transfer of all these from producer to consumer. The volume of currency required is directly proportioned to both amount of property and activity of exchanges. Therefore the sum of money may be large and yet be safe. It must be large, and it must increase with the growth and the requirements of the country.

There is now of bank circulation I suppose about $160,000,000; of United States notes, legal tender, $447,796,212; of United States notes, old issue, $1,323,336; of fractional currency, $18,745,720; of one year five per cent. notes, $5,860,000; of certificates of indebtedness, $134,872,000; in all, $608,600,268, (exclusive of $160,000,000 bank circulation,) instead of $1,000,000,000, as stated by my colleagues. And while the increase of currency for the past two or three years has been quite large, in excess of the ratio of the increase of population, it has not been so largely disproportionate to the increase in the ratio of the wealth of the country.

It is not, then, Mr. Speaker, the system of finance adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury that is defective. With the currency depreciated, or the precious metals held at a premium, we must resort to a more ample system of taxation, and more economy in expenditure as the proper correctives.

Debt is heavy or light in proportion to the resources of a State. England, with an enormous debt, has a small material estate from which to pay or sustain it, but a very profitable and active trade. We have ten times the intrinsic wealth of England already, and shall have fifty times its wealth in another twenty years.

In regard to the comparative debt and comparative resources of England during her continental war and the United States in this great national struggle, to which my colleague [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] referred with evident desire to disparage our own, and discriminate in favor of England, I shall draw upon Dr. Elder, of Philadelphia, for a scrap from his learned, comprehensive, and accurate work published in June last, upon the debt and resources of the United States:

"There is, indeed, a general impression that the debt of England, meaning its maximum amount in 1816, 'was forty years in growing,' while ours is the growth of two years only, and that already it is relatively as large as theirs. But the fact is that England added $3,113,000,000 to her debt in the twenty-two years of her great French wars, and expended besides no less than $5,471,000,000 derived from taxation, while the war expenditure of our two years is all in the form of debt except the sum of $17,000,000 derived from taxation and other ordinary sources of revenue beyond the ordinary peace expenditure of the country. In fair comparison, therefore, the Government account should be charged with this $17,000,000 in addition to its loans of $899,000,000, making $916,000,000; and England's account, in correspondence for her twenty-two years, would be her increase of debt and $5,471,000,000 of taxes, amounting together to $8,584,000,000, or more than nine times the equal of ours. Of the total revenue of the period our Treasury derived but 14½ per cent. from taxation. England's exchequer drew 63 per cent. of hers from that source. If the British loans had borne the proportion of ours to receipts from ordinary sources, her debt in 1816, without the current interest added, would have stood at $10,500,000,000 instead of $4,300,000,000; and if our debt had been kept down by a system of taxation equivalent to hers, instead of footing up $367,000,000 it would have stood on the 1st of May last at $350,000,000, less the accruing interest on the surplus of $587,000,000. This should be remembered whenever a comparison of the growth and the amount of our present debt with that of England is instituted."

"So far as the national resources and our relative ability to meet our debt are concerned, these $367,000,000 are to be regarded as undrawn revenue in the pockets of the people. This amount subtracted, along with $10,000,000 of current interest upon the sum, would leave our debt, old and new, at $27,000,000."

"Nor is this view of the case either illogical or unpractical. On the contrary, it is far below the true statement of our advantage, for it still leaves us fresh, untaxed, unexhausted, and almost untouched, while England was in the condition of a people taxed for twenty-two successive years, to the average amount of $248,000,000 a year, with an interest account rising, steadily and rapidly, from $17,250,000 at the beginning, to $161,250,000 at the end of the term. Moreover, be it remembered that in 1816 the population of Great Britain was but 19,300,000, the total value of their property $10,450,000,000, and their annual products worth but $1,667,000,000; while the population of the loyal States, in 1863, is 24,000,000, the value of their property, at the market rates of 1860, $13,395,000,000, and their products of the current year worth $3,500,000,000; giving us the present advantage of 30 per cent. in population, 28 per cent. in property, and 110 per cent. of annual products."

"The just parallel in the statement of the respective debt accounts of the two nations would be: England borrowed, for twenty-two running years, an average of $150,000,000 a year; we, for two years, $185,000,000 per annum, (an equal ratio of taxation being deducted from the actual loans,) with a difference of wealth and resources in our favor more than equal to the difference against us in the amounts thus estimated."

Mr. Speaker, I have this further to remark. I have no fear that the national currency will become worthless, that the debt will be fearfully great beyond our ability to pay, or that the system of finance adopted by the Secretary will prove a disastrous failure.

The country will rise from the perils of the crisis and rejoice if the Union shall be maintained, the objects of its founders secured, and the curse of slavery, which had demoralized the people of the South and was rapidly undermining the liberties of the whole people, shall perish in the contest.

All the higher historical authorities of modern times, the Boeckes, the Grotes, the Arnolds, and the Michelets, agree in this, that slavery corrupted and devoured the ancient world.

Wailan's History of Slavery in Antiquity sets forth with remarkable clearness and accuracy the ravages of slavery and its destruction of social order in ancient times. Mr. Bancroft has an essay on the decline of the Roman empire, which, written in 1834 and describing a society which existed more than two thousand years ago, is in many particulars a curiously exact description of our slave States before the war:

"When Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, on his way to Spain to serve in the army before Numantia, traveled through Italy, he was led to observe the impoverishment of the great body of citizens in the rural districts. Instead of little farms studding the country with their pleasant aspect, and nursing an independent race, he beheld nearly all the lands of Italy engrossed by large proprietors, and the plow was in the hands of the slave."

the inhabitants of the Roman State divided into the few wealthy nobles; the many indigent citizens; the still more numerous slaves. Reasoning correctly, he perceived that it was slavery which crowded the poor freeman out of employment and barred the way to his advancement."

Again he writes:

"The aristocracy owned the soil and its cultivators. The vast capacity for accumulation, which the laws of society secure to capital in a greater degree than to personal exertion, displays itself nowhere so clearly as in slaveholding States, where the laboring class is but a portion of the capital of the opulent. As wealth consists chiefly in land and slaves, the rates of interest are, from universally operative causes, always comparatively high: the difficulty of advancing with borrowed capital proportionally great. The small landholder finds himself unable to compete with those who are possessed of whole cohorts of bondmen; his slaves, his lands, rapidly pass, in consequence of his debts, into the hands of the more opulent. The large plantations are continually swallowing up the smaller ones; and land and slaves come to be engrossed by a few."

Our far-sighted statesmen of an early day, Jefferson, Jay, Franklin, and others, saw and proclaimed the effect of slavery upon our institutions, but their voice was not heeded. At last, not too late for freedom to triumph, comes the struggle, with the sacrifice of life, property, and the accumulation of debt. If, however, it shall result in the total destruction, the sweeping from our fair land every vestige of this corrupter of people and destroyer of nations, the horrors of the strife will be appeased, and there will be some compensation for the blood and the treasure which have been poured so freely upon the altar of our country, for her honor, unity, and safety, in the long generations of peace, prosperity, and happiness, which will follow. With the Union maintained, a people united and firmly entrenched in the highest and most perfect liberty compatible with free government, and the return to the whole people of those industries which enrich and elevate the masses of mankind, we shall be able to rise from the burden of debt, and from our vast and inexhaustible resources, with rapidly swelling revenues, attain the most ample wealth and independence that have been known to any nation of the earth, and the unfaithful and the excitors of distrust and discredit will receive the reprobation of a just and discriminating people.

I now renew the demand for the previous question on the pending amendment, as I agreed with my colleague to do.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to have a test vote, I move to lay the bill and amendments upon the table.

The question was put; and there were, upon a division—yeas 34, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Before the roll-call is commenced I desire to ask a question of the Chair. Suppose the bill and the pending amendments are laid upon the table, will the proposition of the gentleman from New York on the left, [Mr. SERRANIS,] and the proposition of the gentleman from New York on the right, [Mr. FENTON,] be before the House?

The SPEAKER. They will not unless by unanimous consent of the House or by a two-thirds vote on Monday, or when the Committee of Ways and Means have a right to report.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Broomall, Chanler, Coffroth, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Hotman, Asahel W. Hubbard, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kenan, Law, Lazear, Mallory, McDowell, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Penderton, Price, Prayn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Starr, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Wadworth, Ward, and Wheeler—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Bixter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Daves, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McClodde, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomerooy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stubbins, Stevens, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

So the House refused to lay the bill and the amendments on the table.

During the roll-call, Mr. NORTON stated that Mr. ARNOLD had been called home on account of sickness in his family.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question upon the pending amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. Would it be in order at this time to move the previous question upon the resolution as well as upon the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would; and it would take priority of the demand for the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then I call the previous question on the resolution and the amendments.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. Is it in order to make a report from a committee of conference at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I submit a report from the committee of conference on the internal revenue bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

JOHN SHERMAN,
DANIEL CLARK,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
JOHN A. KASSON,
R. P. SPALDING,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Vermont whether the Senate has yet acted on the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know; but the papers are in the possession of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, the committee of conference, after a full and free discussion of the subject, as has been reported, has been unable to agree. The question has reached that position that it becomes necessary for the House to recede or lose the bill. It is one of so much importance that I trust the House will consider it dispassionately, and as a question interesting to the whole country. The House having made its proposition to the Senate, the Senate is, of course, at liberty to receive it, amend it, or reject it, as it pleases. Both Houses agree on the main subject of an increased tax; upon a branch of it, of minor amount, they differ. Shall we now lose the whole bill because we cannot obtain all we desire?

The Senate has been willing to dispose of this subject in any manner that the House may see fit, except that it will not adopt the principle of taxing liquors on hand. That out of the question, there will be no disagreement between the two Houses. But as both my colleagues on the committee [Messrs. KASSON and SPALDING] desire to speak on this question, I shall give them the privilege of doing so, desiring in the mean time to hold the floor. I shall make the motion, however, as I now do make it, that the House recede from its disagreement with the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, it has been the earnest hope of the majority of the conference committee on the part of the House that the Senate would take into consideration especially the constitutional relations of the House to questions of revenue. It is the duty of the House, as the originating body, to present to Congress the subjects of taxation, the rates of taxation, and the general means by which the Government is to be sustained. It was our opinion, sir, that the House ought to have a greater degree of consideration given to its determination respecting the articles that shall be subject to taxation, by way of equalizing the burdens of taxation over the country.

It was and is the opinion of the majority of the conference committee on the part of the House that you cannot, on any principle of justice, exempt from its due share of liability this article of distilled spirits on hand. It should bear, not all, necessarily, but a portion of the tax to be assessed on the entire subject, the amount bearing a certain relation to the entire increase of value created by the action of the Government itself in levying that tax.

In order to explain the matter fully to the House I ought to state the views pressed by the majority of the managers on our part. They were substantially and briefly these: first, that you destroy the regular, legitimate, small distilling interest of the country, or very seriously embarrass it, by refusing to put any tax at all on the stock on hand, and putting this largely increased tax on every gallon to be hereafter distilled; secondly, it was our opinion that when you raise the tax on distilled spirits, as proposed, you ought necessarily to protect the interest which you put in jeopardy by that very act itself, and to protect it at least by an approximation to the principle of justice, which would be, perhaps, to impose half the increased tax on distilled spirits held as an accumulated stock of merchandise on hand. We were willing and are willing to concede to the Senate to the extent of reducing the tax one half, in order to approximate, with a due sense of justice, what is required to sustain the relative interests of the country in regard to this subject of taxation.

Both these propositions have unfortunately failed up to this time; and, as stated by the gentleman from Vermont, the question recurs now whether the House is willing to lose this bill and take its chance of reaching a better result, on some principle of justice, in another bill, or whether we shall recede and go over entirely to the propositions of the Senate.

Before the mind of the House is made up on this subject, I call attention to the fact that the bill proposed by the Senate for a sliding scale is not satisfactory to the House, as shown by the vote upon it, and that that sliding scale is itself imperfect. Some gentlemen may have thought it too high. I consider it in one respect too low. And I call the attention particularly of gentlemen representing agricultural districts to the fact that if you refuse to tax the stock of liquor on hand, and if, in addition to that, you give no great inducements to continue the manufacture up to the 1st of January, you will seriously embarrass (so far as affected by this market) the sale of the harvests of the coming fall—all the agricultural interests that are affected by it. Every distillery demands hogs and cattle for fattening, and consumes a large amount of fuel, also furnished by the farmers.

By the decided increase of the rate of taxation after the 1st of January, you keep in operation every distillery of the country, as has been done heretofore night and day to some extent to anticipate this proposed increase of taxation. What I think, therefore, it is the duty of the House to do, if the House recedes from its disagreement as proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] is to put your tax in anticipation, on the 1st of January, higher than is proposed by the sliding scale of the Senate. You should put it at such a point as to increase the revenues for this year, for we know that the operations of our various tax bills have failed to procure the revenue anticipated and estimated for the current year. You produce both results. You increase the revenue largely by stimulating production in anticipation of the tax on the 1st of January, and also produce a special market for the products of the farmer during the fall. It is for these reasons that I think it is the duty of the House to insist on its disagreement, though it may endanger the loss of the bill. The responsibility must rest with that body which does not, like this House, represent the people, but yet controls and defeats in this manner a measure of revenue which we originate.

For myself I cannot justify myself to the people of my district and to the people of the country, when we need so many millions more than we are realizing from our present system of taxation, in exempting from taxation an interest which bears it by common consent so easily as the interest which we propose to tax.

Mr. Speaker, it is not only the opinion of the agricultural portions of the country, but of the commercial centers. They look with great surprise on the action of Congress in releasing the stock upon hand from taxation. I beg to call the attention of the House, in justification of what I say, to the expression of the public journals, in order that they may see the view taken at the commercial centers as well as in the rural districts. I take the following from the New York Herald, from an issue of that paper shortly after the second action of the House in which they receded from their action taxing whisky on hand. It reads thus:

"THE FAVORED CLASS.—The House of Representatives has decided that the favored class, to be enriched at the expense of all other classes and the Treasury, shall be the whisky speculators. Such is the lobby power of whisky."

From the New York Tribune I might read expressions substantially the same. They are papers representing both political parties of the country, and they may be presumed to be impartial in their expression on this subject, so far as its partisan effect is concerned.

I beg to read from the great commercial papers of the Northwest. From the Chicago Times I read this:

"We repeat, 'who believes that with no new facts submitted, and with the sentiment of the country overwhelmingly the other way, the whisky vote can have been honestly run up from thirty-three to seventy-seven?' Who can doubt the character of the influences brought to bear? But then, again, who can doubt that 'loyal Union' Congressmen, 'engaged in the interests of God and humanity,' have acted honestly?"

To that the Chicago Tribune on its part says:

"We agree with the Chicago organ of the rebels that the whisky vote 'could not have been honestly run up from thirty-three to seventy-seven'; we believe that bribery ran it up; we agree with the seceder concern also that the 'sentiment of the country was overwhelmingly in favor of levying the forty cents tax on whisky in the hands of speculators.'"

Now, sir, it will not be considered for a moment that I entertain in the slightest degree any confidence in the allegation that bribery has been used in this House. I cite these articles in the papers to show that the principal commercial centers of the country, and the commercial organs at the leading commercial centers, insist that it is the duty of the House to tax this article of distilled spirits on hand.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman does not indorse the slanders of those papers, why does he read them?

Mr. KASSON. I told the gentleman why I read them—not to indorse the intimations, but to show their declarations, that the action proposed by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is not in accordance with the interests or the opinions of the country; and to show further that the effect of that action will be to convince the people of the country that improper influences have been used. I do not suppose the people are fully aware, away from Washington, that there is absolute and perfect purity on the part of this Congress!

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to give another paragraph from the commercial centers.

Mr. KASSON. I saw that. It is a contribution and not an editorial.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is from a commercial center.

Mr. KASSON. I have shown that the leading organs of both parties at the leading commercial points of the country do not justify but condemn the course of Congress in exempting from the operation and burdens of taxation an interest so large as that of distilled spirits in question. It is for that object, and that object only, that I have cited these extracts. No gentleman has heard me make an imputation, and I make none, and I read from the papers only for the purpose I have stated. That, I trust, gentlemen will fully understand.

The question recurs whether we shall abandon the bill by insisting on our disagreement, or whether we shall recede from our disagreement and take the tax that the Senate are willing to give us on whisky.

For the reasons I have already stated, and for the further reason that when a new bill is introduced into the House you may settle that bill according to the original theory, with a higher rate of tax, and carry the tax back to the date when the bill was presented by the Committee of Ways and Means, for example to the 12th of January, a point to which the Senate might agree, I think it the duty of the House to insist upon its disagreement, and to endeavor, at least, to make this whole interest bear its fair share of the burdens of the Government in the best form in which it can be provided for in a new bill.

For these reasons, in addition to what my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] may have to say upon the subject, I have deemed it my duty, in concurrence with him, to ask the House to insist upon its disagreement, and consequently to reject the proposition made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. SPALDING. When some weeks ago the proposition came from the gentleman from New York, on the other side of the House, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] to place a duty upon spirits on hand, the proposition met instantaneously my approbation, not because I had any peculiar anxiety to favor the source from whence the proposition emanated, but because I supposed it to be in itself eminently just and proper. Since then I have given this subject my best attention in listening to the many arguments which have been made upon this bill pro and con. upon this exciting subject. I have attended the committee of conference between the two Houses; and I have there heard a portion of the same arguments again; and I can say, as the conclusion of the whole matter, so far as I am concerned, that I speak under a high sense of my responsibility to this country when I advise this House to be true to itself, and adhere to the position which it has heretofore maintained upon this subject. I do this with all due respect for the other body in this Congress; but I think the best interests of this country in this great exigency require that we should render available all property which may be productive of duty; and I know of none which will bear it more easily than this liquor now on hand.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this is a revenue bill, and appropriation bills originate in this popular branch of Congress. As one feature of that revenue bill, we sought to impose a duty upon this liquor on hand. We first passed the bill. It went to the other branch of Congress. They saw proper to strike out that proposition, and the question is now whether we shall recede from the position we first assumed, or whether the Senate shall give way from their amendment striking out our proposition of taxing this property. There can be no two minds differing in this House upon the subject of the necessities of the country for all the duties that we can raise upon this article, whether it be present or prospective.

Now we are told by some that the duty proposed to be laid upon liquors on hand would raise a revenue of from four to five million dollars. I have been told by men who profess to be better versed in the matter than myself that that revenue would be nearer twenty-five or thirty millions than four or five millions. Furthermore we are told that we shall ruin the manufacturers of the article by imposing a duty on liquor on hand. Will not a fair investigation show to any sensible mind that the reverse of this in all probability will be the case? It cannot admit of a doubt that so soon as Congress shall have passed a bill imposing a duty of from fifty cents to one dollar upon all liquors to be manufactured hereafter, the liquor on hand will at once adjust its price to the taxes thus prospectively laid. Hence the holders—some call them speculators—the holders of this property which thus receives the benefit of the law which we are about to enact, putting a prospective duty upon all liquor to be manufactured, will at once have the benefit of the rise of the market; and will not many of them realize large fortunes? The distillers are to be taxed on what they manufacture hereafter; and may not many of the large manufacturers, who by the operation of this bill upon the liquors on hand realize their hundred, two hundred, or five hundred thousand dollars, think proper to say, "Let the distilleries be closed hereafter; we have realized our gain by the remission of Congress to tax this property on hand, and we will be careful how we manufacture any more to meet the increased duties to be hereafter imposed;" and hence the public will be disappointed again, as they have been heretofore, in the amount of revenue to be realized from the imposition of a tax upon the manufacture of this article.

Mr. Speaker it is said to be against public policy, if not against previous precedents, to impose a tax upon an article manufactured when that article has once been taxed in the process of manufacture. Sir, we are living in times when precedents must give way to the public interests. We are called upon every day to make appropriations here for the public benefit, and the inquiry comes up in tones of thunder, from whence are you to derive the means to supply all these vast appropriations? I say to this House that if you let this tax upon the whisky on hand go by, it will not be many days before you will be met with a bill emanating from the Committee of Ways and Means to tax the lands of the small farmers of the country; and in view of that, I ask gentlemen to pause before they agree to the position taken by the Senate to leave this article out of the scale of taxation.

I hope, sir, that the House will vote down the proposition to recede, and in place thereof vote to adhere to the position which they have thus far so well sustained before the country.

Mr. MORRILL resumed the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me for about ten minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes of my time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for the motion to recede on the part of the House and accept the bill of the Senate, and I propose to make a remark or two in explanation of that vote.

I am one of those among the members upon this floor who, approving the object and the general character of the bill as it was first reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, voted for the bill, voted for it in its various stages, and have continued to vote for it, believing, as I do, that it is founded upon the true principle of taxation, and that the attempt to amend it so as to extend the tax from manufactured articles not hitherto taxed to the stock on hand which has heretofore been subject to taxation, is in violation of the principles of legislation which we ought to observe.

Now, sir, I consider this as a new question, and I believe, from the remarks that my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] has just made, that perhaps I do not differ much from the gentlemen who take a different view of this subject, or at least vote upon a different side of the question, in entertaining that conclusion, for my colleague has just remarked that it is necessary not to adhere to precedents, but to put precedents out of the way in consideration of the necessities of the country. Sir, you would be abandoning precedents if you should undertake to pile tax upon tax, and thus interfere with and discourage the production of manufactures and importations into the country.

This whole matter, as it strikes my mind, is simply this, a question between raising or otherwise changing the tax which you impose upon a particular production, and applying it to that production which has not been heretofore taxed, thus keeping faith with the citizens of the country and the manufacturers of the country in regard to all taxes previously imposed, or of abandoning that faith, and, not satisfied with taxing that which may hereafter be produced, extending the tax and piling it again upon that which has previously been the subject of taxation. That is the simple proposition of the House bill, and it is because I believe that there is a violation of principle in adopting any such course that I have from the beginning sustained the Committee of Ways and Means upon this subject.

Gentlemen say you may tax and repeat your tax. I do not deny the power of Congress to do so. It is the question of the expediency and propriety of the exercise of that power, as it regards due consideration of the rights and interests of the citizens of the country, of which I speak. I know that after having once imposed an impost duty you may repeat that impost duty, though it might often be attended with some inconvenience to do so. Having imposed an excise duty, you may repeat that excise duty upon the same article; but I hold that if you do so it is in violation of the confidence which you endeavored to cultivate in the citizens, that they might understand, when they had once met their obligations to the Government, whether they had done with these obligations and stood acquitted or not.

You may reach, it is said, the stock of spirits on hand, as you can do, and you may reach it justly and without any breach of faith. You may tax the capital employed in the trade; you may impose a tax on the income; you may levy a tax for the use of the article. But I am speaking now not of any tax of that character, but of an excise duty laid for the purpose of operating as a license for the production or manufacture of the article, or for the bringing of the article into the country. The gentleman from Iowa has said that when you impose a tax on liquors distilled in the country it operates against distillation, unless you go further and tax all that has been previously distilled and taxed.

What is there in that argument that does not apply with precisely the same force and to the same extent to any impost duty on any article brought by ships into the country? Dry goods are imported, hardware is imported. You impose upon them a duty of twenty, thirty, or forty per cent., as the case may be. The moment you increase that duty the same clamor may be raised, "Oh, the tax operates on these dry goods, on this hardware, on these articles heretofore imported, and it gives an advantage to those who have stocks on hand. You must follow those stocks into the private warehouse, into the public store, and put on the increased tax for the protection of the importer." And yet, Mr. Speaker, nobody ever thought of doing such a thing. When you have once laid an impost duty on goods brought into the country for sale, you thereby make a declaration to importers, not only at home but abroad, that they may safely trade on the faith of the United States and bring their goods here, as that is the amount of tax to be imposed upon them. If those goods are afterwards to be followed up whenever the condition of the country is supposed to require it and made to pay an increased rate of duties, who will be found to import goods into the country on the faith of laws that have no consistency, no security, no certainty, that are made to vary from time to time in this manner at the mere caprice of a majority in the legislative body?

That which is true in that regard of imported goods is no less true of goods produced in the country and paying the duties imposed on them. The payment of those duties is the license which the Government charges for the production of the particular article. This does not prevent the Government from afterwards increasing the duty. It does not prevent the Government from levying income tax on the profits of the business. It does not prevent the increase of tax on articles employed in the business. But it is a declaration to the world that so far as that particular production is concerned, you have claimed from the producer all that you require for the support of the Government, as his payment for the privilege of producing.

Now, sir, for standing by this old, well-known, established practice of the Government, for standing by this system which the gentleman from Iowa himself [Mr. KASSON] says is the precedent, gentlemen are assailed on all hands, as if, forsooth, they had proposed something new and heretofore unknown in the land. So far from being innovators, so far from proposing some new principle, so far from advancing a novelty, I claim that the Committee of Ways and Means and those members of the House who have sustained the committee, have wisely adhered to the old, fixed principles of taxation, and should not be driven from their position by any clamor, even though that clamor be about whisky.

This article of spirits seems to have inflamed the minds of gentlemen. I have sat silent all the way through; I have not opened my lips on the subject before. But I felt that I could not say less than I now do. When I see newspapers through the land, and gentlemen here—who are ashamed to indorse what the newspapers say, and yet feel it becoming the dignity of the House and of themselves to read those scurrilous articles—charging everybody who adheres to an old principle of taxation with being corrupt, with being bought up by whisky speculators, I feel it due to myself and to others occupying the same position to repel and denounce that charge as an infamous and scandalous one, unworthy of those who make it, and unworthy to be repeated here.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will permit me to say simply this: the gentleman has referred to comments of the newspapers of the country upon this as a strange and anomalous position. The newspapers in my district have made comments of this character. But, sir, I think the newspapers are wrong. And, whether the newspapers think me wrong or not, while acting from my sober sense of duty in this matter, so help me God, I will vote according to my convictions, whether it is in accordance with their opinions or not.

Mr. MORRILL resumed the floor.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I have agreed to yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and I do not think I am justified in yielding further. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say upon this subject that I have steadily voted in favor of taxing the spirits on hand since this matter has been before the House, and I have given my reasons for thus voting.

I have said, and I repeat now, that there is no one article that will bear taxation as well as the article of spirits. I read in accounts of the system of taxation in Great Britain, where, perhaps, the tax system has been more perfectly systematized than in any other country in the world, that £65,000,000 are raised by internal taxation upon every description of property, of which £35,000,000 are raised upon four articles, one of which is spirits, another tobacco, another tea, and another sugar in its various forms. And I know that these articles will bear taxation more than all other articles. This very day, as I understand, in England a gallon of spirits pays a tax of $3 18 in our currency. And yet there is no less manufactured and no less consumed than was consumed years ago, when the tax was much lighter.

Sir, I have steadily advocated and I still advocate a heavy tax upon this article. I wish it had been made heavier than even is proposed in this bill. But what has been the course of our legislation here? We have consistently voted to tax the stock on hand, and have pressed that proposition upon the Senate to the extent of our power. But from some cause the majority of forty with which we started out has, in the presence of various influences, dwindled down. I have never said, nor do I now say, that any man has been suborned, or that any man in this House has been bribed; and no consideration of fear of being charged with bribery would deter me from voting in this matter as I believe to be just and right.

But I call the attention of gentlemen in this House with whom I have all along acted in this matter to the condition in which the bill is now presented to us to-day. The interests of the country require that we should furnish means by which the public revenue shall be increased. The committees which we have appointed to represent the wishes of a majority of the House in our conferences with the Senate have not been able to come to any agreement with that body. The House refused to concur in the report of the first committee. The second committee failed to agree. The third committee in like manner have failed to agree, and now the question arises, shall we kill the bill by still adhering to our proposition, or shall we yield to the position of the Senate?

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is wise or patriotic in us to destroy the whole bill, with much that is valuable in it, because we cannot get in it all that we desire. For myself, while I do not abate one jot or tittle of my opinions as to the wisdom or propriety of taxing the stock on hand, I am now in favor of concurring in the amendments of the Senate. And I wish it to be distinctly understood that in taking that position I do it solely on the ground that if we allow the delay that will occur by killing this bill and in getting up a new bill and passing it, we shall waste more money than we should save by insisting upon our point in a new bill. I believe there is no hope of carrying our point with the Senate. They have, by a majority of more than two to one, insisted upon their original action in this respect, and it does not seem to me that, having in view the whole interests of the country, we ought longer to hold out in this issue between the two Houses. I shall therefore vote to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL took the floor.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. I would be glad to accommodate my colleague, but I have declined to yield to gentlemen on the other side of the House, and therefore am not at liberty to do so.

Mr. Speaker, this question has been so thoroughly discussed that I do not propose to discuss the merits of the proposition to any great extent. I have in the course of my experience found the members of the House on all questions of revenue, when they came to a final vote, treat them fairly; but of all questions which have been before Congress, this proposition, I confess, is the one that has generated most heat. Gentlemen seem unwilling to listen to argument or to change opinion under any circumstances or under any state of facts. They both vote and talk for victory, reckless of principle or policy.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the condition of the bill, provided my motion to recede from our disagreement to the Senate is agreed to. If the motion prevails, it will leave a tax of sixty cents a gallon upon all manufactured from this time up to the 1st of July; after that, and up to the 1st of January, 1865, it will impose a tax of seventy cents per gallon; and it will impose a tax of eighty cents per gallon. It will be seen by this exposition of the bill that it will raise, provided our consumption is as it has been computed to be, seventy million gallons a year, $14,000,000 per annum, after January next; more than the bill would as it was sent to the Senate from the House. We have already lost perhaps twice the amount of revenue that is the subject of dispute between the two Houses. If we had passed the bill at the time it was introduced we should have gained certainly much more than any one now proposes to collect from those who have the article on hand, and have already paid all the tax the Government has required upon it.

But, sir, this proposition of levying a tax upon the stock on hand is an experiment, at the very best. It has never been attempted before in this or in any other country. I know that it was asserted the other day that it had been done in England, but when we came to refer to the English statutes we found that the tax was upon spirits in free warehouses, which had never before been subject to tax at all. Is it not better for us that we follow the examples of taxation and the experience of our own Government, as well as that of others, rather than to try this new policy about which there are so wide differences of opinion? As I have said on a former occasion it is impracticable to enforce it. By the provision of the bill there is no limit as to the minimum quantity to be taxed. It reaches, theoretically, the smallest as well as the largest quantity on hand. Practically I think it would never touch either extreme. If this were to go into operation it would include not only what are called speculators, but the regular merchants engaged in their legitimate business. It taxes the man who is compelled to keep a stock upon hand to supply his customers. He has not bought it for the purpose of unusual speculation, but to supply the demands of his customers; and unless he can realize the amount of the tax he will be subject to great loss.

In many cases the notoriety of our intention to put a tax upon the stock on hand has increased the price, and these parties have bought at a large advance upon what they would otherwise have had to pay. If we levy this tax in many of the commercial cities of the country it would produce disastrous results upon persons who hold stocks thus accumulated. Others have bought for exportation, and the foreign demand having suddenly ceased, are thus caught with stocks on hand at high prices, for which there is now no sale. If we levy it at all, we levy such a tax upon the assumption that the party has been benefited by the rise in the price to the extent of the duty. But that cannot be true. The value will not be increased to the extent of the duty. And for this reason, that the country holds more than is wanted for consumption. Therefore we ought to have, if we intend to be just, a commissioner to go about and find the exact profit made by these so-called speculators, and grab that and no more. Some will have made something and others nothing. Some will make three, five, ten, or possibly twenty cents per gallon. There would be a manifest injustice in levying forty cents upon those who only have made three or five.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am mainly opposed to this measure because it is a new principle. If we are to adopt it in regard to this matter, why not in regard to every other article? Why should we not adopt it in regard to leather, iron, cotton, wool, and every other article which we subject to taxation?

The Senate committee were unanimous in pressing upon us—whatever their individual opinions might be with regard to taxing the stock on hand, they were unanimous in urging upon us as a duty that this bill should not be lost. I make an earnest appeal to the House that we may recede from our disagreement, and allow the bill to become a law. The Government is in need of the money. I do not think we ought to allow pride of opinion or anything else to stand here so long higgling about so small a matter, and allow so large an amount of revenue to escape. I demand the previous question.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw the call for the previous question for five minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. There are so many gentlemen asking for the same thing on all sides, that I must decline to withdraw the call.

Mr. STILES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. BRANDEGEE demanded the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the motion to recede.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bally, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Fenton, Finck, Garfield, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Higby, Holman, Hooper, William Johnson, Kelley, Knapp, Law, Leazar, Loan, Mallory, Marvin, McIndoe, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wheeler, Wilder, and Woodbridge—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Elliot, Frank, Ganson, Grinnell, Hale, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Longyear, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Norton, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Seefeld, Spading, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Thomas, Tracy, Ward, Ward, William E. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, and Windom—71.

So the motion was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. DRIGGS stated that he had paired off with Mr. LOVEJOY, otherwise he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and request another committee of conference.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House adhere to its disagreements.

The SPEAKER. The motion to insist, and ask another committee of conference, will take precedence of the motion to adhere.

Mr. GRINNELL. I make my motion, because I believe this matter can be compromised without waiting six weeks.

Mr. STEVENS. That cannot be done.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for tellers upon the motion to insist.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the House adhere to its disagreement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. KNAPP, (at half past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th of January, information relating to the arrest and imprisonment, by the military authorities in Missouri, of soldiers belonging to the ninth Minnesota regiment; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY presented a memorial of the Council and House of Representatives of the Legislative Assembly of New Mexico in favor of a grant of lands, money, or bonds, to aid in the construction of a branch railroad and telegraph line to connect with similar lines on the western line of the State of Kansas, and running through Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona, connecting with the Central Pacific railroad of California; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of money or bonds to aid in the speedy construction of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe railroad; which were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILKINSON presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the establishment of a mail route from the city of St. Cloud, Minnesota, via Fort Abercrombie and Bannock City, to Fort Walla-Walla, to connect with other mail routes running through Oregon and Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of an extension of the benefits of the pension law to the widows and orphans of those who were engaged in the service of the United States in suppressing the late raid of the Sioux Indians in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for an extension of the act of March 3, 1857, for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands, so as to make good the titles of bona fide purchasers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the eastern line of the State to intersect the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of William H. Jameson, a paymaster in the United States Army, who sets forth that he was on board the steamer Ruth at the time it was burned on the Mississippi river; that a large sum of money was lost by him at that time, and, at the same time, some of his vouchers; and he prays Congress, by a special act, to direct the Paymaster General of the United States to enter a credit in his favor for the sum for which such vouchers were lost. I ask its reference to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.
Mr. RAMSEY. I present the memorial of the First National Bank of St. Paul, Minnesota, representing that on the 19th day of December of last year, they transmitted a package directed to Hon. F. E. Spinner, Treasurer of the United States at Washington, containing twenty-five five-twenty bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, ten five-twenty United States registered certificates of $1,000 each, bearing interest from December 2, 1863, and all of them payable to the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the First National Bank by the president of said bank; that upon each and every of said five-twenty bonds there was indorsed an assignment in the form required by the regulations of the Treasury Department. These bonds and certificates were being sent to the United States Treasurer to be deposited under the conditions of the act of February, 25, 1863, as a basis for the issue of circulating currency notes to said bank, and they were intrusted to Franklin Steele, Esq., who was about visiting Washington, and by him were deposited in a traveling-trunk, which trunk was placed at the time of his departure upon the boot of the stage. During the night of December 21, 1863, the stage was robbed of the trunk and securities, together with certain property and money belonging to said Steele; and neither the trunk nor bonds and registered certificates, nor any part thereof, have been recovered, although every effort has been made to do so. The memorialists pray that an act may be passed for their relief, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds and certificates for those stolen. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. NESMITH, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Charles McCormick, an assistant surgeon in the Army, praying for compensation for extra services, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Gordon, a messenger in the Post Office Department, praying for compensation for extra services performed out of office hours, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, it was Ordered, That the joint resolution (S. No. 32) for the removal of the refugee Indians in Kansas to their homes in the Indian country, be printed.

On motion of Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 143) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, be printed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 29th of February the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 230) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 42) authorizing the payment of prize money, due to Commander Abner Read, United States Navy, to his widow, Constance Read.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 119) to reorganize and promote the efficiency of the Army chaplains' department, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 118) to promote the efficiency of chaplains in the Army of the United States, and define their rank, pay, and emoluments, reported adversely thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NESMITH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 149) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Portland to Dalles City; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WILLIAM YOCOM.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the charge or charges, the sentence or judgment, the proofs and all the papers and proceedings, including his pardon, connected with the case of William Yocom, of the State of Illinois, or of the State of Kentucky; and also if the said Yocom is now in prison; and if so, where, and for how long a term.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 3d instant, the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 94) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Paymaster E. C. Doran; and

A bill (S. No. 140) to provide for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the consent of the Senate to submit an amendment to a bill which is now before the select committee on the Pacific railroad, which I desire to have printed in order that the committee may consider it in connection with the bill. It is an amendment to the bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862. I ask that the amendment be printed and referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred, and the order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

STATISTICAL CENSUS TABLES.

Mr. BROWN. With the permission of the Senate, I should like to call up a resolution that I offered some weeks ago, and which is now lying on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. BROWN on the 17th of February:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the Census be required to prepare for the Senate statistical tables expressing in full the population of the United States, classing according to the hydrographic divisions of North America, as arranged in the accompanying article. Also, the relative industrial occupations of the population in each hydrographic subdivision, distinguishing the rural from the town populations. Also, the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial statistics of each, expressed in aggregate totals, specifying the population of each county or part of county, city, &c.

Mr. BROWN. I am informed that the information called for does not require a great deal of additional work, as it is partly arranged already, and certainly it will be very valuable to the country. According to the present arrangement of our statistics, and the divisions under which they are embraced, it is purely conventional. This is an effort to have a better basis laid down—one that shall conform to the great features of the country, and that shall enable us to judge with greater accuracy as to the relative proportions of population and industry. I cannot conceive that any objection can be entertained to the adoption of the resolution. I understand that there are clerks now unemployed in the office who can present this work without interfering with other business. I trust it may be adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know of the Senator from Missouri what information he has as to the extent of this work. How large is it to be?

Mr. BROWN. Not very large. I presume it can be done by the unemployed labor of the clerks now in the office.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know anything about it myself; but I simply judge from the reading of the resolution that it proposes a different method of republishing the same matter that has already been published, namely, the census returns. They are to be put in a different shape, I suppose, for some particular purpose which I do not understand. After they have been put into that shape, and reported to us, then comes the question of printing.

Mr. BROWN. We can determine that question when it arises.

Mr. GRIMES. I have learned that when these reports are once before us, we are always in the habit of printing them to an almost indefinite extent. I think we have been expending quite money enough in the printing of documents. I understand there is now a deficiency of $600,000 from last year for the printing of documents which was not anticipated by Congress, and that that does not cover the amount of the deficiency. Unless there is some reason assigned by the gentleman from Missouri which has not been assigned yet, and which I do not at present comprehend, I am opposed to calling for this information.

Mr. BROWN. I will say in reply to the Senator from Iowa that I understand that the mere labor of the compilation which is here asked for can be performed by the unemployed clerks now in the office.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I will ask why those clerks are kept so unemployed? Why are they not discharged?

Mr. BROWN. I cannot tell you that, sir; but I understand that to be the fact; at least, that is the information I have on the subject.

I will state furthermore that the same reason which applies to the preparing of statistics at all applies with still greater force to their being prepared accurately and upon some scientific basis. According to the present distribution under which the statistics are made they have a purely fictitious nomenclature that enables no one to form any true opinion as to the wealth or the industrial attitude of the different sections of the country. For instance, who can tell what the middle States mean? I cannot; nor can anybody else. We can all tell what the Mississippi valley means, what the Atlantic basin means, and what the other basin means. It is simply to conform or to make a beginning for the conformation of our future reports under that system that I desire this resolution adopted.

I will say to the Senator from Iowa that when the report comes back to us, if it is of such a character as to involve expense in the printing of it not commensurate with any benefit likely to result from it I shall be the last to press any motion to print it; but I do ask that the resolution may be entertained and passed, and that the information desired may be had.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to refer this resolution to the Committee on Finance. I understand that it has not received the consideration of any committee, and I think that a question of this importance ought to come to us with the indorsement and recommendation of a committee. I do not concur in the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri—I do not know that it was exactly his suggestion, but that might be one of the conclusions that would follow from what he said—that we should pass this resolution for the purpose of furnishing employment to present unemployed clerks of the Census Bureau; and then I am opposed to the proposition in itself, if I understand what it is.

I understand that the purpose is to have a kind of sectional census made, and we are to have some portions of the United States classified by themselves, as the New England States, or the eastern portion; another as the western portion; another as the valley of the Mississippi. I do not want to see any such returns sent to Congress or disseminated among the people. I would, if I could, impress upon the people of my State that they are a part of every portion of the Union, and also, as is suggested to me by my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] that every part of the Union is a portion of them.

I am satisfied with the census report as it is; but if the Committee on Finance see fit to recommend that the officers of the Government be employed in getting up such a census report as is now proposed, I shall be satisfied, but not as at present informed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House adhered to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, insisted on by the Senate, to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill to increase the internal revenue.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was sent to the House of Representatives on the report of the committee of conference of their disagreement, and the disagreement seems to be permanent. There are but three courses now open to be pursued in order to dispose of this question. If we adhere, as I understand the House of Representatives has done, that defeats the bill, and the effect will be as a matter of course to lose the revenue we hope to derive from the tax on manufactured spirits from this time until another bill can be originated in the House of Representatives and passed through the forms of legislation. The second course is to have another committee of conference. With the experience we have already had with three committees of conference, I am satisfied it will be idle to move for the appointment of another committee of conference. The House of Representatives seems to have taken its definite position on this question, and the Senate also the other day by its vote decided its course. It is impossible, therefore, to come to an agreement by another committee of conference; and I will now propose a method, which I do not very well like, but which I think is the best we can do, and that is that the Senate recede from its amendments which have been disagreed to by the House of Representatives. I will explain briefly and clearly the effect of this motion if it shall be agreed to.

The effect will be to immediately pass the bill. The bill will then provide for a tax, on whisky manufactured after its passage and prior to the 1st of July next of sixty cents on each and every gallon; but there will be no duty after the 1st of July, and consequently further legislation will be required to provide a tax on whisky manufactured after the 1st of July. On the other hand, if the Senate recede from these amendments to which the House of Representatives have disagreed, it leaves standing in the bill this incongruous provision which Senators should understand:

"And that upon all spirits imported prior to the passage of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under the direction and according to the regulations established by the Secretary of the Treasury."

If my motion be adopted, the Senate must understand that there will be no tax upon domestic spirits on hand, but this provision will be in the bill levying a tax of forty cents additional upon imported spirits on hand. This is an unjust provision; but upon reflection we deem it better, in order to secure the tax on manufactured whisky in future, in order to pass the bill, to leave this incongruity in it, in the hope that Congress will immediately repeal it; and a resolution will be introduced into the Senate, as soon as this is disposed of, with a view to repeal this incongruous provision.

I make this plain statement to the Senate as briefly as I can, in order that they may see the effect of the motion I submit that the Senate recede from the amendments which have been disagreed to by the House of Representatives, with a view to secure the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio that the Senate recede from its disagreement.

Mr. DAVIS. I will thank the Chair to state precisely what question will then be presented to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the only question.

Mr. DAVIS. But what is the disagreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not for the Chair to state what the various amendments are. The Chair understood the Senator from Ohio to say that there were three points on which there was a disagreement, and he has explained them.

Mr. DAVIS. If it is not asking too much, I ask the Secretary to read the points of disagreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is in order.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I will endeavor to state what will be the provisions of the bill and the points of difference.

Mr. DAVIS. I would rather that the writing itself should explain it.

Mr. CLARK. I was going to make an explanation, because I thought you would not get it clearly from the mere reading.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the writing will explain it as clearly as the Senator can.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments on which the two branches have disagreed will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The amendments non-concurred in by the House of Representatives are the third, fifteenth, and sixteenth amendments of the Senate.

The third amendment is as follows:

On page 1, line ten, after the word "gallon," insert: And upon all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of July next, and previous to the 1st day of January next, seventy cents on each and every gallon; and on all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of January next, eighty cents on each and every gallon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senate agrees with the House to strike that out.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will be the effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate recede.

The Secretary read the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, which was on page 10, line eight, after the word "gallon," to strike out the words, "and no lower rate of duty shall be levied or collected than upon the basis of first proof," and to insert, "all such spirits imported."

The Secretary read the sixteenth amendment, which was on page 10 to strike out all after the word "proof" in line eleven to the end of the section, as follows:

And that upon all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under the direction and according to the regulations established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. These are the three amendments upon which the two branches have disagreed; and the question is upon the Senate receding from these amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Ohio explain the second disagreement?

Mr. SHERMAN. The second amendment of the Senate disagreed to by the House of Representatives was with a view to put the same tax on imported spirits after the 1st of July as was put on domestic spirits manufactured after the 1st of July. To that amendment of the Senate the House of Representatives disagreed, and I now propose to recede from it. The effect of that will be to impose a tax of sixty cents on foreign spirits imported prior to the 1st of July, and none after that, precisely on the same footing as the domestic spirits.

I will again repeat in a few words, so that Senators may not misunderstand this matter, for it is rather peculiar, the effect of the bill, which will be simply to provide a tax on whisky to be manufactured before the 1st of July, and fix no tax on that either to be manufactured or imported after the 1st of July except the twenty cents provided by the internal revenue act; to strike out the tax on domestic spirits upon hand; and to leave in the tax upon spirits upon hand which have been imported from abroad.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand the Senator to say that what is on hand now is not taxed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not unless it has been imported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion that the Senate recede.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I think from inquiries which are made that Senators do not fully understand how the law will be if we pass the bill in the shape now proposed. At the present time, as Senators know, there is a tax of twenty cents a gallon imposed on whisky manufactured, as it is manufactured. The House of Representatives proposed by the bill to impose a tax of sixty cents on the manufactured article to be manufactured hereafter, and also a tax of forty cents on the article which has already been manufactured and is on hand. The Senate struck out of the bill the provision for taxing spirits on hand, and when it went back to the other House that House agreed to that amendment of the Senate and left all taxation on domestic spirits upon hand out of the bill entirely; and whatever may be the action of the Senate you cannot restore any tax upon domestic spirits on hand by the action of this body. It is concluded and out of the bill.

The House of Representatives proposed to lay a tax of sixty cents a gallon upon all domestic spirits manufactured after this time. The Senate amended it so as to lay a duty of sixty cents up to the 1st of July, and from July to January seventy cents, and after the 1st of January next eighty cents, making a sliding scale. To that amendment in part the House of Representatives disagreed. They agreed to so much of it as imposed a tax of sixty cents up to July, but they disagreed to that part proposing seventy cents between July and January, and eighty cents after the 1st of January. Now if the Senate recede, the effect will be to pass the bill with a sixty cent tax up to July, and there will be no provision for a tax after July, nor upon what is on hand. Whether you pass the bill or reject it, you get no tax upon liquor on hand, and that is the great point on which we differed.

There is a further provision in the bill. To meet the tax proposed to be put upon domestic liquors on hand, the House of Representatives imposed a tax upon foreign liquors on hand to correspond. To that the Senate disagreed, and by receding now we leave that provision in the bill. We shall still leave the tax of forty cents to be imposed upon foreign liquors on hand, subject to the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury. Many of the members of the committee, and indeed I may say all, upon an informal consultation, think it is better that the Senate should recede and allow the bill to become a law imposing a tax on domestic liquor manufactured between now and July of sixty cents, and also a tax of forty cents upon foreign liquor upon hand, but trusting to the action of Congress to repeal the latter provision. As the bill provides that that tax is to be levied under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe, before those regulations can be provided Congress may act and repeal the provision. The committee would rather do that than lose the bill.

Mr. CARLILE. Then, as I understand it, the effect of voting to recede will be to tax domestic liquors hereafter manufactured sixty cents.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, with the incongruity I have mentioned. That is the whole of the bill. The point the committee discussed is whether we had not better pass the bill and get a tax of sixty cents on the liquor hereafter made, rather than to let the bill fail, because if the bill fails and a new one is brought in, I fear that we shall have the same controversy arising between the House of Representatives and the Senate. Perhaps we had better gain one step now and get a tax of sixty cents upon the liquor on hand. That is my judgment in regard to it, and I have stated the whole effect of the bill as it will stand if the Senate recede.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio that the Senate recede from its amendments to which the House of Representatives have disagreed.

Mr. FOOT. Before the vote is taken, I think it proper to state that my colleague's [Mr. COLAMER's] absence from attendance on the Senate is occasioned by severe indisposition.

Mr. GRIMES. I will say the same of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] I have seen him this morning, and he is confined to his bed by sickness.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. RIDDLE] was called home a few days since, and has been prevented from returning by sickness.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wiley—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, and Wilson—11.

So the motion to recede was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

TREATY WITH OREGON INDIANS.

Mr. NESMITH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 25.

Mr. GRIMES. What is it?

Mr. NESMITH. It is a bill to authorize the President to negotiate a treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and other Indian tribes in southeastern Oregon. It is very important that there should be action upon it at once.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which authorizes the President to conclude a treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and Snake Indians, in southeastern Oregon, for the purchase of the country occupied by them. It also appropriates, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of $20,000, to be expended under direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if the President now has not full power to negotiate treaties with these Indian tribes, and indeed with all foreign nations.

Mr. NESMITH. There is a law which provides that no treaty shall be negotiated with Indian tribes without the consent of Congress. I do not recollect the date of the statute, and I cannot turn to it at present; but I know that such is the law, and that the President cannot negotiate a treaty with these tribes without the authority of Congress.

I will state in regard to this particular treaty that it is important the bill should be passed now, in order that the negotiation may be made early in the spring. The importance of it is fully impressed upon the Department. These three tribes of Indians occupy what is called middle Oregon, or rather southeastern Oregon. They occupy a country about as large as what the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] would designate one of the two New England States. They occupy a country about half as large as New England. It is a country abounding in precious metals, and is the direct thoroughfare to what is known as the old Fremont claim, from the Columbia river to California. There was a great deal of travel passing through that country. The Indians have been hostile for many years, and they have now cut off all the travel by that route. By their hostility within the last two years, the Government itself has suffered a loss of some fifty or sixty thousand dollars, by reason of their breaking up the reservation of friendly Indians contiguous to them, the confederated tribes of middle Oregon living directly north of them. It is of very great importance to make this treaty, in order to open communication between Oregon and California, and to prevent the depredations of these Indians, not only upon travelers, but upon the reservations of the friendly Indians themselves, whom we are bound to protect.

There are several reports here recommending it. I will not occupy the time and attention of the Senate by reading these reports. The bill has the favorable recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs. If any Senator desires any further explanation of it, I am ready to give it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask if there is a report of the committee accompanying the bill?

Mr. NESMITH. The committee directed me to report it back, with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. FOSTER. No written report?

Mr. NESMITH. No, sir; there was no written report.

Mr. WILSON. I think this bill had better lie over for a day or two to give us time for inquiry and reflection upon it, and I therefore move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. NESMITH. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist on his motion. It is necessary that the bill should be passed now, so that it can be made available this spring. It is very important to that portion of the country.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator think that a postponement for a day or two will delay its passage?

Mr. NESMITH. It will delay it some time. As it must go to the House of Representatives it should be acted on here at once, if it is to be made available this spring.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will suggest to the Senator from Oregon, that as the morning hour has now expired, he allow this bill to go over. That will leave it the unfinished business of the morning hour, to come up to-morrow in the morning hour. If any Senator desires further information on the subject, it can then be given. I make that suggestion to him, to allow it to go over now and come up to-morrow as the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. NESMITH. The Senator from Kentucky,

[Mr. POWELL,] who is entitled to the floor on the special order which comes up at one o'clock, has kindly consented that I should occupy a little portion of his time to finish this bill. If Senators insist upon it, however, I will let it go over, though I should prefer to take a vote upon it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day is the unfinished business of yesterday, and the morning hour having expired, that is now before the Senate.

Mr. NESMITH. By the courtesy of the Senator from Kentucky, I have his consent to consider this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order will be passed over informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. POWELL. I am willing to let it be informally passed over until this bill is disposed of if the Senate wish to act upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly do not oppose this bill for any reasons that I know why it ought not to be passed; but I do ask a little delay in order that I may inform myself, and get a few more good reasons why it ought to be passed before it is acted upon. The Senator from Oregon is well informed about it, and is satisfied that it ought to pass, and is probably correct. He was imperfectly heard, however, near me, in consequence of some disturbance in the Chamber, and I did not hear all that he said. I understood him, however, to say that the President could not negotiate a treaty with these particular tribes of Indians. If that is so, of course it needs a law to authorize negotiation; but it seems to me a singular fact if it be so. I know not why the power of the Executive which is given him by the Constitution has somehow been got rid of. As I said, I know nothing about this matter, and it may be I should say nothing until I inform myself; but it came up suddenly and unexpectedly. There is no report accompanying it. I wish the Senator would consent to let it lie until to-morrow.

Mr. NESMITH. I consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the special order will be taken up, on which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] is entitled to the floor.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States.

Mr. POWELL concluded his argument on the bill. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 6, relative to payments made to certain railroad companies.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that that paper be printed and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CODE OF NAVAL LAWS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a report from the commissioner (Hon. Charles B. Sedgwick) to prepare a code of laws for the naval establishment; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two hundred and fifty additional copies of the proposed naval code be printed for the use of the Navy Department and the commissioner of the code.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to state that yesterday I was paired off with Mr. Cox on the whisky bill. I should have voted with the majority of the House, while Mr. Cox would have voted with the minority.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to withdraw the vote I gave yesterday upon the revenue bill. I was paired upon that bill with my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I did not think of the fact until this morning.

No objection being made, the vote was withdrawn.

Mr. BOYD. I was unintentionally absent yesterday when the vote was taken on the whisky bill. Had I been here I should have voted with the minority.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I understand I was paired yesterday by my friends with Mr. DRIGGS upon the internal revenue bill. Mr. DRIGGS is present, and we would both like to vote.

No objection being made, Mr. LOVEJOY recorded his vote in the affirmative, and

Mr. DRIGGS recorded his vote in the negative. Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire the consent of the House to record my vote upon the report of the committee of conference upon the internal revenue bill. I was absent from the House yesterday, as I have been for a few days past, on account of sickness.

Mr. SPALDING. I must object to all such requests.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. If I had been present I should have voted to recede from the disagreement of the House to the amendments of the Senate.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to record my vote on the passage of the bill to establish a Freedmen's Bureau. I was unavoidably absent when the vote was taken.

Mr. ELIOT. I object.
Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio. I desire to state, then, that if I had been present I should have voted in the negative.

FREE SCHOOLS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Daniel Breed, Sayles J. Bowen, and Zenas C. Robbins, commissioners or trustees appointed by the act of 11th July, 1863, to dispose of certain taxes imposed on persons of color in the District of Columbia to establish free schools, be requested to make report to this House.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH BRAZIL.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill authorizing the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil; which was read a first and second time by its title, recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CRANDALL AND HOUGHTALING.

Mr. NORTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Edward W. Crandall and Abram Houghtaling; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

GENERAL MEADE'S REPORT.

Mr. NORTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of General Meade of the battle of Gettysburg and the accompanying reports of subordinate officers be printed for the use of the members of this House.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object to that.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a private bill from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as this is the regular day for calling the committees for reports of a private nature, it seems to me that it would be much better to have the regular order of business, and then the gentleman's bill will come in in its regular order.

Mr. ELIOT. If objection be made, I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object. I simply call myself for the regular order of business, so that all the committees may be called.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports of a private nature.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

Mr. LAW. Mr. Speaker, a few days since, at a meeting of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, it was suggested that an inquiry should be made of the Commissioner of Pensions what number of revolutionary pensioners were then on the rolls of his office entitled to and drawing pensions from the Government; secondly, their names and age; and thirdly, in what States they were enrolled; and I was directed to make the inquiries. I accordingly wrote to the Commissioner to furnish me the list, and the paper which I hold in my hand is his answer. This paper I wish read by the Clerk, and when read, with the resolution which accompanies it, to be placed on the Journals of the House as a matter of interest to every member, and, as I have no doubt it will be, to the whole country.

How many of the patriotic and gallant men who fought the battles of our country in the war of the Revolution, who poured out their blood like water and thereby achieved our independence, do you think, Mr. Speaker, are on the rolls of the Pension Office here, and are receiving a bounty from the Government? Twelve, sir; twelve only, of all that army which the Father of our Country led to victory, now, after eighty years since the treaty of peace in 1783, are living, and it is a matter of wonder, as well as a matter of gratulation, that any are living. The youngest, who must have entered the Army probably not over twelve years of age, as he must have been but fourteen when peace was established, is ninety-four. The oldest, one hundred and five.

Mr. Speaker, one of the finest poets that ever lived in this century, and one, probably, who had few superiors at any time, (Byron,) in closing one of his stanzas at midnight, while the oil of his lamp was nearly expended, and the wick flickering in its socket, thus most beautifully and eloquently moralizes:

"How little do we know that which we are,
Or that which we may be! The eternal surge
Of time and tide rolls on, and bears afar our bubbles!
As the old burst, new emerge, lashed from the foam
Of ages; and the graves of empires heave but as
Some passing wave."

Sir, the truth, the truth of history, both as to men and nations, was never more graphically and sentimentally expressed, either in prose or verse. Let history, either ancient or modern, tell its own story, and it is but the repetition of the death of the conqueror, and the destruction of the city or empire he founded. Where is Tyre, Nineveh, Babylon? Where is Carthage? "Delenda est" is the epitaph on its tomb, as it may be written on that of all the others, and the stranger now works among their ruins to find some relic of their former greatness, but he labors in vain. Where is Greece, once so famous in story, and from which we have derived all our taste for the arts? Where is Rome, imperial Rome, once the mistress of the world, and now with a territory less than one of our smallest States?

And is our destiny to be theirs in less than eighty years from our formation as a Government, ay, within the lifetime of any one of these gallant and noble men whose names are enrolled on our pension list, and who were born before our present Government existed? Will they live long enough to witness our exit as well as our entrance among the nations of the world—a Republic in ruins, whose foundation was the work of their hands, and that of their gallant compeers, whose bones were scattered over every battle-field of the Revolution from Bunker Hill to the gates of Yorktown? Shall these centurial heroes, these old and infirm veterans, live to see the day when the Republic, which was cemented with their blood, is broken in pieces and drenched in gore by the fratricidal hands of their children? God forbid. But who can predict what our destiny is to be? None but Him "in whose hands are the destinies of nations as well as of men." It may be that, as a nation, we have not given to Him the glory and praise of our prosperous career, but have attributed it to ourselves, forgetting the omnipotence of that Being who reigns supreme on earth as in heaven. It may be that, like Jeshurun of old, we have "waxed fat and kicked," and are now, as a nation, being punished for our transgressions.

"He can create, and He destroy;" His purposes are not known to us, and it is well they are not.

But, Mr. Speaker, I did not rise to make a speech in presenting these papers to the House, and have probably trespassed on the patience of the House longer than I ought. But I cannot conclude without saying that my sincere wish and prayer is that this small band of revolutionary patriots, all that are left of those brave and gallant men who acquired our independence, notwithstanding their age and infirmity, before they are gathered to their fathers, may live long enough to see that Union they and their comrades fought and bled for, during a war of seven years' duration, restored in all its parts—not a star blotted out or a stripe erased from our flag, but floating proudly in the wind, as it ever should have floated, on hill-top and mountain, in cities and in plains, throughout our whole country, peace and harmony and brotherly love again uniting us, as our fathers were united, as one people in interest and fellowship, binding us together even by stronger ties than those which made us once a great, powerful, and prosperous nation.

Sir, I am no seer, prophet, or son of a prophet, but I say to you, and I say to the country, if our Union is not preserved intact, "one and indivisible," neither on this continent, nor on any other, will a republican Government be established that will last a quarter of a century; I doubt, even, whether the experiment will ever again be tried. If in this nineteenth century, with the intelligence and love of liberty which ought to influence our people, with the blood that has been shed to obtain that liberty, with the example of our fathers, with the advice of Washington, who saw and dreaded the "sectional feeling" which has increased from year to year for the last thirty years, we, forgetful of his counsels, should rashly and wickedly permit our Union to be dissolved, what hope is there in the future, what prospect of success, even should those who are to come after us, under the yoke of some military despot, endeavor to break their chains, and once more become freemen? None, none whatever. The friends of free government would stand appalled, the arm that would strike for freedom be paralyzed, despotism would triumph, and tyrants rejoice that the last hope of freedom was extinguished forever.

I now ask for the reading of the letter and the resolutions.

The Clerk read the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, as follows:

PENSION OFFICE, February 18, 1864.

SIR: In reply to your letter of February 10, requesting me to furnish you with the names of all revolutionary pensioners, I have the honor to submit the following report, which is believed to furnish, so far as is in my power, the information desired:

James Barham, on the St. Louis, Missouri, roll, at $32 33 per annum; born in Southampton county, Virginia, May 18, 1764; age, 99 years 9 months.

John Goodnow, on the Boston, Massachusetts, roll, at $36 07 per annum; born in Sudbury, Middlesex county, Massachusetts, January 30, 1762; age, 102 years 14 months.

Amaziah Goodwin, on Portland, Maine, roll, at $38 33; born in Somersworth, Strafford county, New Hampshire, February 18, 1759; age, 105 years.

William Hutchings, on Portland, Maine, roll, at $21 66; born in York, York county, Maine, (then Massachusetts,) in the year 1764.

Adam Link, on Cleveland, Ohio, roll, at $30 per annum; born in Washington county, Pennsylvania; age, 102 years.

Benjamin Miller, on the Albany, New York, roll, at $24 54 per annum; born in Springfield, Massachusetts, April 4, 1764; age, 99 years 104 months.

Alexander Maroney, on the Albany, New York, roll, at eight dollars per month; born in the year 1770, enlisted at Lake George, New York; age, 94 years; enlisted by his father, as he was young.

John Pettigill, on the Albany, New York, roll, at $50 per annum; born in Windham, Connecticut, November 30, 1766; age, 97 years 24 months.

Daniel Waldo, on the Albany, New York, roll, at $36 per annum; born in Windham, Connecticut, September 19, 1762; age, 101 years 54 months.

Samuel Downing, (papers do not show his age,) on the Albany, New York, roll, at $80 per annum; served in the second New Hampshire regiment.

Lemuel Cook, on Albany, New York, roll, at $100 per annum; no age or birthplace given in papers.

Jonas Gates, on the St. Johnsbury, Vermont, roll, at eight dollars per month; papers not filed.

Respectfully, JOSEPH H. BARRETT, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN LAW, House of Representatives.

The following letter subsequently addressed to Mr. LAW by the Commissioner of Pensions is here inserted:

PENSION OFFICE, March 2, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to state that, from the papers on file in this office in the case of Jonas Gates, it appears that his name is borne upon the pension roll of the State of Vermont, under the act of March 18, 1818. In his declaration made on the 28th day of December, 1820, he declares that he was then fifty-seven years of age, and in a subsequent declaration he states that he was born in the town of Barre, State of Massachusetts.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOSEPH H. BARRETT,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN LAW, House of Representatives.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. LAW were then read, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be, and are hereby, tendered to the gallant surviving soldiers of the Revolution; twelve in number, now on the pension rolls in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, for their services in the revolutionary war, by which our Independence was achieved and our liberty obtained, and we sincerely rejoice in the decrees of Providence which have thus far protracted their lives beyond the allotted period of man, and enabled them in their declining years to receive from the Government a sum of money as pensioners, which, if not as large as desired by them, will at least help to smooth the rugged path of life in their descent to the tomb.

Resolved, That copies of this resolution, when adopted by the House, be signed by the Speaker and certified by the Clerk, and a copy of the same be furnished to each of the revolutionary pensioners mentioned in the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions this day submitted.

RHODA WOLCOTT.

Mr. HERRICK, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott; which was read a first and second time.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this bill is in reference to a very old transaction, and that it ought to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. KERNAN. It is an eminently just bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERRICK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SARAH WHITNEY AND MARY HUGGERFORD.

Mr. EDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Sarah Whitney and Mary Huggerford, children of Huldah Butler; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill makes an appropriation, and must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDEN. I hope that the gentleman from Indiana will not persist in his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have examined this case, and think it ought to be referred.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ESTHER P. FOX.

Mr. ROSS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting an invalid pension to Esther P. Fox, widow of Augustus C. Fox; which was read a first and second time.

The bill and report were read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GUARDIAN SOCIETY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds House bill No. 255, granting certain privileges to the Guardian Society of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The bill is of a public character, and makes an appropriation, and requires unanimous consent.

Mr. ELIOT. I object.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. It is not an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. On examination the Chair discovers that the bill does not technically make an appropriation, but it is of a public character.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I object.

INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FENTON. I ask unanimous consent of the House to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means House bill No. 66, to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

H. R. CROSBIE.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of H. R. Crosbie; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF OHIO MILITIA.

Mr. HALE, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide for the payment of the second regiment of the third brigade Ohio volunteer militia during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. J. BULOW.

On motion of Mr. HALE, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of J. J. Bulow for presentation to the Court of Claims.

JOHN T. HILDRETH.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of John T. Hildreth, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw them.

The motion was agreed to.

GUSTAVUS A. BELZER.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to report back this memorial to the House, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the memorial be laid on the table.

The memorialist asks for compensation for property belonging to him as a sutler in the army of the Potomac, destroyed by the rebels, amounting in value to $3,097. The loss of the property and the loyalty of the memorialist are clearly established; and, indeed, there is one part of the official evidence before the committee that peculiarly recommends Mr. Belzer to favor. Indorsed on a letter written by him to the President, is the following:

This man wants to work; so uncommon a want that I think it ought to be gratified. I shall be obliged to any head of a bureau or Department who can and will find work for him.

A. LINCOLN.

January 23, 1862.

Yet this peculiar and flattering commendation does not relieve the committee. If Congress shall pay for damages done and property seized by our own troops, the public burdens will be sufficient without adding the enormous destruction and capture of property made by the rebel forces. The committee have therefore been compelled to disregard the wishes of this meritorious citizen who was willing to work.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH C. G. KENNEDY.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph C. G. Kennedy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REV. W. B. MATCHETT.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a joint resolution for the relief of Rev. W. B. Matchett, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes and directs the Paymaster General of the United States to pay to W. B. Matchett the amount due him as chaplain tenth regiment New York volunteers, from the time he was last paid to the time the regiment was mustered out of service.

Mr. HOLMAN. This chaplain has not been able to obtain the balance of pay due to him, on account of some irregularity in the mustering. The joint resolution ought to pass.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CITIZENS OF INDIANA AND OHIO.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act for the relief of citizens of Indiana and Ohio; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLMENT OF STEAM-TUGS.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 39) to authorize the enrollment and license of the steam-tugs B. F. Davidson and W. K. Muir, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

L. F. CARTEE.

Mr. HIGBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 19) for the relief of L. F. Cartee, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to pay to L. F. Cartee $3,033 50 for services performed in surveys of the public lands in Oregon in excess of his contract with the surveyor general of Oregon, dated October 14, 1860; but before any payment is made, the work performed by him is to be tested in the field by actual examination, under the direction of the surveyor general of Oregon, and any correction made necessary to make it conformable to the laws of the United States and the instructions governing the surveys of the public lands at his expense, and the balance only of the appropriation is to be paid him after deducting the expense of inspection and correction, and when the certificate of the surveyor general of Oregon is filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the survey is complete according to the law and regulations governing public surveys.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. B. WOOLF AND OTHERS.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the petition of J. B. Woolf and others, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

It was so ordered.

MISSOURI LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 217) to confirm certain entries of land in the State of Missouri; and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It confirms certain entries of land in the State of Missouri heretofore made under the graduation act of August 4, 1854, in township forty-five north, range nine west, south of Missouri river, in the district of lands subject to sale at St. Louis, Missouri; provided that the act shall not apply to any entry of land on which there was an actual settler other than the purchaser at the date of such entry.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that that bill should be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask the gentleman to listen to the reading of the report. The bill has the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Public Lands, as it has had of the former Commissioner. I think if the gentleman from Indiana will listen to the reading of the report, he will make no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this is one of the cases to confirm the title to lands entered under the graduation act of 1854. Of course I will not make any motion until I hear the report read.

The report was read, as also the following letter from a former Commissioner of the Land Office:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 6, 1860.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of James S. Laughlin et al., and the petition of William L. Jenkins and nine other citizens of Osage county, Missouri, praying for the confirmation of certain entries made by them in township forty-five north, range nine west, south of Missouri river, under the graduation act of August 4, 1851. In reference thereto I have to state that it appears from the records of this office that said township, both north and south of the river, was offered at public sale on the 22d of November, 1819; and it further appears that through some inadvertence the fractional township south of the river was marked on the plats of the local office as being not offered, and consequently it has always been treated as not subject to private entry, and until 1856 no entries were permitted therein, except to persons claiming under the preemption act of 1841.

The letter to which the petitioners allude as the authority under which the register permitted them to make their entries at the lowest graduation rate was simply a reply to a question submitted by Alton Long, Esq., as to the time when said fractional township was offered, and stated the facts as shown by our records, and not those of the local office, which alone control or determine the condition of the land, and its liability to entry or location.

In view, however, of the fact that the register of St. Louis improperly accepted the information conveyed in this letter to a third party as conclusive, and disregarding the evidence of his own records, permitted these entries to be made; and in consideration of the circumstance that these purchasers were thereby misled and induced to make improvements upon the land as actual settlers under the graduation law in good faith, and with honest intent to comply with the requirements thereof, I would respectfully recommend that the prayer of the petitioners be granted, and a law be enacted confirming said entries under certain restrictions, as provided in the bill herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

JOSEPH S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN S. PHELPS, House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had receded from its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill to increase the internal revenue.

MAILS TO FOREIGN PORTS.

Mr. ALLEY. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report back a bill providing for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes. It is not a private bill, but is one of great importance to the Department, and has received the unanimous approval of the committee. It is of such importance to the country and to the Department that I think it will elicit no discussion or opposition, and I hope the House will consent to put it upon its passage now.

The bill was read by its title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 142) to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to object, but I desire to say that this day being set apart, and being the only day allowed, for the report of private bills, it does seem to me that this class of bills should remain until the committees have been called through for reports of private bills.

Mr. ALLEY. I understand that, but this is a very important bill, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has not had any opportunity to report this session, and this is the only bill of a public nature we particularly desire to pass at the present time. I think if the gentleman will give his attention to the reading of the bill he will see its importance, and will not object.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object.

SHEPHERD AND CALDWELL.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back a bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of John H. Shepherd and Walter H. Caldwell, of Missouri.

The bill directs the Postmaster General to allow to Shepherd & Caldwell the sums of money due and unpaid and heretofore withheld by the Post Office Department, for carrying the mails, during the years 1854 and 1855, on routes 8818 and 8849 in the State of Missouri, under certain restrictions and upon certain conditions named in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this bill ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. ALLEY. I think the report had better be read. It is brief, and contains a statement of the facts of the case as clearly as I could make it.

The report was read.

No objection being made, the report was received.

Mr. ALLEY. I move the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts how much money is involved in the bill?

Mr. ALLEY. About nineteen hundred dollars.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETER NICOL.

On motion of Mr. ALLEY, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Peter Nicol, mail carrier, for an increase of compensation; and the same was laid on the table.

MAIL ROUTE IN CONNECTICUT.

On motion of Mr. ALLEY, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of certain citizens of Connecticut, praying for a change of mail route from Sharon to Cornwall Bridge, so as to run from Amenia Union via South Amenia to Kent; and the same was laid on the table.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. DAWES. I desire now to call up the contested-election case from the seventh congressional district of Virginia. The case was partially considered a few days since, but was interrupted by other business.

Mr. HALE. This being the day for the consideration of private business, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege takes precedence.

Mr. DAWES. I will say that probably the business to which the Committee of Elections invites the attention of the House will occupy but a short time. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] who has the floor, intends to make a motion to postpone the case, and I shall make no objection to that. I call up the case now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to say that my health is such at this time that I am unable to go on with the argument in this case. I therefore hope the House will entertain the motion I make to postpone the case indefinitely, and I will in two or three weeks, when my health is improved, call up the case and fix a day for its consideration. I move the case be postponed.

Mr. DAWES. For how long a time?

Mr. SMITH. I will say Monday two weeks, after the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will let this case be postponed till a week from to-day, and then, if the circumstances are such that he does not desire it to come up, it can be further postponed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a week from to-day will not be "objection day;" to-day is.

Mr. SMITH. I will state to the chairman of the Committee of Elections that I expect to ask leave of absence for ten days in consequence of family affairs.

Mr. DAWES. I am in much the same situation as my friend from Kentucky; but I will state to him that if, when this day week comes, he is not prepared to go on with the case he will not find me opposing a further postponement. I think the case had better be postponed until this day week.

Mr. SMITH. Well, I will not object to that.

The motion to postpone for one week was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH. I now ask leave of absence for ten days. My family is in such a condition that I am compelled to go home.

There being no objection, the leave of absence was granted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I now move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not press that motion. It was the understanding that the Committee of Elections should have Fridays. Everybody knows that the committee is overburdened with business, and we have held back our reports and have not interfered with the general business of the House with the understanding that we should have as much of Fridays as was necessary. I have a single case which I wish to present to the House to-day, and I do not think it will occupy the whole day, but if Fridays are not set apart for the committee they will be under the necessity of calling up their reports on other days.

Mr. HALE. The Private Calendar is very short, and it will take but a very short time to dispose of it, as this is "objection day." We shall not probably occupy more than half an hour in considering it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are only eight bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. DAWES. And is this "objection day?"

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAWES. Then I will not object to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to make an appeal to the House. Owing to the fact that I have been sick, the business of the Committee for the District of Columbia, of which I am chairman, has accumulated, and has been much delayed. We have a few bills from the Senate which we are prepared to report, and I hope the House will allow us to report them to-day.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman does not desire to have immediate action upon them, I will make no objection.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish that some of them shall be put upon their passage. They will occupy but a very short time.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield for that purpose, but as this is "objection day," I will yield for the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HALE.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY?]

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to his reporting any bill upon which he does not desire immediate action.

Mr. LOVEJOY. They are Senate bills, and I want them passed at once.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield for that purpose.

JOHN DIXON.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, upon which I do not ask action at this time.

Mr. HALE. Then I have no objection to the report being made.

Mr. FARNSWORTH then, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the benefit of John Dixon, of Illinois; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me to make a report from the Committee for the District of Columbia?

Mr. HALE. I must insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. Next Friday the call of committees for reports will commence with the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. The reports which the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia wishes to make are private bills, to which there will be no objection.

Mr. HALE. Then we can take them up in Committee of the Whole House. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House thereupon resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. J. C. AL-LEN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the private bills upon the Calendar, as follows:

F. A. HOLDEN AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 226) for the relief of F. A. Holden, Eli Thayer, Hannah Bexton, D. W. Frisby, and Hiram Bloss.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

CHIPPEWA AND OTHER INDIANS.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, residing in Michigan, the sum of $190,850.

Mr. STEVENS objected.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS.

A bill (H. R. No. 194) for the benefit of half-breeds and mixed bloods of the Winnebago tribe of Indians.

Mr. MORRILL objected.

ISAAC R. DILLER.

A bill (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac R. Diller.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, objected.

R. L. B. CLARKE.

A bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke.

Mr. STEVENS objected.

BRIGHAM YOUNG.

A bill (H. R. No. 130) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust and settle the accounts of ex-Governor Brigham Young as ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Utah.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, objected.

ALBERT BROWN.

An act (S. No. 92) for the relief of Albert Brown.

Mr. AMES objected.

JACOB WEBER.

A bill (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of Jacob Weber.

Mr. LOVEJOY objected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. J. C. ALLEN reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MASSACHUSETTS CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the Massachusetts contested-election case.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I desire to make a report from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE. I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts that my half hour is not up yet.

Mr. DAWES. No; but the gentleman was smarter than he promised to be.

Mr. HALE. I promised to occupy only half an hour, and I have not had that length of time.

Mr. DAWES. Yet the gentleman has had time enough to go through the Calendar. He went through it in five minutes instead of half an hour.

WASHINGTON CITY SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion till the Committee for the District of Columbia is called?

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw it provisionally.

The SPEAKER proceeded with the call of reports of a private character.

Mr. LOVEJOY, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 15) to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank; and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOVEJOY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEVY COURT EXPENSES.

Mr. LOVEJOY, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 81, to apportion the expenses of the levy court of the county of Washington upon the basis of population, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOVEJOY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MASSACHUSETTS CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES called up the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of John S. Sleeper, contesting the right of Alexander H. Rice to a seat in the House of Representatives as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district of Massachusetts.

The resolutions reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Resolved, That John S. Sleeper is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Alexander H. Rice is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to have gentlemen send to the document-room for the report of the Committee of Elections in this case. It is a peculiar case—not such as has heretofore come before the House—depending entirely upon the accuracy of the count of the votes, which will be better understood by gentlemen if they will refer to the report of the committee in this case.

The district is the third district of Massachusetts, composed of six wards of the city of Boston, the city of Roxbury, and the town of Brookline. The official canvass of votes shows the following result: for Mr. Rice, 8045 votes; for Mr. Sleeper, 5,020 votes; making a plurality of 25 votes for Mr. Rice. Mr. Sleeper claims that the true result should be as follows: for Mr. Sleeper, 5,049 votes; for Mr. Rice, 5,017 votes; making a plurality for Mr. Sleeper of 32 votes.

The contest does not involve the legality of any of the votes cast at this election, but simply the accuracy of the count, and the accuracy of the count in a single ward only of the city of Boston—the twelfth ward, or South Boston.

Mr. Sleeper claims that in that ward the true count should have been: for Mr. Sleeper, 890 votes; for Mr. Rice, 805 votes; making a plurality for Mr. Sleeper in that ward of 85 votes. Mr. Rice claims that the true vote in that ward was as follows: for Mr. Sleeper, 861 votes; for Mr. Rice, 833 votes; making a plurality in that ward for Mr. Sleeper of only 28 votes. It is upon this single ward of the city of Boston, and upon this single point, that the whole contest hangs.

The vote in the State of Massachusetts is by ballot. A check-list is prepared ten days beforehand. When a voter approaches the polls, his name is first found upon the check-list and checked off. He then deposits his ballot. There is nothing upon the ballot to indicate by whom a particular ballot was cast, and no means of ascertaining that fact except from the voluntary statement of the voter, or by the casual observations of bystanders.

In the cities of Massachusetts each ward constitutes an election precinct, and a poll is opened in each ward. The ward officers consist of a warden, a clerk, and five inspectors, who conduct the election. In all other respects, the ballots are cast at a ward meeting precisely as they are at town meetings in the towns of the State, and in the manner I have described.

The ward officers as well as the town officers are required at the close of the polls to announce in open ward or town meeting, before the adjournment of the meeting, the result of the ballot for whatever officer is being elected. In wards they are then required to make a certificate of the result and enter it in a record kept for that purpose, transmitting certified copies of it to the mayor and aldermen of the city, who are required in case of an election of members of Congress to examine these returns and transmit them to the Governor of the Commonwealth and the Council, who as a board of canvassers are to declare elected and give certificates to the persons appearing to them to have the highest number of votes.

Upon the night of the election, when the voting was had in the State of Massachusetts for Representatives to Congress, which was on the 4th of November, 1862, the ward officers entered upon their record, and then certified and returned to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Boston a certificate, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

City of Boston:

At a legal meeting of the inhabitants of ward No. 12, in the city of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, qualified as the law directs, holden in said ward on Tuesday, the 4th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1862, for the purpose of giving in their votes for one able and discreet person, being an inhabitant of district No. 3, to represent said district in the next Congress of the United States, the whole number of votes given in as aforesaid were sorted, counted, recorded, and declaration thereof made, as by the constitution and law directed, and were for the following persons:

For Alexander H. Rice, of Boston, eight hundred and five (805) votes.

For John S. Sleeper, of Roxbury, eight hundred and ninety (890) votes.

In testimony whereof, the warden, inspectors of elections, and clerk of said ward, have hereunto set their hands, the 5th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1862.

HORATIO N. CRANE, Warden.

A. SMITH, Jr.,

FRANCIS W. HILL,

JOSEPH H. TOMBS,

Inspectors.

GEORGE W. BAIL, Clerk.

Mr. DAWES. The number of votes thus certified to have been cast in this ward is the number Mr. Sleeper claims to have been the true number.

And the mayor and aldermen certified the result in the six wards of the city falling in this district, and transmitted that certificate to the Governor and Council. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

At a legal meeting of the inhabitants of the city of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, qualified by the constitution to vote for civil officers, holden in their several wards on the 4th day of November, being the Tuesday after the first Monday of said month, in the year of our Lord 1862, for the purpose of giving in their votes for a Representative in the congressional district No. 3 of said Commonwealth, it appears from the several returns made to the board of aldermen, and by them examined according to law, that the whole number of votes given in were sorted, counted, recorded, and declaration thereof made, as by the constitution is directed, and were for the following persons:

John S. Sleeper, of Roxbury, 3,629; Alexander H. Rice, of Boston, 3,717; Alexander H. Rice, of Roxbury, 8; Lyndander Spooner, of Boston, 1; — Rice, 1; William Whitney, 1; Henry Crocker, 1.

SAMUEL R. SPINNEY,

THOMAS P. RICH,

JOS. L. HENSHAW,

JAMES L. HANSON,

GEO. W. PARMENTER,

E. T. WILSON,

THOMAS C. AMORY, Jr.,

OTIS NORCROSS,

Aldermen of the city of Boston.

SAMUEL F. MCCLARY,

City Clerk.

Attest:

Mr. DAWES. To make up this aggregate is included the number of votes certified in the certificate just read to have been cast for Mr. Sleeper and Mr. Rice in this ward.

On the 11th day of November, seven days following, the ward officers of ward twelve made an amended or additional return to the mayor and aldermen, as follows.

The Clerk read, as follows:

City of Boston:

At a legal meeting of the inhabitants of ward No. 12, in the city of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, qualified as the law directs, holden in said ward on Tuesday, the 4th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1862, for the purpose of giving in their votes for one able and discreet person, being an inhabitant of district No. 3, to represent said district in the next Congress of the United States, the whole number of votes given in as aforesaid were sorted, counted, recorded, and declaration thereof made, as by the constitution and law is directed, and were for the following persons:

To Alexander H. Rice, as per corrected return, eight hundred and thirty-three (833) votes, instead of eight hundred and five, as per original return; and for John S. Sleeper, as per corrected return, eight hundred and sixty-one (861) votes, instead of eight hundred and ninety, as per original return.

HORATIO N. CRANE, Warden.

GEORGE W. BAIL, Clerk.

In testimony whereof, the warden, inspectors of elections, and clerk of said ward have hereunto set their hands the 11th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1862.

HORATIO N. CRANE, Warden.

FRANCIS W. HILL,

THOMAS JOHNSON,

JOSEPH H. TOMBS,

C. A. CONNOR,

Inspectors.

GEORGE W. BAIL, Clerk.

SUFFOLK, ss:

CITY OF BOSTON, November 11, 1862.

Then personally appeared the within-named persons, to wit, Horatio N. Crane, warden; Francis W. Hill, Alfred Smith, Jr., Thomas Johnson, Joseph H. Tombs, and C. A. Connor, inspectors of elections, and George W. Bail, clerk, who solemnly swore that this corrected return given by them is true.

Before me,

HORACE SMITH,

Justice of the Peace.

Mr. DAWES. The difference between this certificate and the former one is to give Mr. Sleeper 861 instead of 890 votes, and Mr. Rice 833 instead of 805; that is, a difference of 29 votes less for Mr. Sleeper, and 28 votes more for Mr. Rice.

The mayor and aldermen of the city of Boston transmitted the certificate to the secretary of the Commonwealth with the following certificate.

The Clerk read, as follows:

AMENDED CERTIFICATE.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

At a legal meeting of the inhabitants of the city of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, qualified, as by the constitution required, to vote for representatives in the General Court, holden on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, being the 4th day of said month, in the year 1862, for the purpose of giving in their votes for a Representative of this Commonwealth in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, for district No. 3, all the ballots given in therefor were sorted, counted, and recorded, and declaration thereof made, as by the constitution is directed, and were for the following persons, namely:

John S. Sleeper, of Roxbury, 3,600; Alexander H. Rice, of Boston, 3,745; Alexander H. Rice, of Roxbury, 8; Lyndauer Spooner, of Boston, 1; — Rice, 1; William Whitney, 1; Henry Crocker 1; if the amended return from ward twelve, of which a copy is hereto attached and marked A, should be received as a true return of the votes cast at said election.

Aldermen of Boston.

SAMUEL F. MCCLARY,

City Clerk.

Attest:

November 12, 1862.

Mr. DAWES. The Governor and Council adopted this as the true return and correct statement of the vote cast in ward twelve of Boston, instead of the other, and as it gave Mr. Rice a majority of 25 votes, awarded him the certificate accordingly.

It is on the legality and accuracy of that proceeding this whole contest depends. If the House will indulge me, I will endeavor to present the precise point in the case. The Committee of Elections, so far as I know, without an exception, came to the conclusion that the amended return was the correct one. In respect to it Mr. Sleeper claims, first, that it is illegal because there is no law authorizing the ward officers to make an amended or additional return of this nature; that the law requires the result to be declared in open ward meeting, and this result never has been so declared, and cannot therefore be accepted as the result; and because the mayor and aldermen have never, as required by law, passed upon this amended or additional return, or determined anything one way or the other based upon it, but only transmitted the same to the Governor and Council, with a hypothetical certificate of their own, of no force in law; and secondly, that the amended return is not true.

It is necessary, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the House should listen to an exposition of the law of Massachusetts upon the subject of an amended return, and then to evidence to ascertain whether in point of fact the amended return is true or not.

First, Mr. Sleeper claims that there is no authority of law to make such an amended return. Let the law be read before we proceed any further. Is there any law authorizing the ward officers to make an amended or additional return of the nature of the one here made? The duty of the ward officers, as well as of the mayor and aldermen in the premises, is prescribed in chapter seven, section sixteen, of the General Statutes of Massachusetts, in these words:

"The mayor and aldermen and the clerk of each city shall forthwith, after an election, examine the returns made by the returning officers of each ward in such city; and if any error appears therein, they shall forthwith notify said ward officers thereof, who shall forthwith make a new and additional return, under oath, in conformity to truth, which additional return, whether made upon notice or by such officers without notice, shall be received by the mayor and aldermen or city clerk at any time before the expiration of the day preceding that on which by law they are required to make their returns, or to declare the result of the election in said city; and all original and additional returns so made shall be examined by the mayor and aldermen, and made part of their returns of the results of such election. In counting the votes in an election no returns shall be rejected when the votes given for each candidate can be ascertained."

It is claimed by Mr. Sleeper that although that statute provides for and contemplates an amended or new return from ward officers in certain cases, it was only designed to cover clerical errors; that when the mayor and aldermen found on looking over the returns, or when they suspected there was a clerical error in the returns, they were required to notify the ward officers that they were to correct the error, but that there was no provision of law which permits the ward officers to examine into the facts touching the real number of votes cast, or to do anything more than to correct any clerical error, such as that when they had declared the result to be 805 votes the clerk called it 806, or some such clerical error as that.

But a careful examination of the statute shows this claim entirely unfounded. In the first place it requires the ward officers to make an amended or new return in certain cases specified in the section. It is then their duty to make a new return. The return is limited by law in two ways, and two only: first, it must be made within ten days of the election; second, it must be "in conformity to truth." Those are the only limitations upon the ward officers. They shall make a new return whenever the making of a new return is necessary to certify the truth. They must make it within ten days, and the new certificate must conform to the truth, and nothing else. They must swear to it, and therefore it must be in conformity to what they believe the truth to be. And the statute is wholly silent upon the means by which they are to arrive at the truth. They are therefore at liberty to adopt any means which will lead to the truth.

My friend, Mr. Sleeper, claims that there is no express authority for them to re-examine and recount the ballots; and there is none. He claims that it follows, therefore, that they are not authorized to recount the ballots. But there is no express authority for them to adopt any method of examination to ascertain what that truth is to which their certificate must conform, and therefore, if they are not permitted to examine the ballots to ascertain that truth because there is no express provision for examining the ballots, it would follow that they are not authorized by law to pursue any method of ascertaining the truth, although the law requires of them to make a certificate in conformity to truth. Yet my friend claims that they cannot be permitted to pursue any method to ascertain what the truth is.

Well, it is evident if they are to make a new or amended return, it must be different from the first return; and that does away entirely with the claim of Mr. Sleeper upon the second ground, namely, that this result in the amended return was never proclaimed in open town meeting, because the result in the first return is the result proclaimed in open town meeting always, except whatever clerical mistake may arise in making out the certificate. Any mistake except a clerical one in the certificate would certainly involve the number proclaimed in open town meeting, and therefore the proclaimed number would be different from that made in the amended return.

Therefore, unless the amended return is to be precisely like the original—which is absurd—it would be different from that which is proclaimed in open town meeting. That disposes of Mr. Sleeper's second objection.

The third objection is that this return was, by the mayor and aldermen, transmitted to the Governor and Council without passing upon it, or deciding whether it was the true return from ward twelve or not. An examination of the statute will show that it is no part of the business of the mayor and aldermen to adjudicate upon it at all. They are required to examine it, and then transmit it to the Governor and Council, who shall take it, along with the original return, and examine and adjudicate upon all the returns, and declare him elected who, in their opinion, is elected by such returns. So that the contestant entirely mistakes the express provision of the statute, which is, not that the mayor and aldermen, but that the Governor and Council, shall pass upon the returns, and the mayor and aldermen are only the channel through which they come.

The last and most important objection which the contestant makes to this amended return is that it is not true in fact, and, if it is not, he is entitled to the seat.

It is quite apparent that it was the duty of the Committee of Elections, and that it is our duty, to ascertain, if it is in our power, what was the actual number of legal votes cast in that ward, without regard to whether the ward officers correctly or incorrectly certified that number of legal votes after they were cast. The law of Massachusetts lays great stress upon an open declaration of the result of the election in town meeting, before the adjournment of the town meeting, and before the result can be known or there can be any temptation on the part of any candidate or his friends to tamper with the returns themselves or the number of ballots. It is a very wise provision of law, and tends greatly to protect the ballot-boxes from frauds of this kind. It is claimed by Mr. Sleeper that the announcement in open town meeting is conclusive of the election; that it is the only result that can be accepted and acted upon; that there is no power under the laws of Massachusetts to go behind the result openly declared in town meeting; and that it is not safe or proper for us to go behind that result; so that however satisfied we may be that an honest mistake has been made in counting the votes or certifying them, or in any other way, yet if that mistake has happened to be declared as the result in open town meeting, it is res adjudicata, and past any examination by us. But the Committee of Elections were of the opinion that no such rule exists in Massachusetts or should govern us in the House of Representatives; that while they would put great reliance on that open declaration and regard it as prima facie evidence of the actual result, not to be controlled by any slight or suspicious evidence, nevertheless it is controllable, and to be controlled by evidence that will not admit of any reasonable doubt, so that the truth may be arrived at satisfactorily to fair and candid minds as to the actual result of the legal vote.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how came this mistake to exist? The ward officers, seven in number, superintended the election. Two of them stood at the polls, one with the check-list in his hand, and the other with the ballot-box; and when a man's name was checked on the check-list by the one, his vote was received by the other in the ballot-box. Two or more of them in another part of the ward room, upon a raised platform, separated from the voters by a railing, sat at a table and counted from time to time the ballots thus cast.

The officers of this ward, seven in number, were as nearly divided politically as they could be; four of them at this election voted for Mr. Rice, and three of them for Mr. Sleeper, the warden and president of the board voting for Mr. Sleeper, and the clerk voting for Mr. Rice. The clerk and the warden sat at a table in the rear of the ballot-boxes and counted the votes from time to time.

It was a general election in the State of Massachusetts, and State officers as well as Representatives in Congress were voted for to the number of seventeen. They were all upon one ballot—a paper of considerable size, such as I have now in my hand. The warden and the clerk, friends of the two candidates for this office, kept count of the votes cast, and from hour to hour the result was placed upon a blackboard in the ward room, so that any person coming into the ward room could ascertain exactly how the election was progressing. These officers kept a tally. They kept upon one paper the votes as they were cast and counted for Governor and Representatives in Congress, those being the officers in reference to whom most interest was felt. That paper was called "rough count throughout the day." I have the original paper on which the count was kept. Lithographic copies are annexed to the report. I have also in my hand a photographic copy of it precisely as it appears, as it was kept that day. They also kept another paper, a lithographic copy of which is also annexed to the report, on which they recorded the votes for Representative to Congress, for councilor of the district, and for senator in district five, in which that ward was situated. I have a photographic copy of that paper. The original I have here at my desk.

If gentlemen will turn to the copies of these papers in the report they will see exactly how the count was kept, and how the mistake was made. They first put all the straight votes by themselves, tying them up in small packages and marking on the back of them the number of votes in the package and the words, "clean-taken," adding the initials of the person who counted them. The split or scratched tickets they tied up, assorted in the same way, putting on the back of the package some mark indicating that they were not whole tickets, and the number of votes for the particular candidate whose name was scratched.

It will be observed that the first package counted for Mr. Rice contained 5 votes, the next contained 9. The 9 was placed over the 5, and the sum of them, 14, was carried to the right hand. The next package contained 60 votes. The 60 was placed over the 14 and the sum of these figures, 74, was carried forward to the right. So on through to the end.

If gentlemen will cast their eye over the second line of these figures they will see that at the beginning of the line the votes for Mr. Rice had accumulated to 334. The next package contained 39. These figures placed over the 334 made 373, which was carried to the right; 9 over that, added to it, was carried forward, 382; 187 over that, added to it, was carried forward, 569; 3 over that, added to it, was carried forward, 572; 1 over that, added to it, was carried forward, 573; 5 over that, added to it, made 578, but was carried forward as 518, the figure 7 being mistaken for the figure 1, 60 votes being thus dropped from the count.

This mistake runs through to the end, giving Mr. Rice at the end 770 votes, when in point of fact, by correct addition, it should have been 830 votes. The whole error is embraced in that point.

There is another method of proving it, but this correction of the vote will change the result and bring it out precisely as the ward officers claimed it to be in their amended return, and as the Committee of Elections found it to be.

There is a reason why I should go further in this statement. The ward officers made a return, not from that paper, but from the second paper, K, and therefore I beg the attention of the House for a moment to paper K. The results from hour to hour of the vote for Governor and Representative in Congress, placed on the blackboard, were taken from the "rough count" paper I. As they made this count and added up the votes they recounted them and set down the results on paper K, carrying them out in the same way. But the House will observe that paper I and paper K do not coincide. The people of the ward observed at the close of the polls this strange fact, that there were 60 votes less for Representative to Congress than there were for any other officer. They could not understand how that was. They inquired whether there were 60 men voting in that ward for all other officers, and omitting to vote for Representative in Congress. None of the ward officers had observed in the count any such circumstance, and no man had been found in the ward who had cast a vote for every other officer, omitting to vote for Representative in Congress. That led to inquiry and to an examination.

It will be observed also that this "rough count" I not only does not agree in its present condition with paper K, but that when you correct it, and add to it the 60 votes, the papers I and K will not even then agree. Correcting this mistake, which is perfectly clear, and restoring to Mr. Rice the 60 votes here lost to him, his vote would be by the "rough count," corrected, 830 votes, which, with the 863 votes given Mr. Sleeper by the "rough count," would make an aggregate of 1,693, one more than the lowest and nine less than the highest aggregate given among all the candidates for the other offices. But this does not agree with paper K, which was declared to be the vote on election day, and certified as such to the mayor and aldermen, for, adding this corrected vote for Mr. Rice, 830, to that put down on paper K for Mr. Sleeper, 890, and it makes an aggregate of 1,720, thirty-two votes more than the lowest and twenty-two votes more than the highest of the other aggregates.

The anxiety of the clerk growing out of the peculiarity I have just alluded to, a lack of 60 votes for member of Congress upon the blackboard, led him, upon the Sunday following, to sit down at his table and recast the votes upon paper I, to see how it was that there was a lack of 60 votes for member of Congress. He there discovered the mistake of 60 votes in paper I, as I have stated. Comparing it with paper K he also discovered that after the correction of those 60 votes paper K would not agree with it, and the two did not agree, as to Representative in Congress, with the votes for any of the other candidates on the same papers, for, by adding 60 votes to Mr. Rice's count, giving him 830 votes, the aggregate on paper K would give 28 votes for member of Congress more than were cast for any other officer. So that it would appear that 28 voters cast their votes for member of Congress who did not vote for any other officer in that election. But they had never seen any such ballot as that, nor could any voter casting such a vote be found, and therefore he determined to reexamine the ballots themselves.

I should state in passing that at the close of the polls he tied up the bundles of votes with a string around the middle of each bundle, then tied a paper around the whole, took them to his own house, carried them to the attic, and placed them in a trunk with a spring lock with the key in the lock, and there they remained, so far as there is a particle of testimony, until the Sunday following. After discovering this discrepancy in these papers, he went and consulted with the old clerk of the ward as to what he had better do. He then returned by himself to the attic, and taking off the paper wrapper, but without untying the string around the middle of the bundle of packages or removing the packages, he examined the votes in each package, took off the number of votes for Representative in Congress on each of the packages, and then restored them to their former place in the closet. In consequence of the conviction that an error had been committed in counting, which this examination produced on his mind, he then procured a meeting of all the ward officers at his house on the following evening, when the votes were by them there recounted with great care, and the result as thus ascertained was embodied in the new or amended return, signed by all the ward officers, seven in number, four of them voting themselves for Mr. Rice, and three of them for Mr. Sleeper, sworn to by them all, forwarded to the mayor and aldermen, and by them transmitted to the Governor and Council within the time prescribed by law. In counting the votes at this time the ward officers took each of the small packages upon which the number of votes was marked, recounted it carefully, and checked the corresponding numbers upon paper K.

It will be observed that on paper K there are, among the several packages set down to Mr. Sleeper, three packages of twenty-eight votes each, and none of that number for Mr. Rice. In the recount, after all the votes in the whole bundle for Mr. Sleeper were counted and checked, there had been checked but two packages of twenty-eight votes, and there remained unchecked to any one, a package of twenty-eight votes, corresponding with what was known as the "people's ticket," or that of Mr. Sleeper's political friends, with the name of Mr. Rice printed in place of Mr. Sleeper's for Representative in Congress.

This "people's ticket" in Massachusetts was composed of all political parties opposed to the political associates of Mr. Rice. But many of those voting that ticket as to the State officers preferred Mr. Rice to Mr. Sleeper, and therefore substituted his name for that of Mr. Sleeper, voting for the other officers upon the "people's ticket."

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President was received, by Mr. NICOLAY, informing the House that he did, on the 3d instant, approve a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 265) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) of thanks of Congress to the volunteer soldiers who have reenlisted in the Army; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) to continue the payment of bounties.

MASSACHUSETTS CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. DAWES. As these ballots were counted they were put up in packages; those containing straight tickets were put in packages by themselves and marked in pencil on the back "clean," with the initials of the person who counted them. But they found, as I said, three packages of twenty-eight votes counted for Mr. Sleeper, while they could find but two packages of that number with Mr. Sleeper's name on them. They found, however, one package of twenty-eight ballots containing the names of Mr. Sleeper's political associates for State officers, but with Mr. Rice's name inserted instead of that of Mr. Sleeper for member of Congress. Upon the back of that bundle was written the words "all alike," with the initials of the gentleman who counted the votes, the clerk of the ward. There was no place in Mr. Sleeper's count for these 28 votes. The whole vote of Mr. Sleeper, with the exception of these 28 votes, was counted, but there was no package of twenty-eight votes credited to Mr. Rice on paper K. Giving to Mr. Rice 28 votes, taking them from Mr. Sleeper, which were erroneously counted for him, restores the harmony of both papers. It brings up Mr. Rice's vote on paper K to precisely what it is on paper I, with the correction that I have already mentioned.

It is a very curious mistake, but on looking at the papers it is easily seen how it was made. I will explain it.

Mr. Speaker, there is no dispute but that the actual number of votes counted at the last count is correctly stated in the amended certificate. That this was the correct count of the ballots on the second count the Monday night after the election no one disputes; and an examination of the evidence, with a sworn return of the seven ward officers, does not leave room for doubt. The ward officers, four on one side and three on the other, swear to it; and they sat down deliberately to recount the votes, and counted them with great care. If, therefore, the ballots in the mean time had not been tampered with, the proof could not be made stronger that the true result had been reached. If those votes had not been tampered with, no proof could be stronger and clearer that the true result had been arrived at. As to whether the votes were tampered with or not will depend very much on the confidence the House has in the testimony of the man who had the keeping of those ballots: What that is I will state. The clerk testifies that at the close of the polls, as had been his custom he tied up the ballots in this package, and tied a paper around them; that he carried them to his home that night, and put them in a trunk in a closet in his attic; and that so far as he knew no mortal but himself knew where they were; that his own family consisted of a wife, confined all this time to her bed with sickness, a child born on the day of election, a nurse, and an aunt visiting the family. He swears positively that no person knew where they were but himself, so far as he knew; and that when they were taken out by the officers they were precisely in the condition in which they were when put there. He also swears that the memorandum on the back, "28 votes, all alike, taken G. W. B.," written on the package, was written on the day of election by himself, and that the mistake must have arisen in calling off the packages. That was the package having Mr. Rice's name in the place of Mr. Sleeper's. There is, however, corroborative proof found in the papers I and K themselves. By correcting the 60 votes in paper I, as before stated, and restoring to Mr. Rice the 28 votes here spoken of, the aggregate vote for Representative to Congress corresponds with those cast for the other officers, as follows: for Governor, 1,702; for Representative in Congress, 1,693; for councilor, 1,695; and for senator, 1,692. Correcting paper I, and the aggregate on paper I will be 1,694; but if that correction be applied to paper K, without also counting the 28 votes, an aggregate of 1,720 votes will be produced, just 28 votes more than the aggregate given for senator, and 27 more than that given for councilor. Therefore, unless the clerk perjured himself, there is no doubt that these votes were not tampered with, but that they were safely kept.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Sleeper does not present a particle of testimony to controvert that condition of facts. He asserts that it was possible to tamper with the ballots, and he therefore insists it is not only our right but our duty to say that that has been done. He is exceedingly severe upon this clerk; I do not know what for.

The supposition, therefore, that the ballots had been tampered with before the last count, in order to produce this result, involves not only the perjury of the clerk of the ward, but also requires that papers I and K be both forged and put in their present condition for the same purpose. But the evidence was abundant from all sides that the hourly announcements, put upon the blackboard in the ward room on election day, corresponded with paper I, and disclosed the precise discrep-

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 60.

any in the aggregate vote found on that paper; and the first return made on the night of the election was made from paper K, and corresponded with it. Besides all this, the very sight of the original papers, now with the committee, shows how preposterous is the pretense that they have been altered to produce this result. Without the correction in paper I, we must suppose that there were sixty ballots cast with no name upon them for Representative in Congress, yet no such ballot has been produced, and no person who cast such a ballot; and with that correction, but without the correction in paper K, we must conclude that twenty men voted for Mr. Sleeper for Congress, but for no one else of the candidates for the sixteen other offices voted for on the same ballot by all others; yet no such ballot has ever been seen and no such voter has ever been found. By making the correction in both papers a striking coincidence will be found, not only between the votes for candidates for Congress, but even the aggregate thus produced, and the aggregates for other offices. Restoring the 60 votes to Mr. Rice on paper I, and counting for him, instead of for Mr. Sleeper, on paper K the 28 votes for him found on the "people's ticket," and then Mr. Rice will have on paper I 830 votes, on paper K 833 votes. Mr. Sleeper will have on paper I 863 votes, and on paper K 862 votes. The aggregate of vote for Mr. Rice and Mr. Sleeper on paper I would then be 1,693, on paper K 1,695. The aggregate for other officers has been already shown to be, for senator, 1,692; for councilor, 1,695; and for Governor, 1,702.

Now, sir, I will close this lengthy and tedious exposition of the case by simply reading the conclusion of an article inserted in a Boston paper by the president of the ward officers, who himself voted for Mr. Sleeper, and which he published soon after the occurrence, that the people might know just how the matter stood. He was a friend of Mr. Sleeper, and a high-minded and honorable man. These are his concluding words:

"In conclusion, there was, and is, to my mind—and all of the inspectors concur with me in this result—an unfortunate, unintentional error on the part of our clerk, in originally giving to Mr. Sleeper these twenty-eight votes, when he should have put them to the credit of Mr. Rice."

"HORATIO N. CRANE,
"Warden of Ward Twelve."

This is under his own hand, and is testimony of which no one who examines the case and the papers can entertain a doubt. I now yield to the contestant, who, I understand, desires to address the House.

Mr. SLEEPER, (contestant.) Mr. Speaker, a majority of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case connected with the third Massachusetts congressional district have, in accordance with their sense of justice, and after a full hearing, made a report to this House unfavorable to the claim of the contestant. This result I was not prepared to expect. I believe the decision to be an erroneous one, and not in accordance with the laws of Massachusetts, or the testimony that has been laid before Congress. I therefore feel bound by my convictions of duty to the majority of the intelligent citizens of the district in which I reside, to avail myself of the privilege of appearing before this honorable body, and in person advocating my claim.

In my remarks I shall not attempt to argue the case with my friend, the able chairman of the Committee of Elections. But having confidence in the righteousness of my cause, and also in the wisdom and integrity of the representatives of the people, I shall address myself through you, Mr. Speaker, directly to the members of this House, and endeavor to expose the mistaken conclusions of a majority of the committee by a plain narrative of the case, as established by the evidence, accompanied by such comments as are in accordance with my own interpretation of the laws of Massachusetts, after consultation with men of eminent legal ability, and my own instincts of truth, justice, and common sense.

Mr. Speaker, the outlines of this case may be given in a few words. During the political campaign in Massachusetts in 1862 my name was placed before the voters of the third congressional district as a candidate for Congress, and at the annual election in that year the returns showed that I was elected by a plurality of votes. The legal documents certifying to this fact were laid before the Executive of the Commonwealth. According to the laws of Massachusetts in force at that time, and the usage for many years, the ballots were of no value after the declaration of the votes in open town meeting. No person was designated to take charge of them, no place was assigned for their deposit, and no mode was prescribed for their safe-keeping. Yet six days after the election, while abundant opportunity had been given for tampering with and changing the ballots, a recount was had in one of the wards of Boston by the ward officers, at the instigation of the clerk of the ward, who had assumed charge of the ballots, and it was found that in the bundle of votes then counted, and after they had been clandestinely examined and fingered by the clerk, according to his own confession, Mr. Rice had 28 votes more and Mr. Sleeper 28 votes less than were declared and certified to by the ward officers on the day of election. A voucher to this fact was forthwith laid before the board of aldermen of Boston, and without any further inquiry a hypothetical certificate was sent to the Governor and Council—an irregular and unprecedented proceeding on the part of the board—and without any investigation by the Executive the certificate of election to the office of member of Congress was withheld from the contestant and given to the present incumbent.

Such are the outlines of the case which is now engaging the attention of this House, and involving a principle which calls for a careful and just decision.

The provisions of the laws of Massachusetts, which in 1862 regulated the proceedings at elections, are contained in the seventh chapter of the General Statutes. Section fifteen provides as follows:

"The votes in elections for national, State, county, and district officers shall be received, sorted, and counted by the selectmen and the ward officers, and public declaration made thereof in open town and ward meeting."

Here the whole process of the election is clearly and explicitly set forth. The votes must be received, sorted, and counted, and the declaration of the vote, the crowning act, must be made in open town or ward meeting. When this is done, the votes are no longer of value. The laws of Massachusetts were at that time silent respecting them. They indicated neither directly nor indirectly the disposition which should be made of them. It was no crime to destroy them after the vote was declared. It was no felony to steal them, as they had done their work, and were of no more value than so many pieces of blank paper. The law proclaimed clearly and distinctly that the election should be decided on election day, in presence of the people, and that there should be no appeal from that decision.

The sixteenth section of the General Statutes of Massachusetts provides that—

"The mayor and aldermen and the clerk of each city shall forthwith after an election examine the returns made by the returning officers in each ward in such city, and if any error appears therein they shall forthwith notify said ward officers thereof, who shall forthwith make a new and additional return under oath, in conformity to the truth, which additional returns, whether made upon notice or by such officers without notice, shall be received by the mayor and aldermen or city clerk at any time before the expiration of the day preceding that on which by law the result of the election in said city; and all original and additional returns so made shall be examined by the mayor and aldermen, and made part of their returns of the result of such election. In counting the votes in an election no returns shall be rejected when the votes given for each candidate can be ascertained."

The language of this section is also clear and explicit. It is intended to give authority for the correction of clerical or arithmetical errors on the part of the ward officers when the return does not correspond with the declaration or the facts as they appeared on the day of election, and for that object only. For instance, if the return to the city clerk bore on the face of it that a certain number of ballots were cast in ward twelve for Josiah Smith, when the declaration and record showed that the true name was Joseph Smith, or that a certain number of votes were cast for a candidate, when the declaration and record showed that he had not received that number of votes, the return would be set aside on discovery of the error, and a new return would be made. And this new return would not only be strictly in conformity with truth, but confirm the count, record, and declaration made on the day of election.

Such a provision is necessary for the correction of blunders of this description. But I hardly supposed that any intelligent person would seriously contend that this section of the statute authorizes a recount of the ballots in any one precinct several days after the polls have been closed; and that the result of such a recount may set aside and nullify the declaration made by the ward officers on the day of election.

I am no lawyer, but I have consulted with lawyers; and, with great respect for my worthy friend, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, and who, on legal questions, does not often run off the track, I contend that any other construction of the statutes than the one I have given is an erroneous construction, not recognized by the courts in Massachusetts, and at variance with the spirit and letter of the law.

The laws of Massachusetts in 1862 did not provide for the preservation of the ballots. In some precincts of this third district the votes were destroyed immediately after the election. This was shown by the evidence of Joshua Seaver, a highly respectable citizen of Roxbury, who had presided at the polls as a warden for fifteen successive years. According to his statement the votes in his ward were never preserved after the close of the polls. If ballots were to be used as evidence after they had been counted, declared, and the returns made, the laws of Massachusetts would never have allowed them to be destroyed.

The object of that provision in the statutes which required that in all elections a public declaration of the votes should be made in open meeting, in presence of the assembled citizens, was, beyond all question, to guard against precisely such an occurrence as took place in ward twelve, in Boston, and is the foundation of this appeal; that is, to prevent any persons, actuated by good or evil intentions, rogues or honest men, from assembling in secret conclave, at any time or times within ten days after the election, and, in the absence of any subsequent investigation of the facts, reversing the recorded doings and solemn declaration on election day. I repeat it, the very object of this clause was to prevent such an irregular, dangerous, and manifestly improper proceeding.

If a proceeding of this character were strictly in accordance with law and propriety, as is contended by the committee, it may well be asked, why was that clause introduced into the statute, which requires not only the counting, but a public declaration of the votes to be made in open meeting on the day of election? That clause, according to this new interpretation, was altogether without meaning, without object, and palpably redundant.

It is no wonder that the irregular, unauthorized, and hitherto unprecedented proceedings connected with the election of member of Congress in the third Massachusetts district in 1862 should have excited surprise and a feeling of distrust and dissatisfaction throughout the Commonwealth. The people saw that if such a course of action should be established as a precedent, the ballot-box, thrown open to pollution, would no longer be an indicator of their sovereign will. And at the very next session of the Massachusetts Legislature, a few months afterwards, important additions, not changes, but additions, were made to the laws regulating the proceedings at elections. These new provisions, repealing nothing, prescribe a mode for the preservation and safe-keeping of the ballots after an election by causing them to be sealed in an envelope in open town meeting, and, with all other documents pertaining thereto, given in charge to the city clerk. The manner in which a recount may be had by the board of aldermen, and only by the board of aldermen, is also specified.

The enactment of this law in itself is an admission that previously no authority was given for the preservation and safe-keeping of the ballots after an election; and that a recount of votes after the dissolution of a ward meeting was also an unauthorized act. It sets the stamp of illegality on all the doings connected with this recount of votes for member of Congress in ward twelve after the election in 1862.

Mr. Speaker, according to a provision in the Federal Constitution, "each House (of Congress) shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Thus, in a case like this, the House of Representatives becomes a legal tribunal to try the issue. The members perform the solemn duty of judges on a question deeply affecting the rights of the people and the rights of States, and from this tribunal there is no appeal. Each member, therefore, must act on his individual responsibility, and, after a full and attentive hearing, frame his decision according to his own interpretation of the law and evidence. And if the Representatives in Congress should be convinced that the incumbent of the seat which I claim was not elected in conformity with the laws of Massachusetts, it can hardly be expected they will confirm him in the seat.

Therefore I beg that the members of this House will consider well the facts which I have stated: that the election for member of Congress in the third Massachusetts district was honestly conducted; that the votes were carefully counted, recorded, and declared in open meetings, in presence of the people; that returns in conformity with the records and declarations were made according to law, and placed in the hands of the proper officers, and by those officers the results, definitely stated and certified to by the boards of aldermen and selectmen, were transmitted to the secretary of State. These returns showed that the votes for member of Congress were: for Alexander H. Rice, 5,017; John S. Sleeper, 5,049; showing a plurality for John S. Sleeper of 32 votes.

These facts are fully proved by attested documents and oral evidence. They stand out in bold relief. They cannot be questioned or explained away.

But the Representatives in Congress, in their desire to do justice, often exercise the power with which they are vested, and look beyond State statutes, which were intended to regulate proceedings at elections. This course of action has been adopted by the Committee of Elections, and was evidently anticipated by the gentleman who now holds the disputed seat, as appears by the character of the evidence he has laid before Congress, and which bases his whole claim to the seat, not on the declarations and returns in open meeting on election day, or on any proceedings in the course of that day, but on the result of a recount of the ballots in one ward six days afterwards.

It is shown by documents in this case that, on the day after the annual election in Massachusetts in 1862, a return of votes for member of Congress was made to the city government of Boston from ward twelve, usually called South Boston. This return stated that—"The whole number of votes given in, as aforesaid, were sorted, counted, recorded, and declaration thereof made as by the constitution and laws directed, and were for the following persons, namely: Alexander H. Rice, of Boston, 895; John S. Sleeper, of Roxbury, 890."

This return was signed by the warden, clerk, and three of the inspectors, and duly forwarded to the city clerk of Boston, and the result through him laid before the secretary of State.

It also appears that on the 11th of November, seven days afterwards, and after a recount of the votes had been had by the ward officers in ward twelve, another document was received by the city clerk and also signed and sworn to by the ward officers. In this document it was stated that—"The whole number of votes given in on that day (the 4th of November) were sorted, counted, and declaration thereof made in open ward meeting, and were for the following persons, namely: Alexander H. Rice, 835 votes, instead of 895; John S. Sleeper, 861 votes, instead of 890."

A result untrue in fact, for no such declaration was actually made, and changing the whole character of the election for member of Congress as declared on the day of election.

This amended return was placed in the hands of the city clerk of Boston on the 12th of November, and a special meeting of the board of aldermen was called to take action in the case on the following day. But, without entering on any investigation, the aldermen adroitly contrived to evade a decision and avoid all troublesome consequences by virtue of an "if," and threw the responsibility of receiving or rejecting this strange and unprecedented document on the Governor and Council!

The amended return was transmitted to the secretary of State, accompanied by the following "amended certificate of the result:"

Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

"At a legal meeting of the inhabitants of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, &c., for the purpose of giving in their votes for a Representative in this Commonwealth in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States for district No. 3, all the ballots given in therefor were sorted, counted, and recorded, and declaration thereof made as by the constitution is directed, and were for the following persons, namely: John S. Sleeper, of Roxbury, 3,600; Alexander H. Rice, of Boston, 3,745; if the amended return from ward twelve, of which a copy is hereto attached and marked A, should be received as a true return of the votes cast at the election."

Mark the language, "if the amended return should be received as a true return;" thus guardedly avoiding the indorsement of its correctness, and expressing a strong doubt of its being received by the Executive as a true return, indicative of an expectation that it would be rejected! Nevertheless, this amended return and the amended certificate of the board of aldermen were received by the Governor and Council. Such being the case, it was a fair presumption that they would investigate the facts in order to satisfy themselves whether justice and truth required that the result of the declaration of the doings in ward twelve on election day should be reversed. Nevertheless, without any investigation, the original return from the city of Boston, containing the result of the vote for member of Congress in certain wards, as actually declared on the day of election, was set aside; the hypothetical certificate, with a palpable error clinging to it, was indorsed as a solemn truth, and the certificate of election was given to my friend, Hon. Alexander H. Rice, who was thus entitled to the seat at the opening of the session.

I contend that having received on the day of election a plurality of the votes cast in the third district for member of Congress, and this result having been submitted to the Governor and Council in strict conformity with law, I was entitled to the certificate of election. Any rumors, doubts, or facts subsequently created, connected with the doings of the ward officers, might have been a proper matter for legal investigation, subject to the decision of the House of Representatives in Congress.

I am thus, by the mistaken action of the Executive of my own State, placed in a false position, and compelled to appear in the unpopular character of a plaintiff in a case before Congress, and substantiate my claim in opposition to a gentleman deservedly respected by all who know him, a legislator of experience, chairman of an important committee, and surrounded by a large number of political and a larger number of personal friends, who, however anxious to do right, must unavoidably cherish a strong desire to retain him in the seat he now occupies. Such are the obstacles I have to encounter at the very threshold of my case—obstacles which might almost lead one to doubt the result of a claim, however just in itself.

The election in South Boston in 1862 took place on the 4th of November. The inspectors received the votes which were counted by the warden and clerk. About every hour the ballot-boxes were emptied, the votes counted, and the results for Governor and member of Congress only placed on a blackboard, and exhibited for the gratification of curiosity. This was done by the clerk of the ward, who kept a record in pencil of the announcement every hour on the blackboard. On this record, which was headed "rough count throughout the day," was subsequently put as a distinguishing mark the letter I. The votes were carefully counted and recounted during the day by the warden and clerk, and the result recorded on another paper subsequently marked with the letter K.

Toward the close of the polls a discrepancy of 60 or 70 votes suddenly occurred in the announcement on the blackboard between the number of the combined votes for Governor and the number of the combined votes for member of Congress. This was an error made by George W. Bail, the clerk of the ward. The figures were compared with the record marked K, and corrected, and the final declaration made from this paper agreed with the footing and record of the count, and was believed to be correct, as the error of about 60 votes on the blackboard, or any other blunder in the figures on the paper marked I, could have had no effect on the result as declared at the polls.

All the witnesses agree that the count throughout the day was fairly and apparently correctly made, and no suspicion existed that there was any error or anything wrong in the final count and declaration.

At the close of the election, Bail, the clerk of the ward, took the different parcels of votes, placed them in two piles, lengthwise, by the side of each other, and tied them round and round with twine; and finding on the floor an old handbill, he tied that round the ends of the bundle, to prevent the votes from slipping out. In this condition he carried the votes to his house and put them in a trunk, leaving the key in the lock, and deposited the trunk in a closet in an attic chamber, neither of which, the closet or chamber, was fastened by a lock and key, or in any other way. And here the votes remained, untouched, so far as the knowledge of Bail extends, for the remainder of the week—four days—during which time he was engaged in his business as clerk of a lumber yard. Friends and neighbors were occasionally calling on him, and it was generally known that the bundle of ballots was in the house.

During these four days no one spoke to him urging or suggesting a recount of the votes; nor did he during that time suspect anything was wrong in relation to the final result. But on the Sunday following the election, five days afterwards, having some leisure time on his hands, he proceeded to examine the minutes or records of the count of votes on election day. In the course of this examination, he says he discovered an error of about sixty votes in the "rough count" marked I. On making this discovery for the second time, of an error of about 60 votes in the blackboard memorandum, he proceeded to call on Hollis R. Gray, a personal and political friend, and communicate the fact to him. After talking over the matter, these two persons concluded to call on Horace Smith, an intimate friend of both parties and an active politician. After further consultation the trio proceeded to the house of Josiah Dunham, an experienced and adroit politician. At Dunham's house the subject of a recount of votes was further discussed.

The details of the conversation among these gentlemen do not appear. Bail's memory failed him on that occasion, as on other occasions, as shown on his cross-examination, where the non mi ricordo tactics figure extensively. But those gentlemen approved of Bail's suggestion to have a recount of votes for member of Congress, and a recount was determined on from that moment. Bail returned home. After dinner he ascended to the attic, took from the closet the bundle of votes, and laid it on the chamber floor, and, as he says, without untying the bundle or loosening the twine, which had been more than once wound around it, he removed the handbill which was fastened around each end. In this way, he says, he got access to the packages, and by lifting the ends of the votes he was able to examine and "take" the numbers on each package for member of Congress. While doing this, he says he discovered an error or discrepancy with the record and declaration of about 28 votes, but without discovering the actual error, which was subsequently found at the time of the recount. If Bail's intention had been to enact a fraud, there was no obstacle in his way save such as conscience might interpose. He had only to take out of the bundle a package of 17 votes or upward, of the regular Democratic or People's ticket, and replace it by a package of 17 votes on which the name of Alexander H. Rice was printed for member of Congress, instead of John S. Sleeper, and indorsing in pencil the package thus surreptitiously introduced. The process was a simple one, as easy as lying, and apparently safe.

Bail's description of his mode of examining the ballots is worthy of particular attention. By removing the handbill, and lifting the ends of the packages, he might possibly have seen the figures on the back of each package. But how could he ascertain that there was an error of 28 votes unless he could also distinguish the names of the candidates voted for, unless he actually discovered the error in the package of 28 votes, which was subsequently found in the bundle? According to his description of the manner in which the bundle was tied this was an impossibility! The names of the candidates for Congress were printed in the center of the tickets, and if the packages of votes were placed in two piles, by the side of each other, and tied firmly round and round the center of the bundle with a piece of twine, as Bail swears was the case, and was not loosened on this occasion, the impossibility of such a discovery must be manifest to every one.

On Sunday evening Bail, having determined to have a recount of votes, and fortified by the request of his three political friends, called upon several of the inspectors, and also the warden, to obtain their consent to the proposition. But instead of calling first on the warden, an elderly and highly respectable citizen, and consulting with him on the legality and expediency of a second counting of the votes, and frankly stating his reasons for such a proceeding, he first visited three of the inspectors, a majority of those officers comparatively young men, and whom he had reason to suppose might be guided in such matters by his opinion.

The reason which Bail gave the inspectors for a recount was, he supposes, "in consequence of the talk around." He subsequently said that "the talk around" was confined to the error on the blackboard at the close of the polls. But Bail knew that the error on the blackboard was his own particular blunder, and he could have set those rumors at rest at any moment. Connor, one of the inspectors, on the other hand, said that the "talk around" or "conversation," as he called it, was in consequence of the surprise of people that Mr. Rice did not get a larger vote. On that evening Bail said nothing to the inspectors of his new discovery connected with the blackboard memorandum; nor did he say he had examined the packages, and found an error sufficient to stultify the official declaration and return. Nevertheless he obtained the consent of three of the inspectors, and those gentlemen agreed to meet at his house on the next evening and recount the votes.

Bail next called on the warden. His interview with that officer is thus described by Mr. Crane in a communication published in the Boston Journal, and included among the printed documents:

"On Sunday the 9th of November, Mr. Bail called at my house and informed me that he had been requested to recount the votes given at the late election for member of Congress from our district, and wished me to come to his house the next evening for that purpose. Upon being asked the reason, he said there were some who thought there might be an error in the count. I declined peremptorily to entertain any such request unless it was respectfully and properly made in writing to me as warden, and giving good reasons for our recounting the votes. He replied that a majority of the inspectors had assented to the recount, and it would be done with or without my being present."

In this interview with the warden, Bail conveyed the impression that there was a demand outside for a reexamination of the votes. He did not state that this request, from three individuals only, was made during a secret consultation at his own suggestion; and he carefully concealed the fact that he had reexamined the records of figures and the bundle of votes in the course of the day. The warden very properly refused his assent to such a proceeding, and declined to attend the meeting. Afterwards, however, as he could not prevent a recount of the votes, he concluded to be present.

The next evening the warden and inspectors met at Bail's house. The clerk gave no further reasons for recounting the votes. He produced the bundle and placed it on the table, and then, to use the language of the warden, "Mr. Bail assured me on his word of honor that the bundle of votes then and there before us had not been untied, and that then in my presence they were seen for the first time since the day of election, by his untying the bundle!"

A most bold and unblushing falsehood, furnishing a skeleton-key to unfold the true character of the man! And it is singular that while the report of the Committee of Elections refers to the secret examination of the votes by the clerk that Sabbath afternoon—as is shown by his statements on oath—this man's solemn and deliberate and voluntary denial of that clandestine act should have altogether escaped their notice.

The warden and inspectors, confiding in the honesty of the clerk, proceeded to recount the votes. In this proceeding Bail did not participate, under pretense of being unwell. While the officers were busy at their work, he sat at the table carefully watching their progress. After a time an important error was discovered. A package of 28 votes, headed "the People's ticket," and indorsed as such, was found to be composed of votes on which the name of Alexander H. Rice was substituted in print for that of John S. Sleeper as candidate for Congress, apparently making an error in the declared result of 56 votes, and electing Mr. Rice by a plurality of 25.

At the annual election in 1862, besides the large number of "split tickets," there were three regular tickets in the field, namely, the Democratic, the People's, and the Republican. Each of these three classes of tickets differed materially in their general appearance from each other, but the names of all the candidates on the Democratic and the People's tickets were the same. Hence the conclusion was inevitable that a ticket which differed materially from either of the three regular tickets must have been a spurious ticket, and could not without inexcusable carelessness have been counted and indorsed as a regular ticket. These 28 tickets nevertheless differed in general appearance from the regular tickets which were distributed at the polls. "They were not similar in any respect to the People's or Democratic ticket," says the warden, in his printed statement, "but were dissimilar in every respect, having a vignette entirely different from any other ticket circulated at the polls on the day of election; neither was there any semblance in style, form, or print to any other ticket."

It can hardly be believed that the most incompetent officer in counting the votes on the day of election could have made such an important error as was discovered on the recount, and at a time when spurious tickets were abundant, and a deep interest was manifested in the result of the election.

A few votes of a character similar to those found in this package of twenty-eight were seen by the inspectors during the election, but none of them could say that the identical votes in this package or the package itself were ever before seen by them. The warden says: "I cannot, of my own personal knowledge, say that I ever before the evening of the second count saw those 28 votes."

The votes in the package in which the error was discovered were noticed by inspectors to have been unusually smooth and unwrinkled, a corroborative fact of no little significance. Notwithstanding this, and although it must have been manifest that a package of spurious votes could easily have been substituted between the 4th and 11th of November for a like number of genuine votes, yet no one at that time, after the solemn asseveration of the clerk, suspected the perpetration of a fraud.

A certificate was drawn up on the spot, signed and sworn to by the ward officers, and the party separated, little dreaming that Bail in the solitude of that attic chamber, on a Sabbath afternoon, with no human eye watching his proceedings, had examined those votes, and knew that before they left his hands they contained an error which he believed would change the result of the vote for member of Congress.

After the election the papers marked I and K remained in Bail's possession. Photographic copies of these papers accompany the evidence, and undoubtedly show the state in which the papers appeared when the copies were taken. They show that in several instances erasures or changes have been made in figures. Much importance is attached by the sitting member to these copies, as on the truth and validity of the papers marked I and K hangs his claim to the seat which he now occupies in Congress, a thread slender and fragile in itself, but which has been so magnified and twisted as to assume the deceptive appearance of a cable of colossal proportions; but which I trust will not prove strong enough to shake from its solid foundation and bear away into the regions of error the southern wing of the Capitol.

Mr. Speaker, it is clearly established that in the announcement on the blackboard in South

Boston at the closing of the polls there was a discrepancy of about 60 votes between the combined votes for Governor and the combined votes for member of Congress. This blunder was, of course, detected immediately and corrected. In correcting it the blackboard memorandum must have been then compared with the regular and systematic record of the count, and the mistake substantiated before it was corrected. The papers then agreed with each other, and the vote as it appeared on the paper marked K was declared in presence of the people. Before this blunder occurred there was no evidence of a discrepancy between the figures on either of those papers and the figures on the blackboard. This blunder was owing to the carelessness of the clerk in the addition of figures. Bail said so at the time. That there was any other blunder of about 60 votes at the close of the polls, on this blackboard memorandum, is an assumption too absurd and improbable to be entertained for a moment.

If an important error of 28 votes, making a difference of 56 in the result, was so clearly manifest in that paper on that Sunday morning, why was not that paper produced by Bail and exhibited at the recount? The carefully corrected record of the count was produced, but the blackboard memorandum was kept back. It was not ready for exhibition! Bail of course refrained from laying it before the ward officers; and the officers, regarding it as a piece of waste paper, expressed no wish to examine it. The other paper, marked K, was examined by the warden, and the castings of the figures found to be correct. Hence the statement of the warden, in the simplicity of his heart, that "the mistake was believed to be occasioned by an unintentional error on the part of the clerk." Nothing was elicited in the course of this recount which could have furnished Bail with a reason for suspecting an error in the blackboard memorandum or for calling on his friends for advice in consequence of an error discovered in that paper.

But a pretext was wanted, and there having been some "talk around" about the error of 60 votes on the blackboard at the close of the polls, Bail made that the pretext for calling on Mr. Gray. The language he used he would not state when on the stand, but he conveyed to Mr. Gray and Mr. Smith, gentlemen whose honesty in this matter is not called in question, the idea that on examining the figures on one of the papers he had found an error of about 60 votes, which if corrected would give the election to the Republican candidate. His statement to those gentlemen obtained easy credence. It confirmed the truth of rumors afloat; it corresponded with their own wishes, and was doubtless received without question.

And again, why should Bail have told such abominable lies to the ward officers as an inducement to those gentlemen to consent to a recount of votes, when the truth would have accomplished his object at once, when he could have taken the papers from his pocket, and furnished in a moment evidence satisfactory to them of the propriety of the measure? He could have done this without acknowledging the humiliating fact that he had the day before clandestinely fingered the bundle of ballots.

The warden and inspectors were honest men. Unconscious of guile themselves, they did not suspect it in others. An amended return was made out, but without the authority of law, and by the singular combination of proceedings, which I have described, and which I hope will never be cited as a precedent, Mr. Rice received the certificate of election. The plan was ingeniously devised and successfully executed. The papers were in Bail's possession. They could tell no tale. The votes were still in his attic. The man had done his work, and clamored for his reward. But when Bail found that the election would be contested, and the whole matter investigated before a commissioner, it became necessary so to prepare the papers and arrange the figures as to confirm his statements, and vindicate the propriety of his course in calling on his friends for advice. Something more than a pretext was now required; and Bail having been two years clerk of the ward, and familiar with votes as well as figures, was equal to the task. He framed his theory, prepared the papers, conned his lesson faithfully, and got it by heart.

These two papers, being the only memoranda of the count of votes on the day of election, were in Bail's possession not only six days before the recount, but more than four months afterwards, before they were brought forward as evidence. No one had seen them; no one had a copy of them; no one could identify them. Lithographic copies of these papers—not as they appeared at the close of the polls on the day of election, but as they appeared when produced before the commissioner as evidence—are affixed to this report from the Committee of Elections, giving an imposing appearance and a fictitious importance to that document. This trouble and expense was hardly necessary; for no one will have the hardihood to deny that those papers, after having been long retained in the hands of unscrupulous men, could exhibit any numbers of figures which might be fixed upon to secure to the sitting member a plurality of votes. No one doubts it, or ever can doubt it. It was a simple and easy act of legerdemain. Furnish but an inducement, time, and opportunity, and such deeds will be done by dishonest men every day.

While it would have been easy for Bail, or any other tolerable accountant, to make the number of votes, and the indorsements on the different packages, correspond to any figures in the papers, he could with equal ease with a lead-pencil and a piece of India rubber have changed the character of the figures in the papers from beginning to end; making them to conform to any number of votes in the aggregate, or any indorsements on the different packages. If 100 votes instead of a less number had been necessary to change the result, the figures in those papers would have been made to prove that the incumbent received precisely that number of votes, and the photographic process would have indorsed the falsehood. The man who held those papers was not the tool which knaves do work with, called a fool. He did his work well, and richly earned the promised reward from his employers residing in South Boston. And it becomes an important and interesting subject of inquiry, what was the character of this reward?

This George W. Bail, within four months after the election in 1862, received an appointment from the General Government to an office known and designated as postmaster at South Boston, and took the place of a gentleman who had held the office some years, enjoying the confidence of his fellow-citizens, and was summarily dismissed. For five months previous to the examination, Bail had been temporarily engaged as clerk and book-keeper at a lumber yard, with wages at nine dollars a week, before which he worked at his trade as a carpenter. The emoluments of the office to which he was appointed under the General Government are not less than $900 a year! This appointment, at that particular time, caused almost as much "surprise" and "talk around" in South Boston as the declaration of the result of the election on the 4th of November. And the question was asked, "Was this appointment procured for this man at this time as a premium for inefficiency and an aptitude for making arithmetical blunders in official matters where great care and accuracy are required, or as a reward for other services?"

But I will not enlarge on this point. To mention the fact is sufficient. I am not addressing unsophisticated men, who have faith in the purity of all active politicians. Indeed, everybody knows how these matters are sometimes managed in a community where party feelings rage uncontrolled, where the political excitement is intense, and one or two unscrupulous men of great wealth and almost magic influence assume to direct and control the politics of the people, and are determined to carry their point.

If intelligent men from abroad had been in South Boston soon after Bail received his appointment, and had listened to the "talk around" of honest citizens of all political parties, they would have seen that this appointment was everywhere regarded as a deep and damning proof of the fraud which was believed by nine tenths of the inhabitants to have been perpetrated on the ballots soon after election day. Bail, in his evidence before the commissioner, exhibited a deficiency of memory, prevarications and contradictions, which cannot by the most specious explanations be reconciled with honesty. And furthermore, he convicted himself of several falsehoods, which, even disconnected from a long chain of circumstances, cannot but destroy his credibility as a witness. Bail lied to the warden when he led him to believe that Messrs. Smith, Gray, and Dunham had of their own accord, without any suggestion or consultation with him, requested him to have a recount of votes. And Bail lied to the inspectors, each and all of them in detail, when he told them that the "talk around" or any "dissatisfaction" expressed outside was the reason why he urged a recount of votes. And Bail lied deliberately and audaciously to the warden and inspectors when he solemnly declared on his word of honor, on the evening of the 10th of November, that the votes had not been examined or seen by him until that hour, since the evening of election. These incidents, and others of a similar character, are clearly set forth in the evidence, and furnish premises from which a majority of the committee have adduced the following conclusions, namely, "that the testimony of the clerk of the board is uncontradicted, and his character appeared to be above reproach."

Mr. Speaker, I differ from a majority of the committee in their estimate of the character of this clerk of the ward. My knowledge of human nature, which from the various positions I have held in a long and particularly eventful life is extensive, leads me to believe that a man who will deliberately lie, or attempt to impose upon other men falsehood instead of truth, is not an honest man. I conscientiously believe that such a man is not to be trusted, that his character is open to reproach, that no confidence should be reposed in his statements, that he will have no scruples against changing votes or altering records to suit his purposes. Nothing but the fear of punishment or a regard for his reputation will restrain him from dishonest acts when it is for his interest to be dishonest. And if the rigid maxim of the law, "falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus," be justly as well as unsparingly applied to the credit of a witness who speaks with reference to any one important fact in relation to which he cannot from his personal knowledge of that fact be presumed to mistake, what an overwhelming influence this recognized principle must have to crush as with an avalanche the credibility of this clerk of the ward!

Mr. Speaker, from the remarks in which I have indulged, it will be seen that I contest this seat on no slight or unimportant grounds, each of which I contend is substantiated and sufficient to establish my claim.

In the first place, I claim that I was fairly and honestly elected to Congress, in strict accordance with the statute laws of Massachusetts.

Secondly, I claim it on the ground that abundant time and opportunity, all that could have been wished by dishonest men, were given for the perpetration of a fraud on the ballots between the day of election and the time of the recount.

And thirdly, I claim it on the ground that a fraud has actually been perpetrated by some person or persons since the day of election, by changing a package of votes and altering figures and indorsements on parcels and papers.

On the other hand, it appears by the evidence that the grounds on which the distinguished gentleman who occupies the seat which I dispute—and here I wish distinctly to state, whose whole course of action during the election in 1862, or in connection with any proceedings in this contest since, I believe to have been strictly upright and honorable—I say that the only grounds on which my friend bases his claim are the ipse dixit of the Governor of Massachusetts, the naked assertions of this George W. Bail, and the genuineness of all the figures which now appear on this black-board memorandum, entitled "rough count throughout the day." And let it be recollected that the genuineness and truth of this document rest on the testimony of this Bail, unsupported by any other proof whatever; while numerous facts, trumpet-tongued, cannot but destroy his credibility as a witness, and overthrow the whole weight of his testimony.

Mr. Speaker, I very well know that a man who makes a statement of a case in which he is personally interested is liable to be biased in one direction, and give a gloss to one side of a picture and a forbidding aspect to the other. All tribunals make allowance for such unconscious aberrations from the true meridian line. But in this case there are facts which cannot be controverted; facts which, without argument or comment, furnish powerful evidence of the justice of my claim. A few of these facts I will enumerate.

The laws of Massachusetts ordain that in the election of State, county, and district officers, the votes shall be received, sorted, and counted by the ward officers, and public declaration made thereof in open town and ward meeting.

The laws of Massachusetts in 1862 did not authorize a recount of ballots after the closing of the polls. They might be and often were destroyed on the day of election.

In 1863 the Legislature of Massachusetts enacted a law providing for the preservation and safe-keeping of the ballots after an election, and prescribing the mode by which a recount could be had by the board of aldermen, and only by that board.

The annual election in the third Massachusetts congressional district in 1862 was fairly and honestly conducted in all the various precincts.

According to the original declarations and returns made to the secretary of State for Representative to Congress in that district, John S. Sleeper was elected by a plurality of votes.

In ward twelve, George W. Bail, clerk of the ward, after the closing of the polls, took charge of the ballots. They were deposited in no sealed box or envelope, but tied in a bundle with an old handbill wrapped around them, carried to Bail's house, and placed in an insecure position in the house. A recount of these ballots took place six days after the election, at Bail's suggestion, and there was then found in the bundle a package of twenty-eight votes, credited to Mr. Sleeper, which should have been credited to Mr. Rice. An amended return of this result was laid before the board of aldermen, and the board, without investigation, sent this document to the Governor and Council, accompanied by a certificate giving no definite result, in accordance with law and usage, but merely stating that "if the amended return should be received as a true return" Mr. Rice was elected, and not Mr. Sleeper. The Governor and Council received the amended return as a true return, and, without asking a question, gave the certificate of election to Hon. Alexander H. Rice. A legal investigation subsequently took place at the instance of Mr. Sleeper in strict conformity with the law of Congress adopted February, 1854.

George W. Bail, clerk of the ward, was not only contradictory and shuffling in his evidence, but in his reasons given to the warden and inspectors for a recount of votes he concealed some important facts, and was guilty of bold and deliberate falsehoods. When Bail, at the time of the recount, placed the bundle of votes on the table, he solemnly assured the warden and inspectors on his word of honor that the bundle of votes had not been untied, and that then, in their presence, they were seen for the first time by his untying the bundle. On his cross-examination on oath, some months afterwards, Bail acknowledged that he did actually on the day previous to the recount take that bundle of votes from the closet, remove the handbill which was wrapped around it, and see those votes, examine those votes, finger those votes, and copy indorsements on different packages of those votes.

The papers, being the only memoranda of the proceedings during the election, and the bundle of ballots, were in Bail's possession six days before the recount, and several months afterwards, giving him abundant time and opportunity to change the votes, alter or erase figures on the memoranda, which were kept in pencil, or substitute other papers in their stead, and fashion the result at pleasure.

At the time of the election, in 1862, Bail was clerk of a lumber yard, at wages of nine dollars a week; within four months he was appointed postmaster at South Boston, with emoluments rising nine hundred dollars a year.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are some of the facts in this case, as they stand out boldly in the testimony and on the statute-book; facts which the most specious arguments, the most subtle reasoning, or the most powerful eloquence cannot explain away. And if the members of this House will carefully consider the various points presented by the testimony, I think they will see that the conclusions of a majority of the Committee of Elections are unsound, and that by adopting them they will not only do less than justice to the contestant, but open the road to a host of evils in the future. Let me not be misunderstood. In saying this, I mean nothing disrespectful or derogatory to the honor or intelligence of any member of the Committee of Elections, all of whom are gentlemen of high character and doubtless desirous of doing justice to all men. They probably view the subject from a stand-point far different from mine, but, nevertheless, being human beings, are liable to error.

It is manifest that in this case, which appears on the face to be merely the claim of an individual to a seat in Congress, or a contest between two individuals attached to two different political parties, important principles are at stake—principles which are closely connected with the rights of the people and the integrity of the Government; and the decision of the House of Representatives in Congress is awaited with much interest not only by the voters of the third congressional district in Massachusetts, but by all intelligent citizens in that Commonwealth.

Nor is the importance of this decision confined to Massachusetts. If the House of Representatives in Congress should sanction or encourage the doctrine that, after the return of votes made, declared, and recorded, according to the laws of the State in which the election was held, it may be disregarded, and pronounced null and void; if the House should set aside an election in consequence of a recount of votes in a single precinct several days after the result had been declared in presence of the people, and when, meanwhile, the votes had been kept in a loose and insecure position, inviting an attempt at fraud, a host of evils will inevitably follow. The House will not only sanction a course of action adverse to the spirit and the whole character of our Government, but establish a precedent which will subject future legislators to a vast increase of labor and responsibility. The declaration of no election at the polls can be relied on, as the result of a recount several days afterwards may be made by dexterous politicians to meet any case. If 28 votes are wanted 28 votes will be found. If 50 votes are wanted 50 votes will be found. If the doors of an office worth $1,000 a year are not ready to open to receive a new incumbent, an equivalent can be found in some other way. Bribery and other influences will be freely used to set at naught the verdict of the voters. Villainy will be pitted against villainy; and the longest purse or the most powerful political influence will carry the day.

Mr. Speaker, I was led to contest this seat, not by an ambitious wish to obtain the high honor of a seat in Congress, as all who know me will bear witness, but by a sense of duty to those who advocated my election, by a feeling of self-respect, which instinctively shrinks at the idea of tamely submitting to an act of injustice; by a wish to preserve the purity of elections and plead for the sanctity of the ballot-box, the corner-stone of a republican Government, and which should be kept sacred and inviolate, and guarded from even the possibility of being polluted by prying eyes or unhallowed hands. And whatever may be the result of my appeal, I feel that I have faithfully and conscientiously performed my duty.

And I ask the Representatives in Congress—surely it is not asking too much—that in deciding this case they will bear in mind the true question at issue, and base their decision not on the comparative political or personal merits of the two individuals who are directly interested, but on the merits of the case itself, and to say who, in accordance with the laws of Massachusetts and the decrees of justice is entitled to represent in this honorable body the third Massachusetts district.

Mr. DAWES. I call the previous question upon the resolutions.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; being first upon the following resolution reported from the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That John S. Sleeper is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district in Massachusetts.

The resolution was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the following resolution, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That Alexander H. Rice is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district in Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the votes by which the two resolutions were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

USE OF THE HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of this House be, and the same is hereby, granted for an exhibition of the pupils of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and the Blind, on Thursday evening the 10th instant.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FENTON. Objection has been withdrawn to my reporting a bill which I asked leave to report this morning, and if the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his motion to adjourn I will ask leave to report it now, and then renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LAW. With that understanding I withdraw my motion.

Mr. FENTON asked unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill (S. No. 66) to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports.

Mr. SPALDING objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. FENTON, (at half past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 5, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. STILES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message.

STATE SOVEREIGNTY AND TREASON.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with profound interest to what has been uttered in these discussions touching the present state of the Union; and I cannot avoid believing that the work we have in hand would thrive better if there were in the country and in this House less partisan conspiracy and more friendship for the national Government. Could every man prevail on himself to seek only what is best for the nation our work would become easy. Difficulties would vanish; the way before us would brighten; troublesome questions would grow clear; and our deliberations would be regulated by a power of wisdom transcending any force of debate or sagacity in applying principles. I suppose, however, it is not reasonable to expect this, considering that a vicious old political dynasty that has long controlled the Government is now in the last agonies of dissolution, and also that a struggle with supporters of the insurgent slave power goes on at the North, while the bloody conflict with that power is maintained in the South.

In the party of the Opposition, when the conflict began at Charleston, there were men who, rising at once above all partisan considerations, gave themselves unreservedly to the duties of patriotism. Others, taking the tone of disaffection, have sought chiefly to restore the so-called Democratic party by encamping around the disconsolate wreck of its national organization and howling at "black Republicans" and "abolitionists." But in that party is a controlling class of men who make us feel that, in sympathy and purpose, they are on the side of the rebellion. These are the northern slavery extremists, who long ago, forgetting or failing to comprehend the grand meaning of this Republic, brought themselves to act as if the slave power were really the fundamental law of the land. From the beginning they have insisted that the conspirators should be allowed to have their own way; and they now insist, substantially, that submission to the will of treason is the only desirable way to peace. They would withdraw our armies; they would send ambassadors to Richmond; they would do anything to accommodate the rebellion and save its leaders; they would lower the national Government to equality with confederate treason; they would substitute "State sovereignty" for both human rights and nationality; and they have been willing to put arms in the hands of the rebels, while seeking to restrain and weaken the Government.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Frazar Wood,] regarded as a representative of this class, describes the endeavor to defend the Union and crush treason by force of arms as "this hellish crusade of blood and famine," and he charges that it "was commenced without cause." Yes, he says, "without cause." This is talking as the rebel leaders talk, and it shows his relation to them. That opposition to the Government from this source, which came out so fiercely when the necessary measures against treason were first taken, only needed the atmosphere of Charleston or Richmond to become open rebellion; and its loudest fury has proceeded from those who always become honey-mouthed and overflow with "holiday and lady terms" when they talk of the southern traitors.

I propose to discuss this opposition of our northern slavery extremists, and consider particularly their disorganizing southern doctrine of State supremacy.

1. No observer of this contest has failed to see how constantly the measures of the Government against the rebellion have been met with denials of its right to use such measures, supported by appeals to what is called "State sovereignty." They have been denounced as usurpations of power that threaten extermination to "the sovereignty of the States;" it being the policy of this opposition to reduce and paralyze the authority of the national Government in all its relations to the doctrine and practice of the secessionists. The gentlemen who desire to be sent as ambassadors to Richmond are evidently ready to accept the latest form of the doctrine and make it the basis of their proposed treaty with the rebel leaders. They and their political associates have always accepted this doctrine in some form. It is presented to this House in such speeches as that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dawes,] who begins here now where he left off eight years ago. It is seldom absent from the annual resolutions of their party friends in the loyal States. A recent article in one of the chief newspaper-organs of these factionists, describes the national Government as "but the agent of the sovereign States," and goes on to declare that the aim of its party is to "maintain the sovereignty of the States," against "the encroachments of the Federal Government," which, it is charged, aspires to be something higher and more supreme than a mere agency of the States.

Sovereignty is the highest, the most absolute, and the most essential prerogative of a nation. It cannot rightfully be predicated of any political society or community that is not a nation. There cannot be, in the same nation, two sovereignties, not to speak of thirty or forty. The scope of the national Government is limited and defined by the Federal Constitution; but it includes everything necessary to the full establishment of national authority and power; and to this Government, and to this alone, belong the rights of sovereignty. The States of this Union have certain reserved prerogatives which the national sovereignty is bound to respect; but it is absurd to call them sovereignties, or to talk as if it belonged to them to assume and use the rights of sovereignty. Some other term must be employed to describe them, and it must be some term that cannot be made to deny the fact that they are only parts of a nation.

The States, whose people established this Government, never were, and never undertook to be, independent sovereignties. At first they were colonies and dependencies of Great Britain; next, by the Declaration of Independence, they became

United States of America; and both the Union and the Declaration are older than any State constitution—older than the Articles of the old Confederation. These two were the first things, all the rest being both subsequent and consequent. In the course of a debate that occurred June 29, 1787, in the Convention that framed the Federal Constitution, James Madison described, as follows, what the States were then, and what they had been previous to that time. I quote from Yates's Minutes:

"Some contend that States are sovereign, when, in fact, they are only political societies. There is a gradation of power in all societies, from the lowest corporation to the highest sovereignty. The States never possessed the essential rights of sovereignty. These were always vested in Congress. Their voting as States in Congress is no evidence of sovereignty. The State of Maryland voted by counties. Did this make the counties sovereign? The States at present are only great corporations, having the power of making by-laws, and these are effectual only if they are not contradictory to the general Confederation."

"State sovereignty" was never anything more than a dream of theorists. Under the Continental Congress, and under the old Confederation, it was sometimes heard of, but always as a pretense rather than a reality. It was asserted by a few able men when measures were taken to "form a more perfect Union." It was represented in the Convention that framed the national Constitution; and in that body its theories and propositions were discussed and rejected. Its pretensions were put aside deliberately, and with such emphasis that several of its advocates left the Convention in disgust. One of those gentlemen in the Convention who advocated extreme demands in behalf of the States was Luther Martin, of Maryland. In his address to the Legislature of that State on proceedings in the Convention he shows the determination with which the pretensions of State supremacy were refused; and Washington, in a letter to Congress, which every member of this House may read in his Manual, states as follows the reason why they were refused:

"It is obviously impracticable, in the Federal Government of these States, to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each and yet provide for the interest and safety of all."

Such disorganizing theories could not prevail then; but this doctrine of State supremacy has since been used to disturb and destroy the nation. Under the Constitution, persistent attempts to exalt the States above the national Government have usually come from the South, where slavery has claimed to be a domestic or State institution. Nowhere else have they found much encouragement. The slave interest has, very naturally, favored the most extreme pretensions in behalf of the agencies on which it has depended for support. Its safety and the secure growth of its political power required its devotees to maintain extreme theories of State supremacy. It is a very peculiar interest, peculiarly destitute of protection in the ordinary political arrangements of Christendom, and peculiarly dependent on the States that allow it existence and shelter. It is against civilization, and has nothing to hope from the sympathy or the good will of the civilized world. Its whole influence would, of course, be directed to support any political doctrine that could be used to exalt the States, especially the slave States, and secure to them the prerogatives of independent sovereignty, in order to use these prerogatives for its own security and aggrandizement. And so it has been.

For more than thirty years previous to the outbreak of this rebellion the term "STATE RIGHTS" had been used at the South as the watchword of disaffection and conspiracy; and it was admirably fitted for such use. "RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE" would not have served as well, would, in fact, have served to defeat rather than aid the purpose of the conspiring slavery extremists. Their aim was to deny the rights of the people and establish a slave oligarchy; and it was a clever artifice to use a loud clamor for State rights as a shield to cover the establishment of plantation despotisms in the States, and hide treasonable conspiracy against the nation; and the more so, because the fact that, under the national Constitution, certain powers are reserved to the States and to the people gave special plausibility and force to the term, even when used to indicate the most extreme and destructive theories. A careful history of this term, as used by southern politicians, with an accurate account of the different meanings they have given it and of the different uses to which they have applied it, would give us pretty much the whole political history of that part of the country during the last half century. In 1830, Mr. Calhoun and the nullifiers meant by "State rights" the right of any southern State, especially South Carolina, to nullify the authority of the Government. In 1851, Mr. Rhett, of South Carolina, used it to mean a right of any State to break up the Union; and by virtue of the southern theory of State rights he defined treason as follows, in a speech delivered in the Senate:

"Treason against the United States is a violation of allegiance to the sovereignties who established the system of government; and those sovereignties are described in the Constitution as the States. A person levying war against them, or giving aid and comfort to their enemies, is guilty of treason; showing distinctly that treason can be committed against them, AND AGAINST THEM ONLY."

Here is a doctrine that abrogates the national Government and bids everything go down before the pretensions of State sovereignty. In 1861 this treasonable doctrine brought forth secession madness, and filled the land with the bloody horrors of rebellion; and to-day, here at the North, the seditious organ of disloyalty to which I have referred echoes Rhett's doctrine, as follows:

"While obedience is due to the governments—to the Federal no more and no less than to the State governments—allegiance is due to the States alone, to each State by the citizens thereof."

And this vile sheet, edited and published by a member of this House, goes on to warn the Administration that the northern people, in support of this "State sovereignty," will soon be "massed right in its way" with arms in their hands.

II. Let us see how this revolutionary doctrine of the southern conspirators has been used at the North to aid them in the present conflict.

1. Not many of us have forgotten what use was made of it by President Buchanan. The traitors claimed for their States a right to trample under foot the national Government and break up the Union. President Buchanan allowed them to mature their plot under his roof and in his Cabinet; and, when they began openly their work of treasonable violence, he declared officially, in a message to Congress, that no power to coerce a seceding State, or to use force against the secession treason, had "been delegated to Congress, or to any other department of the Federal Government." That is to say, State sovereignty was the paramount thing, and the national Government had no right to defend itself. What more could treason ask than to have the Union thus delivered into its hands, paralyzed, defenseless, and bound for sacrifice by this devil-spun theory of "State sovereignty?"

It is impossible to think calmly of what President Buchanan might have done, but refused to do, to baffle the conspirators and make rebellion impossible. One downright word of executive authority, one lightning stroke of executive power, would have crushed conspiracy and sent treason howling into the darkness whence it came. There was the great occasion, but the miserable man occupying the presidential chair was not equal to it.

Mr. STEVENS. Can I call the gentleman to order?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's question of order?

Mr. STEVENS. If I can call the gentleman to order in committee, I make the point that he is calling my neighbor and constituent a miserable man. I desire to know whether that is in order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed in order.

Mr. STUART. I would like to know whether it was not the division of the Whig party between Fremont and Fillmore that elected Mr. Buchanan, and whether those who divided the Whig party are not responsible for his election!

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman that, inasmuch as I did not belong to the Whig party, I do not feel authorized to answer his question.

Weak, treacherous, and, from long-settled habit, the submissive creature of these assassins of the Republic, he had become incapable of such fidelity to his oath of office. There might have been special wonder among those who knew him well if he had not thus made himself responsible for the most inexcusable outbreak of treason ever heard of below the sun. History will do him justice, and will read to those who come after us wholesome lessons on his character; and the record of his conduct as President of the United States in the years 1860-61 may be put to good uses by those teachers of mankind who have the spiritual elevation, purity, and sweetness to draw a light of wisdom from the blackest record of infamy,

"Gather honey from the weed,
And make a moral of the devil himself."

2. The treasonable doctrine used by President Buchanan was immediately adopted by disloyalty throughout the North. It was just what the northern allies of treason wanted, and from that time to this they have used it at every point and on every occasion where it has seemed possible for it to obstruct any measure employed to "put down the rebels. Every effort of the Government to defend its own existence and beat down its assailants has been attacked with such disingenuousness and virulence as never before seemed possible to the most unscrupulous baseness of faction. Who has forgotten the howl that broke forth against President Lincoln when he issued that call for seventy-five thousand men to suppress insurrection? "What!" exclaimed our northern slavery extremists, "does he mean to coerce sovereign States? Is it his purpose to attack secessionism with force of arms? He will make havoc of State rights! It is infamous usurpation of power!" So ran and raged the turbulent stream of cursing; and it was amazing to see with what audacity of disloyal zeal northern apologists for treason sought to prevent harm to the rebellion by reducing the Government to imbecility.

The enrollment law furnished occasion for a still more striking illustration of the meaning of this factious opposition to the Government. The slavery extremists have very seldom intimated the possibility of State supremacy anywhere north of the slave line; and never unless to do so would benefit the slave interest. They have always one essential preliminary, or condition precedent, to any theory of the Constitution or of State rights they are moved to advocate. It must be a theory that will decide some question in favor of that interest, or in some way give it advantage over other interests. When slavery requires it, they support any usurpation of power against the free States. They were unscrupulous supporters of the infamous fugitive slave bill of 1850, although prominent southern men admitted that no power to enact fugitive slave laws had been delegated to Congress, while every honest advocate of strict construction denied that the Constitution authorized the Government to engage in the business of slave-hunting. They talked as if that bill were the special glory and joy of patriotism. They honored it with public meetings, processions, hymns, and hallelujahs. They actually fell into the habit of calling it "the Constitution and the laws." So, on the other hand, to break down the enrollment law, they set up a claim of sovereignty for the free States; and never was an act of Congress assailed with a more evident purpose of hostility to the Government. The whole vocabulary of vituperation was poured out upon it. It was denounced as tyrannical interference with State rights. For a time, conspiracy at the North believed it possible to stimulate opposition to this law to such fury as would break out in revolution. It produced a terrible riot in the city of New York, and caused violence and murder in several enrollment districts in different parts of the country; but this demon of faction was smitten down, baffled, and confounded by a spirit of loyalty in the people which it did not expect nor deem possible. That men who came forth from the dens of faction to foment disloyalty and revolution by accusing that law of trampling under foot State rights, and of clothing the Government with unconstitutional power, that they should sneak away from their failure into the most silent darkness, was very appropriate. That they should ever again talk as if they were patriotic, or have the hardihood to come forth again to mingle with honest people, and seek refreshment in the pure atmosphere and genial sunlight of northern skies, is one of the uncomprehended mysteries.

3. Let me point out another evil use made of this southern doctrine of State supremacy. It is brought forward to obstruct a reestablishment of the national authority in that part of the country which armed treason has disorganized. I shall not now undertake to determine every question relating to the present political condition of that part of our country formerly known in the Republic as the State of South Carolina. Of one thing, however, I am sure: whether it be now a State without a government, a land district in need of popular sovereignty, a howling wilderness of treason, or, if gentlemen prefer, a star in eclipse, or perhaps an exploded comet, it is, unquestionably, still a part of the nation. And the full authority of the national Government should be re-established there as soon as possible, without waiting to have it voted in, and without any consultation whatever with the rebel leaders. The national Government, representing and acting for the people of the United States, has a right of sovereignty in the whole insurgent section of the country, which nothing but successful revolution can abrogate. It is, therefore, the imperative duty of the Government to take possession of South Carolina, and of every other disorganized part of the nation, by force of arms, punish treason, protect loyalty, and provide there for the reestablishment of order, and for a regular enforcement of the laws.

But right here we encounter preposterous talk of the States as mysterious, indestructible, and sovereign entities, distinct from the people, and quite superior to everything else in our political system. The State organizations are set forth as the States, and in speeches and resolutions it is maintained that these organizations in the hands of the rebels are very sacred State "sovereignities." And yet how absurd it is, under any circumstances, to talk of a State organization as a fixed, changeless, absolute something, above the people, greater than the nation, and endowed with a sort of divine right to bind and control both the people and the national Government! And how wicked to talk as if an organized league of traitors could legitimately be recognized as a State in this Union! The political organization once known as the government of the State of South Carolina transformed and outlawed itself, and became an agency of treason, no more entitled to consideration than one of those organizations of "Knights of the Golden Circle" so much used by the conspirators. And yet for this club of virulent traitors is demanded not only the constitutional deference due to the loyal people of a loyal State, but also the prerogatives of sovereignty. The national Government is told to beware of touching the holy ground of State supremacy in dealing with it, and warned off from its duty.

It is, or ought to be, a maxim that the people of a State are superior to its institutions. It is their prerogative to make and unmake institutions. In our political system the word "State" means something more than a given section of inhabited territory, something more than a constitution and code of laws written on parchments, something more than any form or degree of political organization. Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says the word State, "in its most enlarged sense, means the people composing a particular nation or community;" and he adds that "the State, and the people of the State, are equivalent terms."

The disorganizing theory of State supremacy and prerogative must be flung aside, if we mean to uphold the Government and save the nation. Moreover, if the national Government have any right whatever, it has a right to assert itself against conspiracy and treason; that is to say, the right of sovereignty. We need not go to books and precedents for the law on this point. It is self-evident. It mocks reason and affronts common sense to urge upon the Government the doctrines and scruples of disloyalty, and bid it crouch and crawl before treason like a shivering imbecile. Its duty to establish and maintain its authority, and to secure order and a republican form of government in each disorganized State, implies legitimate power to do so. The power is there by what James Madison called "unavoidable implication," and explained in the Federalist as follows:

"No axiom is more clearly established, in law or in reason, than that wherever the end is required the means are authorized; wherever a general power to do a thing is given, every particular power necessary for doing it is included."

To this right of sovereignty the conflict with rebellion has superadded the right of war. In order to crush rebellion in the most effective manner the national Government may use either right, or it may use both together. It was decided in our courts, by Chief Justice Marshall and others of his time, and it has been reaffirmed since, that in cases of what Grotius describes as "mixed war," or war between a Government and a rebellion, the Government may have belligerent rights superadded to the right of sovereignty, and that in suppressing rebellion it may, with entire consistency, act in the two-fold capacity of sovereign and belligerent. But can it reasonably be doubted that in dealing with persons the right of war in this case must necessarily be modified and limited by that obligation of sovereignty which requires it to discriminate between loyal men and traitors? Let me explain here that by the national Government I mean all that is meant in the Constitution. The right of sovereignty belongs to the whole Government, and not to any single branch of it exclusively. The very idea of sovereignty implies not only executive power, but also the power that provides rules and regulations by which the Executive shall proceed. Hence Blackstone says:

"Sovereignty and legislature are, indeed, convertible terms; one cannot subsist without the other."

But it is not my purpose to discuss these questions. I seek only to show that the Government has no lack of legitimate power to deal with the rebellion, and also with the slave power, the baleful cause of our national trouble, as they deserve; and that it can recognize no legitimate obstruction to its operations in this southern doctrine of State supremacy.

There is very noteworthy significance in the fact that the disloyal crusade against the supremacy of the national Government is undertaken in behalf of the so-called rebel States, and not in behalf of the southern people. The organizations in the insurgent section of the country called "State governments" by the rebels are strongholds of the slave power and main defenses of its system of oligarchy. The slave interest demands reverence for them, agencies of treason though they be, and insists that it is a vested right of the rebel leaders, by whom they are controlled, to represent and bind the whole southern people. Should these foul nests of treason be crushed to pieces and swept away into the past to molder with the rubbish of the ages, the downfall of the slave power would be complete, and the southern people would hail the day of their emancipation. Power, in that section, would pass into new hands, and be used to promote interests of more importance to human welfare and prosperity. Here are the reasons why the slavery extremists everywhere interpose their doctrine of State supremacy between the Government and the rebellion. To gain peace, security, and a permanent restoration of the Union the Administration and its supporters would deal directly with the southern people, or with that portion of them who have not become traitors and public enemies. Northern friends of the rebels insist on having commissioners sent to treat with the "authorities at Richmond," or with the rebel authorities in each rebel State; that is to say, with the foremost rebel leaders; as if they had a representative right to speak for the southern people and control their political destiny. The difference is very great. Observe it carefully.

III. If anything comes out clearly, when we study these questions, it is that in this conflict the slave power or the Republic must perish. If anything has been learned from the history of our politics during the last thirty years, or if anything has been forced upon our attention by the events of the present time, it is that absolute extermination of the slave power is essential to the restoration and security of the Union. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] professes, very ungraciously, to accept the destruction of slavery as a fact accomplished. Will he do anything to make the country quite sure of this fact? Is the gentleman himself quite certain that slavery is already dead beyond hope of resurrection? At one season of the year in our northern latitude all the serpents appear to be dead; but when spring returns, with reviving influences, and the sun shines warm on the earth, the revived serpents crawl forth from their hiding-places as full of life as ever. Thus, I fear, would the slave power revive to more than its former vigor if that gentleman's party should be allowed to assume control of the Government.

The other day the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. YEAMAN], in a speech that seemed to me admirable for its candor and for its loyalty to the Union, although I cannot accept all the views he advanced, spoke of slavery as a "collateral issue," raised unnecessarily and exalted to "paramount importance." He might as well describe the part of Hamlet in the play as a collateral part, raised to paramount importance by injudicious players. Dismiss the slave power from the nation, and you dismiss the rebellion itself, and bring the American people the gladdest day of hope and peace they ever knew. New life, unity, and aspiration would transfigure the whole country. Give us this great confiscation and but little more will be needed. Can any gentleman study this rebellion and believe that such infidelity to free institutions and such treasonable rancor against the Government would have been possible in this country without long training in the school of slavery? Does any gentleman believe the work of restoring the Union would be either long or difficult if the hope of restoring the political power of slavery were dead and turned to ashes, even in every northern apologist for the traitors? Treason was bred by slavery, and its only supporters are slavery extremists, North and South.

What slavery has done to destroy the nation was foreseen as possible by the earnest men who founded the Government. They held that "slavery is inconsistent with the genius of republicanism, and has a tendency to destroy those principles on which it is founded." Such opinions of the men of that time are as familiar to us as household words; but they felt sure that slavery would soon disappear. Instead of disappearing it found unexpected life and vigor in the cotton-plant; grew to be a political power; transformed communities and States; taught men to mock at the Declaration of Independence and denounce its doctrine of equality and human rights as a "self-evident lie;" organized despotism and defiance of constitutional rights in every community subject to its sway; and, finally, perfected a conspiracy to dismember and destroy the Union.

We hear men talk gravely, now and then, of having again the Union as it was; that is to say, the Union with the slave power unharmed and in its old place; and some men talk on this subject as if it were possible to turn back from these years and results of bloody treason as one turns from an hour of engrossing amusement. They have not taken pains to comprehend the relation of the present to the past and to the future. "The Constitution as it is." Yes, until the people see fit to change it in a regular and orderly manner. "The Union as it was." This is not possible.

If we could go back to the past, and have again the Union precisely as it was under the slave power for some years before the outbreak of this rebellion, what thoughtful man would desire it in preference to going forward to something better? Is another thirty years' struggle with the growing influence, audacity, violence, and political atheism of the slave power something to pray for? A struggle in which the influence of slavery shall be the paramount consideration in our politics, and the supreme influence in the Government; a struggle in which every great interest of the country must be subordinated to the clamorous schemes of filibusters and slavery propagandists; a struggle in which nothing can make itself heard save the pretensions, arrogances, barbarisms, and anathemas of slavery, and which shall inevitably lead on to another terrible outbreak of conspiracy and treason—is a return to all this, instead of deliverance from it, something to pray for?

But we could not repeat all that if we would. That volume of our history is now at the close. We are about to commence another. The contents of this new volume, unknown to us now, because we cannot lift the veil that hangs over the future, will be determined by the result of this contest, and especially by the policy that shall regulate the restoration of peace. In the near future the nation will be "all slave or all free," a malignant slave despotism shaken by anarchy or an emancipated and magnificent Republic—one of these two. The issue has been made up for us by the slave interest itself, and we have not the power to change it. Henceforth, if we have the Republic at all, we must have it as it ought to be, as its founders meant it should be.

And so we shall have it! Darkness in this conflict will not be permitted to subdue reason and justice. Conspiracy and treason will be overthrown. The slave power and its worshipers will be crushed. The nation will triumph in this contest; and its record, in the volume of its history about to open, will become so grandly bright, and wear such splendor of true glory, that in all the nations it will be felt by those who revere freedom that the great American Republic at last fulfills the dream of its founders, and deserves recognition as the light and the hope of mankind.

AMNESTY PROCLAMATION.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman, some time since my very censorious colleague took occasion, while speaking to the confiscation bill then pending in this House, to address a portion of the concluding remarks of his speech specially and particularly to the four accredited loyal members of this House from the State of Missouri, making therein an accusation against them and his Excellency the President of the United States. First, that at the instance and suggestion of these four loyal members had an agreement with his Excellency to the effect that Brigadier General Schofield, who has been for a long time zealously courting senatorial favor, was unmercifully, unsparingly, and ungratefully abused, and his fond anticipations of the action of the United States Senate in his unmerited promotion had been blasted, and his Excellency the President of the United States entrapped by the bad faith of these four loyal members from Missouri. It is still remembered by Congressmen that my colleague did not finish his speech, but by unanimous consent of this House leave was given him to print, and it happened that the remarks alluded to are contained in that printed portion of his speech. I desire now to disabuse the minds of this House of the false impression made against me by my colleague. I would have been gratified to have done so earlier, but unfortunately in the pressure of legislation of much more important matters, after one or two ineffectual attempts to obtain the floor, I have patiently deferred to this moment, and promise to be brief and to the point, and with a few remarks only, on the amnesty proclamation, I will conclude.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared with primary evidence here at this Capitol, and will not ask leave to continue my cause to subpoena witnesses—as is frequently resorted to by astute attorneys as a dilatory plea in a bad case, or when they have neither law nor equity to prosecute or defend—to prove to the satisfaction of each and every member of this House, and even to my accuser, that we four radical members of Missouri are the only true representatives of the truly loyal, Union, devoted, sacrificing citizens and soldiers of that much-abused, ever-convulsed loyal State, the State of Missouri. I have, sir, the highest grade and most convincing, conclusive evidence known to this or any other civilized court or tribunal to fasten and rivet that so-much-complained-of declaration upon my colleague as an unalterable truth. Be ye not surprised nor astounded when I tell you, sir, that his Excellency Abraham Lincoln—who is an honest man, and a man in his official capacity I swear by, and to support, to as great an extent, if not greater, than my colleague—said in my presence, and to me, and will to-day, sir, reiterate, that his great reliance in Missouri was the radical Union men, and if the throats of either the conservatives or radicals of Missouri had to be cut, the radicals should be spared. Would I be presumptuous in beseeching my amiable colleague in all kindness of feeling of heart to be a renegade, doff the conservative cloak, and fit up in the paraphernalia and habiliments of radicalism under the amnesty before it is modified or forever suspended? I would warn my colleague that should his ambition for gubernatorial honors carry him to that exalted and honorable position, he had better be a radical, yea, a Jacobin, if he thinks the President intends ever to execute his will.

Again, sir, in support of our "very extraordinary and unbecoming declaration" "that we alone represented the loyal heart of our State on this floor," will my colleague but remember the fact that the only issue in all our State elections since the decapitation of Jackson was gradual or immediate emancipation of the slave, and perpetual confiscation of the real and personal property of Governor Jackson and his supporters; the conservative Claybanks for very gradual emancipation, and the radicals for immediate emancipation and confiscation? Now, sir, in these elections I assume as a fact that the radical party of Missouri never received one isolated single bushwhacking rebel vote, or constitutional Union southern sympathetic vote. I wish my colleague could say so much for his speckled progeny, and of all the men who honored him with their votes. The radical Union party of Missouri adopted the platform of the lamented Douglas, to which my friend from Kentucky alluded a day or so ago, that there now could be but two parties in this nation, Union men and traitors. The Union party of Missouri charged upon the conservative Claybanks a sympathy for rebels, because they did not advocate the immediate extinction of slavery in the State. Known then to us more clearly perhaps than to citizens of the free States that slavery in our State, protected by statute laws, was treason and rebellion, and until we removed it organized bands of rebels would make raids from their haunts and mountain-fastnesses into Union radical communities, robbing and murdering our citizens, young and old, quickly retiring or scattering to their homes, leaving a spectacle of ruined, undone, destitute women and children, all, sir, in consequence of our slave code, and still a majority party then controlling the affairs of the State would not assent to remove the war from our State by merely abolishing slavery. Who, sir, can, with such an array of historic facts, say that our declaration was extraordinary and unbecoming? Ask, sir, the Missouri volunteers, the militia of my district. Ask the wives and children of the officers and privates of my colleague's old regiment of his brigade, that I had the honor of enlisting three companies for—all ask of these gallant citizens and soldiers whether we are not correct in our declaration. Go to the ballot-box of the Missouri soldiery and find it almost unanimous for these four radicals. Sir, we might (I was about to say) have gone much further in our declaration consistent with truth and the facts before us.

Sir, I come now to that portion of the remarks accusing us of making a covert assault upon the President, with Schofield as a blind, alleging it to be an assault upon the President because the Schofield protest was presented to the Senate in open session. May I not, sir, give the history of that protest, and show how easy a member of this Congress can be mistaken, as well as how very particular members should be in making so grave and serious a charge as the one I have up to this time been a victim of, because I could not obtain the floor to disown and repel by incontrovertible evidence? That Schofield protest had its incipency at my suggestion; handed to the Vice President by me with the request that it be presented to the executive session of the Senate, and I doubt whether any Senator saw it or knew of its existence until presented in executive session of the Senate. I do not fear, sir, that any Senator will contradict this statement. May I now assert that that Schofield protest filled its intended and legitimate mission before it was brought to view by the honorable Senator from Missouri? That it did become public is true. And I can see no reason why all citizens of this country are not as much entitled to that information as they are to one of Newton's agricultural reports, with its pictures, or McClellan's report, with the letter of the President on page 43. I am not one, at any rate, to deprive them of it.

Now, sir, I cannot get my consent to believe that his Excellency ever accepted or offered to make a trade of a nature such as my colleague charges him with. I have and entertain a higher opinion of the President of this now powerful warlike nation, and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of over, perhaps, three quarters of a million of able-bodied soldiery, than to believe him capable of such trickery. I will not charge my colleague with making a covert assault upon the President, and the four radicals of Missouri, the pitiful, miserable pretext, an assault most extraordinary and unbecoming. Sir, I am not, in propria persona, a party to this trade, and I merely conclude my colleague was imposed upon, as the great Benton was when he was induced to make an unwise canvass in our State for Governor,

These unfounded charges of infidelity preferred against me have not in the least lessened or estranged me from the President, for which purpose I conclude they were intended. I feel at perfect liberty to ask for favors for my constituency now, and expect to receive them, as I have heretofore done and received. Like all American citizens, I exercise my privilege and right to honestly differ with him, and I do differ widely and materially in some things, and one of which, allow me to say, is to have my colleague foreshadow his policy and defend him à la mode Don Quixote.

I am here, sir, by the order of a large Union majority of my district, and by their advice, my own convictions as a patriot, and devotion to my country, to support the Administration in a vigorous prosecution of this war to an honorable termination—honorable to every man, woman, and child in the nation, whether expressed or implied or not by the Constitution; if necessary ride over it in order to save and restore it in all of its beautiful parts. I am here, sir, to aid this Administration in the protection he is endeavoring to give loyal subjects everywhere and save the Government from the hands and power of the enemy; to vote the Government to the verge of bankruptcy in increased pay to all soldiers, State or national, who are fighting under the stars and stripes, if necessary. I am ready to do any act which should be done to preserve liberty and universal freedom, right or wrong. If it is revolution to do so, then, sir, I am a revolutionist; if Jacobinical, I am a Jacobin. I am here, sir, to give my humble and full influence in establishing and attaining that Missouri "cosmos," and make it national. Now, sir, what is my colleague here for? I have heard it said it was to vote against all Administration measures coming from this side of this House, to distract the Union element of this House, thereby preventing the necessary legislation for the comfort of our soldiers, and the means for the machinery of the Government so absolutely necessary to harmonize every department, acting no doubt honestly and in accordance with his superior judgment to a great extent with that side of the House who are opposing the proclamation of freedom, who are opposed to making negroes soldiers, who desire to make peace by appointing commissioners to treat with the insane confederacy and the reconstruction with political rights to traitors. I here rest this defense and exposition, knowing that a loyal constituency and a grateful people will correctly decide which of us is the Administration member.

Now, sir, my Lexington-district colleague, the member from Missouri—who was seen by this House to ever sneeze when my colleague from St. Louis took snuff—he is absent, afraid, perhaps, of the nine-gun battery commanded by a gallant Captain Dawes, and is understood to be in his case double-shot, and for prudential reasons has complied with the advice,

"He that fights and runs away,
May live to fight another day."

Without further remark to his satire and sarcasm, I will leave him in his wicked pilgrimage with the consolation to him that—

"The time has come, I knew it must,
When you and I should part;
But I ceased to believe when I ceased to trust,
And your trash did not pain my heart."

Mr. Chairman, we are aware of the fact that Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, by an insane act on the part of the State authorities of each of those States, revolted against this Government, and it must not be thought that we were deaf to the fact that a deep suspicion rested upon the loyalty of us throughout the free States, and in some localities and by some individuals we are yet wrongfully and ungratefully suspicious; and I am mortified, sir, that an intimation has been made on the floor of this House by my colleague from St. Louis district that our sincerity is questionable, because, sir, and only because we ardently and zealously support the Administration and are thoroughly radicalized in the free policy of this Government, and the most vigorous, unrelenting prosecution of this war to a speedy subjugation of every man, white or black, who opposes this Government. An unfortunate remark, if he, my colleague, is a friend to Missouri.

The amnesty is at least premature, if the exercise of that high prerogative of pardoning traitors, men who have without cause raised up in their might and power to destroy the Government that gave them birth, prosperity, happiness, comfort, and privileges, such as no other people enjoyed on this earth, and men who have invaded the happy circles of every family in the nation, and shrouded the portals of each and every habitation, rich and poor; men, sir, who are lost to all sense of honor and propriety, who hold no more the obligations of an oath with their hands upon the Holy Evangelists, sacred, who are steeped in crime, and are inmates of the slimy pools of perjury; men, sir, who are fit companions for murderers and the basest felons only.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amnesty as is now promulgated, and will ever in my pilgrimage on this earth oppose such an unwise and humiliating act of the present incumbent of the presidential chair, or any other.

Mr. Chairman, the loyal people of my State, and particularly my district, have gone through the fiery ordeal. They know by the most severe experience what it is to be loyal; they have felt the pangs and torture of an exile; they have returned to their once happy homes only to find them desolated and a barren wilderness. Here and there in their once pleasant yards they see a grave or two, the last and only evidence of a wife and an only child, brought about, consummated by these bad men who are pardoned.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amnesty, because it falls too heavily and only practically falls upon loyal citizens in these loyal slave States. May I say, sir, not intending the most distant reflection, that the people I have the honor to represent in this Hall are as loyal as the people of Massachusetts or any other State in this Union? Is it possible, Mr. Chairman, that you intend to place these bad men among us with the same rights, the same legal respect, the same privileges which we have sacrificed our all to perpetuate? Are you, sir, disposed to bring about by law a humiliation to the hearts and sense of the loyal people of Missouri in this manner, degrading to us? not that we are any better than other loyal people, but a shame, a blasting, withering shame to the lowest classes of humanity. You may, sir, you have, sir, the power to enforce obedience upon our helpless loyal people. Do this act, and the poet has well said in his couplet—

"The world, old as the flood,
For ages on ages has steeped that world in blood."

Is this the reward of loyalty? Is this to conclude this war? Speak, tell me so, and I have no further bright prospects of a great and powerful Government. Tell me that this is the basis of settlement with these bad men, and I will then know that I was sadly mistaken in the high measure of American honor, of American dignity, of American gratitude, of American courage. May I warn but not threaten? This amnesty is a mistaken mercy; and instead of having a good and wholesome effect, and that, too, at the expense of dishonor to the loyal people, it will surely kindle a spirit of opposition dangerous to contemplate. You may, sir, make bandits of the best men in the Government; you may relax the now firm confidence in the stability of this Government in all of its departments; you may bring about confusion and disintegration, so much desired by the bad men and enemies of this Government; you may change the whole machinery of this Government; you may blast the fondest hopes and anticipations of the millions in every quarter of this globe for the perpetuity of this free republican Government. Mr. Chairman, time will tell that these are no idle suggestions. An error now committed is more dangerous to this Government than all the armed rebels in the army of the South. I pray, Mr. Chairman, let us avert this danger by an appeal to his Excellency to recall, revoke, or modify. The loyal people of this Government are the owners of it, and I cannot believe it disrespectful in the least degree to ask his Excellency to do so.

The practical result of this proclamation of amnesty to traitors, the full pardon and restoration to all the privileges and immunities vouchsafed to soldiers and citizens of this nation by our form of Government, will harass and disturb the public sense and mind of loyal men, and may endanger the harmony and now comparative quiet of the people. No traitor will accept of its conditions who is a fit neighbor for you or me. We will get a few of the lowest order of men, convicts, deserters, cowards, robbers, such as are not fit to live and poorly prepared to die. Such will comply, and none others. My opinion is that this is a war of subjugation and exile. Thousands will flee the realm, and take refuge in foreign climes, while a large remainder will live in the southern States as marked traitors without political rights, and will be content with the experimental knowledge, "the way of the transgressor is hard." Another class of them, and by no means inconsiderable and insignificant, will live for many years, even after we have routed their armies and dissipated their great bodies of soldiery, and taken possession of the country; they will live in small compact piratical bodies in the mountains and swamps of the southern States, live, sir, for years after this war is concluded, and in spite, too, of the exertions of our Federal cavalry to destroy them.

The history of the war in the Missouri department brings to light the fact that about one half of all the rebels killed and captured had in their possession the solemn oath of allegiance to the United States Government. Ought the pardoning power be extended to so greatly debased perjurers? Is it safe, is it wise, is it justice to the soldiers of our Army? This amnesty I have long since believed was pressed upon the President—mercy as a pretext—but for an entirely different purpose. It was intended to operate in the State elections this fall; loyal men of Missouri were to be chained, manacled, and imprisoned, horse and dragoon, by the pardoned traitors. Yes, sir, the very men who destroyed the gallant home-guard army of our great chieftain of the West, the dead Lyon, are to be brought home again in our midst and rivet upon us slavery with all of its accompanying evils; our freedom convention is to be defeated, and our political power crushed. This may all occur, it may all happen, the ways and means are digested, and the conspiracy exultant; it may happen, sir, but my opinion is it will be a costly happening. What, sir, traitors of Missouri to be welcomed home to partake of the hospitalities of this Government and receive benefits therefrom! They may be induced back; if in my district, we have self-respect enough yet, and the will and determination at all hazards to meet traitors who they only should be met.

Mr. VOORHEES addressed the committee for an hour. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. ANDERSON next addressed the committee. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

DEMOCRACY REVIEWED.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, we have listened this afternoon to a very remarkable speech from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] I regret that he is not now in his seat, as I shall notice a few of his most extraordinary statements. One of his first utterances was that we are at the feet of a usurper. That is no small compliment to the President of the United States. He a usurper! Why, sir, we saw him, on the eastern portico of this Capitol, take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. That was not the act of a usurper; and all his acts are in keeping with his oath, in my judgment.

The gentleman also informs us that the Republic is dying. If it be dying, I desire to ask him how? Dying, if at all, by the acts of traitors in arms at the South, and of sympathizers on this floor, and in the northern part of the country, avowed Democrats.

He passed out of his way to traduce one of the generals of the national Army. He calls him "the monster Burnside." Why has that gallant officer drawn upon his head the vials of the gentleman's wrath? Is it because General Burnside was always in the front of his army and was ever ready to fight? A friend of mine who happened to have two sons in the Army once said to me that I should not talk so much against McClellan, "for," said he, "he is a man that I love." I asked him what he had done. The reply was, "He is a friend of mine. I have had two sons under him for many months in the Army, and they have come home without a scratch, thank God." That is the condition of the General himself. As I understand, he has never been in the range of musket-ball or cannon-shot; and he is worthy of the gentleman's compliments.

The gentleman from Indiana eulogizes Clement L. Vallandigham as a Christian statesman, Clement L. Vallandigham a Christian statesman! Why, sir, did we not hear him declare on this floor during the last session of Congress that he never had voted, and that he never would vote, a dollar to carry on this war? And yet he is lauded here as a Christian and a patriot. He was placed in the right position by the Government when he was sent among his friends at the South, and perhaps he is not greatly out of his right position now among the Tories of Canada.

He further asks, Has the Administration given us domestic tranquillity? I will tell the gentleman why we have not now domestic tranquillity. It is because the Government has been engaged in fighting the armed enemy at the South and at the same time fighting the insidious enemy in the rear at home. The people understand this.

The gentleman from Indiana has alluded to another pure-minded patriot, as he calls him, Mr. Alexander Stephens, the pure-minded patriot of Georgia. I grant you, sir, that Mr. Stephens is a noble Democrat after the gentleman's pattern; and why? Mr. Stephens has declared that the foundations of the southern confederacy are different from those of any other republic, its corner-stone resting on negro slavery.

The gentleman says that peace would come if the leaders on both sides would stand aside. Do the loyal people of the country ask that? Are twenty million people to bow down before six or eight million in arms, upheld by three million slaves? And yet that is the test the gentleman invites, which allies his votes given during this session of Congress to measures which in my judgment afford the highest gratification to the traitors' conclave at Richmond.

There is here, I know, nominally, a war and peace wing to the party in opposition, and the excuses found for inaction may be represented by the pleas of the camel-bird of the desert, known as the ostrich. Ask it to carry: No, I am a bird. Bid it fly: No, I am a camel. Thus has there been an alternation of excuses here save on the question of early adjournment for dinner and large appropriations of money.

We asked for a more efficient Army bill to at once fill up our depleted regiments in the field and early bring the rebellion to a close, and you delayed it weeks by denouncing the policy of the war and the tyranny of a draft.

The confiscation bill, with tender regard for the traitors, you pronounced unconstitutional, and by your votes deliberately asserted that they who have got up this "dance of death" should not pay the piper, and that there is more justice and statesmanship in securing the estates of rebel slave-owners to their children than to put their proceeds, as a measure of safety, into the national Treasury, and of justice in giving a portion to our brave soldiery and the children of patriots made orphans in our war of defense of liberty.

To the resolutions which I had the honor to introduce asking for more vigorous efforts to enlist acclimated colored men in our Army, and spare our northern mechanics and farmers to their industrial employments and their families, you made opposition; establishing this, that your prejudice against black men is stronger than the love for your white constituency, and shows your indisposition to use that arm of our power and the policy of war which the rebels so much dread.

The proposed amendment of the Constitution to blot out slavery by law met with some favor. These and similar acts give a denial to the assumptions so often made in behalf of a neutral party, a non-intervention party, a war party, or a peace party, being neither, but embracing all that is offensive in these designations, neither cold nor hot, proposing no direct intervention for liberty is its spirit; no war but with protection to slavery a condition precedent; and peace on any terms.

The rebel cause has been discussed by the gentleman from Indiana and others, and what more than a sigh can have escaped the peace-proposing friends across the Chamber that bankruptcy has become the second peculiar institution of the South? What terms of reprobation are heard for that society which under the instruction of modern Democratic Cabinet officials has reduced stealing to one of the fine arts; dignified perjury to the rank of the learned professions; and raised assassination to the keystone in the arch of cardinal virtues, supported by robbing of the poor and the rearing of their children for the shambles? None. The hope of the return of the traitors to the Union is found in the leniency of this Government to their institution for which they made war, and the restoration of Democracy to power is dependent either upon the defeat of our armies or the return of their allies of eleven States into the Union. Such is the party in whose golden circles are held the carnival of traitors, and so base and shameless is its political harlotry, who would not for the honor of his country rather go backward and hide its nakedness than name the party founded by Jefferson as recreant to its first principles and apostatized?

It vaunts itself, and only hopes for power by the calamities of our defenders, as hungry vultures are satiated when the long-watched and reeling brute falls to their prey. Was such the spirit of the early leaders? They were the statesmen who would not put the word slave in our Constitution; who meditated only that all our States should be free, and forbade slavery by law on the virgin soil of the Northwest. It brought us through the second long and bloody war with the mother country; it humbled the spirit of nullification, and, up to the invention of the cotton-gin and a profitable internal slave trade, it was a party of the people, a terror to official profligates, and the foe of oppression everywhere.

Later it turned to worship false gods, in declaration of war against the Seminole Indians to break up the rendezvous of escaped slaves in Florida; it made war on Mexico to extend slavery on fields unblighted by its curse; it enacted repugnant fugitive slave laws, and sought by the patronage, power, and finesse of two Administrations to force a slave constitution upon the State of Kansas; and its late disruption for slavery and the complicity of the northern wing in lending encouragement to the traitors is so clearly proven by the prediction of ex-President Pierce and promise to Jeff. Davis that the "fighting would not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely, it will be within our own borders, in our own streets, between the two classes of citizens to whom I have referred;" by the sympathy of the mayor of New York for Georgia by the detention of her arms, and the avowed opinion of Jeff. Davis that he should receive the substantial aid of twenty thousand men from that city, and the flocking of thousands of Democrats from the North to the standard of rebellion; facts taken with the declaration of General Grant that while a prisoner of war he was assured by prominent Democrats of Pennsylvania "that if the rebels would hold out a little longer they would be successful, for the Democrats of the North would arrest the war by defeating the conscription and otherwise render the Administration powerless to prosecute it," and the earnest support by this Congress of Vallandigham, the great sham hero leader, forebode, in the language of the last Richmond Examiner, trouble in the Northwest: "gracious buds of promise which with the approach of their elections may bloom and blossom into bloody fruit of revolution." Such are the hopes which Democratic dalliance and legislation, Golden Knights, and peace resolutions inspire. And is this the neutral or non-intervention party, the treachery of whose leaders has as truly passed into history as that of Judas, and whose apostasy to liberty is as shameless as that of Julian to the Christian religion? Yet before our soldiery, who know that the war has been prolonged and that thousands of lives have been offered up in sacrifice to love of slavery and of party, they fain, like Pilate, would wash their hands of guilt, when all "Neptune's ocean" could not wash their hands clean of the blood. Let me give later and specific proofs of the apostasy of the Democratic leaders; and my movement shall not be on the flank, but the center.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has addressed me his speech, and not having had an opportunity to notice it since I heard it delivered, I will make allusions to it as illustrative of the subject now under consideration. Being the member who, when many of us were school-boys, sat in this Hall, and is now the gentleman fertile in speeches, resolutions, motions, amendments, objections, and deemed an adroit leader of one wing of the party, and a presidential candidate, I commend his sentiments to those who are in doubt whether the Democratic party has apostatized or is dead. These are some of the gushing, patriotic utterances: "No Government has pursued a foe with such unrelenting, vindictive malignity as we are now pursuing those who came into the Union with us." That is the precise sentiment of Jeff. Davis and Brother Toombs, who telegraphed to the mayor about the arms detained in New York after Georgia had gone out of the Union, resolved to fight.

Here is a question: "I ask, in the name of the American people, when shall this hellish crusade of blood and famine cease?" A most complimentary allusion to the Government seeking to restore the Union, and to the soldiery in the field, and the braves who suffered and died by thousands without a tear or a groan for their country! These sentiments fully explain the bloody mob in New York in resistance to the draft, which the rebel press declared to be worth more than a first-class victory to their cause, which was fily led by Andrews, the Virginia Democrat, who from the color of his paramour was no anti-miscegen.

By resolution the gentleman styles this "an inhuman war," and brings the high-wines of his opinions into a single sentence, thus:

"This war must cease, I care not how, or from what cause, whether by exhaustion on either side, by southern submission or success, by mediation, or by northern magnanimity, or by northern sense of self-preservation."

And this is the plump sentence and sentiment of a member of the Thirty-Eighth Congress on a war which called for the sacrifice of hecatombs of men in that struggle where "resistance to tyrants is obedience to God." Indifferent whether peace is gained by rebel submission or success; whether the country is divided, and slavery made the corner-stone of an empire; whether traitors shall pay for their own music in this dance of demons, or loyalty shall pay for all; whether history shall adjudge the Government imbecile and our Army cravens and cowards, or our veterans return with victorious banners, having doomed slavery, and founded a nation so firm, so mighty and free that Heaven shall look down to see!

Sir, these monstrous, cold-blooded expressions of indifference from a northern peace party are more effective in giving that encouragement which prolongs the war than the temporary victories gained by rebels in arms. The chief traitor, before vacating his seat in the Senate, resented the denial that in the city of New York there were ten thousand men who would take sides with the South in a war, by a declaration that there were not ten but twenty thousand who would join them. This is well authenticated, and stands with the contemporaneous circumstance that, five days after the State of Georgia had gone out of the Union, and five months after an armed preparation to resist the Government of the United States, the gentleman from New York telegraphed to Mr. Toombs this language:

"I regret to say that arms intended for and consigned to the State of Georgia have been seized by the police of this State, but that the city of New York should in no way be made responsible for the outrage. As mayor, I have no authority over the police. If I had the power I should summarily punish the authors of this illegal and unjustifiable seizure of private property."

Judging by these facts and the sympathies of semi-secession sheets in the North, and the interest which the rebels have taken in the action of the Democratic party in State elections and by a majority in this Congress, no rational man can doubt that the peace Democracy have, by cavils, party threats, resistance to the draft, and the avowed indifference expressed by the gentleman from New York, earned more than the doubtful compliment bestowed upon the late Rufus Choate for his learning and eloquence that he made it safe to murder, and of the state of the gentleman's health thieves asked before they began to steal.

The gentleman takes shelter under the great name of Chatham, the advocate of the cause of the Colonies and friend of the race. Never was there a more violent use of the honor and fame of the dead; no, not the dimmest satellite can he be to our great friend, who would break fetters and not forge them.

Edmund Burke is another patriot whose name is invoked in this well-known language:

"Let me add that I do not choose wholly to break the American spirit, because it is the spirit which has made my country."

The quotation has no significance except interpreted to mean: I do not choose wholly to arms; the spirit of the slaveocracy-traitors in break for it is their spirit that has made my party, and it is to their votes that we must look for a restoration to power. So appreciative a peace-maker could reach the rebel capital without a flag of truce, and would be hailed by the pickets on guard as a brother. If the gentleman is to be appointed a peace commissioner, being so urgently pressed by the anti-miscegen gentleman from Ohio, (who finds himself in the Illustrated News posteriorly located to the Pegasus which his protégé is astride,) I shall make these a few of the conditions precedent to giving my vote for the appointment: that mausoleums for leading traitors shall not be built north of the Potomac; that New York police officers and United States marshals shall have immunity from punishment for detaining arms from Georgia rebels; and that until the scars of our soldiers are healed the funeral cortège and showy processions for pirates and military assassins shall be unattended with martial music and be kept on the by-streets.

Sir, I should not have discharged my duty as a member of this House had I forbore going to the verge of parliamentary propriety in expressing my detestation of sentiments uttered here which lead to distrust in our Army and strengthen the enemy in arms.

Our soldiers are properly sensitive, and when speakers with popular fame stigmatize their valor as "a hellish crusade," not caring whether the country is saved or lost, I will not be silent; nor can I refrain from saying that had the gentleman from New York kept his appointments in the State of Iowa the last autumn, and in the fourth district, which I am informed has furnished more than thirteen thousand brave men for our Army, exceeding the number furnished by any other congressional district, and uttered the sentiments announced in this Hall in any political gathering or on our railroads in the presence of soldiers with gaping wounds and wasted by sickness, much as they love freedom of speech and deprecate personal violence, I could only have been assured that his next political conferee would have been Charon, the ferryman, just preceding that welcome, "Hail! horrors, hail!"

Since the war with Michael and the Dragon in heaven, there never has been a contest where the character and purposes of the actors were so clearly defined as in this contest; yet here we must listen to tepid if not reasonable speech. Would such be tolerated in Richmond, where there is satanic sagacity? No; and I have authority for the opinion that such language uttered in the time of our Revolution would have branded its author as a traitor, and compelled him to seek a refuge "over the border" in that early elysium for outlaws and Tories; and had kindred language been uttered in a Roman senate, when her institutions were on trial, the speaker would have been hurled from the Tarpeian rock; but in the American Congress a characterization of our war as a "hellish crusade of blood" furnishes the latest type of peace Democracy.

Let me pass to the illustrative gentleman from Ohio, who is said to represent another wing of this party. The blood-hound leaps not more instinctively at the throat of the affrighted deer than do men reveal the hidden springs and purposes of action, having the voice of leadership and holding the reins of party guidance. And how stands the gentleman, not now the "Buckeye Abroad," but here, with almost pontifical authority, declaring that slavery is not to go into the next political canvass—as well bind Æolus stay the tide—and that his party is not pro-slavery?

Sir, the gentleman early in this session struck the keynote for his party by at once proclaiming his fealty to slavery and the apostasy of the Democracy. His act I might not have noticed, but that the officiating clergyman of this House was characterized as our amalgamation Chaplain; a gentleman, [Dr. CHANNING], whose name, culture, piety, professional devotion, and untiring ministrations to the sick and dying soldiers in our hospitals should have spared him an association in that political drag-net set for partisan purposes at home, and drawn with the grimaces of buffoonery in dilating on the miscogens. This significant act was the nomination and support of a Chaplain for this Congress, with attending circumstances that set forth in a strong light the apostasy of Democracy from the ancient faith. It was known that peace Democrats, acting as vestrymen in the State of New York, had forbidden the reading of prayers for our soldiers in the field in several churches; that Bishop Hopkins, of Vermont, had convinced Bishop Meade, of Virginia, of the right of secession; that the Vermont bishop had written a work on slavery which was published by a Democratic association in New York for the "diffusion of political knowledge," and circulated to influence the recent elections; and that the learned and devoted Bishop Potter, of Pennsylvania, had issued a pastoral letter with the purpose of counteracting the influence of this clerical outlaw, who is the only pastor known to have a charge in the northern States who declares God to be in favor of the slavery of the negro race.

The gentleman from Ohio desired a spiritual adviser for his party, and he bestows his compliments and suffrage with a consistency more becoming his acts than his professions. He goes up to Vermont, on whose sacred soil a slave never trod, where the hills and the rivers murmur only the song of the free, and where the grand old mountains rise so near heaven that they hold their breath in refusal to reëcho the voice of a traitor, and there compliments senility and apostasy by an insult to the memory and fame of Allen and Warren and every Representative and native of that State on this floor. His candidate obtained fifty-four votes for Chaplain.

This act may have a relationship to a church movement, inaugurated by bankrupt politicians who have discovered that there is now found no existing church order that is favorable to the growth of Democracy, and not wholly "given over to believing a lie;" there is yet compunction of conscience in having revived the courage of southern brethren in arms, where the late demonstrations in favor of McClellan for the Presidency are received with favor, and congressional peace propositions occasion exultation; they seek a way to heaven by the new church without passing through purgatory.

In the official call for its founding it is declared it is "for all lovers of freedom, and for Democrats who want the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is;" and being the first instance that venality and slavery have so openly called religion to their aid, it is reserved for an eminent martyr in Ohio to be intrusted with its temporal structure; and a gentleman of this Congress having with great sagacity indicated who should be invested with the bishopric, I shall not stop to dissent from the public acclaim that it is the "Olds Coxian church," but draw from the fact and incidents of its founding an illustration in support of my position of the apostasy of modern Democracy. It is the counterpart of the southern confederacy, of which Mr. Stephens, the vice president, says, "Its foundations are laid, its cornerstone rests upon this, that slavery is the natural and normal condition of the African." "This stone, rejected by the first builders, is become the chief stone of the corner in our new edifice;" and here goes up its counterpart, a northern Democratic church. With satanic intoxication, it is conceived in effort to perpetuate the curse of Canaan, and it is fit that the indecent exposure which led to the curse should have the attendant of drunkenness and profane cursing.

Brahman and Thug worship the monsters nearest in correspondence with their lusts and crimes. And in the founding of this new Democratic church, which has no parallel in blasphemy since the proclamation of Jeff. Davis for days of fasting and prayer, all the damnable paraphernalia of slavery, "with the Union as it was," will bring into use for material foundations slave-whips, pronged collars, heavy manacles, and branding-irons; and for the superstructure refuse auction-blocks and dilapidated slave-pens could be obtained in this capital which would lend a sad but historic interest to the enterprise. For the chancel, bones of victims offered in holocaust would be most appropriately used, and the keen-visaged upholder of "king cotton" opposite to the trained bloodhounds, the urim and thummim of the new temple, would give grand effect to the altar-piece. Emblazoned pictures of martyrs of both sexes who followed in the train of St. Vallandigham and Mrs. Onderdonk in angelic vestments should fill the windows, and busts in plaster might be set in the vestibule and corners to represent the mold-divine of those political devotees to the new church and their country who have made every sacrifice for them save by their tears, their money, and their blood.

Thus constituted, there being in all so much of the fitness of things in the poverty of the new enterprise, the non-elect chaplain, but called bishop, might dispense gratuitous service, and with kindred charity as a layman and admirer of the austere virtues of the prelate, and with a heart full of gratitude for the prospects of his Zion and clerical protégé without designation, who doubts that there would be a volunteer usher and sexton, who would involuntarily exclaim, "I had rather be a door-keeper to this new sanctuary of pure political worthiness than to dwell in the tents of abolitionists and miscegens?"

Sir, these facts, almost too base for a name, invite the satire of a Rabelais and the pen of a Swift, the literary prince and scourge of imposture and villainies; but without comment, as historical incidents they indicate as plainly the apostasy of the leaders who aspire to control the country as drifting flood-wood tells the course of the stream.

A true party in sympathy with the people, moved by common gratitude to the brave defenders of their country, would have been prompt in vindication of their rights by awarding to the citizen soldier the privilege of the elective franchise. Our volunteer army could have no interests alien to the general welfare. They were among the truest of our nobility, the pride of our Israel, and the superiors of the masses in patriotism and courage, having gone forth from the high and honorable walks of life our equals in rights as citizens, in intelligence and character as men. It ill became a great party to stand upon technicalities when the sacrifice and valor of our scarred and war-worn veterans appealed to our States for ballots to deposit in attestation of love for that home they were defending with privation, treasure, and blood.

How did the Democratic party meet this appeal, and what has been its record on this question when there was a possibility of keeping ballots from our soldiers since the rebellion began? The answers are unequivocal, furnishing the most conclusive evidence that the party leaders, who, in season and out of season, have vaunted their championship of the injured and the rights of the people, were fearful of the soldiers' verdict; and by their acts proved that they had apostatized from the early Democratic faith. Their claim, like the clear flash of the light, comes home to the mind of every legislator with many reasons for permitting our soldiers to use the representative ballot for one that could be framed for its exercise by the cooler-blooded stay-at-home citizen; and in lieu of arguments against their rights we have the jeers of the press, partisan votes in State Legislatures, the tricks of caucuses and most significant acts which I shall, as a chronicler of the time, combine to prove the recreancy of Democracy. Its base ingratitude, "sharper than a serpent's tooth," to our high-minded and sensitive volunteers, was expressed in preparation for the action of State Legislatures by the eminent literary oracle of the party in this language:

"The common soldiers have gone to the war for pay, the officers for honor and political purposes, and few, if any, moved by patriotism."

This base calumny was often repeated,

"For slander lives upon succession, Forever housed where it gets possession," with modifications by a venial press, biased courts, and influenced State Legislatures of doubtful loyalty; and that there was a proper appreciation by the soldiers of the issue and the nature of partisan scruples, is evinced by the returns of the last election, which show that out of 79,000 votes cast in six States the Union party had 82,000, and Democracy 7,000, varying from seventeen per cent. for the independent military candidate for Governor without a platform in Iowa, down to a per cent. so small in Pennsylvania, where General McClellan indorsed the Democratic candidate, that it cannot easily be computed.

With brevity I will give the record of States on soldiers' voting, beginning with New York. In the Assembly of that State in 1863 there was a tie party vote without the Speaker, and when the question of soldiers voting was first raised, eminent Democrats took ground against their right in the abstract, and afterwards denied them a vote on professed constitutional scruples. Governor Seymour, to avoid the issue, sent a warning note to the Union members, in disregard of which every member of the Union party in that Assembly voted to extend suffrage to the soldiers, and every Democrat voted against giving suffrage, and the Governor vetoed the bill.

In the State of Connecticut the Democrats of the Legislature of 1862 opposed soldiers voting, and in the Legislature of 1863, on the proposition for amending the constitution to remove all legal objection, every Democrat voted against its amendment.

The Democrats in the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania voted against extending suffrage to the soldiers in 1863; and the present year, while every Union member of the Legislature voted for the proposition, and have gained the boon, every Democrat was silent or voted against it. In the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, and Minnesota, where soldiers vote, the law was resisted with the same Democratic unanimity. In the State of Minnesota a notice of contest for the seat of one of the Representatives in Congress from that State was served on the ground of the illegality of the soldiers' vote. At the present session of the Legislature of the State of Ohio in contested-election cases every Democrat voted to unseat members elected by the soldiers, and a leader of the party opposed the law for the reason that "our liberties would soon be destroyed if the Army should be allowed to vote."

The State of New Jersey, being the only northern State where the peace party preponderates in the Legislature, scouts the idea of extending the elective franchise to her soldiers, and through one of her members insults our defenders by the presentation of a bill forbidding bodies of soldiers to approach within a mile of any place where an election is held in a city, or within two miles if held elsewhere. I am not advised of the action of any other State on this question save that which I in part represent—the State of Iowa. At the extra session of the Legislature in 1862 there was but feeble opposition to the soldiers voting, but almost the entire Democratic press deprecated the action of their party, and boards of supervisors in many cases refused to count the soldiers' votes, depriving Union men of the offices to which they had been elected; and against a verdict of near fourteen hundred votes the seat of a member on this floor from Iowa has, up to a very recent period, been contested on the ground of soldiers voting. To fill up the measure of political infamy the following resolution of the Democratic State central committee was adopted in 1863:

"Resolved That, as a measure of mitigating the abominable inequalities of the unconstitutional conscription act by which Democrats were sought to be forced into an abolition war which they detest, it is recommended that the ratification meetings to be held through the State on or about the 1st of August, do petition the county authorities to appropriate a sufficiency of the public money to commute the military service, or in other words purchase our freedom (as the rich are provided to do for themselves) of each poor white man who may be drafted in Iowa, and upon whose labor a family may be dependent for support."

The monstrous character and unmixed treason of this resolution is seen in the deliberate attempt to keep soldiers from the Army, that the rebels might triumph in the field, and their quiet accomplices at home triumph by the success of the Democratic party at the elections. It was nothing less than a proposition to tax the soldiers' farms at home; to detain men from coming to their rescue who were dying in the southern miasma and threatened to be overborne by the demons of secession in arms, as thousands of their comrades had been when outnumbered.

The fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson fired anew the hearts of the people, and the sick and the wounded returning in great numbers plead for men to fill the depleted ranks; and in most of our towns there were ladies' societies formed to supply the wants of the soldiers in the hospitals and in the field, and county boards of supervisors voted freely money to soldiers' families, and so delicate were these attentions that the recipients felt no degradation in receipting for money while husband or son was in the service of his country receiving the small compensation of the common soldier. These efforts were met on the part of peace Democrats by a system of secret organizations to discourage enlistments, and while individuals and counties were exhibiting such liberality and devotion, it was reserved for the only considerable Democratic county in the State (Dubuque) to exhibit a climacteric of baseness by a refusal to vote a dime to soldiers' families, and give their pittance only as to paupers asking for food and for clothing as protection from the rigors of a northern winter.

Such is a truthful chapter of the honors bestowed and the love shown by the Democracy for the valiant soldiers of the Republic. It has passed into history, while the undaunted Army like "The mower moves on, though the adder may writhe,

And the copperheads curl round the blade of the scythe."

A few facts incidental will show that this former party-hold upon public confidence is not lost without reason. Democracy is now controlled mainly by caucuses and the magic touch of political wires and cumbrous machinery, which must be lubricated by some Jew broker of the house of Rothschilds. Once the editor and the press were controlling, and, by calm discussion and the announcement of principles and approved historic precedents, new leases of power were given to the party ruling so long. How changed! That great lever, the press, most effective in organizing and consolidating public opinion, has passed into other hands—one lobe of the brain of the party has been struck with paralysis. Three fourths of the issues of the press, in quarterlies, monthlies, weekly and daily sheets, are for minds that will brook no neutrality, and abhor leaders in dalliance with an oligarchy. Thus to have lost a welcome to the shop of the mechanic and the kitchen of the farmer, such as the Democratic newspaper had so long, tells at once of the rising sense of justice with the people, and furnishes a striking commentary on party servility.

In close relationship to the loss of the press, that once powerfully ally of Democracy, is its alienation of our scholars and loss of control over the academies, colleges, and universities of the Union States. The sagacity of persons and parties in countries boasting of refined civilization and candidates for popular favor holds in high estimation the mute influence from classic halls and the molding philosophy of professors, which finds power and many voices in the graduates' love for their alma mater. Even Philip of the bloody Inquisition asked respect as a patron of learning, and the haughty Stuarts gave pledge with conditions that Britain's halls of science should be an attraction to the world, and Jefferson, on his retirement to private life, as a crowning gift to his country, founded an institution of learning, which he fostered as the child of his old age. He left the world sharing the gratitude of millions, whose memory is hallowed to-day not more as the founder and expounder of true Democracy than as the friend of the school and the college.

Were Jefferson now to revisit the earth and seek companionship in his dear old Virginia, he would find his rudimental ethics and political science disowned, and himself without a stranger's welcome to tarry for the night. The campus he planned would be seen a pasture for worn and decrepit cavalry, the college halls vacated by conscripted students to give room to a wounded soldiery falling in a contest so unholy that there was "no attribute of the Almighty" that could take sides with them in the contest. In his own county he would mark a relapse into barbarism; and, extending a survey over all those States where floats the old flag, he could not find a prospered academy, an endowed college or university controlled by, and a faculty in sympathy with, Democracy. The school-boy's history, tracing the course of subservency and the proffers of peace to rebels in arms made in that name which is desecrated by such association, thus invites the just judgment of the founder of Democracy, which posterity will repeat:

"The curses of hate and the hisses of scorn
Shall burden the winds of the sky,
And proud o'er thy ruin forever be hurled
The laughter of triumph, the jeers of the world."

Too long have I been detained with the party and its pretensions, which I leave in the charge of its once most eminent defenders, with this declaration by the London Times:

"It has pleased the Democratic party in the North, by an amount of moral cowardice to which history furnishes no parallel, to commit political suicide."

And this by the New York Herald:

"Its decline and fall are as much a matter of history as the decline and fall of the Roman empire."

Agreeing in this, a cheering fact, that its political control is reduced to a single State where slavery is not the corner-stone, that of "Camden and Amboy;" and further, that it is doomed to that abandonment in every loyal Commonwealth to which it is now left in that once Democratic-paradise, the State of Iowa; in the truthful, laconic lamentation of a member that their party was "reduced to just two sets of four-hand eucher," less than the insignificant few required to save a city of the plain from consuming fire.

The patient so far weakened by the prescriptions of quacks, this shall be our apology for tearless quietude in this hour of its spasm and the death-rattle—Medicamenta non agunt in cadaver—too far gone to test the virtue of medicines.

In my few remaining moments let us turn from the perfidy of party to that power in the divine alchemy which brings compensation for man's recreancy and the dire calamity of war. It was this bloody baptism and the pall of mourning darkening the skies which led the Government to bind the star of freedom on the nation's brow, and brought us the sympathies and inspired the hopes of the true democracies of the world, and gave us the favor of the God of battles. This acceptance of the arbitrament of the sword, with untold losses, has led to the awakening of latent energy and the development of national resource and wealth before unknown. Foreign nationalities now stand in awe and dread of our colossal strength. Their landless and unemployed peoples who have heard of our free homesteads, the pure air and free schools of the prairies, the acres of coal-fields counted by millions, the mountains of iron, a varied clime, and room for the industrial employments of a hundred millions of people, give us the promise of wealth and national resource which will make our war debt as but the small dust in the balance. We have seen our nation rising into moral grandeur, her soldiers the peers of the heroes at Thermopylae, welcoming with a smile the shortening of their earthly pilgrimage, in the thought that daring to die their children should find friends, themselves a remembrance, and their country honor and renown.

The fires of patriotism are burning with unwonted glow in the hearts of millions crowding our fairs and redeeming the time by toiling ministries. Woman makes cheerfully a richer offering for her country's weal than the gold from the mountain and the ocean's pearl by the gifts of her lord and her child, and meets as ever before the full wants of her country in its peril. By divine compensation the church of God has thrown up its royal highway for conquest, where there shall be neither tyrant nor slave, in that dawning era when the science and song of the nation shall be universal liberty.

Souls are blending in fiery raptures as we weekly learn of the fall of despotism in State after State, and listen to more than a presidential proclamation of freedom, the voice of God in our war, who "has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat." It is the grand upheaving hour of the ages, when centuries take voice to teach us history and bid us rebek justice for universal man. This done, and who doubts that the issue shall be an early and honorable peace? Then the later generations will learn what we forgot, that they need no Vulcan-wrought armor in a good cause, for mightier than the shield of Achilles shall be His promised help for the right:

"As on the fiery track of freedom falls the mild baptismal rain,
And the ashes of old Evil feed the future's golden grain."

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. It has been asserted upon this floor and elsewhere that thousands of lives have been sacrificed, millions of treasure expended, and an immense amount of property destroyed during this war. This I admit; but when the persons who make these statements go further and state that the Administration and its friends are responsible for it; when they assert that they are the cause of all this, I meet this last statement with a flat denial. All the fearful and ruinous consequences which have been attendant upon this war are chargeable upon the guilty authors of this rebellion. They are chargeable upon the traitors who, without cause or provocation, inaugurated this, the most wicked and unprovoked rebellion of which history gives any record, or which has ever disgraced any civilized nation on the face of the earth. They commenced this struggle to obtain for slavery the mastery over freedom, and to make the institution the corner-stone of a slave confederacy. There is no use in closing our eyes to the great fact, patent to all, that this is a contest between freedom and slavery. I take my stand on the side of freedom, and am glad to know that millions of the men of this country are standing on the same platform. I am also most happy to know that more than half a million brave men are found who are to-day fighting the battles of this bloody war for the maintenance of this Government and the freedom it secures. And they will continue the fight until the Government is maintained, and then this nation will become in fact and truth, as well as name, the land of freedom. They will continue to bear our nation's flag until it shall float in triumph over every State, over every county, town, and house, with none to oppose it in all the length and breadth of this restored, redeemed, and disenthralled Union.

The war on the part of the United States is purely and simply a war of defense—of defense against causeless aggression. This is certainly sufficient to arouse the energies and call forth the utmost efforts and sacrifices of the bravest and noblest people that ever lived on the face of the earth. On the part of the rebels this war has been carried on with an amount of vigor and obstinacy, with a degree of heroism, bravery, and self-sacrifice which would have done lasting honor to a more worthy and just cause. The resources of the rebels in men and means, in all the materials of war, have proved to be far greater than we had expected. The struggle has been more protracted, more terrible, and more destructive than in the commencement we supposed it was possible for it to be. But the courage, the devotion and patriotism of the American people have been equal to the emergency. The Government, for nearly three years, has conducted this war with a far-seeing sagacity, prudence, ability, and wise statesmanship which challenge the admiration of the world, and to which the impartial historian will do ample justice, however much political prejudices may blind the public mind at the present time. During all this time, in sunshine and darkness, the people have shown a high-toned, self-sacrificing patriotism and devotion to the country, and an aptness for military affairs which has no equal or precedent among the nations of the earth.

Notwithstanding the thousands of lives sacrificed, the hundreds of millions of treasure expended, and the vast amount of property destroyed, this contest has not been destitute of good results. These proud and defiant traitors have been humbled. It is true they have had their victories, but they have never gained one inch of ground. We have had our defeats, but our armies have never fallen back. We are to-day master of the whole course of the Mississippi; master of all the border States, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Louisiana. All that remains is to stifle the revolt in the narrow territory where it first burst forth, and back to where it has been driven in despair. It is true we have sustained reverses and disasters, yet the grand and brilliant triumphs which have been obtained by our advancing columns more than outweigh all of these reverses. Our blockades seals their ports, our flag waves in triumph upon the soil of every rebellious State. With defeated and demoralized armies, thinned by disease, death, and desertion to an extent that their merciless conscription cannot fill; with a worthless currency, credit destroyed, and their territory reduced to less than one-half of its original limits, the time cannot be far distant when complete success will crown our efforts, and the leaders of this foul and damnable rebellion will receive a traitor's doom and a felon's death.

Our advance has not been confined alone to our armies. During this three years of struggle, of mingled hope and fear, while these grand and magnificent results have been accomplished by our armies, the cause of freedom and humanity has not been standing still. We have been progressing. While contending legions have been engaged on the field of battle, the people have also been at work. A war of ideas has been in progress of vast and immeasurable importance to the future of this country and the cause of freedom.

Society has been stirred to its profoundest depths. The people have caught the inspiration of the hour. They have become convinced that slavery is a great wrong, and that it and freedom are enemies to each other. This great and important truth, which for a long time had apparently been overlooked by many, has flashed upon their visions, and, astonished at their former indifference or blindness, they have resolved and are now resolving that in this country in the future universal freedom shall become the rule and slavery the exception. It is hardly necessary for me to say that what the people have thus in their might and power resolved to do they will surely find the means to accomplish.

While this progress has been hailed with the most profound satisfaction by some, it has caused the most intense fear and alarm to others. In the destruction of slavery they see the dissipation of their political hopes and schemes of future political aggrandizement and greatness. For years slavery has been the great moving cause, the mighty influence which to a large extent has given strength and power, and which has enabled a certain party in this country to control the politics of the nation. In its destruction they see the overthrow of their most powerful ally. Hence all over this land when the strong arm of freedom in aid of this Government is stretched forth to strike the shackles from the hands and feet of slaves, you hear of opposition—of opposition to the war—of opposition to this progress of public opinion, and peace is proposed as the remedy for our national troubles. We are advised to compromise, to offer terms of conciliation to these traitors who are covered with their crimes and stained with the best blood of the nation. Such suggestions in my opinion are entitled to but little importance. These men have gone from us—repudiated their allegiance without cause or provocation. In their madness and passion they have raised the parabolic hand against the best Government the wisdom of man ever devised or the sun of heaven ever shone upon, and the nation has been shaken to its center under the terrible blows aimed against it. They have not only aimed to destroy this Republic, but upon a hundred battle-fields stained with blood and human gore they have attempted to murder its defenders.

Under these circumstances nothing but severe and well-directed blows, laid on with a firm and steady hand, will bring these hardened villains to a sense of the great wrong they are attempting to inflict upon this country and the cause of human freedom. "They are deaf to the voice of reason and the demands of justice." Any show of clemency on our part would be received by them as evidence of our weakness, and only strengthen them in their course of madness, treason, and folly. Any efforts at conciliation which we might make would be treated by them with ridicule, scorn, and contempt. Consistently with the honor and dignity of the nation we cannot offer terms of peace so long as they maintain their present hostile and defiant attitude against the Government. To do so we must virtually concede their independence, and that we are unable to cope with them in the field, and so it would be interpreted by other nations. From the commencement of this conflict the way to peace has always been open to them. It is open now upon the terms of submission. Let them lay down their arms and submit to the Government. Clemency toward the masses would then become a virtue. This they refuse to do: They demand the independence of the confederacy. Anything short of this they say they will not accept. Upon this point Alexander H. Stephens made use of the following language in July, 1863:

"As for reconstruction, such a thing is impossible, such an idea must not be tolerated for an instant. Reconstruction would not end the war, but would produce a more horrible war than that in which we are now engaged.

"The only terms on which we can obtain permanent peace is final and complete separation from the North. Rather than submit to anything short of that, let us resolve to die like men worthy of freedom."

These are their terms: to recognize this confederacy, to give up whatever they choose to take, abandon the Union men of West Virginia, Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, and Louisiana, in short of the entire South, to the tender mercies of the confederate leaders; this is what they demand. Does any man think this a safe course to pursue? In all the history of the past did any nation ever secure an honorable peace by showing her own weakness, and that she was unable to maintain herself in a just war? Are we prepared to say to the South, take back the forts which were ceded to us; wrest from us the Gulf States which were bought with a price five sixths of which was paid by our free population; partition our Territories; help yourselves to the public domain, and dedicate it to the withering and blighting curse of slavery; open and close the great Mississippi at your pleasure; do with us as you please; notwithstanding we outnumber you nearly three to one, we cannot resist you, we cannot defend ourselves? Who is ready to accept such terms, and sound the death-knell of this great Republic, so grand in its proportions, its aims and objects? I fear some such may be found, and I must invite your attention for a moment to the men who are engaged in this work of peace in the North.

Who are these men that demand peace, and are continually crying peace, peace, from the house-tops of this whole country? We sometimes in courts judge of the credibility of a witness by his character for truth and veracity. We judge in all the varied relations of life of men by the company they keep. We sometimes judge of a cause by the sort of men who advocate it. So in these times of trial and difficulty, when the life of the nation is at stake, we should judge of this cry for peace by the sort of men who are engaged in it. Are they friends or are they enemies? We should examine with some care these doctors who offer this remedy for the healing of the nation's infirmities. First among them, standing at their head, is Clement L. Vallandigham. Who is Clement L. Vallandigham? His history for the last two years all are familiar with. A convicted traitor; to-day an exile from his home and native State, in consequence of his crime against his Government in the time of its greatest danger.

In the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, on page 240, Thirty-Sixth Congress, second session, I find the following:

"And now let me add that I did say, not in Washington, not at a dinner table, not in the presence of 'fire-eaters,' but in the city of New York, in public assembly of northern men, and in a public speech at the Cooper Institute, on the 2d of November, 1860, that 'if any one or more of the States of this Union should at any time secede—for reasons of the sufficiency and justice of which, before God and the great tribunal of history, they alone may judge—much as I should deplore it, I never would as a Representative in the Congress of the United States vote one dollar of money whereby one drop of American blood should be shed in a civil war.' That sentiment, thus uttered in the presence of thousands of the merchants and solid men of the free and patriotic city of New York, was received with vehement and long-continued applause, the entire vast assemblage rising as one man, and cheering for some minutes. And I now deliberately repeat and reaffirm it, resolved, though I stand alone, though all others yield and fall away, to make it good to the last moment of my public life."

Standing upon the threshold of the fearful vortex which was about to engulf this nation in the commencement, even before the commencement, while the storm-clouds were gathering, in view of the approach of this rebellion which has shaken this Government to its center, he thus spoke. How has he spoken since? Let the sentence of that court which sent him into banishment answer. As a member of this House from the great loyal State of Ohio, while the earth trembled beneath the tread of hundreds of thousands of armed rebels, and the roar of battles that were to decide the fate of this nation was heard, how did he vote? What brave defender of this country has been sheltered, fed, or clothed by appropriations he voted for, though thousands have poured out their blood like water for the good cause, have given their lives that the nation might live, filling our land with widows and orphans? What single one of all these has been provided for by appropriations he sustained? What great measure calculated to aid the Government in its great work against traitors and treason received the sanction of his great name or the assistance of his powerful influence? The answer is short and conclusive: not one. And this man wants peace on any terms. He ought to. Peace may save him. God knows his patriotism never will.

Who stands next among these apostles of peace? The answer is upon every man's lips. We almost unconsciously and involuntarily turn toward the courtly, dignified, able, and polished gentleman from New York, the acknowledged leader of the other side of this House, and are compelled to exclaim, "Thou art the man." When this re-billion first burst forth, in its very inception, while good men stood amazed and aghast at the coming storm, while the old ship of State was shaking and trembling at its approach, with an imbecile or something worse at the helm, the South, in anticipation of the conflict, had purchased arms. They were then in the city of New York. They were seized by the police of the State. The gentleman was applied to for aid, and what was his response? Here it is:

MILLEDGEVILLE, January 24, 1861.

To his Honor Mayor Wood:

Is it true that any arms intended for and consigned to the State of Georgia have been seized by public authorities in New York? Your answer is important to us and to New York. Answer at once.

R. TOOMBS.

To this the mayor returned the following answer: Hon. ROBERT TOOMBS, Milledgeville, Georgia:

In reply to your dispatch, I regret to say that arms intended for and consigned to the State of Georgia have been seized by the police of this State, but that the city of New York should in no way be made responsible for the outrage.

As mayor I have no authority over the police. If I had the power I should summarily punish the authors of this illegal and unjustifiable seizure of private property.

FERNANDO WOOD.

It must be remembered in this connection that Georgia adopted her secession ordinance on the 19th of January, 1861, and this dispatch bears date the 25th of the month, five days afterwards, and after it was known to the gentleman and the whole country. Yet the seizure of those arms that were to be used by the rebels against this Government for its destruction and the murder of American citizens, he denounces as an outrage, as illegal. How did it happen that the leading conspirators applied to this gentleman? It must have been because of his known friendship and sympathy. It cannot be explained upon any other hypothesis. How much of patriotism and love of country is found in this dispatch? Let the gentleman answer and the country judge. Thus in the commencement this gentleman is found in the company and in sympathy with Toombs. And where has he been found since—upon the side of his country or against it? When and where has his voice either in the halls of Congress or elsewhere been raised against traitors and treason? What aid has he given this Government in the great work it is accomplishing? It is true, he and those with whom he has acted—the whole peace party—have been engaged in a war, bitter, vindictive, and relentless, but not against traitors. Their war has been against the Administration and the friends of the Government. While these have been fighting with all of their strength and power, while they have been struggling against the hosts of treason, the gentleman and those acting with him have been making war upon them and their measures. From the commencement, with all of his power, influence, and strength, in season and out of season, upon the floor of this House and elsewhere, the gentleman has opposed every important measure made use of to suppress this ungodly rebellion.

In a speech delivered in this House on the 26th of January last I find the following remarkable and extraordinary sentiment uttered by the gentleman from New York:

"This war must cease, I care not how or from what cause, whether by exhaustion on either side, by southern submission or success, by mediation or by northern magnanimity, or by northern sense of self-preservation. The war must cease. There must be an end of it sooner or later from one cause or from another. I think all will concede this. Admitting, therefore, this conclusion, the next inquiry is how, and when? These are the proper questions for this Congress to determine. When shall this war cease?"

What are we to understand by this? Is the gentleman totally indifferent to the result of this struggle? Does he not care how it ends, whether in success or defeat? Is there a man in all the North so destitute of interest in the nation's welfare? I have quoted the gentleman's language contained in his printed speech, and will leave it for his explanation and the judgment of the country. Certainly this gentleman is a fit companion for Vallandigham, and the two are fit and estimable advocates of peace while such sentiments are thrown broadcast over the country.

Sir, I am not willing under such circumstances to follow such leaders in such a cause—one already convicted of disloyalty and the other making rapid strides, as rapid as his superabundant caution will allow him, in the same direction.

With these facts I leave the world to determine whether these men are really friends. I have shown that the terms proposed by the South we cannot accept. Can you force others upon them except at the point of the bayonet and the cannon's mouth? It is impossible. In a late number of the Richmond Enquirer I find the following:

"It is all or nothing; the confederacy or the Yankee nation, one or the other, must go down, down to perdition; one or the other must forfeit its national existence, and lie at the mercy of the other."

This is the issue, the dread alternative. We must accept it. The people have already accepted it, and have decided that this fierce and wicked rebellion must and shall be put down by the force of arms; that the confederacy is the government that shall go down, down to black perdition. However the people may be divided on minor points, on this one there is great unanimity of sentiment, at least a large majority have determined that this rebellion must and shall be crushed, and this Government of ours maintained, let it cost what it may.

This is not mere impulse, but it has become a fixed and well-settled principle. They have become satisfied that unless this is accomplished not only will the Republic, founded upon the right of the people to govern themselves, be destroyed and anarchy and confusion follow, but the last hope of rational civil liberty, resting upon such right, perish from off the face of the earth. Our fathers intended that this noble structure, erected by them at such vast expense and sacrifice of life and treasure, should last forever, and be forever a free Government. They intended to secure for themselves and their posterity forever to the latest generation the perfect enjoyment of civil liberty, and at the same time make it sufficiently strong to maintain itself against all foes, whether they came from within or without. To consummate this they established State governments, sovereign in their own spheres and controlling their own local internal affairs. Over these they established a General Government which within certain distinct and definite limits should be absolutely supreme. It represents the interests of all in those matters which relate to the whole and involve the welfare of the whole. This rebellion seeks to destroy this power of the General Government. This the people have decided shall not be done. They have determined that this Government shall be maintained.

Many persons oppose this war and the policy of the Administration from an apparent distrust of its results. In case the rebellion is suppressed, how do you then propose to restore the Union? is the inquiry. Under existing circumstances, I have deprecated the discussion of this question. The rebellion yet exists in great strength and power. Powerful armies are in the field prepared to maintain the confederate flag and resist with stubborn bravery our advancing legions. The undivided energies of the whole nation should be brought against these rebels. All of our strength should be brought to the aid of our forces until this rebellion is crushed. All discussions calculated to divide and distract the friends of the Government should be discarded. But as the discussion has been commenced and will certainly be continued, and the necessity of settling some definite line of policy in relation to these States has been cast upon us by our opponents, I am not disposed to shrink from it.

It is claimed by some that the act of rebellion against the Government has converted those States into Territories, and that Congress has the power, and it is its duty to legislate and treat these States as Territories. I cannot indorse this doctrine. I find no warrant for it in the Constitution, nor in the relations of these States to the General Government. The Constitution has but very little to do with the States as such. It imposes no affirmative obligations on them. It does not depend upon them for the exercise of its powers or the execution of its laws. The people made that instrument, and all the powers contained and embraced in it came from them; therefore, as it emanated from them, there is peculiar appropriateness in its reacting back to them the source of all power in this Government. It deals with individuals almost exclusively. Under its laws are made, and every man within the scope of its authority must obey them. These laws are supreme, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. It is this feature of our present Constitution which distinguishes it from the old Articles of Confederation. That was a Confederation of States. Congress made laws for the States to execute. States instead of individuals were dealt with, and called upon for men and money and support in all respects. The result was that they could refuse support; in fact could amend the acts of Congress at pleasure.

It was found a very weak Government, and our present Constitution was adopted to form a more perfect Union. Under its laws are made to operate on individuals, and every man must obey them. It is true the States may in this connection be recognized, but if so it is only to prohibit them from interfering with the constitutional powers of the General Government. Whenever a State comes into the Union it must be done by the consent of the General Government, and every person in that State, whatever may be his allegiance to that State or whatever obligations he may be under to obey the local law, he owes allegiance and obedience to the laws of the General Government. His allegiance to the General Government is supreme, and his duty to obey its laws paramount. His State cannot release him from such obedience. If he refuses and resists he commits a crime against the Government, and his State cannot release him from that crime nor from its just punishment. No State can release a single individual from the power or the jurisdiction of the General Government, and if one individual cannot be released one hundred cannot, nor any other number, however large. No individual can sever his connection with and allegiance to the Government of the United States, nor can he absolve himself from the obligations to obey the laws, and what one individual cannot do in this particular no number, however large, can do. There is no way in which individuals can be released from their obligations to the Government but by successful revolution. The rebel States as such are in the Union, and must there remain unless successful in their rebellion.

As it is a crime for an individual to attempt to sever his connection with the Government, if States attempt it their acts are void. States, as such, in their corporate capacity cannot commit crime. Though every individual in a State may commit treason and deserve to be hung, the State cannot be punished. These States came into the Union by the consent of the General Government, and they cannot go out without that consent. Take the case of Florida. If you will examine the acts of Congress a law will be found admitting the State into the Union; also laws establishing ports of entry, collection districts, courts of justice, and giving those courts jurisdiction, and in a great many other respects there are laws upon our statute-books recognizing this State as one of the States of this Union. They are all in full force, unimpaired, as much in force to-day as they were three years ago, so far as this Government is concerned, and they will remain in force until repealed by Congress. The confederates could not repeal them. I will not say that Congress may not repeal these laws, and under the circumstances declare those States Territories; but so long as these laws remain in force the State is in the Union, and there can be no such thing as State secession. They will by the force of these laws remain States unless successful in their rebellion.

The acts of these States against the Government are void. We are prosecuting this war on this very principle—upon the principle that the acts of this rebellion are void. We are prosecuting this war to maintain the Constitution and enforce these laws. We are prosecuting this war to retain the rebellious States in the Union and compel obedience to the constitutional authorities of the Government. We must not repudiate this high ground by declaring these States are not in the Union. To affirm that the States are Territories we do this and destroy the moral force of our position. Intimately connected with this question we are led to inquire, in what relation do these States stand to the Government? What are the rights of those in rebellion, and how shall the governments of these States be reorganized and rescued from rebel hands?

The rebel States are still in the Union, but their governments have been unlawfully seized by traitors and usurpers hostile to the Union, and therefore cannot be recognized by the United States.

As already indicated, their acts are totally void, and not a single man in all these States has been released from his supreme allegiance. The governments of these States are suspended or in abeyance, and will thus remain until the loyal men through the aid and assistance of the General Government are enabled to hurl these usurpers from place and power, and control their governments. Then honest and faithful and true men will take the place of these usurpers; peace, with all of its blessings, will take the place of war with all of its fearful devastation; order will supersede confusion and anarchy, and the Constitution and laws will assume their rightful sway and jurisdiction.

The rebellion has assumed such proportions and magnitude that it is no longer an insurrection but a civil war. Upon this point I will refer to Mr. Lawrence's recent edition of Wheaton's International Law. In a note on page 522 I find the following:

"Publicists distinguish between popular commotion (emotion populaire) or tumultuous assemblage, which may be directed against the magistrates or merely against individuals; sedition, (sedition), applying to a formal disobedience particularly directed against the magistrates or other depositaries of public authority; and insurrection, (soulevement), which extends to great numbers in a city or province, so that even the sovereign is no longer obeyed; and civil war. Popular commotion, sedition, and insurrection are all State crimes, even though arising from just causes of complaint; every violent incursion being interdicted in civil society. These cases are always supposed to be susceptible of being suppressed by the sovereign; and it is usual, in doing so, to grant an amnesty in all but exceptional cases."

"A civil war is when a party arises in a State which no longer obeys the sovereign and is sufficiently strong to make head against him, or when, in a republic, the nation is divided into two opposite factions, and both sides take up arms. Usage applies the term civil war to every war between members of the same political society. If it is between a part of the citizens on the one side and the sovereign and those who obey him on the other, it is sufficient that the malcontents have some reason to take up arms in order that the disturbances should be called civil war, and not rebellion. The prince never fails to call all his subjects who openly resist him rebels; but when the latter become sufficiently strong to make head against him, to compel him to carry on war regularly against them, he must be contented with the term civil war. Civil war breaks the bonds of society and of the Government; it gives rise in a nation to two independent parties, who acknowledge no common judge. They are in the position of two nations who engage in disputes, and, not being able to reconcile them, have recourse to arms. The common laws of war are in civil wars to be observed on both sides. The same reasons which make them obligatory between foreign States render them more necessary in the unhappy circumstances where two exasperated parties are destroying their common country."

We need not rely upon elementary writers for law to settle this question. It has received the careful consideration of our own Supreme Court, a court distinguished for its great learning and ability, and it has settled this question beyond cavil or controversy. In a decision made in prize cases at the December term, 1862, upon this subject, they use the following language:

"This greatest of civil wars was not gradually developed by popular commotions, tumultuous assemblies, or local unorganized insurrections. However long may have been its previous conception, it nevertheless sprang forth suddenly from the parent brain, a Minerva in the full panoply of war. The President was bound to meet it in the shape it presented itself, without waiting for Congress to baptize it with a name; and no name given to it by him or them could change the fact."

"It is not the less a civil war, with belligerent parties in hostile array, because it may be called an 'insurrection' by one side, and the insurgents be considered as rebels or traitors. It is not necessary that the independence of the revolted province or State be acknowledged in order to constitute it a party belligerent in a war, according to the law of nations"—2 Black's Reports, p. 669.

Here these rebels are treated as enemies, enemies in war, engaged in an open war, a civil war. According to the principle enunciated in this decision these men must be treated and dealt with as warlike belligerents, and we must put them down by war prosecuted and conducted in accordance with the laws of civilized warfare. In this discussion this is a point of great importance and should not be lost sight of. They are no longer insurgents, but have raised themselves to the dignity of hostile enemies, enemies against the Government. They are not simply erring brethren, but enemies engaged in open warfare. Kindness to such would be cruelty to ourselves. The war against them must be prosecuted as other wars are prosecuted against open and avowed enemies. We do not and dare not treat them in any other manner. Prisoners captured we treat as prisoners of war, send and receive flags of truce, blockade their ports, and in all of our relations with them we act upon the principle that this is a civil war and that we are bound by the laws of war. Persons who talk otherwise and of peace, either misunderstand or misinterpret the nature and character of this contest. We are or ought to be the friends of this Government owing it allegiance and support, and its enemies are or should be our enemies. The friends of this Government are my friends and its enemies are my enemies, is the language of the patriot. We cannot advocate the cause of our enemies without justly subjecting ourselves to the charge of sympathy with them. Enemies of the Government they are our personal enemies, and we cannot defend them without rightfully subjecting ourselves to the charge of aiding and abetting them and their cause.

Another principle was also settled in the same case to which I have referred. The court differed as to the time when the war became a civil war; a majority holding that it became such when hostilities became general, and the minority holding it became such from the 13th day of July, 1861, the date of the passage of what is generally called the "non-intercourse act." All of the judges, however, agreed that from that date the war became a civil territorial war.

What then are the rights of those engaged in the rebellion from that date? This question is fully and authoritatively settled by the same decision. It settles the principle that from that date the Government was entitled to full belligerent rights against all persons residing in the district of country declared by the President's proclamation to be in rebellion; that the laws of war, whether that war be a civil war or a war between independent nations, converts every citizen of the hostile State into a public enemy and treats him accordingly, whatever may have been his previous conduct; that we may rightfully from July 13, 1861, exercise all the rights of war against the confederacy and the citizens thereof.

Such being the law of this country as settled by our highest judicial tribunal to determine the rights of enemies, we have only to refer to the settled principles of the law of nations. Some of these are very clearly set forth in the dissenting opinion of the judges in the same case:

"A state of war instantly converts the citizens of the two countries into enemies to each other. All intercourse, commercial or otherwise, becomes unlawful. All contracts, compacts, and treaties between them are annulled. It terminates and annuls all obligations of debt unless secured by subsequent treaty of peace. A civil war works all of these consequences, except that when the rebellion is suppressed the sovereign may treat the rebels as subjects and punish them as traitors."

It must then follow that when the war became a civil territorial war, for all the purposes of the war, all of the obligations and compacts existing between the confederate States and the Government as against the citizens of those States (they being enemies) were annulled and destroyed. The moment these men became belligerents and entitled to the rights of war as against themselves they ceased to be citizens entitled to the rights of citizens. They then forfeited their rights as citizens and became entitled only to the rights of enemies in war.

This forfeiture (which at least continues during the war) does not depend upon the decision of a judicial tribunal, nor upon any act of Congress, nor proclamation of the President, but it follows as the certain and inevitable consequence of their hostile position against the Government. Nor can any act of theirs restore them to their rights as citizens. Having forfeited their rights without any fault of the Government, by their own wrongful acts, they can only be restored by the consent of the injured Government. They are enemies, and must be dealt with as such so long as the war lasts, and until pardon is extended to them by the Government, which may and should be extended to the deluded masses. Any other principle would work the greatest mischief and the most serious consequences. If a different principle were to prevail and govern them, the men engaged in this rebellion, with hands stained with the blood of murdered citizens, loyal citizens, might fill our halls of legislation, and control the legislation of the country. As enemies, the laws of war have swept away their rights as citizens, and substituted the rights of war. An enemy can have no right to take any part in our Government. That does not belong to an enemy engaged in a war against that Government. "While the laws of war destroy all claims of subjects engaged in civil war, they do not release the subject from his duties to the Government. By war the subject loses his rights, but does not escape his obligations." Vattel says:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and Government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as thenceforward constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Though one of the parties may have been to blame in breaking the unity of the State and resisting the lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact. Besides, who shall judge them? Who shall pronounce on which side the right or wrong lies? On earth they have no common superior. They stand therefore in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest, and, being unable to come to an agreement, have recourse to arms."—Vattel, page 425.

It would be folly and madness on our part to treat these traitors who have made themselves public enemies otherwise than as enemies. We cannot give them their constitutional rights as they existed before this war, and at the same time the rights of belligerents.

The two classes of right are incompatible with each other, and their rights as subjects are inconsistent with a state of war.

This position is due to no fault of ours. Though traitors, they are none the less public enemies; not foreign or alien enemies, as claimed by the able and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, but public enemies who, when the rebellion is crushed, the Government may punish as traitors. They have placed themselves in this position, and while they claim all the advantages which they are entitled to receive as enemies, we must enforce against them all the disadvantages which logically pertain to such position. Based upon these principles, the President rightfully, as a war measure, issued his emancipation proclamation.

"The end of war is to obtain by force the justice which cannot be obtained otherwise, and the law of nations allows the means requisite to the end."

Allegiance and protection are inseparable. As long as the subject is true to his allegiance the Government owes him protection, whether at home or abroad; but when the subject withdraws his allegiance and support which is due from him and takes up arms to enforce such withdrawal, then the Government may rightfully withdraw its protection. The Constitution is not in conflict with these views. As public enemies the rebels are outside of the Constitution. The war must be governed by the laws of war. The Constitution furnishes no guide; it establishes no rules for the government of nations at war; it fixes no standard by which we may determine the rights of our enemies. How shall we treat these enemies? What rights are they entitled to, and what may we enforce against them? These and all similar questions are not settled by the Constitution, but by the laws of war. The Constitution does not alter the law of nations; it is not in conflict with it. It is the basis of our Government, the foundation of our national life; and as a nation we must be subject to the law of nations.

The rebel States are without governments which we can recognize, and so must as an absolute and indispensable necessity be held under military rule until the United States opens the way for their restoration. There are no loyal governments in these States, and we must abandon them to our enemies, or, for a time, as we gain possession and control, hold and govern them by military power. Reorganization is an indispensable prerequisite to the exercise of their rights and powers as States in the Union. Without this they have no appropriate medium through which these rights may be secured. With governments suspended and disorganized, the protection of these States and the persons therein must be vested in the General Government, and so must be restored under the supervision and control and under the direction and authority of the General Government. This follows from the necessity of the case. The people of these States, under the laws quoted, are all enemies, entitled only to the rights of enemies. To the Government belongs the right and the duty of saying when and how they shall become otherwise—when and how they may again be entitled to the rights of citizens. I recognize the right of the people of the rebel States to govern themselves when purged of their disloyalty; but they are now laboring under a disability, and cannot rightfully act until that disability has been removed by the Government; and it is with the Government to say when and by what process she will remove it.

The people of the rebel States can exercise just those rights and none other which the Government may see proper to confer on them. Terms may be annexed to their pardon. It needs no argument to enforce and illustrate these principles. Necessity, absolute, overpowering, and imperative necessity, enforces them. Enemies must not be permitted, disloyal men must not be permitted, traitors against the Government, blackened with the crime of treason, must not be permitted to govern these States. The Constitution imposes the duty and obligation of guarantying to these States republican governments. This cannot be done if traitors and enemies are permitted to govern them. Some standard of loyalty must be established; some rules and regulations must be enacted under which and by which the loyal may be recognized and separated from the disloyal element, in order that pardons may be granted them and their disabilities removed. We have a new order of things. This must be met by such laws as are suited to the exigencies, and as will enable those who are willing to return to their loyalty to assume the control of their respective States. It seems to me there is no power in this Government better qualified to do all this than Congress, and to it in my opinion rightfully belongs this duty. I make no attack upon the President's amnesty proclamation. It has performed its part. It was a timely and wise measure, but will have fully performed its office when Congress legislates on the subject as is now proposed.

Slavery has shown itself the enemy of this Government, based on robbery and wrong. It has shown itself incompatible with the permanent peace, political welfare, and existence of this nation; and I have no desire to see it perpetuated.

I recognize the duty of so settling this fearful civil war as to secure the nation from a similar rebellion in the future. What slavery has done now it may do in the future if continued; and though I would not prosecute this war to destroy slavery, yet this war, brought about by the friends of the institution, is surely working its death. I favor giving it such a burial, a burial so deep and profound that it will never again be resurrected in this free land.

I indulge in no gloomy forebodings of the future. History tells us of many, very many long-continued and bitter civil wars, all of which were ended and peace restored; and so it will be with this. The war ended, slavery dead, this young nation will come out of the struggle with muscles hardened and strengthened by the fierceness of the contest; it will arise from it with energy and vigor renewed, prepared to leap into a progress far surpassing everything in our own history and the history of the world.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. ASHLEY, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Dawes reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the President's annual message, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAWES, (at five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned to Monday next, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 7, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented four petitions of citizens of Boston, and four petitions of citizens of New York, praying for an increase in the facilities for the transportation of mails, passengers, and freight between the cities of New York and Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of the American Geographical and Statistical Society, praying for the opening of negotiations for a commercial treaty with the empire of Cochin-China, as conducive to the interests of American commerce, arts, and agriculture; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the memorial of Alexander T. Stewart & Co., and Ball, Black & Co.; also, the memorial of E. A. Stansbury and J. B. Varnum, jr.; also the memorial of Coffin, Lee & Co., and Ammidown, Lane & Co.; also the memorial of R. Stuart Hill and Lewis C. Popham; and also the memorial of Lowther & Brother, Lewis H. Phillips, and many other citizens of New York, praying for an increase in the facilities for the transportation of mails, passengers, and freight between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. By request, I present the petition of Eli Thayer and others, praying Congress "to confiscate utterly and without reserve the lands of rebels, and to give of the same, without other formality than occupation, one hundred and sixty acres to each private in the naval service, and to each man in the rank and file of the Union Army, and of the rebel army who will take the prescribed oath of allegiance to the United States, and that the lands thereafter remaining be open to settlement under the homestead law." I ask its reference to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

It was so referred.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the construction of a bridge across the Republican river on the Government reservation at Fort Riley; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the construction of a military road from Fort Leavenworth, via Fort Riley, to Fort Larned, and an appropriation for bridging the same; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY presented resolutions of the constitutional convention of West Virginia, in favor of an appropriation to aid that State in emancipating her slaves under the act of Congress approved on the 31st of December, 1862; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. WILSON presented four petitions of citizens of Boston, praying for an increase of the facilities for the transportation of mails, passengers, and freight between the cities of New York and Philadelphia; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 1st instant, a copy of the report of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, under date of June 1, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 1st instant, a copy of the acceptance of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes" by the Central Pacific Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Portland, Maine, praying that a pension may be granted to Jessie Gould, widow of Daniel Gould, who was accidentally shot while assisting in discharging the guns and ammunition from the schooner Archer, taken from the Tacony pirates, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 150) for the relief of Jessie Gould, widow of Daniel Gould, of Portland, Maine. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILKINSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 59) extending the limits of the northern Indian superintendency, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the memorial of merchants and others, of Providence, Rhode Island, praying that the petition of the South American Steamship Company for aid in the establishment of postal communication with South America by steam vessels may be granted; reported in favor of printing the same.

The report was agreed to.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, No. 14, accompanying Senate bill No. 37, in relation to interference by military authority in elections in the States, to report the same back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to hear something about that report. I heard nothing of it before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate three thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, No. 14, in relation to interference by military authority in elections in the States.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think that resolution ought to pass.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let it lie over then, sir. I understood the Senator to agree to the report.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator is mistaken. I never heard of it before, to my knowledge, and I am on that committee.

REPEAL OF FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand extra copies of the report of the select committee on slavery and freedmen accompanying the bill to repeal all laws for the rendition of slaves, and also a resolution that ten thousand extra copies of the views of the minority of the same committee be printed for the use of the Senate, have directed me to report them back with an amendment as a substitute for both, and to ask its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That ten thousand extra copies of the report of the select committee on slavery and freedmen accompanying the bill to repeal all laws for the rendition of slaves, with the views of the minority of the select committee upon the same bill, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 151) relating to chaplains, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 153) to provide for the revision and codification of the laws of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill, without previous notice, to amend the act to aid in the construction of the Pacific railroad, that it may be referred to the select committee on that subject. I desire to say in connection with it that it does not entirely represent my views, but I introduce it simply that it may be referred to the committee.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 152) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 217) to confirm certain entries of land in the State of Missouri;

A bill (No. 290) for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott;

A bill (No. 291) granting an invalid pension to Esther P. Fox, widow of Augustus C. Fox; and

A joint resolution (No. 47) for the relief of Rev. W. B. Matchett.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank;

A bill (No. 19) for the relief of L. F. Cartee;

A bill (No. 39) to authorize the enrollment and license of the steam-tugs B. F. Davidson and W. K. Muir;

A bill (No. 81) to apportion the expenses of the levy court in the county of Washington upon the basis of population; and

A bill (No. 110) for the relief of John H. Shepherd and Walter K. Caldwell, of Missouri.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announcing that the President had this day approved and signed a joint resolution (S. No. 19) of thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine.

CONSTITUTIONAL MAJORITIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen and qualified.

Resolved, That if a majority of the presidential electors, duly appointed and qualified vote for one person he is the President.

Resolved, That if the election of President devolves upon the House of Representatives and the votes of a majority of the States represented in the House be cast for one person he is the President.

I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does not the Senator design this as a joint resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; simply as a resolution of the Senate. I will also ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection, and the resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF CAPTAIN FISK.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report of Captain James L. Fisk of his northern overland expedition from St. Paul, via Fort Abercrombie, to the gold fields of the Territory of Idaho, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the attention of the Committee on Printing to that resolution. I have been annoyed almost with correspondence on that subject. If the committee could report immediately it would save much trouble in correspondence. There is a great deal of anxiety to get the information contained in that report.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 299) to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes; and

A bill (No. 296) for the benefit of John Dickson, of Illinois.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1864.

NEW SERIES... No. 61.

twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 217) to confirm certain entries of land in the State of Missouri—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (No. 290) for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (No. 291) granting an invalid pension to Esther P. Fox, widow of Augustus C. Fox—to the Committee on Pensions.

A joint resolution (No. 47) for the relief of Rev. W. B. Matchett—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (No. 299) to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (No. 296) for the benefit of John Dickson, of Illinois—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

TREATY WITH OREGON INDIANS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the bill (S. No. 25) to authorize the President to negotiate a treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and other Indian tribes in southeastern Oregon, is now before the Senate as the unfinished business of the morning hour of Friday, the pending question being on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NESMITH. For the satisfaction of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] who desired the bill to be laid over on Friday last for information, I send up a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, March 4, 1864.

Sir: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of this date, inclosing Senate bill No. 25, (herewith returned,) providing for the negotiation of treaties with the Indians of southeastern Oregon, and stating that you would like my recommendations of the same.

I have no hesitation in stating that in my opinion no measure is better calculated to secure the people of Oregon against the hostilities and depredations of the Indians within their borders than is that now under consideration. Should this bill become a law, I believe it will be found practicable to negotiate treaties with all the tribes named in the bill, and through such treaties bring all the Indians now engaged in hostilities in Oregon under the control of Government upon fair and honorable terms, thus securing peace throughout the entire limits of the State.

I respectfully refer you to page 5 of the recent annual report of this office, also to papers Nos. 1 and 3 accompanying the same, which will more fully show the condition of affairs in Oregon as regards the Indians named in the bill and the urgent necessity that some measure should be adopted which will reduce them to subjection.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

W. P. DOLE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. W. NESMITH, United States Senator.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPEAL OF FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to take up a bill, merely with a view to make it a special order for a future day. It is Senate bill No. 141, to repeal all laws for the rendition of fugitives from service or labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated in his motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 141) to repeal all laws for the rendition of fugitives from service or labor.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, Mr. President, I move to make that bill the special order at half past twelve o'clock on Wednesday next. I will say, in making the motion, that I do not wish to debate it; I am not aware of any Senator on this side who wishes to debate it; and I hope we may at once proceed to vote upon it, and that before the morning hour expires the Senate may be discharged satisfactorily of that question.

Mr. DAVIS. I notify the Senator he may expect to have that bill elaborately debated.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. Then we may as well begin it early.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to beginning early.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to postpone the further consideration of the bill to, and make it the special order for, Wednesday next at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANT TO A RAILROAD.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to postpone all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 31.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 31) making a grant of lands to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, in the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY. I can only say again that I trust the Senate will not recommit this bill. I see no occasion for taking that course. We may as well dispose of it now. As the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has stated, there are no new questions presented to the Senate that have not been presented to that committee. I trust, therefore, the Senate will proceed with its consideration, and refuse to recommit it to the committee.

If the Senate will bear with me, I will read one or two paragraphs from a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, presented some days since, on this subject:

"That a railroad communication from the Mississippi river to the head of Lake Superior has for a long time been the subject of anxious solicitude with the people of the late Territory, and of the State of Minnesota, as rendering accessible and available to them what is obviously the natural outlet of a large portion of this State for its products to the eastern markets and shipping points on the Atlantic seaboard, and as being the most ready and only reliable means of opening up to emigration and settlement an extensive tract of country which will be traversed by such a road, and which, although possessing abundant resources, is now unproductive, and a mere wilderness.

"That the attention of Congress was directed to this important subject during the territorial existence of Minnesota, as early as 1854, during which year a grant of lands in alternate sections was made by the United States to the Territory of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of such a railroad; this grant, however, was repealed at the same session of Congress, in consequence of an unauthorized alteration in the draft of the bill, pending its passage in Congress, which caused an immediate repeal of the grant; that Minnesota was in no way implicated in this matter, and that this alteration occurred through the agency of individuals acting without the privity of the territorial government, as has always been conceded, and is clearly shown in the proceedings of Congress investigating the matter; the result to Minnesota, however, although entirely blameless, has been exceedingly disastrous, and but for the unfortunate circumstance causing the grant to be revoked, it is confidently asserted that such a road would have been, by this time, entirely completed and equipped. It is not inappropriate to state, in this connection, that at the time of the grant aforesaid, Minnesota was then in its infancy, not producing sufficient from its fertile soil for the consumption of its own inhabitants, and yielding little or nothing for export; that at a later period, and since its organization as a State, its agricultural resources have been developed in a ratio almost unparalleled, so as not only to yield abundance yearly for home consumption, but to leave a large surplus yearly of grain and other products for exportation; and that this line of communication, which at the early day referred to was of sufficient importance, by reasons of advantages merely prospective, to deserve the encouragement and liberal aid of the General Government, has now become a practical necessity to Minnesota, and its want is seriously felt as retarding her prosperity and the settlement of a large portion of her territory."

"This road, in connection with the Winona and St. Peter road, which it intersects, will on its completion drain one of the most fertile and populous portions of this State; its loss would be irreparable to Minnesota, and its final completion should be forwarded as a measure of national policy in connection with the construction of the proposed road to Lake Superior. That the completion of the rail road to Superior will stimulate the progress of the work on the line of the road located by the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company, and contribute greatly to the success of the latter, whereby ultimately a line of road will be secured, if reasonably aided, traversing the entire State of Minnesota from the great lakes to the Iowa line, in the direction of Sioux City, and ramifying through the fertile district of southern Minnesota, connecting at Sioux City with the projected branch road through Iowa of the great national railway to the Pacific ocean."

"Your memorialists would further represent that a liberal grant of land from the General Government, upon the usual conditions and limitations, to aid in the construction of this important work should be made, not only as a measure of equity due to Minnesota in the premises, but as an act of restitution for the grant of 1854, above referred to. Such action on the part of the United States would be in strict accordance with a well-settled and obvious national policy."

I will further state, for the information of the Senate, that this grant of land will after all convey to us but about three or four hundred thousand acres of land. The greater portion of the land since 1854, when the first grant was made, has been entered and occupied in various ways on the route between St. Paul and Lake Superior, leaving at this time, with the most liberal amendment that the Senate may choose to give us by this bill, but about four hundred thousand acres, equal in money value to about two hundred thousand dollars. The road will be one hundred and forty miles long; and it cannot at this time be constructed for less than three million dollars. This, then, is the only aid we ask from the General Government, some two or three hundred thousand dollars. As I said before, the city of St. Paul has voted $250,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to ask him whether there be a charter already granted for the construction of the road, and what are the termini of the route?

Mr. RAMSEY. There is an existing charter. The termini of the route are St. Paul and the head of Lake Superior. The Legislature is now memorializing Congress for the grant. As I stated before when this question was up, one of the great evils of which the people of Minnesota complain, and of which they propose to rid themselves, is the monstrous charge for transportation for our only surplus product which we ship east, our wheat. In 1862, the freight on it from Lake Michigan, either from Milwaukee or Chicago, was twelve and a half cents a bushel. In 1863 there was a tariff placed on it of eighteen cents a bushel; and the tariff agreed upon by the transportation companies now is twenty-six cents per bushel. This increase in the rate has caused considerable agitation, as is evidenced by the following extracts from some of our papers:

"Some excitement has been recently created among wheat buyers along the river by the announcement that the steamboat and railroad lines connecting the Mississippi with Lake Michigan had entered into a combination to increase the rates of transporting wheat from Winona and other river ports to Milwaukee or Chicago to twenty-six cents per bushel. We do not know whether the statement concerning the advance is correct or not, but if it is it will be likely to raise a storm which cannot be easily allayed."

In a recent number of the Winona Republican I find this:

"THE FREIGHT QUESTION.—It appears that the subject of high freight is agitating the business men of other river towns as well as this, and that initiatory steps are being taken to remedy the matter if possible. By concerted action on the part of our grain dealers and merchants, some plan may be devised whereby this combination of the transportation companies may be broken up. Whether the plan to meet in a general convention with representatives of other towns on the river, where a union of action of all interested could be adopted, would be the best means of accomplishing the object, we would not pretend to say; but it seems necessary that action of some kind should be taken immediately. Let there be a meeting called at an early day and opinions interchanged on the subject, and some mode of procedure adopted whereby all can act in harmony, resolved to effect a reduction of the exorbitant rates adopted by the combination of railroad and steamboat companies."

"The business men of Hastings held a meeting on the 13th instant, at which time the following resolutions were adopted. Should our people desire to cooperate with them and meet in the proposed convention, a delegation to the same should be appointed soon:

"Whereas certain transportation companies have entered into a combination, and have established an exorbitant rate of freights from all points on the Mississippi river above La Crosse to Milwaukee and Chicago; Therefore,

"Resolved, That we, the shippers and other business men of the city of Hastings, protest against that combination, and the exorbitant rates of freight established thereby; and we recommend the combined action of the business men of all the towns affected by such combination, for the purpose of making some arrangement by which freights will be reduced to reasonable rates."

"Resolved, That we invite the business men of all river towns on the Mississippi river above Dubuque, on the St. Croix and Minnesota, and in the interior, to send delegates to a general convention to be held at Red Wing on the 3d day of March, 1864, for the purpose of inaugurating some measures that will secure the transportation of freight at reasonable rates.

"Resolved, That H. H. Pringle be appointed corresponding secretary, and that he be directed to correspond with the business men of said towns, and invite their cooperation in effecting the object for which said convention is called.

"W. D. French, C. H. L. Lange, William Thompson, N. C. Draper, and S. C. Renick, were appointed delegates to attend the convention at Red Wing."

As I said before, we have for exportation to the East about three million bushels of wheat. The result of this new and direct route would be a saving to the people of Minnesota and the people of the East, because the saving would be divided between them, of $1,000,000 per annum. By the construction of these one hundred and forty miles of railroad to Lake Superior we should be enabled to take the cheap and long transit by water from thence, and in this way the saving would be effected. I hope the Senate will refuse to recommit this bill, and will proceed with its consideration.

Mr. HOWE. I very devoutly hope that the Senate will recommit this bill. I think there are very important questions which the Committee on Public Lands, from whom this bill comes, have not sufficiently considered. I think one of those questions lies in the very gateway to the consideration of this bill; and that is the question propounded by the Senator from Michigan—the question whether there is any such corporation in existence as the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company. I do not know that that question was not investigated by the committee. The chairman of the committee can state whether it was or not.

Mr. HARLAN. The statutes of Minnesota on this subject were referred to, I think. I did not personally examine the laws, and I do not know whether any member of the committee did or not; but they were satisfied that such a corporation did exist under the laws of Minnesota. I do not think any critical examination of those laws was made.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose they would have been satisfied of it by receiving a petition signed by the officers, and authenticated by the seal of a company, and I do not deny that there is a so-called corporation in the State of Minnesota professing to act under the style of the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, but I am informed that there is no such corporation existing by law. I am told that the franchises claimed by this company to-day were granted by the Territory of Minnesota many years before the State was organized.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator will allow me I will clear up all doubt on that point. The Legislature of the State of Minnesota within three weeks, in a memorial to the Congress of the United States, assert the fact; and the statutes were placed before the committee evidencing the existence of such a corporation. This is what the memorial says:

"Your memorialists would further state that this State has labored, and it is feared has so far labored in vain, to accomplish this same object; that a railroad company has been incorporated and organized under the laws of this State, under the name of the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, empowered to construct the railroad in question."

And they memorialize Congress to concede this grant.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know how the fact is; but I am told that the Legislature of Minnesota cannot make a company; and if it cannot create such a corporation as this directly it cannot create it by confession or by cognovit. I am told that the constitution of Minnesota actually prohibits the creation of any special companies for this purpose. I have not the constitution before me, and I have not examined it.

Mr. HOWARD. But I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to say just now that this charter was granted originally by the territorial Legislature of Minnesota. If so, it certainly was a good charter, and good under the State constitution; they could not repeal it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Michigan is entirely right in saying that if such a charter had been granted by the Territory of Minnesota it was a good charter when it was granted. I do not affirm that it is not a good charter to-day; I simply say that I am informed that the charter had been lost by nonuser; that all the rights created under the act of incorporation had been lost prior to the organization of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin, then, whether this forfeiture has been judicially declared, whether any court has passed upon the question of forfeiture or non-forfeiture; for he knows very well that if no court has decided the charter to be forfeited it is still a good charter in law, although perhaps possibly subject to forfeiture.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am not informed that any court in the State of Minnesota has ever declared that charter to be forfeited. I do not suppose that any such judgment is absolutely necessary. I am informed, however, that those interested in the company were so assured that the charter was invalid that they appealed to the Legislature of Minnesota since the organization of the State and obtained the passage of an act in derogation of the Constitution of the State reviving the charter. I am informed so; I do not assert it as a fact. Whether this information was before the Committee on Public Lands I do not know.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Public Lands thought they guarded this point sufficiently, so far as the United States Government is concerned, in providing that no land shall pass to the company until after twenty miles of the road shall have been completed in perfect order, and then only the adjacent sections coterminous with the completed portion of the road, so that if the company shall not build any road, they will receive no land—not an acre.

Mr. HOWE. How far it was necessary to guard the interests of the United States I do not undertake now to say, and how far the provision just stated by the honorable Senator from Iowa does guard those interests I am not now prepared to say. Against the established usage of the Congress of the United States, departed from I believe only in the instance of the grants made to the Pacific Railroad Company, which stand upon reasons peculiar to themselves, here is a bill that proposes to make a large grant of land, and a larger grant of land per mile than the Congress has ever made for any railroad purpose to a private corporation. I inform the Senate that I have information that there is no such private corporation existing under the laws of Minnesota, and it is one of the questions which I think ought to be examined either by the Committee on Public Lands or by some other committee.

Mr. WILKINSON. With the permission of the Senator, I should like to ask him a question. It is whether, if his position be correct that there is no such company legally constituted and organized in the State of Minnesota, it can take land under this grant; and if it cannot, will the Government be injured by the passage of the bill?

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President; if there is no such company, I do not think it will take much; but I do not think it becomes the Congress of the United States to grant land to men who simply pretend to be a corporation. Besides, I beg leave to remind my friend from Minnesota that I am not here to give information; I am here seeking for information. It is because I do not know how the facts are that I want this bill to go back to a committee which may be enabled to investigate and tell me what the facts are.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. If it shall be established by the committee that there is such a legal company, a valid organization, will he then support this measure?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir, not unless I forget myself. I can only say that in that contingency I should have one less objection in number to support the bill than I have at present; but I should still have other and insuperable objections if my information upon other points is correct.

Now I state another point upon which I want more information, and I want to get it through some committee, if any committee will take charge of the investigation; if not, I will look it up for myself. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Ramsey] appeals to the humane feelings of Congress to give his constituents a short and cheap outlet for their produce. I respond with all my might. Any facility which you can reasonably furnish to that gallant little State of Minnesota to enable them to get their rich and ever-increasing products to market give in God's name, and in the name of the United States; but I respectfully submit that upon my information the bill before the Senate is not intended to give any additional facility to the State of Minnesota. The Senator has presented this question to the Senate as if without this grant Minnesota was bound to send her products for all future time, as she has for all time up to this, down the Mississippi river and over the several roads leading through southern Wisconsin and northern Illinois. I am informed that such is not the fact. I am informed that the Congress of the United States made a grant eight years ago calculated to accommodate the very trade which the Senator from Minnesota wishes to accommodate by the building of this road—a grant to build a road not over the exact track, but right along the same line where this road is to be located, having one terminus at the same point on Lake Superior, and having its other terminus within about fifteen miles of St. Paul. I am informed, I say, that such a grant was made then, and that that road is in process of construction.

Now, I need not remind the Senate what difficulties have lain in the way of building new roads since 1856. We have had one protracted season of great commercial disaster, followed by a pretty big specimen of a war, and we have not had much time to build railroads. That railroad is not completed. I have heard it said here, I think carelessly said, that it has not been commenced. That has not been said upon the authority of the committee that reported this bill. I am informed that it has been commenced. I am informed that individuals have put large sums of money into the construction of that road. I am informed that twenty miles of the road have been graded. I am informed that the ties have been purchased for forty miles of the road, and that iron enough to lay twenty miles of rail has been purchased and is to be delivered in the coming spring.

I do not state these as facts; I state them as information which I derive from sources which I credit, and as information which I want to be laid before the committee and the truth or the falsity of it to be determined. If it is disputed here, I have not the evidence at hand to verify it. If it is disputed before the committee, the committee can determine whether it is true or false.

But I submit to the Senate that there is no possible necessity, and there seems to me no sort of propriety in the Legislature of the United States endowing two railroads to run along within sixteen or twenty miles of each other. Fifteen miles of road would place St. Paul, the southern terminus of the road named in this bill, in connection with Hudson, the southern terminus of the road already endowed by the liberality of Congress. My friend, the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. Wilkinson,] says twenty miles. I am told fifteen. Let the committee inform us what the true distance is. I put the question to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Ramsey] the other day, what would be the distance from St. Paul to Lake Superior by the way of Hudson. I did not get a very accurate statement. I am told that the distance between St. Paul and Lake Superior by the way of Hudson, will not exceed by a mile the distance between St. Paul and Lake Superior by the route contemplated in this bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. The distance between St. Paul and Hudson is from sixteen to twenty miles. The distance to Superior from St. Paul and from Hudson is alike.

Mr. HOWE. I am sufficiently familiar with the map to know that that answer is predicated on the assumption that St. Paul and Hudson lie upon about the same latitude or very near the same latitude; but the Senator from Minnesota knows very well that the line contemplated by this bill defects very much from a direct line and bends very much to the west. It is very much longer than a direct line, and it does not follow by any manner of means that because Hudson is fifteen or sixteen miles east of St. Paul it is therefore sixteen miles further from St. Paul to Superior by way of Hudson than it is by way of this road. There is a difference of opinion between the Senator from Minnesota and my informants as to the length of the two lines. Let this question go to a committee, and let them tell us what that difference is, if there be any difference. Do not ask the Senate to vote this large endowment upon your statement or upon mine. Give us the facts and give us the testimony which sustains those facts, and give it to us through the organism of a committee of this body, and give to that committee an opportunity which they have not yet had to know how far the vested interests of an existing enterprise are to be injured by this grant.

I think every Senator knows that if you inaugurate two railroads running within fifteen miles of each other they must necessarily be intended to accommodate the same trade to a great extent; and I think every Senator knows that they must seriously retard the success of each other. Capital will be a great deal more reluctant to invest in the road from Hudson to Superior because of the endowment of the road from St. Paul to Superior; and capital will be a great deal more reluctant to invest in the road from St. Paul to Superior because of the endowment to the road from Hudson to Superior. Get one road and then you may have another, if you find another necessary. Get one road at a time, and be content with one road at a time.

Mr. President, I hope my friends who represent Minnesota will do me the justice to acknowledge that I am advocating no narrow interest here. I simply find an enterprise already on foot, endowed by the liberality of the Congress of the United States, and through the influence of that endowment the capital of men invested in it to build a road running right through the section of country through which this road is designed to go. I say to the justice of Congress, "Keep your hands off that." The Senators from Minnesota say, "Do not do it, but on the contrary send into the market an endowment exceeding that made to the Hudson and Superior road by four sections of land to the mile; outbid in the market of the world the enterprise which you have already set on foot."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move to postpone the regular order, that this bill may be proceeded with until a vote can be had.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to postpone the special order of the day, which is the unfinished business of the last adjournment, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill now before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have already occupied as much of the time of the Senate as I ought to occupy upon this motion.

Mr. GRIMES. Do these roads continue all along only fifteen miles apart?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir. The road from St. Paul to Superior defects, as I said before, to the west, as I see by the map on which it has been traced. Whether there has been an actual survey or not, I do not know. At those points where it passes to the west the most, the distance must be more than fifteen or sixteen miles, but they run along in the same region of country. I understand the northern terminus of the road mentioned here is on Lake Superior without naming the point; but I understand the purpose is to terminate it at a place called Superior, a town on Lake Superior.

Now, in anticipation of a remark which has been made aside repeatedly, that we are rather illiberal, when Congress has endowed a road running through Wisconsin, to oppose a road running through Minnesota, I beg to say that I think the State of Minnesota is, on the contrary, a little too ambitious. She has a right to ask a great deal. I am ordinarily inclined to give her everything she does ask for; but in this particular instance she not only asks that we shall agree to a grant which will kill a road already in construction through our State, but that we shall consent to the cession of a part of our State in order to give them a terminus on Lake Superior within their own State. They really ask of Wisconsin to stand silent while a grant is being made to kill this road already in construction through our own limits, and then to consent to grant to Minnesota the northern terminus of the road, the town of Superior and the adjacent country, in order that Minnesota may have the road run through her own limits and terminate within her own limits. Sir, I conceive that this is asking a great deal of the magnanimity of Wisconsin. Wisconsin claims to be magnanimous, generous, bountiful; but she really cannot afford to sit still and be picked to pieces after that fashion. I hope some part of this demand will be surrendered by my friends from Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the first objection of the honorable member from Wisconsin to the particular bill which is before us to consist in the fact, which he supposes to be true, that there is no such corporation as is proposed to be the grantee. In the first place, in answer to that objection, I will say that if it be so the grant will be void and no title to the land granted will pass out of the United States.

But I have further to say to him, if I understand the facts, that there is beyond all doubt a chartered company now in existence. The territorial government of Minnesota had a right to charter a company such as this was, and in the execution of that right they did charter this company. That charter was not so limited in point of time that it has expired by virtue of that limitation. It is now as good as it was when it was originally passed, unless it has been in some way or other judicially or legislatively decided to have been forfeited. Nothing is better known to jurisprudence than that in all such cases nonuser or misuser of a corporate franchise does not terminate the franchise. That is a question depending as between the corporation and the sovereignty granting the charter. Nobody else has a right to complain of misuser or nonuser but the party granting the franchise. That party of course is the sovereign. It is therefore perfectly well settled that in all such cases of a right to forfeit, there must be a judicial proceeding in the nature of a quo warrantum or scire facias; but until that proceeding has been instituted and prosecuted to judgment as against the corporation, the corporation remains just as vital as it was on the first day it was passed.

If I understand the facts aright, and I am sure I do, so far from there having been any such proceeding on the part of the State of Minnesota, or upon the part of the Government of the United States before the Territory became a State, to forfeit the charter, the only proceeding on the part of the State which has occurred is one which recognizes the continuing existence of the charter. They have granted to the company their swamp lands; and although the State of Minnesota, by force of their own constitution, have no authority to grant a franchise, yet if a franchise has been granted by the Territory and is in force at the time the Territory becomes a State, they have a clear right to recognize the existence of the franchise.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire if he has had an opportunity of seeing the charter under which this company claims to act?

Mr. JOHNSON. The original charter?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have.

Mr. HOWE. Is it a perpetual one?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it is. I am not so sure about that. I was about to say that I had an opportunity of seeing it because I was concerned professionally in the questions which arose in relation to the validity of the grant to this company. The grant to the company which is about to be revived substantially by the present charter was held to be an ineffective grant for causes which it is not necessary here to mention, but for causes not affecting the company at all, or the integrity of the company. It was because of some proceedings which were supposed to have taken place in the House of Representatives at the time the bill was passed.

So far therefore as the particular objection that there is no such corporation as is proposed to be the grantee is concerned, a sufficient answer is to be found in what I have already said, that if there is not, no harm is done; but secondly, there is such a corporation, provided the territorial government had the authority to charter; and I do not understand that that is disputed. The only two governments which would have had a right to have that charter forfeited were the United States as long as the Territory was subject to the authority of the United States, and the State when the Territory became a State; and neither of those sovereignties interfered at all to vacate the charter.

I hold it, therefore, perfectly clear in point of law that the charter is now as operative as it was in the beginning.

Now, the honorable member says that the amount granted by this bill is a much larger one than has ever been granted before. I do not stop to inquire what would be the extent of the grant provided the lands included within the limits of the grant would all pass by force of the grant; but we have it already from the Land Office that there is only a limited portion of the lands which originally belonged to the United States within the limit of the grant, and the whole value of that portion which will be affected by the bill if it passes amounts, at the supposed value of the lands, to some two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HOWE. I have not seen that information. Does it come from the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the member from Minnesota to give it.

Mr. RAMSEY. What was that?

Mr. JOHNSON. That the whole value of these lands only amounted to about two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. RAMSEY. They are valued at two hundred thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, at the rate of fifty or seventy-five cents an acre. The lands along the line of this road having been in the market for twelve or fifteen years, the best lands have long since been entered, leaving only the inferior land remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I have understood. All the valuable lands, all that would be selected by those who wanted homesteads or had preemption warrants, have been taken up, and the lands that are left are comparatively valueless. They will become valuable, no doubt, if this road is made, and for the same reason that all roads of this description add to the value of the territory through which they pass.

Now, Mr. President, if this road promises to be of value to Minnesota, it is expending very little of the public money, if it can be considered as expending any, to give two hundred or two hundred and fifty thousand dollars worth of now refuse land. If I understand it, that country, which is now for the first time agriculturally open, has proved to be one of the best growing countries that we have within our limits. Its production is extraordinary. The great difficulty is not in raising the cereals, but in getting the cereals to market. If this road, or some road of a like kind, is not made, the farmers in Minnesota, who are now rapidly being increased by immigration, will have to travel some three hundred miles further to get to New York than they would have to travel if this road should be made. But not only is the distance very much increased by the route which they are now obliged to take, but the expense is much more increased than one would suppose because of the comparative difference between the distance of the two routes. These cereals cannot be carried over the railroad for less than some twelve or thirteen cents, I suppose. They are to be carried some one hundred and forty miles if this road is made, and the rest is by water communication. The difference between the price of transportation by railroad and transportation by water is the difference between some twelve cents and two and a half cents. That of itself is a very serious item in the profit of the farmer.

Wisconsin is not much to be injured, and she has roads in plenty of her own. She can only be affected—and that I am sure would not be a motive to influence her legislation or the conduct of her representatives on this floor, because they look, as they are bound to look, to the general interests and not to the mere local interest of the State—by the trade which may be taken away from their railroads and find a vent upon this route. That is comparatively little or nothing, except to the owners of the railroads in Wisconsin. The stockholders may be benefited; but I do not say that the State is very much benefited by having run through the State two or three million bushels, or more, of cereals. Nobody gets any advantage from a transportation of that description except the several companies upon whose roads the transportation may be made.

To deny this grant for the purpose of benefiting these individual stockholders in Wisconsin alone, when to make the grant is to benefit the growing State of Minnesota, and when the road for which the grant is to be made is entirely within the limits of Minnesota, would seem to me—I speak it with all respect—to be rather a narrow policy. I am sure the honorable Senator from Wisconsin does not think so. I am satisfied he supposes he is promoting the public good by his opposition to this grant. But I submit to him that if it was originally right—and certainly I am far from denying that it was right—as a matter of policy, that the Government should make grants to Wisconsin, and that roads should be made through Wisconsin for her benefit, it is equally right that the Government should make grants to Minnesota. She is now as it were but in her infancy, with a population, I think, of some two hundred thousand, or two hundred and fifty thousand, very rapidly accumulating. It accumulated very rapidly during the last year, and will naturally accumulate in a much larger proportion during the coming year because of the particular condition of the country and the prospect we all see is before us, and in which we cannot be disappointed, that immigration is very largely to be increased. Instead of having two hundred and fifty thousand, the amount I believe of her present population, at the next decade she may have a million. She will grow with the rapidity, and perhaps with greater rapidity than Wisconsin. It is better for us, therefore, I think, to provide in advance if we can, by granting these facilities to Minnesota, an additional inducement to those who may come within the limits of our country with a view of bettering their fortune, that they should settle in Minnesota. There will be enough for all, as I think.

I submit, therefore, Mr. President, that whether considered as a question of law, or whether considered as a mere question of policy, it is but just that we should pass this bill or some bill like it.

Mr. HOWE. I am very sorry to differ from the Senator from Maryland on this point; but I regret very much more to have him differ from me upon it. There evidently is a difference of opinion between us. Whether it is his fault or mine, I suppose remains to be settled.

Now, sir, when it is objected to the making of a grant of seven hundred thousand acres of land that there is nobody to take the grant, I do not think it is a good answer to that objection to say, if there is nobody to take it it will not go. I do not think it is a good thing for the Congress of the United States to make these grants upon the reflection that if there should be no such person in being as is named for the grantee, the lands will still belong to the Government. It is true the grantee will not get them if he does not exist; but it is true they go out of market; it is true they are withdrawn from sale and from settlement; and it is true they remain there on the hands of the United States waiting for the grantee to come into being; and you do not know how long they will wait. I do not affirm that this grantee does not exist. I say it is a matter over which I think there is grave doubt, thrown by the information I have. I ask the Committee on Public Lands what their information is upon that point, and they have not any to communicate. I ask the Senator from Maryland, who has been consulted professionally it seems by this company, what his information is on these points, and he has none distinct to communicate. Let us have some. So much upon that point.

The Senator from Maryland has surprised me by saying it is a narrow policy we defend here when we insist upon Minnesota sending her products to market over our roads and over the roads of Illinois. I thought I had advised the Senate sufficiently, when I was on the floor just now, that I insisted upon no such thing whatever. That is not the point of my objection at all. I had advised the Senate, as I thought, that no such consequence as that can follow from rejecting this grant; that if you withhold this grant there will be a road running almost over the identical line—and when you are talking about States and Territories it is sufficient to say over the same line—within two years. It is true it will run on the Wisconsin side of the boundary line instead of on the Minnesota side.

Mr. HARLAN. I know the Senator from Wisconsin will not intentionally mislead the Senate. The lines of the two roads—if he will allow me to state it—should the line of this road be located as indicated on the map, would be sixty miles apart in the center of the two roads, and on the west termini sixteen miles. The east terminus of each road is not fixed; but on the Wisconsin road it is fixed either at Bayfield or at Superior city with a branch running to the one or the other. The distance, therefore, between these two roads, if both should be built, will be greater on the average than the distance between the roads in Iowa and the other roads in Minnesota, leaving a space of about sixty miles between the two, and making it necessary for the farmers who may live in the center between them to travel about thirty miles in order to reach either road.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Iowa is quite right in saying I did not mean to mislead the Senate, and I will make the same remark in reference to him. It is very probable my remarks were calculated to mislead the Senate, and I respectfully submit his own are equally calculated to mislead the Senate. The Senator is entirely correct in saying that the southern termini of the road are about fifteen or sixteen miles asunder. I think he says sixteen miles. I had been informed that it was fifteen miles. He is entirely mistaken in saying that the northern termini of our road is either Superior or Bayfield. There are two roads provided for; one terminates at Bayfield, and one terminates at Superior, and they are not in the alternative at all. Superior and Bayfield are the termini of the Wisconsin road on Lake Superior.

Mr. HARLAN. We had the maps from the Land Office before us; and the committee is fortunate enough to have an ex-Commissioner of the General Land Office as a member of the committee, and I think he was in the office when this grant was to some extent executed. One of those roads is styled a branch road. If the trunk road should be built it would run to Superior; but if they should build the main trunk to the point of junction, and then build the branch only, there would be no road, of course, to Superior. There would be a road from Hudson, on the St. Croix river, to Bayfield; so that the committee, of course, is in no doubt as to the distance between the termini of the two roads at Lake Superior. I stated the facts as clearly as I could. I regret if my statement of them was calculated to mislead anybody. I had no such intention.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir, not the slightest intention, doubtless. One of the roads, says the Senator, is called a branch road. I have no doubt that is so. I have no doubt each of them is called a branch road, sometimes one and sometimes the other. Both are branches of other roads. That is the fact about it. But there are the termini, one at Superior and the other at Bayfield. The Senator says if they do not build the Superior road they will not have any outlet at Superior. That is very true. That fact will be known in two years; for unless the road is completed within about two years from this time, this grant, which was made to the State of Wisconsin, and not to a private company, will be withdrawn from the State. Now, sir, I say this and this alone is the point of my objection, not that you furnish railroad facilities for Minnesota, but I say they have those same facilities running over this road.

The Senator reminds me that a portion of the route on the Minnesota road will be sixty miles distant from the Hudson road. That only shows that a deflection of the Minnesota route is much greater from a right line than I had supposed. The northern termini being the same, and the southern termini being within sixteen miles of each other, if they get sixty miles distant during the road there must be a great deflection somewhere.

Mr. HARLAN. It is partly on both lines.

Mr. HOWE. That may be.

Mr. HARLAN. The deflection is quite as great in the Wisconsin road as in the proposed road in Minnesota.

Mr. HOWE. Is the Senator advised upon that point, that it is as great?

Mr. HARLAN. It is so judging from the maps, as the roads are laid down in the maps sent us from the General Land Office.

Mr. WILKINSON. With the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, I wish to state that between these two routes runs the St. Croix river. The banks of that river are very high, rugged, and steep. There are streams running into it occasionally, causing very deep ravines. These roads must go some twenty or thirty miles back from the river toward the sources of the streams running into it in order to get a practicable route on both sides, and that causes the deflection.

Mr. HOWE. I do not object to the deflection. I think if they varied a great deal more from a right line than they do it would be vastly better for the State of Minnesota; and I believe the State of Minnesota, on the information I have, really thinks so. I think one of the objections to the line proposed is that it runs too near in a direct line; that it ought to go further to the west than it does, and it would do more for the development of the State of Minnesota. The Senator produces a map which shows that both of the lines deflect from a right line, one to the east and the other to the west; and there is not a great deal of difference in the amount of variation. I cannot calculate from the map which varies the most. But, Mr. President, the point after all is this: I do not wish this grant to be made now because it interferes with the value of the grant already made to the State of Wisconsin and because it endangers the success of that enterprise by putting a rival enterprise on foot.

The Senator from Maryland said, properly enough, that the granting of $250,000 in land to Minnesota to build a road to enable her to get her products to Lake Superior was not doing a great deal. I admit it is not doing a great deal. I do not object to Minnesota having that value in lands, or having that quantity of lands to develop herself. But, sir, do you not see, does not the Senate see, that you take more from the value of that which you have heretofore granted to Wisconsin than you take from the United States itself? By putting this rival enterprise into the market, by setting on foot a rival road and endowing it with these lands, of course it abstracts directly and greatly from the value of that grant which you have already made to Wisconsin. You made that not to a private company, you made that to a State, and you told the State they must complete this work within ten years, which will expire in about two, or the grant reverts in the United States, so much of it as is not disposed of. As I have said before, we have had eight years of adversity and of war; and now, just as we are getting over the effects of both, and railroad enterprises begin to move, you put into the market a rival enterprise. It may strike the Senate as just. It strikes me as hard.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, some question has been raised as to whether under the terms of the Wisconsin grant they were bound to go to Superior. The question has been raised whether they may not build to Bayfield, which is sixty miles, or to Superior, and therefore the whole force of the argument in behalf of the Wisconsin grant is lost. By reference to the statute under which the grant was made I find the words are positive. "From thence"—speaking of this place on the St. Croix river—"to the west end of Lake Superior;" and then follow these other words, "and to Bayfield;" which is a distinct obligation upon the company to build them both; but they must build to Superior. Superior is twenty-five miles nearer the navigable waters of the Mississippi river at Hudson than Bayfield is. Is it to be supposed that any men will invest their money in the building of a railroad, when they are bound to build to connect these navigable waters, first to Bayfield to reach the same lake from the same river, when the great purpose is to connect these navigable waters that their railroad may be a profitable investment and carry the freights which pass from one navigable water to the other?

Mr. HARLAN. Does the Senator intend to say that Hudson is on the Mississippi river?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Hudson is on the navigable waters of the Mississippi river, on the St. Croix lake. I beg Senators to give their attention to the map. I have the map before me. That is one reason why I very much desire this thing to be looked at carefully in the committee.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will correct the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I beg my honorable friend not to interrupt me. I am going to correct him.

Mr. WILKINSON. Allow me just one moment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection, only I desire to make my remarks in a condensed form, and do not care about being interrupted.

Mr. WILKINSON. The town of Hudson is not on the Mississippi river. It is on the St. Croix, at the head of an enlargement of that river called St. Croix lake. It is nearly twenty miles east of the Mississippi.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am speaking of the navigable waters of the Mississippi. The Mississippi river at Prescott divides into two streams, one about as large as the other; the one they call the St. Croix, the other the Upper Mississippi. St. Paul is situated on the one and Hudson on the other. They are just above the dividing place, and they divide in a triangular shape at a very acute angle. Hudson is about from twelve to fifteen miles east of St. Paul; the one on the east and the other on the west branch of the Mississippi river. Of course the name of the river on which Hudson is located is the St. Croix. It is the St. Croix branch of the Mississippi river, it is true. But I was speaking of the navigable waters of the Mississippi river, and the purpose of this railroad grant is to connect the navigable waters of the lakes with the Mississippi river. That is one of the purposes certainly, and it is a great purpose, a purpose beyond any mere interest of Minnesota or Wisconsin, a purpose which is national in its character, and in which all the States of the Northwest, and I may say of the East and of the West, have an interest as a national question, independent of any development of any State or particular local interest or section.

I regret that the honorable Senator from Maryland is not in his seat, as he seems to have quite an interest in the advocacy of this matter. I desired to reply to some of the arguments made by him. He says it is a narrow policy which Wisconsin appears to advocate on the floor of the Senate in resisting this grant. I must bring before the Senate the history of the whole action of the Wisconsin delegation in this and the other House, in all that we have ever said or done in relation to Minnesota, to show that no narrow policy, certainly, has ever controlled our action, our voices, or our votes. We have always stood with Minnesota, side by side, identical in interest, bound together in commercial and friendly ties. We have taken an interest in this very question of the railroad development of Minnesota, because the development of Minnesota, the neighbor just beyond us, is the development of Wisconsin. We utterly repudiate the idea that we are controlled by a narrow policy, much less by any unfriendly feeling toward the interests or the well-being of the State of Minnesota. Why, sir, but the session before last, upon my motion, a bill was passed through the Senate granting to the State of Minnesota twenty sections per mile upon the railroad route from the west end of Lake Superior deflecting southward so as to connect with her railroad system on the grand northern route to the Pacific; and but for the fact that it met some opposition in the House, that bill, I doubt not, would have passed and have become a law—in my judgment, one of the best laws that could have been passed for the benefit either of Minnesota or of Wisconsin.

I desire now to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to some facts which have been brought to my mind since this question was last before the Senate. From St. Paul to Superior, on the navigable waters of the great lake, the distance is almost precisely the same, whether you go over the route upon which the land grant is made in Wisconsin, or whether you go upon the proposed route which is asked for in this bill. I do not think there is a difference of six miles. Any one who will examine the map, and trace upon it by the town lines the two proposed routes, will see, with regard to the connection of St. Paul with the headwaters, that it is almost impossible to determine which is the longer or the shorter line. The argument, therefore, of our friends from Minnesota is without foundation; and in desiring to have this railroad grant in Wisconsin made effectual by the building of the road, we in no way whatever damage the interests of Minnesota or the interests of St. Paul, the great commercial town of Minnesota.

My honorable friend from Minnesota has told us that the State of Minnesota are memorializing to have a railroad route from the headwaters of Lake Superior through St. Paul to Sioux City on the Missouri, and there connecting with the great railroad route. That proposition is identical with ours, provided you are willing that Wisconsin shall have a share in it as well as Minnesota. The Legislature of Wisconsin are memorializing in the same way, that from Hudson upon the St. Croix through St. Paul to Sioux City there shall be a grant given, which is through Minnesota and through a portion of Iowa, to connect the great railroad route with this very route from Hudson to Superior, thus making the interests of Minnesota and Wisconsin identical and not conflicting with each other. In no narrow policy, but upon broad national grounds, we should thus benefit them both.

Sir, I desire to make no invidious comparisons between these two States, for we are friendly States, neighboring States; but if you look upon the map which I have before me of the amount of railroad grants that have already been given to the State of Minnesota, you will find that her whole territory is covered over with railroad grant lines. She has had up to this day more than twice as many railroad grants as the State of Wisconsin, more than two acres to our one, as any one who will examine the map before me will see. I do not object to it. I presume I voted for most of them myself. As I have already stated, I got such a bill through this body during the last Congress; and had it not been lost in the House of Representatives, as I think by some inadvertence or oversight by those who were interested in the question in not getting it through the committee of the other House, we should have had still another grant, which while it developed, it is true, the little portion of Wisconsin situated on the end of Lake Superior, by running through the very heart of Minnesota from east to west, would develop her resources and put her upon the great northern Pacific railroad line, which one day is to be built, and for which they can always command my influence and my vote.

I desire to state another fact, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. It is admitted that shortly after this grant to the State of Wisconsin there came on that tremendous commercial revulsion, from which they did not sufficiently recover in that section to be able to go on with the building of this road until this war began, and the eventualities of the war, the drain upon the resources and the men of that State, have prevented them from going on with the building of the road until within the last one or two years. This company with its interests and its prospective right in this grant has been transferred into the hands of men who are perfectly able and competent to build this railroad, if they desire to do so. This railroad company, or rather the men who purchased the stock and other interest of the railroad company, caused a preliminary survey to be made of both routes, the route from Hudson to Superior and the route from St. Paul over this proposed line in Minnesota, and upon that preliminary survey, it is said, it will cost $700,000 more to build the road from St. Paul to Lake Superior than it will to build it from St. Paul, construct a bridge across the river, and meet this road at Hudson or at Stillwater, and build it to the headwaters of Lake Superior. The men who have put and are about to put their money into this enterprise were unwilling to invest in it until this preliminary survey was made, and that they became satisfied, as regarded the feasibility of the routes, that the route from St. Paul to the lake was $700,000 cheaper than the proposed route through Minnesota. They took the road on the faith of that, and upon the survey which they had caused to be made, and have invested their money in it and are going on with the work, and by the terms of the grant of the United States it must be completed within the next two years. They hope to complete a considerable portion of it within the next year. They hope to begin at both ends of this route, both on the navigable waters of the Mississippi at St. Croix going north, and also on the navigable waters of Lake Superior at Superior.

I am informed by a gentleman connected with this road that the men who are interested in it are about to build rolling-mills at the city of Superior, in the State of Wisconsin, to make the iron. Their arrangements are made. Men of interest from Pennsylvania, from New Jersey, and from

New York are going into this to build rolling-mills at Superior that will produce fifty tons of iron per day from the mines which exist within fifteen miles of Superior, some of the best iron mines in the world. The route which they have located goes through the iron mines of Wisconsin, in Douglas county. It is also in the neighborhood of the copper mines in Wisconsin. A question was raised here the other day on the subject of those copper mines. I had not looked into that matter very much, but happening to see my old law partner from the State of Wisconsin, I learned some facts from him on the subject. He told me that about fifteen miles south of Superior a copper mine had been discovered, in which he himself had an interest, from which the percentage produced is as great as in any of the mines in the upper peninsula of Michigan.

There is one other fact which I desire to state, and to which I wish to call special attention. It will be remembered that when Mr. Rice, of Minnesota, was a member of this body, during the last session he was here, he procured the passage of a joint resolution by which the State of Minnesota was authorized to deflect from her northwestern, or what was called her Pacific railroad route at any point between St. Anthony's falls, which are about six or eight miles from St. Paul, and a point where the fourth guide meridian meets the tenth standard parallel, which I should estimate to be about one hundred and fifty miles, by looking at the map, northwest from St. Anthony's falls. At any point between those two points they were authorized to deflect the line of route on to the waters of Superior, and to appropriate so much of the grant of public lands as lay northwest of the point which I last mentioned, the meeting of the fourth meridian with the tenth parallel.

Now, Mr. President, one word in conclusion. About two years remain in which it is to be determined whether this Wisconsin grant shall be perfected by the building of the road. Will not the Senate give them those two years? If they fail to complete their road, let their grant be taken from them and let the grant go on the other side of the river; but so long as it is seen that in good faith they are attempting to build it, I ask is it wise, is it just, is it national, is it for the interest of Wisconsin or the special interest of Minnesota that you shall build or attempt to build up another and a rival line, which commencing at a point fifteen miles distant from the other will terminate at the same place on the lake? Would it be wise in any landholder thus to give away his lands? What is the ground upon which the United States makes these grants? It is upon the ground that the United States is a great landholder, and that by giving away alternate sections of its lands it can increase the value of the remainder for sale in the market. That is the main ground upon which these grants are made. I ask, would it be reasonable, or wise, or practicable for any landholder in order to improve the remainder of his land to give alternate sections of land upon two railroad lines one hundred and fifty miles in length where the termini at one end were fifteen miles apart and at the other came together, when by giving to both and making them rivals perhaps neither would be built, whereas if he gave upon one only it would secure the building of the road?

Let me put a case to my friend from Maryland. Suppose the United States owned all the land between here and Philadelphia, and the proposition was that the United States should give alternate sections of land to aid in the building of a railroad between here and Philadelphia. Suppose they make such a grant upon one route and give the company ten years in which to build the road. Would you give to another company the right to begin at Georgetown and build a railroad to Philadelphia over another route, before the ten years had expired, before the time of the men who had taken the grant, upon the faith of which they had invested their money, was expired? I do not think it would be just.

I do not think any consideration of a national character, I do not think any consideration of the real interests of Minnesota or of Wisconsin demands this additional grant. When we have made a grant to build a road from St. Paul to the headwaters of Lake Superior, it is no harm to Minnesota if the people of St. Paul and the people of Hudson shall ride in the same cars and go over the same road, when the distance is no greater, and all the estimates are that it can be built much cheaper.

Mr. HARLAN. The concluding argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] seems to be based on the idea that if this bill shall be passed it will deprive the Wisconsin road of its grant. It will have no such effect. He also argues that this bill should not pass because it will encourage the investment of money in two roads so near each other as to be mutually ruinous to each other. During his speech I sent to the Library for a township map of Wisconsin; and on looking at the lines of railroad through his own State as laid down on that map, I find that the greatest distance between any two parallel roads is about fifty-four miles.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not land-grant roads.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not know which of those lines of roads are land-grant roads; but I speak of the railroad policy of the Senator's own State. The question to be decided is whether public policy justifies the Senate in making a land grant to a road through Minnesota so near to a land-grant road in and through Wisconsin, both of which roads would connect the upper waters of the Mississippi river with Lake Superior. On examining the map the committee ascertained that the greatest distance between the two roads was about sixty miles, that at the termini on the Mississippi river and on Lake Superior they came near together, but that the average distance between the two lines would be about as great as the average distance between the parallel lines of road through Wisconsin and other States. Hence the committee did not deem this a sufficient objection, and this I believe is the only reason urged by the Senators from Wisconsin for a reference of the bill back to the committee that they may reexamine the very subject which they have examined thoroughly. If there is any reliance to be placed upon the maps issued by publishers, or those furnished the committee by the General Land Office, which are probably very nearly correct, these two lines of road, if both shall be built, cannot be considered as rival roads in any stronger sense than other railroads now built and in running order through the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend will allow me to say that I admit that fact as to the State of Wisconsin, and I admit for other States the same fact, for I have no doubt it is true, although I know better in Wisconsin than any other State, where they have run a great many railroads and run them as a network together; and I admit another thing, (and my friend may put it down as a universal fact,) that in every case where the roads run so closely together, if the stock has not been sunk altogether, more than three fourths of all the stock and all the capital that the original builders put into the railroads has been sunk, and sunk for the very reason that they are built so close together.

Mr. HARLAN. That is an argument against the whole system. If it is all wrong from the beginning, it would be well perhaps to repeal the laws making these grants and take from Wisconsin and the other States the lands they have acquired to aid in building their various roads.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. These are not land-grant roads in Wisconsin. There are but two land-grant roads in Wisconsin: the one commencing near the middle of the State, going off northwest, the end of which is this one here from Hudson to Superior; and the other land-grant road is in the northeastern part of the State. Our land-grant roads are under the act of Congress of 1856 to which I refer. If you will put your finger on the map you will see in a minute, as I read the route fixed in that act:

"For the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Madison or Columbus,"—

The Legislature fixed it at Columbus—
"by the way of Portage City,"—

Which you will find about the junction of the Wisconsin and the Fox rivers—

"to the St. Croix river or lake between townships twenty-five and thirty-one,"—

That is, at Hudson—

"and from thence to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield; and also from Fond-du-lac, on Lake Winnebago, northerly to the State line."

These are all the land grants we ever had in the State of Wisconsin; and my friend from Iowa will see that they are hundreds of miles apart at their northern termini, and probably a hundred miles apart at their southern termini, one running northeast and the other running northwest; but it is true, as my friend says, that all over the southern part of the State of Wisconsin towns and cities and interested men have got up different and rival railroad routes, and have got them so near together that the whole stock has been sunk and wiped out in a majority of them, the railroads gone into the hands of mortgagors and bond-holders, and been the great subject of litigation in our State. The stock has been pretty much entirely sunk because these railroads were located and built so near together that each has devoured the other; and that is the very ground on which, in this comparatively uninhabitable country of the great northwest of our State and the northeast of Minnesota, along up the line of the St. Croix to Douglas county, with a very sparse population as yet; I say it is impossible to suppose that two lines of railroad which begin fifteen miles apart on the waters of the Mississippi and run together to Superior can be paying roads upon the money invested. It makes them of necessity antagonistic and rival to each other, destroying the stock in each; whereas if but one is allowed to be built it may be a good investment, and accommodate the whole public.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator's argument would be a good one if delivered before the Legislature of Wisconsin when charters were pending authorizing companies in Wisconsin to build the roads to which he refers. But it would be difficult to persuade the people of Wisconsin that they have too many railroads. I have shown that the parallel roads now constructed in the southern portion of Wisconsin, connecting the waters of the lakes with the waters of the Mississippi, are nearer together on an average than these two proposed lines of road. The Senator answers that by saying that his State has adopted a bad system. And out of regard for the public interests, he will protect Minnesota from this evil by withholding this proposed grant. But there may be those uncharitable enough to suppose that another reason was quite as potential. The companies that have built the roads through Wisconsin may desire to do the business for Minnesota; but as Minnesota borders on Lake Superior, it is not unreasonable, as it seemed to the committee, that she should desire to connect her system of roads with the waters of the lake through her own State, and not be subject to the tolls and taxes that might be levied on her produce as it passed through the Senator's State. It may be that within the two years next to come Wisconsin may build a railroad from Hudson to the lake, one hundred and fifty or more miles in length; but the committee were of opinion that if both roads should be built they would not be rival roads in such a sense as to justify the committee to report against this grant, that the public reasons were sufficient to justify them in reporting in favor of the grant if it were certain that the Wisconsin road would be built. It was not originally intended that that road should be a monopoly. It was not intended when the grant was made that those possessing the franchise in Wisconsin should have the exclusive right to build a railroad from the Upper Mississippi to Lake Superior. By an examination of the law, the Senate will see that it will not bear any such construction. And yet the substance of the Senator's [Mr. DOOLITTLE's] argument is that because a grant has been made for the construction of a railroad through Wisconsin from Lake Superior to the Mississippi river, therefore no other company, through any other State, should be allowed to build a road within the vicinity of that road.

I have shown that the average distance of the proposed road from the Wisconsin road is as great as the average distance of similar parallel roads leading east and west through his own State that have been built under the direction of his own Legislature. The same is true of other western States. The railroads that have been authorized, and many of them now completed, are located nearer to each other on an average than these two roads will be if both shall be constructed. Hence I see no necessity for referring this bill back to the committee. They have examined the very subject of difficulty with the Senator from Wisconsin, have made up their judgment, and reported to the Senate. There is, therefore, as it seems to me, no reason for referring it back to the committee. If the Senate should differ with the committee in relation to the policy of the grant, that is another question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I was very much embarrassed as a member of the Committee on Public Lands in deciding whether I ought to support this bill or not. The considerations that have been so forcibly urged by the Senators from the State of Wisconsin pressed themselves upon my reflections on this subject. But, sir, I became satisfied that the State of Wisconsin had had sufficient time to show the world whether she was going to build a road to Lake Superior or not. It is eight years since the grant was made to that State to build a road from a point on the St. Croix river to Superior and to Bayfield; and although one of the Senators from that State thinks that some progress has been made in the work, I have not been able to satisfy myself that any important portion of the work has yet been constructed. I appreciate the reasons why nothing has been done; but the State of Minnesota has a very large interest in this question. She is entirely an agricultural State, and my position at the head of the General Land Office for a few years enabled me to know that she is one of the richest States of the great Northwest. In a few years, her productions of wheat will not be surpassed perhaps by any State in the Union of her size; and now that her southern market is cut off, and in my opinion must remain cut off for a number of years to come, it is of the first importance that she shall have some outlet to the eastern market other than by the line of railroads by Chicago.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire, if it is proper to give the information, whether there was or was not any evidence before the committee upon that point, as to how much had been done in the execution of this trust created in 1856?

Mr. HENDRICKS. There was some evidence upon the subject, for I had taken a good deal of interest to inform myself in regard to it. There were no witnesses, to my knowledge, before the committee; we made no investigation of that sort; but I have inquired about it since the lands were set apart to the State of Wisconsin at the General Land Office during the time I was at the head of that office, of persons likely to know, and I have been unable to ascertain that anything has been done upon that work except to transfer from one company to another the franchises that were granted by the State of Wisconsin.

I was going on to say that it is of very great importance to the young State of Minnesota that she should have some outlet to a market by the lakes. If I had full confidence that a railroad would be constructed from Hudson or any convenient point on the St. Croix river to either Superior or Bayfield within a reasonable time, I should not support this bill. I do not agree with the chairman of the committee, that it is the policy of the General Government to encourage by donations of the public lands the construction of roads running parallel or having common termini. But I do not have faith that the work through the State of Wisconsin is going to be accomplished. Some two or three years ago I met an engineer—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend will allow me to interrupt him. On that point I made a statement the other day—I do not know whether the Senator was in his place or not—and I stated the means of information that I had from a gentleman who is here. He states to me the fact to be, and I have every reason to believe that his statement is correct, that he has himself personally put into the work $35,000, and he is under obligations to put in $150,000 more, and is perfectly able to do it; that twenty miles have been graded; that the ties are out; that five hundred tons of iron have already been purchased; and that they are in process of going on and are to finish within the year a certain number of miles, the precise number I cannot now state, but I think it is some forty-five or fifty miles of the road.

These facts I should like to have presented to the committee, that they may really see whether or not there is a bona fide attempt to build this road; and I think if the matter was referred to the committee these facts could be ascertained. I cannot on my own responsibility and of my own knowledge state the facts; but from correspondence which I have had with gentlemen at Hudson, who are interested in this route, I understand them to be as I have just stated. I admit that after the grant from 1856 down to this war, and for a year after it commenced, hardly anything was done upon the road; but within the last year and a half efforts have been made to construct it, and this gentleman informs me that a company is arranged and the capital agreed upon to build rolling-mills at Superior to make the iron there to put down on this very road, and that they are about to build it. This is what he states to me. I should like to have the committee examine into the facts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In reply to the question put to me by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] I was going on to say in respect to my own information on this question, that two or three years ago I met with an engineer at the city of Indianapolis who said to me that he had been selected by the company as the engineer to locate the road from Hudson to Bayfield and to survey it, and he thought the company then taking charge of the work would be able to construct the road, and he gave me his reasons. They were quite as encouraging as the suggestions now made by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Doolittle,] that a sufficient capital, perhaps, had been subscribed; at least, that the men who were going into the work were men of capital, and would be able to construct the road. I supposed then that we should soon hear that the work was going on in good faith and rapidly; but I heard no more of it until some time afterwards the franchises were sold by that company to another. I have observed that when a privilege is granted by a State to a company and that company makes a speculation out of the privilege, and then another company does the same, you may give up all hope of the work being very soon constructed. When privileges granted by the Legislature to companies become the subject of trade and speculation, the purpose of really constructing the work is substantially abandoned.

As I said before, I do not have faith in the construction of the road through Wisconsin from Hudson to Superior. I do not think any well-informed company will construct a road from Hudson to Bayfield. In the first place, Bayfield is a point on the lake much nearer the eastern market than Superior. It is a better harbor; it remains open from three to five weeks later in the fall, and is open from three to five weeks earlier in the spring, and the harbor at Superior is so defective that one half the boats that go to the north-western end of Lake Superior cannot make an entrance. When the Senator says that the road is to be constructed not to Bayfield but to Superior, I say that it is a work we need not expect. I do not believe any company that understands its interests will construct a road to Superior. I do not understand that the road from St. Paul north through Minnesota is to go to Superior. The bill before us does not propose that it shall go to Superior, but to some point on the north-western side of Lake Superior, and of course it will be some point where there is a good harbor.

I support this bill with reluctance, as I have said, after my investigations in the committee, because it is of the first importance that the State of Minnesota should have an outlet from her capital to Lake Superior, that the waters of the Mississippi should be connected with Lake Superior. I support this bill because I have faith that the road will be constructed. The State of Minnesota has granted, as I understand and as she informs this body by her memorial, her swamp lands in that portion of the State to aid in its construction; the city of St. Paul, I understand, has agreed to subscribe $250,000—a very large subscription—toward the prosecution of the work; and then if the company receive the support of this grant, I think that with the benefits which will be derived from it with the swamp lands, and with the subscription made by the city of St. Paul, the road will be constructed, and I think it will be constructed at a much earlier day than the road through Wisconsin. I regret to vote for a bill that conflicts at all with a measure heretofore adopted by Congress; but so important is it to have an outlet to the people of Minnesota, that I, with some reluctance, give my support to this measure.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, if I thought that the passage of this bill would materially affect the State of Wisconsin, I do not know that I should urge its passage here. I do not know that it would be proper, right, or fair, that one State should ask the aid of Congress in the support of a measure which would materially affect the interests of the people of any other State. I do not believe the passage of this bill will injure the people of the State of Wisconsin. It is true it may somewhat affect the value of the railroad stock of the rival line from Hudson to Bayfield or Superior, in case that road shall be built. I hold in my hand a letter from one of the directors of that road, which I shall read, because the main point of argument urged by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin is that it is unfair to grant aid to a railroad starting from nearly the same point on the Mississippi river and terminating at nearly the same point on the lake. This is a letter from Mr. Rice, who is largely interested in property at Bayfield; I think his main real-estate interests are at Bayfield, in Wisconsin. This letter is written to a friend of mine, who is now in the city, in regard to this road.

Mr. HOWE. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. WILKINSON. St. Paul, February 7, 1864. Mr. Rice is a director of the Wisconsin company who propose to build a road from Hudson in Wisconsin to Bayfield and to Superior, or rather I should say that that is the grant; but I agree with the Senator from Indiana that the purpose is not to make a road to Superior. That is my conviction. I have thought so for a long time. It has been the general understanding in our part of the country that their road, if built, would be built to Bayfield, and not to Superior. In this letter Mr. Rice says:

"I look upon the building of a railroad from here to the head of Lake Superior as a work of great national and State importance. In a national point of view it is second to hardly any enterprise named. Our city and State would upon its completion receive new life and vigor. The road cannot be built for many years without aid from the General Government. I am now and have been always in favor of a land grant for that purpose, and I cannot see why Congress should not give land and money. It is in fact a part of the Pacific railroad, and an important part."

This letter was written in reference to the particular bill which is now before the Senate. Mr. Rice, as I have said, is one of the directors of the Wisconsin road; at least he has been until within a few days, and I presume he is now.

It has been urged by the honorable Senators from Wisconsin that the people of Minnesota will profit just as much by the construction of the Wisconsin road as they will by the building of this road. I think I can convince those Senators that that is not true. In the first place the country above Hudson toward Superior, through which the St. Croix river runs, is so rough that for fifty or sixty miles up that river, from Hudson or St. Paul, no communication can be had which would be practicable to carry the produce of the northern part of our State across to the Wisconsin road. St. Paul, it must be remembered, is one hundred or more miles south of the center of our State north and south. It is much further from there to our northern line than it is to our southern line. Consequently everything raised north of St. Paul would have to run south to St. Paul, and then cross over to Wisconsin, in order to reach the Wisconsin railroad for the lake. The argument of those Senators can only hold good as to the produce which is raised in the immediate vicinity of St. Paul, or south of it; and here I wish to state that there is a road now in progress from the western terminus of the La Crosse and Milwaukee railroad running due west across our State, nearly fifty miles of it completed, running through the richest farming portion of our State, which acts as a feeder to that great Wisconsin railroad.

I have no doubt that the building of the road which is asked for in this bill will affect somewhat the business of the road which the Senators from Wisconsin are laboring so zealously to protect; but I submit that that is hardly a broad enough gauge for a Senator in the Congress of the United States to run upon. I admit that what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Doolittle] has said in regard to the Senators from his State favoring land grants in Minnesota is true. I believe those honorable Senators, as a general rule, have favored measures tending to the advancement of the State of Minnesota; but why do they oppose this proposition? Is it because some men out of Wisconsin are or pretend to be interested in a railroad charter from Hudson to Lake Superior? I understand that those men represent capital in New York and in Philadelphia, and other eastern cities. I do not understand that they are Wisconsin gentlemen. I understand that they are down here now lobbying with Congress to defeat this bill; and why? Merely because one railroad corporation is to be slightly affected by it.

I do not think the honorable Senators from Wisconsin fully understand the difficulties of connecting St. Paul with Hudson by railroad. In the first place, the banks of the Mississippi river at St. Paul are, I think, about two hundred and fifty feet high. The banks of the river St. Croix at Hudson are, perhaps, equally high, and a railroad must run over the high level lands between those two rivers. To get down to the river-bed at Hudson will require a very circuitous route. I do not believe that a railroad between the two places can be built short of twenty-five miles in length, although an air line would not, perhaps, be more than sixteen miles between the two. It would be a very expensive road to build, and when built would only accommodate the country in the immediate vicinity of St. Paul, leaving all that vast region of country north of it entirely without any access either to Lake Superior or to the Mississippi river.

It is said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Doolittle] that my former colleague, Mr. Rice, procured the passage of a resolution to which the Northern Pacific railroad in Minnesota, as it is called, may swing around, divert its grant (running northward toward the Canada line) from the vicinity of Crow Wing and run to Lake Superior.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Any point between St. Anthony's falls and Crow Wing; and I understand your Legislature has fixed a point which I believe is called Onoka—I am not familiar with the names.

Mr. WILKINSON. The precise point is immaterial so far as regards what I have to say. The Legislature did pass a law allowing that company to do that in pursuance of the joint resolution of Congress; but during the last session the president of that company visited England for the purpose of buying iron for his road, and he made a purchase, but it was upon the condition that the company should not accept that grant of Congress, and, in consequence of that, the company have not accepted it; and, therefore, so far as that is concerned, that resolution goes for nothing. It was the express condition of the English merchants who sold the iron that the road should continue on, in pursuance of the original grant from Congress, toward the Canada line.

Mr. HOWE. Who is the president of that road?

Mr. WILKINSON. Edmund Rice, Esq., the brother of the late Senator Rice.

Mr. HOWE. Residing at St. Paul?

Mr. WILKINSON. Residing at St. Paul; and the company have not accepted the privilege granted by the resolution passed by Congress to which the honorable Senator [Mr. Doolittle] referred. Hence we have no communication and no provision, as the law now stands, for any communication with Lake Superior.

I have not usually at home advocated the interests of railroad companies gotten up for purposes of speculation, and I think my colleague will bear me out in that statement. If I believed that this was a speculative concern, if it was a company organized for purposes of speculation, I would have nothing to do with it and I would not say one word about it here; but, sir, the interests of our people are deeply concerned in this matter. The people of St. Paul and the country north of it are intensely excited on this very question. They ask for this grant more earnestly than they ask for any other measure affecting their interest which is before Congress or likely to be before Congress during the present year. There is a determination on the part of our people to put their money into this road and build it. We know how difficult it is for new communities like Minnesota to furnish the means necessary to build a railroad; and as this is the shortest and quickest and easiest line of communication to the sea-board, they have asked that this grant may be made.

I suppose that for the first forty miles after leaving St. Paul the company will get no land at all, for I suppose that land was all taken up years ago. After going about forty miles, you come to a lumber country that has not thus far been settled up very much, but there is through all that country north a series of swamps and marshes rendering the land comparatively valueless unless some communication of this kind can be obtained through it.

I have nothing to say about the propriety of Congress passing this bill, because that matter has been submitted to the appropriate committee, the Committee on Public Lands, and the propriety of this measure has been so ably defended by members of that committee that I do not think it is worth while for me to say anything about it. I must insist, however, that the argument urged by the honorable Senators from Wisconsin that their road from Hudson is just as favorable to Minnesota as this one running from St. Paul to Superior is unsound in fact, and anybody looking at the map of our State will see that it cannot be so. Besides, if we take our wheat, for instance, from St. Paul across to Hudson, there must be a reshipment at Hudson, and everybody knows that a reshipment will enhance very much the cost of transportation.

For the reasons which I have stated, I hope that this motion to recommit may not prevail, particularly when the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands opposes the motion, but that a vote may be had on the bill, and that it may be promptly disposed of.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Since I took my seat, one of the Senators informs me that I was mistaken in regard to the character of the harbor at Superior; I never was there personally; but the Senator to whom I allude informs me that he was there, and that it is a very good harbor indeed. As that point is not at all material in respect to this measure, I wish to make this explanation, and to withdraw what I said before in respect to the character of that harbor.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will say a word in regard to the remark just dropped by the Senator from Indiana. I think he is partially mistaken; but at the same time I think he is correct in the statement that Bayfield is a much better harbor. It is protected by a number of islands that lie out in the lake, and I suppose it is one of the best harbors on that lake or anywhere else.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if I had failed to convince myself that this bill ought to be re-committed to the Committee on Public Lands, the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WILKINSON,] and especially the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] would have convinced me beyond all room for doubt. The Senator from Indiana takes precisely the view of the expediency of this kind of legislation that I have presented. He says that if there is a railroad in progress of construction, and with a fair promise of being built, between Hudson and Lake Superior, this grant ought not to be made, because it will interfere with the success of that enterprise and will endanger its success, that it is a wrong to it, and he would not favor the grant; but he assumes and he says that he could obtain no information satisfactory to him that there was any fair probability of that road being built. I put the question to him if there was any evidence before the committee on that point, and he said no. Now, let me say to the Senator that at that period of time I was precisely as ignorant on this point as any man could be; I had no information whatever in regard to it. Those represented in the Hudson and Superior road were not represented before the committee; they were not represented before this Congress. I knew nothing about it. Since that time I have received information which I do believe, which I do credit, and I am told that if this matter can be re-committed to that committee the evidence verifying the information which I have, and which I have stated to the Senate, will be produced; and then if that should turn out so, the Senator from Indiana is precluded, by his own views of propriety stated here, from supporting this bill. I ask that the bill be sent to the committee that they may be able to tell us upon testimony when it comes back here whether there is a fair probability of that road being built or not.

The Senator says that eight years have transpired; he says he appreciates the difficulties which have stood in the way of the building of the road down to this time, and notwithstanding these difficulties he thinks eight years are sufficient to have built the road. Mr. President, when you made that grant, you told the State of Wisconsin that she might have ten years to build the road, and the ten years are not out. Upon a mere assumption, when you are told that the road is in progress of being built, upon a mere suspicion or surmise that Wisconsin will not complete the road in the other two years, are you going to forfeit the franchise and the grant? I do not think that is correct legislation.

Another reason the Senator from Indiana assigns why he distrusts the completion of the road from Hudson to Superior: he assumes that no company which understands its interests will build a road to Superior when it has the right to build a road to Bayfield, because he says Bayfield has the best harbor. Well, I put this question to the Senator from Indiana: will not a road from Hudson to Bayfield accommodate the trade of Minnesota as well as a road from Hudson to Superior, if it strikes a harbor further east and strikes a better harbor?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Then if there is a probability of the road being built to Bayfield that is as good a reason against making this grant, on the Senator's own views of policy, as would be the probability of building a road from Hudson to Superior.

The Senator says that the harbor at Superior is an insufficient one, a poor one; but he partially retracts that statement. I have stated the fact to the Senate that upon my information the Minnesota road is intended to terminate at that very harbor, the harbor of Superior, and that Minnesota is struggling to get a cession of that portion of our State in order to give her a harbor within her own State. I have not heard that statement contradicted; no Senator tells me that I am misinformed on that point; and I think, therefore, the very reasons urged here by the Senator from Indiana ought to be conclusive upon the Senate in favor of the recommitment of this bill.

Now indulge me in but a single word in reply to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON.] He ventures to say that our opposition to this grant runs on rather a too narrow gauge for Senators of the United States. I am obliged to say to my friend from Minnesota that he and I differ widely as to what is the proper gauge for a Senator of the United States to run upon. I concede as readily as he asserts, that a Senator ought not to run on a very narrow one, but on a broad gauge; but he and I differ materially as to what a broad gauge is.

What is the attitude of Minnesota? She comes in here and says, "We want an outlet for our products; we want to go to Lake Superior." "Very well," we say, "you have an outlet now being built for you under a grant made years ago; can you not come over it; it runs a little to the east of your line; can you not come over that?" "No; that is a narrow gauge." "Very well," we say, "you have another grant running through your own State; you have a road already built from St. Paul up to the mouth of Rum river along the valley of the Mississippi, running toward Lake Superior, and you have a right already to swing your northwest road from any point between St. Anthony and Crow Wing and run it to Lake Superior." In other words the law says to St. Paul—I do not mean the apostle, Mr. President, I mean the town of that name—"if you will consent to go to Lake Superior by way of Hudson, you can go along; the grants are already made; the roads are already being made." It says to St. Paul, "If you will consent to go to Superior, taking any point on the Mississippi above St. Anthony in your path, you can go; the rights are already conceded, the roads already being constructed," and the cars are actually running about thirty miles on that line, I am told. "No; we cannot go that way, that is a narrow gauge; put us right on this peninsula; start us from the town of St. Paul; give us a track by ourselves right along through this country," which, says the Senator from Minnesota, is a waste, a desolation, a desert uninhabited and uninhabitable, valueless, worth only fifty cents an acre—"give us a track over that; that is the broad gauge that suits us."

If that suits the idea of the Senate as to what a broad gauge is or ought to be, I acquiesce, of course, but it is not my notion. I think St. Paul, whether the apostle or the town, can afford to go to Superior by the way of the mouth of Rum river; or by the way of Hudson on the St. Croix river; and the State of Minnesota would not be dwarfed by taking either track; but the State of Minnesota would be developed by taking it, especially by taking the western one.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, I am a little surprised that so much feeling should be manifested by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe.] I am perfectly willing that he shall have his road if he can get it built; but the grant for it was made eight years ago, and I venture to say there has not been a cross-tie laid on that road yet, and I venture to say that there has not been one solitary mile of that road built. Does he ask us to wait eight or ten years more?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. WILKINSON. Does he ask us to continue to pay a tribute to railway companies of twelve cents a bushel over and above what we could get our wheat carried for a few years ago? A part of our State is now supporting the road from La Crosse to Milwaukee, one hundred and eighty miles, with our wheat that we are sending over it. I am very glad that the prosperity of Wisconsin is so great. She has nearly a million people. She has Lake Michigan on her whole eastern border. She is geographically better situated than almost any other State in this Union, certainly as well situated as any of the western States except, perhaps, Michigan; with that exception she has more natural advantages and easier communication with the sea-board than any other western State. With these natural facilities, and in view of what has been granted to that State heretofore by Congress, and her great prosperity, I am a little surprised that her Senators should exhibit so much feeling against this measure which proposes to aid a road from St. Paul one hundred and forty miles to Lake Superior.

The Senator seems to think that our interests will be greatly subserved by going over the Wisconsin road. I submit whether he will not allow the people of Minnesota to judge for themselves. If such a measure as this should come here from Wisconsin, and they were to ask for aid from Congress, I do not think I should dictate to the honorable Senators from Wisconsin what it was for the interest of the people of Wisconsin to do; but I would take the opinion of their representatives here on such a question.

I will not detain the Senate any further than to say that the people of our State have taken up this measure in sober earnest, with the intention of putting their money into this road and building it, and if Congress will aid the State by passing this bill they will be very glad of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate. I wish to come to a vote on this question, and first to say a single word in reply to the Senator from Indiana. He seems to state that nothing has been done toward the building of the Wisconsin road; he seems to state that if he were assured that that road was about to be built in good faith, he should oppose the granting of land to another rival road substantially over the same route. Now, sir, I understand the fact to be that if the bill be committed to the committee it will appear to the satisfaction of the committee that a large amount of capital has already been invested in that road, and its resources are in such a condition as to insure its completion.

I will state another fact, which did not occur to me when he was on the floor before, and which my colleague also forgot to state; and that is that our Legislature is passing laws authorizing the various counties along the line of road from Hudson to Superior, as counties, to loan the credit of the counties in the construction of the road. That is an additional fact that I presume the committee knew nothing about.

The truth is that the question about this grant went before the committee, and the Wisconsin side of the question was never heard before the committee at all. It is true, as the members of the committee say, they knew what laws had been passed by Congress; and they had the laws before them; and they raised the same question among themselves about the propriety of this grant; but as to there being any facts before the committee as to what Wisconsin had done, or those who act under the authority of Wisconsin had done, there was no evidence whatever before the committee. I suggest is it not fair and just that the committee should hear this? The Senate, situated as we are, cannot get hold of those facts and consider them in open session as well as they can be considered in committee. Besides that, sir, I have not become so possessed of the facts myself that I can state to the Senate precisely the condition of the question. I want it to go to the committee that they may learn the precise facts, and have the evidence before the committee to know how far capital has become invested, how far vested rights may be injured by this rival grant; and this, it seems to me, is asking but little. Wisconsin does not ask anything more than it has a right to ask, that its side should be heard in the committee, and the facts really presented; and that is the question pending on this motion to recommit. I know a committee are always reluctant to have this labor imposed on them; when they have once had a question before them, they are very glad to get rid of it and have it brought before the Senate; but, after all, if there are gentlemen connected with this road who can give them direct and positive information as to the condition of its resources, how far they have proceeded in building the road and complying with the terms of the grant, it seems to me it would be very unjust not to allow them to be heard and let the facts come before the committee. All that has been considered before the committee as yet really has been the question of law, the law of the case, not the facts of the case, and it is the facts of the case that want to be considered.

One word more I desire to say to my honorable friends from Minnesota. We are as anxious as they to connect the navigable waters of Lake Superior with the navigable waters of the Mississippi by every railroad route and by every water route possible, and it is from a national interest as well as a State and local interest; but I say to my honorable friends who represent Minnesota on this floor, that the proposition introduced into this body and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to open a water route through the Wisconsin and Fox rivers to Green bay, is a question of more interest to Minnesota and to Iowa than all the railroads put together; because when from St. Paul the steamboats that load on the banks of the Mississippi can go themselves to the navigable waters of the lakes, when produce can be shipped to Green bay in the same steamers that go to St. Paul, as it can be by an expenditure not exceeding $2,500,000, the producing interests of Minnesota and of northern Iowa are more interested in it than they are in all the railroads that can be built across Wisconsin, because the water will float the produce so much cheaper, and there can be no monopoly upon a water route of communication; and this very opening of a water route is what is necessary to prevent the monopolies in the railroad routes.

At the same time I do not object to your communication between St. Paul and Lake Superior, nor do I object to a communication through the State of Minnesota to Superior. The law now, under the resolution which Mr. Rice, as Senator from Minnesota, got through this body the last session he was here, authorizes the building of a railroad to Superior to connect with a route leading to St. Paul at any place between St. Anthony (which is only eight miles west of St. Paul) and Crow Wing. They can choose their own line. Go eight miles further west than St. Paul, and you have already a right to build a road and have a land grant over it. That is the law of Congress as it stands now; but will you make another railroad grant, bringing it still nearer the grant which was made to Wisconsin?

Speaking of the railroad grants to Wisconsin, I presume to say now that I was altogether mistaken when I was on the floor before in stating that Minnesota had two acres to our one. I presume, from looking over the maps, that she has had more than five acres granted by the United States to aid in the construction of railroads, to one that Wisconsin has had.

Mr. President, I hope this bill will be sent to the committee, and let all these facts be heard there. Let the committee get the definite facts, sworn testimony if you please, in relation to what has been done on this road.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, I trust Senators will recollect that the people of Minnesota who come here through their Legislature, they and their Legislature understanding all the facts, are not here asking a donation of land in the State of Wisconsin.

It is in the State of Minnesota that we ask for a grant of lands. Is it not surprising that we should meet with this opposition on the part of the State of Wisconsin, as though we were trying to invade that State and asking for her lands? Is it an unfair thing for us to ask that we may have within our own State a connection between the navigable waters of the Mississippi and the navigable waters of the lake? Is it unreasonable? Our immense system of railroads is just beginning to be developed in Minnesota, and upon various parts of it we have thirty or forty miles of railroad already completed, and the measures are in active operation for its further completion; and is it not a fair and proper thing that at this point of concentration of all these roads we should have within our own State an outlet to Lake Superior? Is it not a most unreasonable thing to attempt to deny it to us?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I confess that my impressions are in favor of the bill reported by the committee; and if it be pressed to a vote now, as at present advised I shall vote for it. But the honorable Senators from Wisconsin, both of them, urge with great earnestness that there are facts in this case which have not been presented before the committee who reported the bill, and which they have had no opportunity as yet to present. The committee are not, as, of course, no committee is, disposed to take back a bill which they think they have examined; but still, if these Senators are of opinion that they have important facts not yet presented to the committee, it seems to me but just that they shall have an opportunity to submit them. It can delay the bill but for a very short time. It will be in the power of the committee to report it again, even to-morrow. If the Senators from Wisconsin have not the facts ready, and are not prepared to furnish them to the committee within such reasonable time as the committee think they ought to do so, of course the bill can come back at once. If they present them, and if, on considering them, no alteration is produced in the opinion of the committee, they can again report the bill, and the Senate can act upon it. The delay will be very short, and it seems to me better, under the circumstances, that the bill should go back rather than be pressed to a vote now.

The Senate seems very thin, and a division may not result in the passage of the bill, even if a majority of those present are in favor of it. I suggest that it would be advisable at least to recommit the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to state that the very question about which the argument has been presented was the very first question submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to the committee for its consideration. The first leading question submitted to the committee by the chairman was whether the existence of the grant in Wisconsin ought to weigh against a favorable report of the bill sent to the committee; and then the second question submitted by the chairman was whether the resolution to which Senators have referred, authorizing the diversion of another grant of land in Minnesota, was of sufficient importance to justify them in reporting unfavorably. The committee, after considering both of these questions in their order, decided in favor of reporting the bill favorably.

Mr. HOWE. Let me remind the Senator that at the time the committee passed upon those questions, it is very evident they passed upon them on the assumption that nothing had been done toward building the Hudson and Superior road.

Mr. HARLAN. Not that nothing had been done, but that not very much had been done. Yet, as I stated before, I think from the indications of the committee they would have reported favorably if that road had been completed and in running order. At least my vote would have been so given. I acted on the ground that the road through Wisconsin would not be built; but if it should be, nevertheless Minnesota had a right to this grant under the policy that has been adopted by Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harris, Howe, Morgan, and Sherman—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Canale, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—29.

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move now that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Thursday next, in order that I may produce the facts bearing upon this question before the Senate, as I cannot get it sent to a committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. I trust the Senator for a moment at least will withdraw the motion, to enable me now to present my amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to that, certainly.

Mr. RAMSEY. I now propose to amend the amendment of the committee in the first section by striking out all after the word "thereof," in the thirteenth line, and insert what I send to the Chair.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As I have moved that the bill be postponed until Thursday next, let an order be made to print the amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. It has been printed.

Mr. WILKINSON. I understand that there are some amendments which the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands will offer to the bill, and I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin to waive this motion to postpone for the present, and let the bill be perfected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I may desire to offer amendments myself to the bill.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Senator can do it when the bill comes up. I hope he will allow the amendments of the chairman of the committee to be acted upon by the Senate now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Thursday next.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 15, nays 14; not a quorum voting.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILKINSON. On consultation with my colleague, we waive all objection to the postponement of the bill, as that seems to be desired by some of its friends.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If that be the case, I am willing to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The fact appears by the last division that the Senate is without a quorum, and it cannot proceed with business until the fact appears that there is a quorum present. The Secretary will therefore call the roll on the motion to postpone.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Canale, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—9.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 7, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the call of committees for reports for reference, not to be brought up again by a motion to reconsider.

The list of committees was called over, but no reports presented.

CALL OF STATES FOR RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the call of States in their inverted order, commencing with the State of Ohio, for resolutions and the introduction of bills.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that both members on the Committee on Enrolled Bills are absent from the House. The Chair asks the privilege of appointing a committee temporarily for the examination of bills.

No objection being made, the Speaker appointed Mr. PIKE and Mr. MCKINNEY.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SPALDING submitted the following preamble and resolution, and on their adoption demanded the previous question:

Whereas doubts exist in respect to the binding force and efficacy of either of the resolutions of this House passed on the subject of the Dictionary of Congress during the present session: Therefore,

Resolved, That the resolution providing for printing said work, passed February 12, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, affirmed as the resolution of this House in all particulars, save only the price thereof, which is hereby limited to the sum of one dollar per copy.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, the vote was—ayes 34, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. BEAMAN moved that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called over, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. William J. Allen, Anderson, Baxter, Blaine, Clay, Cobb, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Edger-ton, English, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Orlando Kellogg, King, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Sloan, Stobbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Thomas, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman.

The Speaker announced that one hundred and eighteen members—a quorum—had answered to their names.

Mr. STILES moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and the vote stood—ayes 52, noes 43.

Mr. MORRILL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and SPALDING were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. MORRILL moved to lay the resolution on the table; and on that motion called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Donnelly, Briggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Orth, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—46.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Creswell, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Mallory, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stiles, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Joseph W. White, and Williams—63.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SMITH stated that his colleague, Mr. RANDALL, was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH stated that his colleague, Mr. FENTON, was detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleague, Mr. STROUSE, had been called home on important business.

Mr. LAW stated that his colleague, Mr. EDGERTON, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. WEBSTER, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. MORRILL objected.

Mr. LONGYEAR, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. STILES objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Creswell, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Eden, Eldridge, Ganson, Garfield, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Mallory, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stiles, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Wilder—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Dawes, Donnelly, Briggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Orth, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Wilson, and Windom—49.

So the resolution was adopted.

Before the vote was announced;

Mr. MCBRIDE, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. STILES objected.

Mr. COLE, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. STILES objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I give notice that when Illinois is again called I shall introduce a resolution repealing the one just adopted.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. COX. I submit the following resolution, and demand the previous question on its passage:

Resolved, That the President communicate to this House what steps, if any, he has taken, or is now taking, for the exchange of prisoners; and that, if compatible with the public service, he communicate all unpublished correspondence in relation to such exchange.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, on a division there were—ayes 36, noes 55.

Mr. DAWES. I propose to debate the resolution.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table, in order to get a vote on it.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising, the previous question not having been seconded, the resolution must lie over.

Mr. COX. I demand tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and Dawes were appointed.

Mr. COX. I will so modify my resolution that it will read, "this information shall be furnished if not incompatible with the public interest." We want to know what is going on in reference to the exchange of prisoners.

Mr. DAWES. I have entire confidence in the military arm of the Government in reference to this matter, quite as much, at least, as in our own competency.

Mr. COX. I do this on behalf of the prisoners of war and their friends at home.

Mr. DAWES. I think that the interests of the prisoners of war are safer in the hands of the Department than in ours.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, the tellers reported—ayes forty-four.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Does not the resolution lie over if objection be made?

The SPEAKER. It does, as it is a call on one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I object, and it must go over.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing.

Mr. GRINNELL. I rise to a point of order. The resolution is objected to, and it must go over, and I ask that further division be suspended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no way by which a division of the House can be interrupted, except by unanimous consent.

The tellers reported—noes fifty-six.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. DAWES. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then it goes over, under the rule.

TRIAL OF JAMES M. HUNT.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House all the testimony and proceedings before a military commission which convened at Norfolk, Virginia, on the 28th day of December, 1863, for the trial of James M. Hunt, late master of transportation and superintendent of vessels in the quartermaster's department of the department of Virginia.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Being a call on one of the Executive Departments, it must lie over under the rule, objection being made, even after the call for the previous question.

MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. ALLEY. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads House bill No. 142, to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes. It is of great importance to the Department and the country, and will elicit, I think, little or no discussion.

Mr. LOAN. I object.

Mr. ALLEY. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated.

The rules were suspended, and the report was received.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, the first section provides that all steamers and sailing vessels owned by citizens of the United States shall be compelled to carry the mails from any port in the United States to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port in the United States, for such reasonable compensation as may be allowed by law. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads thought this provision was just and proper, inasmuch as they receive the protection of the United States Government at a vast expense, and it is no more than what should be required of them that they should be compelled to perform this service for the Government. This is in accordance with the recommendation of the Department, and has received, I believe, the unanimous consent of the committee.

The second section provides suitable penalties for the enforcement of the provisions of the first section.

The third section authorizes the Postmaster General to make contracts to continue, not exceeding four years, for the transportation of all mailable matter other than letters, and of such letters as may be so directed, by the isthmus or the Nicaragua routes, provided the expenditure for the service shall not exceed $160,000 per annum. And in case more than one company is engaged in rendering this service, the Postmaster General shall determine the proportion of this sum which shall be paid to each.

At the present time the Department have contracted for carrying the mails by the overland route at an annual expense of $1,000,000. The newspaper mail and matter other than letters are conveyed by sea at a compensation, I believe, of $160,000 per annum to the parties carrying it. That service at present is contracted for by the contractors who carry this overland mail for $1,000,000. The Department thought it would be better for the Government to contract directly for this sea service, which they then would have exclusive control and jurisdiction over the whole matter. I think there can be no objection to this provision.

The fourth section provides that all mailable matter which may be conveyed by mail westward beyond the western boundary of Kansas, and eastward from the eastern boundary of California, shall be subject to prepaid letter postage rates. That provision is necessary to obviate this difficulty: a great quantity of heavy mail matter is now sent by the overland mail which should go by sea. The additional proviso is to prevent re-mailing from different points in the Territories on this side, and on that side in the same manner, by which the Government would be compelled to carry a great deal of mail matter over this route by this dodge which ought to go by sea. There is, however, a provision in the proviso to that section which gives to the publishers of papers the right to send by this overland mail copies of their papers to bona fide subscribers between the intermediate points I have mentioned, at the usual rates.

The fifth section provides that the Postmaster General may, if he shall deem it for the public interests, enter into contracts for any period not exceeding one year, for the transportation of the mails in steamships, by sea, between any of the ports in the United States; and that the sea service already performed by his order on the Atlantic coast and Gulf of Mexico be paid for out of any moneys appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department; also for such service already performed upon the Pacific coast a sum not exceeding $1,500, to be paid for out of any money appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department. This provision legalizes the transportation of mails by sea, which has been performed for the last year upon the Atlantic coast to New Orleans, and other places where there has been no opportunity to send the mails by land. Under the existing laws the Sixth Auditor refused to pay the bills which have been allowed by the Postmaster General for that service, upon the ground that existing laws did not provide for any such payment. In that opinion the First Comptroller accords, and there being no appeal except to Congress the Department was obliged to come here and ask additional legislation, giving the Postmaster General the power to employ this service, and instructing the Department to pay for it. That is a service which everybody will see must be performed; and no objection exists to the payment of this money upon the part of the Auditor, as I understand it, except that he believed he had no authority under the existing law to pay it.

The $1,500 provided to be paid to the contractors for sea service upon the Pacific coast is a sum which the committee believe sufficient to pay for all the service rendered. The claim, in the first place, was for $24,000. The Post Office Department cut it down to a much smaller sum. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads deemed the service of such a character that $1,500 would be sufficient to pay for it, and they accordingly reported that sum, believing that amount to be as much as the service was worth.

Section six provides that if any person or persons shall paint, print, post, or in any other manner place upon, or attach to, any steamboat or other vessel, or any stage-coach or other vehicle, which steamboat or other vessel, or stage-coach or other vehicle, is not actually used in carrying the mails of the United States, the words "United States" mail, or any other words, letters, or characters of like import; or if any person or persons shall give notice, either by publishing in any newspaper or otherwise, that any steamboat or other vessel, or any stage-coach or other vehicle, is used in carrying the mails of the United States, when the same is not actually so used, every person so offending or willfully aiding or abetting therein, shall, on conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $500 for every such offense; one half for the use of the United States and the other half to the use of the person informing and prosecuting for the same.

This provision is necessary because a great many vessels on the western waters have been in the habit of putting on their sides the words "United States mail." In consequence of that, they have received the large benefits growing out of the fact that the public believe that those vessels and steamers which are intrusted with the United States mails perform more regular and speedy service and are more safe than other vessels. Therefore the Government of the United States has been robbed to that extent of what we believe to be its just capital, and this provision is inserted here to obviate that difficulty and prevent these people from using the name of the Government in that way for their own private benefit. It is considered upon the western waters in some places of so much consequence that the Postmaster General has been able to get the mails carried for nothing on account of the advantages growing out of this privilege, but if the privilege is used as it has been in many quarters, why, of course, the benefit which the Government derives from that cause will be destroyed. I presume there will be no objection to this provision, and if no further explanation is required I will move the previous question.

Mr. LOAN. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw that demand for a moment.

Mr. ALLEY. I withdraw it for a moment to hear a suggestion from the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LOAN. This is a matter that interests us in the western country very much, and we desire to have a brief period of time to consider the matter. It is proposed to offer some amendments that are not now ready. It was expected that this measure would come up in the regular order of business, and not under a suspension of the rules.

There is also a provision in this bill for the payment of some private claims, and I understand that the bill, as read by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, limits the amounts to be paid to $1,500. The copy of the bill I have does not contain that limitation.

We desire an opportunity to prepare ourselves for the consideration of this matter. It comes up in an unexpected form and at an unexpected time, when we are not prepared to meet it, and I hope, therefore, that the previous question will not be sustained at this time.

Mr. ALLEY. I would be glad to give way to the gentleman from Missouri for any amendments he may desire to offer; but this is an important bill, and one which the Post Office Department desire to have passed at an early day. It should, in fact, have been passed long ago, and I think there can be no objection to it. It is a measure which has been thoroughly matured, and which has received the approbation of the Post Office Department and the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

If the gentleman wishes further legislation on the point suggested, he can have it done in a future bill. We shall be reporting other measures connected with this subject; but I do think it very important to the interests of the country, and particularly of the Pacific coast, that this bill shall be acted on at the present time. I must therefore insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BENNET. I hope the gentleman will give way to me for a moment.

Mr. ALLEY. I yield to the gentleman for a question or a suggestion.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman says that there is a necessity for the immediate passage of this bill. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity so urgent that this bill cannot be put off for a few days and acted upon hereafter when gentlemen are prepared to present their amendments?

Mr. GRINNELL. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will say that the Postmaster General states distinctly that without this legislation he is left at the mercy of a combination of contractors, and that it is absolutely necessary for the good of the service that this bill should pass, and pass immediately. I think that will be answer enough to the gentleman man from Colorado, without going into details.

Mr. BENNET. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa why it is that the proposal for bids on this overland route have recently been withdrawn?

Mr. GRINNELL. It is very well known that the overland service and the ocean service have been let together. It is now proposed to save the Government a large sum of money by letting them separately. I am not called upon to go into any explanation of that service. The gentleman from Colorado ought to understand as well as myself that this measure is necessary to avoid combinations of contractors.

Mr. ALLEY. I will answer the gentleman further, that it was at the request of the Post Office Committee of the Senate that the advertisement for proposals on that route was withdrawn, because they wished to have action on this bill before proposals were received. I understand that if this bill shall be passed immediately there will be a readvertisement for these proposals; but it is impossible to fix this matter up fully until provision is made for this sea service; and while this measure was before Congress and subject to the action of Congress, it was thought advisable by the Senate committee that these advertisements should be withdrawn until this provision could be made for sea service for the newspapers and heavy mails.

While, therefore, I would be very glad to accommodate the gentleman from Colorado by deferring action upon this bill, I deem it immediate passage of too great importance. I know that the interests of the country require action upon the bill at the present time. I believe that great inconvenience would result from delaying action upon it, and all that gentlemen desire can be obtained by future legislation on other bills.

Mr. BENNET. I wish to say that this is a very important bill for the people of my Territory, for by this route alone do we get all our mail service. I have not examined the amendment proposed by the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEY. The provision in the bill is exactly as the gentleman desired it, word for word, as it was handed to me by the gentleman himself. I submitted it to the Post Office Committee, and it was unanimously approved.

The amendment was read. It provides that the fourth section shall not be held to exclude the transmission by mail of newspapers from a known office of publication to bona fide subscribers, not exceeding one copy to each subscriber, to and from the intermediate points between the boundaries therein named, at the usual rates.

Mr. BENNET. That is all satisfactory to me. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. KINNEY. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether that amendment is confined to newspapers alone.

Mr. ALLEY. It extends to all matter between these intermediate points. The bill has been considered very attentively by the Post Office Committee, and we have heard the suggestions of gentlemen in this House from the Pacific coast. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GUARDIANS OF LUNATICS.

Mr. WILSON asked and obtained unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table House bill No. 42, to enable guardians and committees of lunatics appointed in the several States and other countries to act within the District of Columbia, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

The amendments were read. The first amendment was to strike out the words "or in any foreign country;" the second, to strike out the words "or a foreign country;" and the third, to strike out of the title the words "and other countries."

Mr. WILSON. I move that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN DICKSON.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent of the House to have the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 296, for the benefit of John Dickson, of Illinois.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from its further consideration, and the bill was brought before the House for action.

The bill directs the payment of $21,000 to John Dickson, of Illinois, to compensate him for the damages he sustained by reason of the failure of J. W. Belger, quartermaster of United States volunteers, to receive one hundred thousand bushels of corn tendered him by said Dickson, under a contract therefor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH asked for the reading of the report.

The report from the Committee on Military Affairs was read. The committee finds that the statements contained in the letter of Mr. Dickson are true, and the bill gives him the actual difference between the contract price (seventy-five cents per bushel) agreed to be paid by the Government and price realized by Dickson for the corn when he was obliged to sell it in the market of Baltimore, namely, fifty-four cents. This is twenty-one cents per bushel—amounting to $21,000. This does not include anything for storage, drayage, or interest.

Mr. Dickson's letter, referred to in the report, was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: Agreeable to your request I hand you the following statement:

In the month of December, 1861, I purchased of J. W. Bell, of Illinois, a contract made with him by the Government, at Baltimore, on the 28th day of November, 1861, for the delivery of one hundred thousand bushels of corn, to be delivered in Baltimore, at sixty-nine cents per bushel, and six cents per bushel for the sack—in all seventy-five cents per bushel. I agreed to pay Bell $900 for the contract, provided the quartermaster at Baltimore would sanction the assignment of the contract by Bell to me. I deposited the money with a gentleman in Chicago. And I was to take the contract and go on to Baltimore, and if the quartermaster would acknowledge the contract and the assignment to be right and correct, then I was to telegraph the gentleman in Chicago to pay over the money to Bell. I came on to Baltimore; called upon the quartermaster, (Major Belger;) showed him the contract with the assignment by Bell. Belger assured me that it was all right, and would be carried out, and ordered my name to be put on his books in the place of Bell's; also, when he made out his report of contracts made with different parties, I was one of the contractors named; and my name and contract were sent with others to the receiver of produce at the Camden station of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, but there was no order sent to receive the corn, and I was put off from day to day for two months, the quartermaster stating that they had no capacity to dispose of the corn, for they had such quantities on hand, and at the same time were receiving corn from other parties, at two cents per bushel more than I was to get for mine. After waiting over two months, I made a written tender of the corn to him. He then referred me to the Quartermaster General in Washington, and when I called upon him he said they had more corn on hand than he could dispose of, but wanted to know why Belger referred these things to him, as he (Belger) made the contract.

I held the corn until the month of June, 1862, paying storage. It was during this month that the Quartermaster General refused to receive the corn. Then I was compelled to sell on a low market in hot weather, receiving at an average of fifty-four cents per bushel, leaving me at a loss of twenty-one cents per bushel; besides storage and the interest of money that I had borrowed to purchase the corn and bags with. After I paid for the bags and corn, and expenses, I could not have made over one cent per bushel. However, I fulfilled my part of the contract in good faith. I never once thought but what the Government, through her agents, would do the same by me. I borrowed the money to pay for the corn and expenses, and my neighbors indorsed my notes, with the expectation that I would return the money in sixty days. I was not able to do so, owing to the Government failing to receive the corn. When I returned home I relieved my indorsers by giving trust deeds upon my property, which deeds matured several months since. I paid on them what money I received, and the time has been extended until now. I expended several thousand dollars of my own, which leaves me now more than twenty-five thousand dollars worse off than when I commenced.

JOHN DICKSON.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Committee on Military Affairs found that the statements contained in the letter of Mr. Dickson were true, from an inspection of all the papers and from the examination of witnesses. It is also true that the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session of Congress reported a bill in favor of this claimant to a larger amount than the one we have reported—twenty-four thousand dollars odd. It included the moneys paid for drayage, storage, &c. We have simply reported a bill to pay him the difference between the contract price of the corn and the price for which Mr. Dickson was obliged to sell it in the Baltimore market. We feel that it is an urgent case, and one appealing to our sense of justice and equity.

Mr. DRIGGS. I wish to inquire whether it is competent for us in this bill to censure the officer whose fault this was?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Major Belger has been already dismissed the service. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CONTESTANT.

Mr. MALLORY asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That John S. Sleeper, of Massachusetts, be allowed the mileage and pay that he would have been entitled to if he had been a member of this Congress.

Mr. ORTH. I object.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to suspend the rules to allow me to introduce the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the gentleman from Kentucky allow the resolution to be referred to the Committee of Elections?

Mr. MALLORY. I really see no necessity for the reference. The House understands the resolution. I have no doubt every member of the Committee of Elections would vote for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been usual to refer such resolutions to the Committee of Elections before passing them.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to suspend the rules, and I hope the House will adopt the resolution now.

The motion was not agreed to; two thirds not voting therefor.

GENERAL DEBATE FOR SATURDAYS.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the consent of the House to move that Saturday next, and each succeeding Saturday until further ordered, be set apart for general debate, with the understanding that no vote shall be taken.

There being no objection, the motion was received and adopted.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. With a view of moving to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency bill, I move to postpone all special orders in committee which take precedence of that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow us half an hour to go on with a call of committees for reports.

Mr. STEVENS. If committees could be regularly called for reports, I would yield.

The SPEAKER. The committees cannot be called in their regular order. If the House goes to the call of committees for reports, the gold bill will first come up. But the rules do not provide for a call of committees for reports on Monday.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will at any rate allow me to report one bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, which it is important should be passed.

Mr. STEVENS. The deficiency bill must be passed. There are many hands who have already been without their pay for several months in consequence of the delay in passing this bill.

NEW MEXICO CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial and papers of Emanuel Gallegos, contesting in this House the seat of the Delegate from New Mexico; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

NAVAL CODE.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, and on its adoption demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That two hundred and fifty additional copies of the proposed naval code be printed for the use of the Navy Department and the commissioner of the code.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. McKINNEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

NATIONAL ARMY.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported back House bill No. 267, authorizing commissioners to select a site for a national army, and for other purposes; which was referred to the select committee on national armories.

AARON T. DOLL.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Claims a joint resolution for the relief of Aaron T. Doll; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THE BAINBRIDGE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill fixing the date of the loss of the United States brig Bainbridge, and for the relief of officers, seamen, and marines of the same, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. LONGYEAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

RITCHIE'S COMPASS.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs inquire into the expediency of purchasing for the use of the United States the right to use and manufacture Ritchie's compass for iron-clad ships; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

DEFICIENCY BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Before going into committee, however, I move that all general debate upon the deficiency bill be terminated in ten minutes after the House goes into committee.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman desire the debate upon the deficiency bill to be limited to five minutes?

Mr. STEVENS. Five minutes, of course, upon each amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. Is that all? Well, sir, I wish to say that this is an entirely new bill. We sent it to the Senate with only six or seven millions and it has come back to us with $105,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman wish to debate the bill on general principles?

Mr. BROOKS. I do.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, that general debate be closed in one hour on the amendments of the Senate to the bill. I do not make that motion to occupy the time myself, but for the benefit of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to discuss the bill, and nothing else.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ASHLEY in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first question in order to be the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 156, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864.

First amendment of the Senate:

Strike out the following:

Treasury Department:

For salaries of additional clerks, messengers, and laborers in the several offices of the Treasury Department, from January 1 to June 30, 1864, namely:

In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, one clerk of class four, one of class three, eight of class two, and four of class one, $15,700.

In the construction branch of the Treasury, one supervising architect, one assistant architect, two clerks of class four, four of class three, two of class one, and one messenger, $9,000.

In the First Comptroller's office, five clerks of class four, and four of class one, substituted for one of class one, $4,800.

In the Second Comptroller's office, two clerks of class four, eight of class three, eight of class two, and fifteen of class one, $23,200.

In the First Auditor's office, two clerks of class four, and one of class two, $2,500.

In the Second Auditor's office, two hundred and six clerks of class one, and one clerk at $900 per annum, $124,050.

In the Third Auditor's office, two clerks of class four, two of class three, five of class two, twenty-four of class one, and one messenger and two laborers, $22,250.

In the Fourth Auditor's office, five clerks of class four, nine of class three, nine of class two, thirty-five of class one, and one laborer, $39,300.

In the Treasurer's office, four clerks of class four, two of class three, seventeen of class two, six of class one, and additional clerks, $27,700.

In the Register's office, four clerks of class four, six of class three, six of class two, eight of class one, and one messenger, $17,750.

In the office of the Commissioner of Customs, one clerk of class three, three of class two, and four of class one, $5,300.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that that amendment will not be concurred in. I understand the Third Auditor can get along with fewer clerks if he is allowed clerks of a higher class. I hope that the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means have recommended a concurrence in that amendment. The same thing is provided for in another section afterwards, which is the proper place for an amendment. I am willing all of these amendments of the Senate shall be non-concurred in, and let them go to a committee of conference, which I think would be the best way. The Senate have added some eighty-seven million dollars to the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Insert:

For supplying a deficiency in the current expenses of the branch mint at Denver for the current fiscal year, $18,377 69.

Mr. BROOKS. I have some remarks to make on this bill, and I would as lief make them now as at any other time. If it be in order to discuss the bill before acting on the amendments of the Senate, I will proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is now in order for one hour.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, when the deficiency bill, then under seven millions, was before the House some time ago, I expressed my surprise at its magnitude, and referred to the estimates to show that the appropriations were far beyond what the Secretaries asked. I have none of those remarks to retract. I rise now to remind the House that the objections I then made to this bill have greater force to the extraordinary additions made to this bill as it reaches us amended, that is, added to, by the Senate. The original estimates submitted to the House for deficiencies for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864, were only $4,180,531 13. These were made up of estimates—

For civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous.....	$1,311,371 13
For Interior Department, (Indian).....	4,213 00
For Navy Department.....	2,855,000 00

And here I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that though it must have been as well known then as now that the time of enlistment of a large body of our troops was about expiring, yet there was not a call for a dollar of "deficiency" from the War Department. The Secretary of War admitted, by his silence, that he had all the money he wanted. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, paid but little attention to the deficiency estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, ($4,180,531,) and the House of Representatives paid less, for both committee and House shot far beyond the original. As the bill went to the Senate it appropriated $7,469,109 65. The Senate sent it back to us with additional appropriations for deficiencies of $98,953,608. So the deficiency bill, as added to by the Senate, stands forward with the gigantic appropriation of $106,422,718 40. The Committee of Ways and Means have amended that bill by striking out $151,000, and the deficiency bill, as amended by the Committee of Ways and Means, asks us to appropriate $105,888,386 40. The table may be stated thus:

Amount contained in original (House) bill.....	$7,469,109 65
Senate amendments thereto.....	98,953,608 75

Total.....	106,422,718 40
------------	----------------

Amount stricken out of original bill by Senate amendments, in which the Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence.....	382,832 00
--	------------

Amount Inserted by Senate, in which the Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence.....	151,500 00
--	------------

Total amount in bill as now reported.....	$105,888,386 40
---	------------------

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from New York will not fail to say that the Committee of Ways and Means do not ask that sum. That is the amount of the bill as returned from the Senate.

The Committee of Ways and Means ask only about eight millions. All the remainder has been sent from the Senate. I will say to the gentleman that the committee have concluded to ask the House to non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BROOKS. I take the report of the action of the Committee of Ways and Means as annexed to the bill itself, in which they recommend concurrence in the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, six and a half, eighth, ninth, tenth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and sixteenth amendments of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. That is so, but at a subsequent meeting of the committee they thought it best to non-concur, if the House would agree to it.

Mr. BROOKS. I am correct, then.

Mr. STEVENS. Correct in reference to the first action of the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. I am both pleased and amazed at the change of action now first announced upon the part of the Committee of Ways and Means. I am pleased because the idea of non-concurrence shows they are appalled with the magnitude of the Senate appropriations as well as so humble a member of the House as myself. But I am more than amazed that they propose to take from this House, by the simple proposition to non-concur, the deliberate and detailed action of the House upon these enormous expenditures, and abandon the constitutional powers and functions of this House to examine in detail all these amendments of the Senate, and to throw that whole power from us into the hands of a mere committee of conference to be appointed by the Chair. To non-concur with the Senate upon this bill in its present stage is to abandon all our right, all our authority, all our duty to examine the details of expenditures proposed by the action of the Senate, and to throw the whole discussion and deliberation, which justly belong to this House, exclusively into the hands of a committee of conference.

The result of this action has recently been seen on the whisky bill. That bill was lost in this House by a large majority, defeated over and over again, the House having affirmed its intention to pass a retroactive law upon the stock of whisky on hand; yet the House was, by mere parliamentary action, by the action of a committee of conference, deprived of its legitimate power to impose a retroactive duty, as it intended, upon the stock on hand, and the Senate, by concurrence with the adhering action of the House, was enabled to pass the bill almost as originally intended by the Senate, despite all the resolves and re-resolves of the House.

I warn the House, therefore, in a bill of this enormous magnitude, disposing of over a hundred and five million dollars, not to abandon at this stage of the bill its legitimate function of examination in detail by bestowing it upon a mere committee of conference.

Mr. COLFAX, (the Speaker.) The gentleman will allow me to correct him as to a matter of fact. The reason why the bill did not have the retroactive feature in it when it finally passed, is because the House did not appoint a committee of conference at the last, but upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] adhered to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and allowed the Senate to recede from its amendments, thus leaving the bill without the retroactive feature.

Of course the gentleman will be just to the Chair by saying that in each instance a majority of the members of the committee on the part of the House agreed in their votes, with the majority of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I was far from casting any imputation whatever upon the action of the Speaker. He fairly represented on the committees of conference the majority of the House. I was but showing that though the House had determined by forty majority to have the thing its own way, and repeated that determination over and over again by ten and fifteen majority, yet by parliamentary action the determination of the House was reversed and the bill passed without this retroactive feature.

Mr. COLFAX. It was because the House refused to raise another committee of conference, but under the operation of the rules voted an adherence. The Senate then receded, and the bill passed.

Mr. STEVENS. The bill as it passed is precisely as the House agreed to it.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand all that. I comprehend the parliamentary tactics, comprehended them at the time, and if I had not intended to vote with the gentleman from Pennsylvania I should have resisted his proposition. It is because he is the old parliamentarian that he is now that he would still wish, if he could, to take from the discussion and examination of this House the details of this bill by the action of a conference committee, by transferring the forum of discussion—

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman makes a mistake. The reason why we have not a tax upon whisky on hand now is not because of parliamentary tactics. There is no trace of parliamentary tactics about it, and a reference to the facts will show it. The House put a tax on whisky on hand. The Senate struck that out as an amendment; it came back to the House, and the House concurred in that amendment; and the reason why there is no tax upon whisky on hand to-day is because the majority of the House, in its legitimate functions and in discharging its duty, without the aid or skill of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] at all, concurred in the action of the Senate. It was done by the concurrent action of the two Houses, and not by any committee of conference; and that is the reason why there is no tax on whisky on hand.

Mr. BROOKS. I comprehend all that thoroughly.

Mr. DAWES. Then the gentleman has less excuse for misstating it.

Mr. BROOKS. I comprehend it perfectly, and do not misstate it. I will not take time to discuss this matter. I simply state the fact that this House, at one time by forty-four majority, and at other times by majorities of ten and twelve, resolved and re-resolved to tax the whisky on hand, and the whisky on hand is not taxed despite the resolution of the House. The country understands that, and we will not dispute about the ways and means by which it was done. I say it was parliamentary tactics and conference committees. Other gentlemen think differently. The great facts are before us: the modus operandi we will not dispute about.

Mr. Chairman, whisky is an exciting and entrancing question, and I have been led altogether from the figurative speech I have on hand to the discussion of a far more exciting and thrilling topic than that of a mere bill of deficiencies. But tempting as is the theme, I must recall the attention of the House, however, to the dryer topic which we have on hand, namely, this $105,888,386 appropriation. We have here left a few deficiencies for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1863, and ending June 30, 1864.

I call the attention of the House first to the fact that in this deficiency bill alone there are for the War Department alone appropriations amounting to about ninety-nine millions, when at the beginning of the session, in the estimates submitted by the War Department through the Secretary of the Treasury, not one single cent was asked for by the Secretary of War for a deficiency in his appropriations. And yet now, when all the facts relating to deficiencies must have been just as well known to the Secretary of War in the beginning of the session—and now that Secretary comes before the Senate, and through the Senate before this House, without any estimates whatever being submitted to this House, and asks an additional appropriation of over ninety-eight millions to make up a deficiency in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864.

Why, sir, the whole expenses of this Government in the year 1815, during the last war with Great Britain, that contest which this then comparatively feeble nation carried on with the greatest Power upon earth, were but $48,244,495. The expenses of the Army for that war were, in 1813, $19,662,013 02; in 1814, $20,350,806 86; in 1815, $14,794,294 22; and yet the deficiency asked for by the Secretary of War for one single year amounts to four or five times the cost of any one year of the war of 1812.

The whole appropriations of this Government in 1847-48, the years of the Mexican war, were but little over sixty millions per annum. The actual expenses of the War Department were, in 1847, $35,776,495; in 1848, $27,838,374. And that war, which was not upon our own soil, but was costly in the transfer of troops from our own country to a foreign country; that war in which our troops, landing at Vera Cruz, passed on through the tierra caliente, the hot region of Mexico, to its mountains, to Churubusco and Chapultepec, on to the Garetta of Mexico; that glorious war in which we humbled Mexico and brought the Mexicans to our own terms, cost this Government but $35,776,495, the highest sum in the year 1847; and yet here is a war deficiency bill of over ninety-eight millions for the War Department alone for one year, or over sixty-three millions beyond what the war with Mexico cost a year.

There is something wrong in all this; there must be something wrong; and hence the House should not abandon its functions, but should look into these expenditures, and see when, how, and where this money has been appropriated, and where these enormous sums of money have gone, who have had them, in what quarters they have been paid, why they are called for, and what they are to effect. Sir, if these disbursements for the War Department are to go on for three, four, or five years longer, it will be beyond the power of this country or of any other country on the face of the earth to endure them.

The Secretary of War in his estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, (see Treasury Report, page 30,) asked for and had appropriated $885,479,511. The Secretary of the Treasury, when he submitted that report to Congress, felt sure in his own mind that $885,479,511 was ample and enough for all the expenditures of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, and hence not a single cent additional was then called for either by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Secretary of War himself. And yet here in February and March we propose to add to this already appropriated sum of $885,479,511, a deficiency in this bill of $98,500,000. What calculations are all these? Can man thus carry on war, or provide the men and means for carrying on war?

More than that. Recall a little of the past history of our legislation during this session. At an early period of the session, before the Christmas holidays, there went through this House, in twenty minutes by the clock, a deficiency of $20,000,000 for bounties—a million a minute—uncalled for by the Secretary of War, or by the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimate. I made some quiet remarks on that occasion. I called the attention of the other side of the House to the subject, but I found that my remarks were not pleasant to the other side, and I refrained from discussing the subject at length, leaving the responsibility with those to whom it belonged.

In a few days after the Christmas holidays, the Secretary of War called upon us to change that bounty appropriation of $20,000,000, and in a very few minutes, opposed only by an honorable gentleman from Ohio, on the other side, there went quietly through a bill for bounties, which I said then had in it $100,000,000. Now, under the continuance of the bounty system to April 1, that bill has in it at least $124,000,000 to be added to the estimate of the Secretary of War. Take not my word for it. I quote from the chairman of the Military Committee in the Senate:

"I suppose that we have, since the 17th October, paid and agreed to pay for these bounties from ninety to one hundred million dollars. It must be over ninety millions, for we have paid bounties, I think, to very near three hundred thousand men."

"I suppose if the payment of these bounties is extended and we go on raising men at the rate we are now raising them, that we shall raise during the coming month somewhere from sixty to eighty thousand men, paying a portion of them $400 and another portion $300."

Which, counting seventy thousand men at the average of $350 per man, will make $24,500,000; so that if you take the actual expenditures and appropriations of the Department as now put upon paper as recorded in the Treasury report, at $885,479,511, add to that $98,500,000 deficiency and $120,000,000 for bounty, there will have been appropriated for the War Department of this Government alone, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1864, the gigantic sum of $1,103,979,511.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I wish to correct the gentleman in one respect, if he will permit me.

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. The payment of these bounties is extended over the whole term of enlistment, and only a small portion is to be expended this year.

Mr. BROOKS. Not a small portion—a considerable portion.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. One fourth, I think.

Mr. BROOKS. What I am speaking about is the appropriations for this year. I do not suppose that the bounties will be all expended in the year.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. About a fourth of the moneys to be expended in bounties will be expended this year.

Mr. BROOKS. More than that. But, nevertheless, it's the sum of money appropriated that I am speaking of—the appropriations of Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864. The more money that is saved the better; but all these bounties are to be paid in some time or other.

I hold in my hand a record of the expenses of the British army from 1810 to 1816, in each year—those terrible years of struggle in which the little island of Great Britain and the lesser isle of Ireland were coping against the gigantic power of Napoleon, who had taken the French armies in triumph from the sands of Egypt to the snows of Moscow—that little island which was subsidizing all the other Powers of Europe to fight her battles against that mighty Napoleon. The expenditures of the British army in the year 1810 were $84,415,000; and in 1816, on the closing scenes of the battle of Waterloo, they were $171,035,000. The aggregate expenditures for the seven years from 1810 to 1816 inclusive were $906,730,000. The details were thus:

Expenditures of the British army in the years—

1810.....	$84,415,000
1811.....	90,680,000
1812.....	119,345,000
1813.....	124,935,000
1814.....	147,345,000
1815.....	168,975,000
1816.....	171,035,000
Total.....	$906,730,000

But, sir, for the single fiscal year of 1863-64 we, who are coping with no Napoleon, with no combination of powers for our overthrow—but when a few rebellious States, started without resources and full of all the elements of weakness, are lightly operated upon—we have appropriated more money in a single year to subdue this rebellion than was appropriated for the whole British empire in the six years from 1810 to 1816 to subdue the august Napoleon, at one time combining all the continental nations of Europe for British overthrow.

I do not allude to these things for the purpose of creating alarm or exciting the fears of the country, only to arouse the country to comprehend the magnitude of this war, and to begin now to lay the necessary taxation to support it, so that we may not in the future find ourselves unable to sustain the credit of the country. That is my object and intention in calling the attention of the House to the enormous expenditures of the War Department.

A thousand million dollars per annum, Mr. Chairman, a billion dollars—I do not know how it is with others, but I must confess that to my humble mind these sums are so appalling that I can hardly begin to comprehend their gigantic magnitude when we are called upon to transmit them to our children as a public debt. I confess that I often turn back to the olden times in the history of this Government. I was here in this House in a time when the expenditure by this Government of forty-four, forty-six or forty-eight millions was regarded as an enormous extravagance, and that was not long ago, in 1849-50, 1851-52. I recollect when the then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, then an honorable gentleman from Alabama, well known to the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, educated in a country where cotton even was not raised, but in northern Alabama, where corn and wheat were the productions, and where a dollar was estimated by the price of a bushel of corn or the price of a bushel of wheat—I recollect well how appalled he was at the enormous magnitude of the expenditure by this Government of forty-four, forty-six, or forty-eight million dollars. Indeed, he had a mind so constituted that members who served with him upon the floor of the House will remember that he could not comprehend anything above half a million dollars. Whenever a sum came up in our appropriations of as much as a hundred thousand dollars he was wont to be confused, but when it ran up to half a million dollars he would often abandon his appropriation bill and exclaim, "Good God, what is the country coming to?" Why, sir, if he was here this day he would be lost in inextricable confusion by these enormous appropriations for the War Department only.

Indeed, we in the great cities who are somewhat accustomed to figures, and who represent millions, will soon be compelled, if these expenditures go on, to bring to our aid something more than mere arithmetic, the science of geometry or mensuration say, and measure a million by an inch, a billion by two inches, a trillion by three inches, a quadrillion by four inches, a quintillion by five inches, and so on, or if that does not present numeration or measurement sufficient to enable us to understand these sums we shall have to resort to the science of algebra, apply x as an unknown quantity of expenditure, and work with that. An equation may be stated thus: $AB + CD \times EF = XYZ = LMNOPQ$. [Laughter.]

Sir, it is becoming beyond the power of arithmetic or the power of simple mathematics to compute these appropriations, or to understand the loans or systems of loans on which they are being founded. The whole concern anon will be more puzzling than the consols or exchequer of the debt of England.

The estimates of the War Department for 1865 are, in round numbers, $536,000,000. Sir, it is evident from these appropriations for 1863-64 we are now making that if this war is to continue these estimates for 1865 are not worth the paper they are written upon, for the actual expenditure of the present fiscal year for 1864 of the War Department will amount to almost if not quite a thousand million dollars—certainly, if we pay up the war warrants of the quartermasters, their certificates of obligation, and the great debts now due to the States for money and troops advanced to the Federal Government for military services rendered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it right, is it proper, is it a legitimate mode of coming before the country with an estimate in December of only $4,180,581 deficiency and then before the bill is perfected require, as sanctioned by the Senate, a deficiency of $105,000,000? I repeat, sir, is it right or just to the country thus to throw dust in their eyes? Is it not wise, is it not now our duty at the start to look this war with all its consequences fully in the face, and to provide for this enormous expenditure and these enormous appropriations the only means by which, if the war is to be persisted in, the credit of the country can be sustained, a system of taxation which shall be proportionate to our expenditure? Is it just for us to leave for posterity the full payment of these loans? Sir, under a concordant Cabinet, or any unit administration of the Government, these disorders between estimates and appropriations could not occur.

But every Secretary we see now "runs his own machine." The Secretary of State runs his, and thrusts in appropriations for lawless foreign missions; the Secretary of War runs his, and thrusts in over ninety-eight millions of deficiencies, two months after he says he has enough in the annual appropriations; the Secretary of the Navy runs his; while the Secretary of the Treasury, the victim of all, because he has to find paper money for all, runs his printing machines, and his presidential machine, one and all. Is it any wonder that under such an administration of the Government we are annually spending more money to subdue a few million starving rebels than Great Britain spent in six years to bring down the world-wandering eagles of the great Napoleon.

I availed myself of a former opportunity to denounce this whole system of deficiency bills. I showed that appropriations were made without law. I exhibited in this bill, and it is here reproduced, the creation of four hundred and forty odd clerks utterly without law. I showed the creation of a foreign mission by the Secretary of State without law.

The recklessness of law has become so rife among the Departments that even the Commissioner of Agriculture turns up in this bill in the most extraordinary demand for a deficiency. When we have deficiencies in the Departments it is not to be wondered at that the Commissioner of Agriculture comes before Congress and tells it that he has purchased things without law for which he must have an appropriation. I find in the Senate amendments the following:

To supply deficiencies in the Department of Agriculture for the current year, as follows:
For the purchase of sorghum seed, $2,000.
For rebuilding shop in the propagating garden, $800.
For postage, $1,320.
For carpets, furniture, and cans for fruit, $350.
For fuel, $300.

This is the farcical part of the bill. I allude to it not in resistance to the purchase of these humble matters, for seed may do some good to the country, while appropriations for this war are all lost except as they may serve to restore the Union. This gentleman with the illustrious name, in a letter to the Finance Committee of the Senate, says:

"The destructive frosts of last autumn in a large part of the West rendered entirely worthless many important seeds which I have been called upon to supply, chief of which is the sorghum, now becoming one of the most important crops of the country. In several of the large States the seed was so generally destroyed that I have felt obliged at the urgent call of the farmers to send abroad for a fresh supply of pure seed."

Great sorghum-seed seller!

"An increasing belief among the people in the feasibility of producing an excellent article of silk from the silkworm, and repeated inquiries for the means of its production, have led me to order a large quantity cocoons from France, where it has proved a perfect success."

Importer of cocoons!

"An extensive failure of the corn crops, with other causes, has created a great demand for new and different varieties of wheat for both fall and spring sowing, which has been met by importations from England, Russia, and the Mediterranean, and by purchases of improved varieties of American growth."

Great wheat-seed dealer!

"The very great and increasing interest in the culture of the grape, and the consequent demand for vines, has induced a large increase in the expenses of the propagating garden."

Vines for the propagating garden! Well, well! All this in a deficiency bill. What next may we be coming to?

The Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture gives no excuse for his lawless purchase of carpet, furniture, and cans for fruit, except that he has expended the money, and wants an appropriation for it!

This is a mere farce. It is not worthy of notice, except to show that the higher officers of the Government, by the creation of foreign missions, by enormous expenditures, without law, have induced the Commissioner of Agriculture to purchase canned fruit, sorghum seed, carpet, and furniture, all in humble imitation of the higher powers that thus act without law.

But there are other appropriations in this bill which are far from being farcical, and which may be termed tragical. To these I call the attention of the House. The Quartermaster comes before the country and asks for $25,000,000 deficiency for additional transportation for the Army for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864. The Senate have increased that, and increased it to $30,000,000 in the bill now before the House. The Quartermaster General says:

"This deficiency is caused by the activity of movement of the armies, the great expense of the transportation of the army operating against Vicksburg, the transfer of army corps from the army of the Potomac to the division of the Mississippi, the Texas expedition, the transportation furnished to veteran volunteers to and from their homes, furloughed or reënlising, and the purchase of transports."

But the Quartermaster General has not told the whole truth. These $30,000,000 deficiencies have also been made necessary by the transportation of troops to influence and carry elections in the country. If we could have the details of these quartermaster expenditures the House would find that a large part of this new deficiency was created in the expense of the transportation of a regiment or two to New Hampshire a year ago to carry the election in that State. If we could have a history of the transportation of troops we would find that several regiments and portions of regiments supposed to be favorable to the dominant party were carried to and fro to vote at the expense of the Government. There has been transportation of the Army solely to execute the purposes of the party in power.

If we could have the history of the transportation of the Army, we would find that a large number of troops selected for being favorable to the Administration party were sent last October and November to New York, Pennsylvania, or to the western States, and afterwards to Maryland and Delaware to carry the elections there. There is where the deficiency of $30,000,000 reported by the Committee of Ways and Means is mainly due. It is due to the efforts of the War Department to carry the elections of the country. There is where the money has gone. It is not for the legitimate expenditures of this war; it is not for the capture, overthrow, and destruction of the rebel army, and it is not to plant the stars and stripes upon the capitol hill of Richmond, or on the forts of Mobile and Charleston; but it is to subdue the Democracy, the conservative power of New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and of the great West; in short, to overawe by arms before the ballot-boxes the people of the country. I denounce it with all the vigor and power of which I am capable. Here and hereafter will I denounce it, and I appeal from the majority of this House to the God of heaven to put the mark of reprobation upon these wicked and criminal acts; I appeal to the genius of liberty which has so long hovered over and protected this hitherto blessed country to overthrow the party in power, that thus illegitimately perverts the valor and the generosity and the patriotism of a great people to overthrow their free institutions. I appeal to history and to posterity to brand with everlasting infamy the men who thus bring arms into elections, and who with the cartridge-box trample the ballot-box under foot. I know I shall not be heard or heeded on the floor of this House; but the brand of history and the curse of posterity will be the just doom of all these destroyers of the liberties of their country.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I would like to inquire of my colleague whether it would not be less expensive to let the soldiers of New York vote in the Army than to send them home?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not choose now to be drawn into that discussion.

I voted for this first deficiency bill of $7,000,000. I voted for it not cheerfully, but because in time of war it seemed necessary to be generous, extravagant, if you please, in generosity. I have voted for all the appropriation bills which have gone from this House, but I am going to leave this bill to be voted for by such as approve these quartermaster deficiencies in it. Some time since was remarked by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] in good Virgilian Latin, that the times "did not need help from this side of the House or such helpers as we are." I am disposed to accept him and his friends at his word—to let them pass this large deficiency bill. As for myself, I shall not vote a single dollar as a deficiency for transportation for the Army until this transporting of the military to carry the elections is made clear. Those who favor such an appropriation as this must and shall vote for it. As for myself I never will take the responsibility of voting for a single cent of it, and in justification of my course upon this subject I shall appeal to the public, whom I desire to bear in mind that this House has not before it a single item of legitimate estimate for any of these deficiencies and appropriations. The Committee of Ways and Means may have had them, but the House has not got them. There has been no inquiry what the expenditures have been in New England, in the northern States, in Maryland, and in the western States; and until we have a detail of these expenditures for election purposes, if not a single other vote is given against this bill, I shall on this deficiency bill, with the greatest pleasure with which I have given any vote in my life, vote "no."

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the hour allowed for debate has expired, and I will confine my remarks to five minutes.

I am glad the gentleman from New York has taken this occasion to get out his campaign document. [Laughter.] It will save considerable time on some other occasion, and I do not know when time can be better saved. As to the gentleman appealing from the committee and from this House or a majority of it to another tribunal, well and good, if his appeal can be entertained there. I do not know whether any of us have a standing in that court, but the gentleman can try it. The gentleman will vote for no transportation of troops. Very well.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, the gentleman will vote for none of this thirty millions for transportation. That suits very well the tactics of the gentleman's party. In the first place you vote to have no troops according to law, and in the second place you vote to keep them out of the field, and that they shall not be transported to the enemy where they can be of service. I did not expect any help from that side of the House—I mean from some of those gentlemen. I was very glad to hear this denunciation of the Committee of Ways and Means. I remember very well when my learned friend was in the House at the time the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. Houston) was chairman of the committee and introduced his most extravagant appropriation bills. I was very glad to hear him make the same speech against that gentleman which he has just made against us. It was natural enough, now that he is on the other side, that he should make the same speech against us, and it applies just as well.

Let us consider calmly these different amendments. They are very large. They amount to $80,000,000 and upward. When the first estimates were before the committee, and they framed this bill, there had been no call for the additional five hundred thousand men. After they were called for, and this bill was sent to the Senate, new estimates were made; they were sent here, were printed in pamphlet form, and the gentleman, I presume, had them upon his table. If there are any items that are improper let us vote them down; but the idea that we are to paralyze the arm of the Government and strike down the appropriations for the half million of men now called for to meet the rebels in the spring may become that side of the House, but it would disgrace patriots.

Now, sir, excuse me for taking thus much notice of a speech which was not intended for this bill, but was intended for the time when the gentleman will meet his colleague on the stump. Let us go on and consider the amendments of the Senate. I will not ask that they shall all be rejected, as the gentleman seems to be afraid of that. I am willing that they shall be considered in detail. It will only take a few days, and as we shall certainly reject most of them the matter will go to a committee of conference, as I proposed in the first instance; but the difficulty which the gentleman will encounter is that if the House should adopt some of the amendments it will be against his theory. I am willing, however, that the House shall go on and let each amendment be considered by itself.

Before we proceed with the bill I would like the committee to reconsider its action upon the first amendment of the Senate by agreeing to take a new vote upon it. The Committee of Ways and Means have agreed to concur in it because it strikes out certain appropriations which are duplicated in another part of the bill. I hope the committee will agree to do that before proceeding further with the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to object to going back, and for this reason: if the amendment of the Senate, to which the gentleman refers, is agreed to, it would seem to render it necessary that a subsequent amendment increasing very largely the number of clerks and their salaries shall also be concurred in. I must, therefore, object to going back.

Mr. MORRILL. The matter can be arranged when the bill is reported to the House. It is perhaps due that I should say that the first amendment which I asked the House to non-concur in was a separate and distinct one in itself. I supposed that it embraced not only the question of striking out, but also that of inserting what the Senate proposed. I find now that it does not do that, and I have no objection to the striking out.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would not the effect of striking this out be to compel the House to insert what the Senate proposes to insert in a subsequent part of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir. The gentleman will find the proposition to which he refers set forth in a separate section at the end of the bill. It requires a concurrence in that section in order to meet the full views of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to going back?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; I object for the present. I do not understand this matter exactly.

The second amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

Third amendment:

Strike out the following paragraphs:

For compensation of return clerk from January 1 to June 30, 1864, $600.

For compensation of the surveyor general of Illinois and Missouri, the office to be hereafter closed, $1,663 48.

For compensation of clerks in the office of the surveyor general of California, $1,350.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

On page 4 of the printed bill, after line seventy, insert the following:

To supply deficiencies in the Department of Agriculture for the current year, as follows:

For the purchase of sorghum seed, $2,000.

For rebuilding shop in the propagating garden, $800.

For postage, $1,320.

For carpets, furniture, and cans for fruit, $350.

For fuel, $300.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

On page 5, after line eighty-seven, insert the following: To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the purchase and manufacture of arms for volunteers and regulars, ordnance and ordnance stores, $7,700,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of arms at the national armory, $700,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the Surgeon General's department, to wit:

For medical instruments and dressings, $1,300,000.

For hospital stores, bedding, and so forth, $1,300,000.

For hospital furniture and field equipment, $300,000.

For books, stationery, and printing, $35,000.

For ice, fruits, and other comforts, $100,000.

For hospital clothing, $40,000.

For citizen nurses, $38,000.

For sick soldiers in private hospitals, $17,000.

For artificial limbs for soldiers and seamen, $16,000.

For citizen physicians and medicines furnished by them, $185,000.

For hire of clerks and laborers in purveying depots, $25,000.

For contingent expenses of the medical department, $5,000.

For medicines and medical attendance for negro refugees, commonly called "contrabands," $33,000.

For washing and washing machines for hospitals where matrons cannot be employed, $1,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army, to wit:

For volunteers and drafted men, $5,825,000.

For employes, $640,640.

For women, $218,400.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the engineer department:

For contingencies of fortifications, including fieldworks, $500,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the quartermaster's department, to wit:

For purchase of cavalry and artillery horses, $17,500,000.

For regular supplies of the quartermaster's department, $18,500,000.

For barracks, quarters, and so forth, $3,500,000.

For transportation of the Army, $30,000,000.

For incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, $2,000,000.

For transportation of officers' baggage, $100,000.

For clothing, camp and garrison equipage, $7,000,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the Adjutant General's department:

For purchase of books of tactics, $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are all those items understood to be one amendment, or are they separate amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. They are one amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask some member of the Committee of Ways and Means whether this appropriation of $33,000 for medicines and medical attendance for negro refugees commonly called "contrabands" is for attendance upon African soldiers in the service, or if it is for the benefit of the refugee contrabands now within the lines of the Government and under the control of the Government? If it is understood that this is an appropriation for the benefit of negro soldiers employed by the Government, it may be all right and proper. The objection that I make is to the propriety of appropriating this sum of money for the medical attendance of persons who are in no way in the service of the Government. I am not ready to make a motion on the subject, for I do not know exactly the purport of the appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understand the gentleman aright, the answer is that this estimate is made simply for the service of the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then this is simply for the medical attendance on negro soldiers. The item is "for medicine and medical attendance for negro refugees, commonly called contrabands." Is it for the benefit of negro soldiers employed by the Government, or is it for persons not in the employment of the Government?

Mr. STEVENS. These negro refugees, as the gentleman knows, are all taken charge of and employed by the Government under act of Congress. Some of them are employed about the fortifications. Some of them are enlisted in the Army. It is for the purpose of furnishing them with medicine and medical attendance that this appropriation is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to amend by adding the following words: "who are or shall be in the employment of the Government."

Mr. STEVENS. I think the bill is well enough as it is. I know the gentleman from Illinois wants to help it, [laughter,] but I think we will let it stand.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will not accept the amendment because he knows very well that this appropriation is not for slaves or contrabands in the employment of the Government of the United States, but for those negroes who have run from their masters, and who are in camps all down the Mississippi river, supported by the Government of the United States without authority of law. I think that this appropriation is without law, and that it ought not to have its place in this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know any such thing. I do not know that a single man of them is supported without authority of law. I have no such knowledge.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what Department of the Government has sent in estimates to the Committee of Ways and Means for these items?

Mr. STEVENS. The appropriation comes from the Senate under estimates made to the Senate, which are printed.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not think that any estimates were sent for this item to the Senate. No estimate for any such appropriation came to the Committee of Ways and Means. If there be any necessity for it, that necessity existed when the bill was before the Committee of Ways and Means for its action. And the chairman, knowing that no estimate was sent to our committee, must therefore know that no such estimate was sent to the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is under a misapprehension. I find in the additional estimates an item for medicine and medical attendance for negro refugees, commonly called contrabands.

Mr. MALLORY. Additional estimates sent to the Senate?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I beg pardon of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Kentucky will look at these additional estimates, he will find an item: "for medicines and medical attendance for negro refugees, commonly called contrabands, $33,750." The gentleman has forgotten it, I know.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not observe that any estimate was sent to the Senate for this appropriation, but I retract what I said in regard to the matter, as the gentleman has read it from the estimates sent to the Senate. But am I not still correct in saying that it is not for the benefit of colored soldiers, or of those employed in the service of the United States?

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the item is simply: "medicine and medical attendance for negro refugees, commonly called contrabands."

Mr. MALLORY. Then it is evident that this appropriation is for the benefit of those slaves who have come into the Army of the United States, and are taken care of and supported by the Army. This is a proposition to make that legal for which there was no legal authority before.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania supposes that this appropriation is for the purpose of supplying medicine and medical attendance for negroes in the service of the Government, it is very proper for him to say so; for it surely would be a very extraordinary thing on the part of Congress to appropriate money for persons not so employed.

Mr. STEVENS. May I say to the gentleman from Indiana that if he will look at the heading of the estimate, he will find that it is for those who are put into the hospitals, so that they are so far in the military service that they have been in the service, come out, and gone into hospitals.

Mr. GANSON. Why are they called "refugees" then?

Mr. STEVENS. They are refugees. They are those who have been once slaves, but who having left or been left by their former masters have gone into the service of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. If they are in the service of the United States, why does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist upon calling them "refugees"?

Mr. STEVENS. I call them refugees. They are not slaves. They have been slaves, but, having gone into the service of the United States, they will not be again remanded to slavery unless by some new method of reconstruction it should be accomplished.

Mr. MALLORY. I call them slaves, because I do not recognize the validity of any proclamation freeing slaves. I therefore call them slaves.

Mr. STEVENS. I call them refugees; because, although they have been slaves, they have taken to themselves wings—

Mr. MALLORY. Say "legs;" don't say "wings." [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. And flown away, and they are therefore refugees.

Mr. MALLORY. They have run away, there is no doubt about that; but they have not yet quite become angels and been endowed with wings. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. If these people are in the employment of the Government, then the amendment I have suggested will do them no harm. If they are not, then this appropriation is not properly in this bill. I therefore insist upon my amendment, so that the House may vote intelligently upon the subject. If these persons are in the service of the United States, there is, of course, no objection to this appropriation for them; and with the appropriation so guarded, I shall give it my cordial support.

Mr. KASSON. Before the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana is put to vote I ask gentlemen upon the other side to look at it as a question of fact, which appears before the country in connection with this war.

It is well known throughout the country and in this House that many of these colored people whose masters have fled from them as our Army has advanced, and who have been left without subsistence, without support, have resorted to the vicinity of the camps occupied by the United States Army. And that fact is not only applicable to the black people, but also the white people. White people, and bitter secessionists too, have actually become refugees near the camps of the Army of the United States for the purpose of
